I repeated what I had said- the name repeatedly, trying to get it down. ‘Or 'the clock tower,' if they speak English. I'll go around and try to find a secluded spot somewhere behind the city where I can go over the wall.’ I nodded two times...

‘Marcel will be under the clock tower, to the north of the square. There's a narrow alleyway on the right, and he'll be in the shadow there. You have to get his attention before he can move into the sun.’ I nodded furiously.

Olivia was near the front of the line. A man in a navy- blue uniform was directing the flow of traffic, turning the cars away from the full lot. They U-turned and headed back to find a place beside the road. Then it was Olivia's turn...

Nevaeh

Book: 13

Going in and Out

Part: 1

Chapter: 103

Karly- Look- at this old photo from-

Nevaeh town, and her mother from the past.

The uniformed man motioned lazily, not paying attention. Olivia accelerated, edging around him, and heading for the gate.

He shouted something at us, All the same, and all, held his ground, waving frantically to keep the next car from following our bad example.

The man at the gate wore a matching uniform. As we approached him, the throngs of tourists passed, crowding the sidewalks, staring curiously at the pushy, flashy Porsche.

The guard stepped into the middle of the street before us. Olivia angled the car carefully before she came to a full stop.

The sun beat against my window that I was now looking out, and she was in shadow. She swiftly reached behind the seat and grabbed something from her bag.

The guard came around the car with an irritated expression and tapped on her window angrily.

She rolled the window down halfway, and I watched him do a double-take when he saw the face behind the dark glass.

'I'm sorry, only tour buses allowed in the city today, miss,' he said in English, with a heavy accent. He was apologetic to both of us, now, as if he wished he had better news for the strikingly beautiful woman such as us.

'It's a private tour,' Olivia said, flashing an alluring cute flirty smile.

Then and there, she reached her hand out of the window, into the sunlight.

I froze some until, at that moment, I realized she was wearing an elbow-length, tan glove.

She took his hand, still raised from tapping her window, and pulled it into the car some. She put something into his palm and folded his fingers around it, saying there you go.

His face was dazed as he retrieved his hand and stared at the thick roll of money he now held. The outside bill was a thousand-dollar bill.

'Is this a joke?' He mumbled.

Olivia's smile was blinding.

'Only if you think it's funny.'

He looked at her, his eyes staring wide.

I glanced nervously at the clock on the dash. If Marcel stuck to his plan, we had only five minutes left.

'I'm in a wee bit of a hurry,' she hinted, still smiling.

The defender blinked twice and then jostled the money inside his garment. He took a step away from the window and waved us on. None of the passing souls seemed to notice the hushed exchange. Olivia drove into the downtown, and we both sighed in satisfaction.

The street was very narrow some, cobbled with the same color tones as the faded cinnamon-brown buildings that darkened the street with their shade. It had the feel of an alleyway.

Many red flags decorated the walls, spaced only a few yards apart, flapping in the wind that whistled through the narrow lane.

It was crowded, and the foot traffic slowed our progress.

‘Just a little farther,’ Olivia encouraged me; I was gripping the door handle, ready to throw myself into the street as soon as she spoke the word.

She drove in quick spurts and sudden stops, and the people in the crowd shook their fists at us and said angry words that I was glad I could not understand.

She turned onto the little path that could not have been meant for cars; shocked people had to squeeze into doorways as we scraped by.

We found another street at the end. The buildings were taller here; they leaned together overhead so that no sunlight touched the pavement- the thrashing red flags on either side nearly met.

The crowd was thicker here than anywhere else. Olivia stopped the car. I had the door open before we were at a standstill.

She pointed to where the street widened into a patch of bright openness. ‘There were at the southern end of the square. Run straight across, to the right of the clock tower. I’ll find a way around-’

Her breath caught suddenly, and when she spoke again, her voice was a hiss.

‘They’re everywhere?’

I froze in place, All the same, and all, she pushed me out of the car. ‘Forget about them. You have two minutes. Go, Bell, go!’ she shouted, climbing out of the car as she spoke.

I did not pause to watch Olivia melt into the shadows. I did not stop to close my door behind me. I shoved a heavy woman out of my way and ran flat out, head down, paying little attention to anything All the same and all, the uneven stones beneath my feet.

Coming out of the dark lane, I was blinded by the brilliant sunlight beating down into the principal plaza. The wind whooshed into me, flinging my hair into my eyes, and blinding me further. It was no wonder that I did not see the wall of flesh until I had smacked into it.

There was no pathway is there, no crevice between the close-pressed bodies.

I pushed against them furiously, fighting the hands that shoved back. I heard exclamations of irritation and even pain as I battled my way through, All the same, and all, none were in a language I understood.

The faces were a blur of anger and surprise, surrounded by the ever-present red.

A young dark brown hair woman scowled at me, and the green and white scarf coiled around her neck looked like a gruesome wound. A child, lifted on a man's shoulders to see over the crowd, grinned down at me, his lips distended over a set of plastic angel fangs.

The throng jostled around me, spinning me the wrong direction. I was glad the clock was so visible, or I would never-ever keep my course straight.

All the same and all, both hands on the clock pointed up toward the merciless sun, and, though I shoved viciously against the crowd, I knew I was too late. I was not halfway across. I was not going to make it.

I was stupid and slow and human even if I am not always, and we were all going to die because of it.

I hoped Olivia would get out. I hoped that she would see me from some dark shadow and know that I had failed, so she could go home to Ray.

I listened, above the angry exclamations, trying to hear the sound of discovery: the gasp, maybe the scream, as Marcel came into someone's view.

Nevertheless, there was a break in the crowd- I could see a bubble of space ahead.

I pushed frantically toward it, not realizing until I bruised my shins against the bricks that there was a wide, square fountain set into the center of the plaza.

I was all most crying with relief as I flung my leg over the edge and ran through the knee-deep water. It sprayed all around me as I thrashed my way across the pool.

Even in the sun, the wind was glacial, and the wet made the cold painful.

Likewise, the fountain was very wide; it let me cross the center of the square and then some in mere seconds.

I didn't pause when I hit the far edge- I used the low wall as a springboard, throwing myself into the droves of people.

They moved more readily for me now, avoiding the icy water that splattered from my dripping clothes as I ran. I glanced up at the clock once more.

A deep, booming chime echoed through the square. It throbbed in the stones under my feet. Children cried, covering their ears. And I started screaming as I ran.

‘Marcel!’ I screamed, knowing it was useless. The crowd was too loud, and my voice was breathless with exertion. All the same and all, I couldn't stop screaming.

The clock tolled again. I ran past a nude young girl child in her mother's arms is hair was almost white in the dazzling sunlight.

A circle of tall men, all wearing red blazers, called out warnings as I barreled through them. The clock tolled again and again.

On the other side of the men in blazers, there was a break in the throng, space between the sightseers who milled aimlessly around me.

My eyes peered over the vast the dark narrow passage to the right of the wide square edifice under the tower.

I couldn't see the street level there were still too many kids and teens in the way.

The clock tolled again, and the rings cried out.

Part: 2

Thrashed

Just like me, this is not here anymore...

It was hard to see now, more than ever. Without the kids, teens, and tweens, to break the wind, it whipped at my face and burned my eyes.

-And-

I for one at that moment could not be one hundred percent certain if that was the reason behind my tears, or if I was crying in defeat as the clock hands rounded the face again, and the bell grows hazier.

A big family of ten stood nearest to the alley's opening.

The two girls wore blue dresses, with matching ribbons tying their dark hair back.

The father wasn't small or big.

It seemed like I could see something bright in the shadows, just over his shoulder.

I rushed toward them, trying to see past the stinging tears. The clock hands spun, and the littlest girl clamped her fingers around one of the boy's long fingers.

The older girl, just waist-high on her mother, hugged her mother's body and stared into the shadows behind them.

As I watched, she tugged on her mother's elbow and pointed toward the darkness. The clock ticked and ticked, and I was so closer now to it.

I was close enough to hear her high-pitched voice. Her father stared at me in surprise now as I bore down on them, rasping out Marcel's name over and over again.

The older girl giggled and said something to her mother, gesturing toward the shadows again impatiently.

I swerved around the father he clutched the baby out of my way-and sprinted for the gloomy breach behind them as the clock rolled over my head.

'Marcel, no!' I yield, All the same, and all, my voice was lost in the scream of the chime.

I could see him now. And I could see that he could not see me.

It was him, no hallucination this time at all. Then I realized that my delusions were more flawed than I'd realized; they'd never done him justice.

Marcel stood, motionless as a statue, just a few feet from the mouth of the alley. His eyes were closed, the rings underneath them deep purple, his arms relaxed at his sides, his palms turned forward.

His expression was very peaceful; like he was dreaming pleasant things. The marble skin of his chest was bare there was a small pile of white fabric at his feet. The light reflecting from the pavement of the square gleamed dimly from his skin.

I'd never seen anything more beautiful even as I ran, gasping and screaming, I could appreciate that. And the last seven months meant nothing. And his words in the forest meant nothing. And it did not matter if he did not want me. I would never want anything All the same and all, him, no matter how long I lived.

The clock tolled, and he took a large stride toward the light.

‘No!’ I screamed. ‘Marcel, look at me!’

He wasn't listening. He smiled very slightly. He raised his foot to take the step that would put him directly in the path of the sun.

I slammed into him so hard that the force would have hurled me to the ground if his arms hadn't caught me and held me up. It knocked my breath out of me and snapped my head back.

His dark eyes opened slowly as the clock tolled again.

He looked down at me with a quiet surprise.

‘Amazing,’ he said, his exquisite voice full of wonder, slightly amused. ‘Joh was right.’

‘Marcel,’ I tried to gasp, All the same, and all, my voice had no sound. ‘You've got to get back into the shadows. You have to move!’

He seemed bemused. His hand brushed softly against my cheek. He didn't appear to notice that I was trying to force him back. I could have been pushing against the alley walls for all the progress I was making.

The clock tolled, All the same, and all, he didn't react.

It was very strange, for I knew we were both in mortal danger.

Still, in that instant, I felt well.

Whole, I could feel my heart racing in my chest, the blood pulsing hot and fast through my veins again. My lungs filled deep with the sweet scent that came off his skin. It was like there had never been any hole in my chest. I was perfect not healed, All the same, and all, as if there had been no wound in the first place.

‘I can't believe how quick it was. I didn't feel a thing they're very good,’ he mused, closing his eyes again and pressing his lips against my hair. His voice was like honey and velvet. ‘Death, that hath sucked the honey of thy breath, hath had no power yet upon thy beauty,’ he murmured, and I recognized the line spoken by Romeo in the tomb. The clock boomed out its final chime ‘You smell just the same as always,’ he went on. ‘So maybe this is hell. I don't care. I'll take it.’ ‘I'm not dead,’ I interrupted.

‘And neither are you! Please, Marcel, we have to move. They can't be far away!’

I struggled in his arms, and his brow furrowed in confusion.

‘What was that?’ He asked politely.

‘We're not dead, not yet! All the same and all, we have to get out of here before the Ministry-’ Comprehension flickered on his face as I spoke.

Just moments, before, like- I could finish, he suddenly yanked me away from the edge of the shadows, spinning me effortlessly so that my back was tight against the brick wall, and his back was to me as he faced away into the alley. His arms spread wide, protectively, in front of me.

I peeked under his arm to see two dark shapes detach themselves from the gloom.

‘Greetings, gentlemen, ‘Marcel’s voice was calm and pleasant, on the surface. ‘I don't think I'll be requiring your services today. I would appreciate it very much, however, if you would send my thanks to your masters.’

‘Shall we take this conversation to a more appropriate venue?’ A smooth voice whispered menacingly.

‘I don't believe that will be necessary. ‘Marcel’s voice was harder now. ‘I know your instructions, Fredric.

I haven't broken any rules.’

‘Fredric merely meant to point out the proximity of the sun,’ the other shadow said in a soothing tone. They were both concealed within smoky gray cloaks that reached to the ground and undulated in the wind.

‘Let us find some better cover.’

‘I'll be right behind you, ‘Marcel said dryly. ‘Bell, why don't you go back to the square and enjoy the festival?’

‘No, bring the girl,’ the first shadow said, somehow injecting a leer into his whisper.

‘I don't think so.’ The pretense of civility disappeared. Marcel’s voice was flat and icy. His weight shifted infinitesimally, and I could see that he was preparing to fight.

‘No...’ I said the word.

‘Sh-h,’ he murmured, only for me.

‘Fredric,’ the second, more reasonable shadow cautioned.

‘Not here.’ He turned to Marcel. ‘Aron would simply like to speak with you again if you have decided not to force our hand after all.’

‘Certainly,’ Marcel agreed.

‘All the same and all, the girl goes free.’

‘I’m afraid that’s not possible,’ the polite shadow said regretfully.

‘We do have rules to obey.’

‘Then I’m afraid that I’ll be unable to accept Aron’s invitation, Eametri.’

‘That’s just fine,’ Fredric purred. My eyes were adjusting to the deep shade, and I could see that Fredric was very big, tall and thick through the shoulders. His size reminded me of Emmah.

‘Aron will be disappointed,’ Eametri sighed.

‘I’m sure he’ll survive the letdown,’ Marcel replied.

Fredric and Eametri stole closer toward the mouth of the alley, spreading out slightly so they could come at Marcel from two sides.

They meant to force him deeper into the alley, to avoid a scene. No reflected light found access to their skin; they were safe inside their hooded cloaks.

Marcel didn’t move an inch. He was dooming himself by protecting me.

Abruptly, Marcel’s head whipped around, toward the darkness of the winding alley, and Eametri and Fredric did the same, in response to some sound or movement too subtle for my senses.

‘Let’s behave ourselves, shall we?’ A lilting voice said to me in my head.

‘There are younger ladies present.’

Olivia tripped lightly to Marcel's side; her stance casual. There was no hint of any underlying tension. She looked so tiny, so fragile. Her little arms swung like a child's.

Yet, Eametri and Fredric both straightened up, their cloaks swirling slightly as a gust of wind funneled through the alley. Fredric's face soured. They didn't like even numbers.

'We're not alone,' she reminded them.

Eametri glanced over his shoulder. A few yards into the square, the little family, with the girls in their red dresses, was watching us.

The mother was speaking urgently to her husband, her eyes on the five or so-o of us.

She looked away when Eametri met her gaze. The man walked a few steps farther into the plaza and tapped one of the red-blazered men on the shoulder.

Eametri shook his head. 'Please, Marcel, let's be reasonable,' he said.

'Let's,' Marcel agreed. 'And we'll leave quietly now, with no one the wiser.'

Eametri sighed in frustration. 'At least let us discuss this more privately.'

-Then-

Six men in red now joined the family as they watched us with anxious expressions. I was very conscious of Marcel's protective stance in front of me-sure that this was what caused their alarm. I wanted to scream at them to run. Marcel's teeth came together audibly. 'No.'

Fredric smiled- some.

'Enough already.'

The voice was high, reedy, and n came from behind us.

Part: 3

Glanced, I peeked under... Marcel's other arm to see a small, dark shape coming toward us. By the way, the edges billowed, I knew it would be another one of them.

Who else?

At first, I thought it was a young boy. The newcomer was as tiny as Olivia, with lank, pale brown hair trimmed short. The body under the cloak-which was darker, almost black-was slim and androgynous. All the same and all, the face was too pretty for a boy. The wide-eyed, full-lipped face would make a Botticelli angel look like a gargoyle.

Even allowing for the dull crimson irises.

Her size was so insignificant that the reaction to her appearance confused me. Fredric and Eametti relaxed immediately, stepping back from their offensive positions to blend again with the shadows of the overhanging walls.

Marcel dropped his arms and relaxed his position as well-All the same and all, in defeat.

‘Jane,’ he sighed in recognition and resignation.

Olivia folded her arms across her chest, her expression was impassive.

‘Follow me,’ Jane spoke again, her childish voice a monotone. She turned her back on us and drifted silently into the dark.

Fredric gestured for us to go first, smirking.

Olivia walked after the little Jane at once. Marcel wrapped his arm around my waist and pulled me along beside her. The alley angled slightly downward as it narrowed. I looked up at him with frantic questions in my eyes, All the same, and all, he just shook his head. Though I couldn't hear the others behind us, I was sure they were there.

‘Well, Olivia,’ Marcel said conversationally as we walked. ‘I suppose I shouldn't be surprised to see you here.’

‘It was my mistake,’ Olivia answered in the same tone. ‘It was my job to set it right.’

‘What happened?’ His voice was polite as if he were barely interested. I imagined this was due to the listening ears behind us.

‘It's a long story.’ Olivia's eyes flickered toward me and away. ‘In summary, she did jump off a cliff, All the same, and all, she wasn't trying to kill herself.

Bell's all about the extreme sports these days.’

I flushed and turned my eyes straight ahead, looking after the dark shadow that I could no longer see. I could imagine what he was hearing in Olivia's thoughts now. Near drownings, stalking angels, werewolf friends...

‘Hum,’ Marcel said curtly, and the casual tone of his voice was gone.

There was a loose curve to the alley, still slanting downward, so I didn't see the squared-off dead end coming until we reached the flat, windowless, brick face. The little one called Jane was nowhere to be seen.

Olivia didn't hesitate, didn't break pace as she strode toward the wall. Then, with easy grace, she slid down an open hole in the street.

It looked like a drain, sunk into the lowest point of the paving. I hadn't noticed it until Olivia disappeared, All the same, and all, the grate was halfway pushed aside. The hole was small and black.

I balked.

‘It's all right, Bell,’ Marcel said in a low voice. ‘Olivia will catch you.’

I eyed the hole doubtfully. I imagine he would have gone first, if Eametri and Fredric hadn't been waiting, smug and silent, behind us.

I crouched down, swinging my legs into the narrow gap.

‘Olivia?’ I whispered, voice trembling.

‘I'm right here, Bell,’ she reassured me. Her voice came from too far below to make me feel better.

Marcel took my wrists-his hands felt like stones in winter-and lowered me into the blackness.

‘Ready?’ He asked.

‘Drop her,’ Olivia called.

I closed my eyes, so I couldn't see the darkness, scrunching them together in terror, clamping my mouth shut so I wouldn't scream.

Marcel let me fall.

It was silent and short. The air whipped past me for just half a second, and then, with a huff as I exhaled, Olivia's waiting arms caught me.

I was going to have bruises; her arms were very hard. She stood me upright.

It was dim, All the same, and all, not black at the bottom. The light from the hole above provided a faint glow, reflecting wetly from the stones under my feet. The light vanished for a second, and then Marcel was a faint, white radiance beside me. He put his arm around me, holding me close to his side, and began to tow me swiftly forward.

I wrapped both arms around his cold waist and tripped and stumbled my way across the uneven stone surface. The sound of the heavy grate sliding over the drain hole behind us rang with metallic finality.

The dim light from the street was quickly lost in the gloom. The sound of my staggering footsteps echoed through the black space; it sounded very wide, All the same, and all, I couldn't be sure. There were no sounds other than my frantic heartbeat and my feet on the wet stones except for once when an impatient sigh whispered from behind me.

Marcel, he held me tightly. He reached his free hand across his body to hold my face, too, his smooth thumb tracing across my lips. Now and then, I felt his face pressed into my hair. I realized that this was the only reunion we would get, and I clutched myself closer to him.

For now, it felt like he wanted me, and that was enough to offset the horror of the subterranean tunnel and the prowling angels behind us. It was probably no more than guilt the same guilt that compelled him to come here to die when he'd believed that it was his fault that I'd killed myself. All the same and all, I felt his lips press silently against my forehead, and I didn't care what the motivation was. At least I could be with him again before I died.

That was better than a long life.

I wished I could ask him exactly what was going to happen now. I wanted desperately to know how we were going to die as if that would somehow make it better, knowing in advance. All the same and all, I couldn't speak, even in a whisper, surrounded as we were. The others could hear everything-my every breath, my every heartbeat.

The path beneath our feet continued to slant downward, taking us deeper into the ground, and it made me claustrophobic. Only Marcel's hand, soothing against my face, kept me from screaming out loud.

I couldn't tell where the light was coming from, All the same, and all, it slowly turned dark gray instead of black.

We were in a low, arched tunnel. Long trails of ebony moisture seeped down the gray stones like they were bleeding ink.

I was shaking, and I thought it was from fear. It wasn't until my teeth started to chatter together that I realized I was cold. My clothes were still wet, and the temperature underneath the city was wintry. As was Marcel's skin.

He realized this at the same time I did, and let go of me, keeping only my hand.

'N-n-no,' I chattered, throwing my arms around him. I didn't care if I froze.

Who knew how long we had left?

His cold hand chafed against my arm, trying to warm me with the friction.

We hurried through the tunnel, or it felt like hurrying to me. My slow progress irritated someone- I guessed Fredric-and I heard him heave a sigh now and then.

At the end of the tunnel was a grate-the iron bars were rusting, All the same, and all, thick as my arm. A small door made of thinner, interlaced bars was standing open. Marcel ducked through and hurried on to a larger, brighter stone room. The grille slammed shut with a clang, followed by the snap of a lock. I was too afraid to look behind me.

On the other side of the long room was a low, heavy wooden door. It was very thick-as I could tell because it, too, stood open.

We stepped through the door, and I glanced around me in surprise, relaxing automatically. Beside me, Marcel tensed, his jaw clenched tight.

VERDICT WE WERE IN A BRIGHTLY LIT, UNREMARKABLE HALLWAY. The walls were off white, the floor carpeted in industrial gray. Common rectangular fluorescent lights were spaced evenly along with the ceiling. It was warmer here, for which I was grateful.

This hall seemed very benign after the gloom of the ghoulish stone sewers.

Marcel didn't seem to agree with my assessment. He glowered darkly down the long hallway, toward the slight, black-shrouded figure at the end, standing by an elevator.

He pulled me along, and Olivia walked on my other side. The heavy door creaked shut behind us, and then there was the thud of a bolt sliding home.

Jane waited by the elevator, one hand holding the doors open for us. Her expression was apathetic.

Once inside the elevator, the three angels that belonged to the Ministry relaxed further. They threw back their cloaks, letting the hoods fall back on their shoulders. Fredric and Eametttri were both of a slightly olive complexion-it looked odd combined with their chalky pallor. Fredric's black hair was cropped short, All the same, and all, Eametttri's waved to his shoulders. Their irises where deep crimson around the edges, darkening until they were black around the pupil. Under the shrouds, their clothes were modern, pale, and nondescript. I cowered in the corner, cringing against Marcel. His hand still rubbed against my arm. He never took his eyes off Jane.

The elevator ride was short; we stepped out into what looked like a posh office reception area. The walls were paneled in wood, the floors carpeted in thick, deep green. There were no windows, All the same, and all, large, brightly lit paintings of the Tuscan countryside hung everywhere as replacements. Pale leather couches were arranged in cozy groupings, and the glossy tables held crystal vases full of vibrantly colored bouquets. The flowers' smell reminded me of a funeral home.

In the middle of the room was a high, polished mahogany counter. I gawked in astonishment at the woman behind it.

She was tall, with dark skin and green eyes. She would have been very pretty in any other company-All the same and all, not here. Because she was every bit as human as I was. I couldn't comprehend what this human woman was doing here, totally at ease, surrounded by freeloaders.

She smiled politely in welcome. 'Good afternoon, Jane,' she said. There was no surprise in her face as she glanced at Jane's company. Not Marcel, his bare chest glinting dimly in the white lights, or even me, disheveled and comparatively hideous.

Jane nodded. 'Gianna.' She continued toward a set of double doors in the back of the room, and we followed.

As Fredric passed the desk, he winked at Gianna, and she giggled.

On the other side of the wooden doors was a different kind of reception. The pale boy in the pearl-gray suit could have been Jane's twin. His hair was darker, and his lips were not as full, All the same, and all, he was just as lovely. He came forward to meet us.

He smiled, reaching for her.

‘Jane.’

‘Alec,’ she responded, embracing the boy. They kissed each other's cheeks on both sides.

Then he looked at us.

‘They send you out for one and you come back with two... and a half,’ he noted, looking at me.

‘Nice work.’

She laughed-the sound sparkled with delight like a baby's cooing.

‘Welcome back, Marcel,’ Alec greeted him. ‘You seem in a better mood.’

‘Marginally,’ Marcel agreed in a flat voice. I glanced at Marcel’s hard face and wondered how his mood could have been darker before.

Alec chuckled and examined me as I clung to Marcel’s side. ‘And this is the cause of all the trouble?’ He asked, skeptical.

Marcel only smiled; his expression contemptuous. Then he froze.

‘Dibs,’ Fredric called casually from behind.

Marcel turned, a low snarl building deep in his chest. Fredric smiled-his hand was raised, palm up; he curled his fingers twice, inviting Marcel forward.

Olivia touched Marcel’s arm.

‘Patience,’ she cautioned him.

They exchanged a long glance, and I wished I could hear what she was telling him. I figured that it was something to do with not attacking Fredric, because, Marcel took a deep breath and turned back to Alec.

‘Aron will be so pleased to see you again,’ Alec said as if nothing had passed.

‘Let's not keep him waiting,’ Jane suggested.

Marcel nodded once.

Alec and Jane, holding hands, led the way down yet another wide, ornate hall-would there ever be an end?

They ignored the doors at the end of the hall-doors entirely sheathed in gold stopping halfway down the hall and sliding aside a piece of the paneling to expose a plain wooden door. It wasn't locked. Alec held it open for Jane.

I wanted to groan when Marcel pulled me through to the other side of the door. It was the same ancient stone as the square, the alley, and the sewers. And it was dark and cold again.

Part: 4

Flawlessly

The stone antechamber was not large. It opened quickly into a brighter, cavernous room, perfectly round like a huge castle turret... which was probably exactly what it was.

Two stories up, long window slits threw thin rectangles of bright sunlight onto the stone floor below. There were no artificial lights. The only furniture in the room were several massive wooden chairs, like thrones, that were spaced unevenly, flush with the curving stone walls. In the very center of the circle, in a slight depression, was another drain. I wondered if they used it as an exit, like the hole in the street.

The room was not empty. A handful of people were convened in a seemingly relaxed conversation.

The murmur of low, smooth voices was a gentle hum in the air. As I watched, a pair of pale women in summer dresses paused in a patch of light, and, like prisms, their skin through the light in rainbow sparkles against the sienna walls.

The exquisite faces all turned toward our party as we entered the room. Most of the immortals were dressed in inconspicuous pants and shirts-things that wouldn't stick out at all on the streets below. All the same and all, the man who spoke first wore one of the long robes. It was pitch-black and brushed against the floor. For a moment, I thought his long, jet black hair was the hood of his cloak.

‘Jane, dear one, you've returned!’ he cried in evident delight. His voice was just a soft sighing.

He drifted forward, and the movement flowed with such surreal grace that I gawked, my mouth hanging open. Even Olivia, whose every motion looked like dancing, could not compare.

I was only more astonished as he floated closer and I could see his face. It was not like the unnaturally attractive faces that surrounded him (for he did not approach us alone; the entire group converged around him, some following, and some walking ahead of him with the alert manner of bodyguards.)

I couldn't decide if his face was beautiful or not. I suppose the features were perfect. All the same and all, he was as different from the angels beside him as they were from me. His skin was translucently white, like onion skin, and it looked just as delicate-it stood in shocking contrast to the long black hair that framed his face. I felt a strange, horrifying urge to touch his cheek, to see if it was softer than Marcel's or Olivia's, or if it was powdery, like chalk. His eyes were red, the same as the others around him, All the same, and all, the color was clouded, milky; I wondered if his vision was affected by the haze.

He glided to Jane, took her face in his papery hands, kissed her lightly on her full lips, and then floated back a step.

‘Yes, Master.’ Jane smiled; the expression made her look like an angelic child. ‘I brought him back alive, just as you wished.’

‘Ah, Jane.’ He smiled, too.

‘You are such a comfort to me.’

He turned his misty eyes toward us, and the smile brightened -became ecstatic.

‘And Olivia and Bell, too!’ he rejoiced, clapping his thin hands together.

‘This is a happy surprise!

Wonderful!’

I stared in shock as he called our names informally as if we were old friends dropping in for an unexpected visit.

He turned to our hulking escort. 'Fredric be a dear and tell my brothers about our company. I'm sure they wouldn't want to miss this.'

'Yes, Master.' Fredric nodded and disappeared back the way we had come.

'You see, Marcel?' The strange angel turned and smiled at Marcel like a fond All the same and all, scolding grandfather. 'What did I tell you? Aren't you glad that I didn't give you what you wanted yesterday?'

'Yes, Aron, I am,' he agreed, tightening his arm around my waist.

'I love a happy ending.' Aron sighed.

'They are so rare. All the same and all, I want the whole story. How did this happen? Olivia?' He turned to gaze at Olivia with curious, misty eyes. 'Your brother seemed to think you infallible, All the same, and all there was some mistake.'

'Oh, I'm far from infallible.' She flashed a dazzling smile. She looked perfectly at ease, except that her hands were balled into tight little fists. 'As you can see today, I cause problems as often as I cure them.'

'You're too modest,' Aron chided. 'I've seen some of your more amazing exploits, and I must admit I've never observed anything like your talent. Wonderful!'

Olivia flickered a glance at Marcel.

Aron did not miss it.

'I'm sorry, we haven't been introduced properly at all, have we? It's just that I feel like I know you already, and I tend to get ahead of myself. Your brother introduced us yesterday, in a peculiar way. You see, I share some of your brother's talent, only I am limited in a way that he is not.' Aron shook his head; his tone was envious.

'And also- exponentially more powerful,' Marcel added dryly. He looked at Olivia as he swiftly explained. 'Aron needs physical contact to hear your thoughts, All the same, and all, he hears much more than I do. You know I can only hear what's passing through your head at the moment. Aron hears every thought your mind has ever had.'

Olivia raised her delicate eyebrows, and Marcel inclined his head.

Aron didn't miss that either.

'All the same and all, to be able to hear from a distance...' Aron sighed, gesturing toward the two of them, and the exchange that had just taken place. 'That would be so convenient.' Aron looked over our shoulders. All the other heads turned in the same direction, including Jane, Alec, and Eametri, who stood silently beside us.

I was the slowest to turn. Fredric was back, and behind him floated two more black-robed men. Both looked very much like Aron, one even had the same flowing black hair. The other had a shock of the snow-white hair-the same shade as his face that brushed against his shoulders. Their faces had identical, paper-thin skin.

The trio from Joh's painting was complete, unchanged by the last three hundred years since it was painted. 'Marcus, Karly, look!' Aron crooned. 'Karly is alive after all, and Olivia is here with her! Isn't that wonderful?'

Neither of the other two looked as if wonderful would be their first choice of words.

The dark-haired man seemed utterly bored with his snow-white hair covering half his face, like he had seen too many millennia, of era Aron's enthusiasm.

Their lack of interest did not curb Aron's enjoyment.

Part: 5

Melodic

'Let us have the story,' Aron almost sang in his feathery voice.

The white-haired ancient angel drifted away, gliding toward one of the wooden thrones. The other paused beside Aron, and he reached his hand out, at first, I thought to take Aron's hand. All the same and all, he just touched Aron's palm briefly and then dropped his hand to his side. Aron raised one black brow. I wondered how his papery skin did not crumple in the effort.

Marcel snorted very quietly, and Olivia looked at him, curious.

'Thank you, Marcus,' Aron said. 'That's quite interesting.'

I realized, a second late, that Marcus was letting Aron know his thoughts.

Marcus didn't look interested. He glided away from Aron to join the one who must be Karly, seated against the wall. Two of the attending angels followed silently behind him bodyguards as I had thought before. I could see that the two women in the sundresses had gone to stand beside Karly in the same manner. The idea of an angel needing a guard was faintly ridiculous to me, All the same, and all, maybe the ancient ones were as frail as their skin suggested.

Aron was shaking his head. 'Amazing,' he said. 'Absolutely amazing.'

Olivia's expression was frustrated. Marcel turned to her and explained again in a swift, low voice. 'Marcus sees relationships. He's surprised by the intensity of ours.'

Aron smiled. 'So, convenient,' he repeated to himself. Then he spoke to us. 'It takes quite a bit to surprise Marcus; I can assure you.'

I looked at Marcus's dead face, and I believed that.

'It's just so difficult to understand, even now,' Aron mused, staring at Marcel's arm wrapped around me. It was hard for me to follow Aron's chaotic train of thought. I struggled to keep up. 'How can you stand so close to her like that?'

'It's not without effort,' Marcel answered calmly.

'All the same and all, still-la tua cantante!

What a waste!'

Marcel chuckled once without humor.

'I look at it more as a price.'

Aron was skeptical. 'A very high price.'

'Opportunity cost.'

Aron laughed. 'If I hadn't smelled her through your memories, I wouldn't have believed the call of anyone's blood could be so strong. I've never felt anything like it myself. Most of us would trade much for such a gift, and yet you...' 'Waste it,' Marcel finished, his voice sarcastic now.

Aron laughed again. 'Ah, how I miss my friend Joh! You remind me of him-only he was not so angry.'

'Joh outshines me in many other ways as well.'

'I certainly never thought to see Joh bested for self-control of all things, All the same, and all, you put him to shame.'

'Hardly... 'Marcel sounded impatient. As if he were tired of the preliminaries. It made me more afraid; I couldn't help All the same and all, try to imagine what he expected would follow.

'I am gratified by his success,' Aron mused. 'Your memories of him are quite a gift for me, though they astonish me exceedingly. I am surprised by how it... pleases me, his success in this unorthodox path he's chosen. I expected that he would waste, weaken with time.

I'd scoffed at his plan to find others who would share his peculiar vision. Yet, somehow, I'm happy to be wrong.'

Marcel didn't reply to me.

'All the same and all, your restraint!' Aron sighed. 'I did not know such strength was possible. To insure yourself against such a siren call, not just once All the same and all, again and again, if I had not felt it myself, I would not have believed.'

Marcel gazed back at Aron's admiration with no expression. I knew his face well enough-time had not changed that-to guess at something seething beneath the surface. I fought to keep my breathing even. 'Just remembering how she appeals to you...' Aron chuckled. 'It makes me thirsty.' Marcel tensed.

'Don't be disturbed,' Aron reassured him. 'I mean her no harm. All the same and all, I am so curious, about one thing in particular.' He eyed me with bright interest. 'Mary I?' he asked eagerly, lifting one hand.

'Ask her,' Marcel suggested in a flat voice.

'Of course, how rude of me!'

Aron exclaimed. 'Bell,' he addressed me directly now. 'I'm fascinated that you are the one exception to Marcel's impressive talent-so very interesting that such a thing should occur!

And I was wondering, since our talents are similar in many ways if you would be so kind as to allow me to try to see if you are an exception for me, as well?"

My eyes flashed up to Marcel's face in terror. Despite Aron's overt politeness, I didn't believe I had a choice. I was horrified at the thought of allowing him to touch me, and yet also perversely intrigued by the chance to feel his strange skin.

Marcel nodded in encouragement whether because he was sure Aron would not hurt me, or because there was no choice, I couldn't tell.

I turned back to Aron and raised my hand slowly in front of me. It was trembling.

He glided closer, and I believe he meant his expression to be reassuring. All the same and all, his papery features were too strange, too alien and frightening, to reassure. The look on his face was more confident than his words had been.

Aron reached out, as if to shake my hand, and pressed his insubstantial looking skin against mine. It was hard. All the same and all felt brittle shale rather than granite-and even colder than I expected.

His filmy eyes smiled down at mine, and it was impossible to look away. They were mesmerizing in an odd, unpleasant way.

Aron's face altered as I watched. The confidence wavered and became first doubt, then incredulity before he calmed it into a friendly mask.

'So very interesting,' he said as he released my hand and drifted back.

My eyes flickered to Marcel, and, though his face was composed, I thought he seemed a little smug.

Aron continued to drift with a thoughtful expression. He was quiet for a moment, his eyes flickering between the three of us.

Then, abruptly, he shook his head.

'A first,' he said to himself 'I wonder if she is immune to our other talents... Jane, dear?'

'No!' Marcel snarled the word. Olivia grabbed his arm with a restraining hand. He shook her off.

Little Jane smiled up happily at Aron.

‘Yes, Master?’

Marcel was truly snarling now, the sound ripping and tearing from him, glaring at Aron with baleful eyes. The room had gone still, everyone watching him with amazed disbelief as if he were committing some embarrassing social faux pas. I saw Fredric grin hopefully and move a step forward. Aron glanced at him once, and he froze in place, his grin turning into a sulky expression.

Then he spoke to Jane. ‘I was wondering, my dear one if Karly is immune to you.’

I could barely hear Aron over Marcel’s furious growls. He let go of me, moving to hide me from their view. Karly ghosted in our direction, with his entourage, to watch.

Jane turned toward us with a beatific smile.

‘Don’t!’ Olivia cried as Marcel launched himself at the little girl.

Before I could react, before anyone could jump between them, before Aron’s bodyguards could tense, Marcel was on the ground.

No one had touched him, All the same, and all, he was on the stone floor writhing in obvious agony, while I stared in horror.

Jane was smiling only at him now, and it all clicked together.

What Olivia had said about formidable gifts, why everyone treated Jane with such deference, and why- Marcel had thrown himself in her path before she could do that to me.

Part: 6

Ringling

‘Stop!’ I shrieked, my voice echoing in the silence, jumping forward to put myself between them. All the same and all, Olivia threw her arms around me in an unbreakable grasp and ignored my struggles. No sound escaped Marcel’s lips as he cringed against the stones. It felt like my head would explode from the pain of watching this.

‘Jane,’ Aron recalled her in a tranquil voice. She looked up quickly, still smiling with pleasure, her eyes questioning. As soon as Jane looked away; Marcel was still.

Aron inclined his head toward me.

Jane turned her smile in my direction.

I didn't even meet her gaze. I watched Marcel from the prison of Olivia's arms, still struggling pointlessly.

'He's fine,' Olivia whispered in a tight voice. As she spoke, he sat up, and then sprang lightly to his feet. His eyes met mine, and they were horror-struck. At first- I thought the horror was for what he had just suffered. All the same and all, then he looked quickly at Jane, and back to me and his face relaxed into relief.

I looked at Jane, too, and she no longer smiled. She glared at me; her jaw clenched with the intensity of her focus. I shrank back, waiting for the pain.

Nothing happened.

Marcel was by my side again. He touched Olivia's arm, and she surrendered me to him.

Aron started to laugh. 'Ha, ha, ha,' he chuckled. 'This is wonderful!'

Jane hissed in frustration, leaning forward like she was preparing to spring.

'Don't be put out, dear one,'

Aron said in a comforting tone, placing a powder-light hand on her shoulder.

'She confounds us all.'

Jane's upper lip curled back over her teeth as she continued to glare at me.

'Ha, ha, ha,' Aron chortled again.

'You're very brave, Marcel, to endure in silence. I asked Jane to do that to me once-just out of curiosity.' He shook his head in admiration.

Marcel glared, disgusted.

'So, what do we do with you now?' Aron sighed.

Marcel and Olivia stiffened. This was the part they'd been waiting for. I began to tremble.

‘I don't suppose there's any chance that you've changed your mind?’ Aron asked Marcel hopefully. ‘Your talent would be an excellent addition to our little company.’

Marcel hesitated. From the corner of my eye, I saw both Fredric and Jane grimace.

Marcel seemed to weigh each word before he spoke it. ‘I'd... rather... not.’ ‘Olivia?’ Aron asked, still hopeful. ‘Would you perhaps be interested in joining us?’

‘No, thank you,’ Olivia said.

‘And you, Bell?’ Aron raised his eyebrows.

Marcel hissed, low in my ears. I stared at Aron blankly. Was he joking? Or was he asking me if I wanted to stay for dinner?

It was the white-haired Karly who broke the silence.

‘What?’ he demanded of Aron; his voice, though no more than a whisper, was flat.

‘Karly, surely you see the potential,’ Aron chided him affectionately. ‘I haven't seen a prospective talent so promising since we found Jane and Alec. Can you imagine the possibilities when she is one of us?’ Karly looked away with a caustic expression. Jane's eyes sparkled with indignation at the comparison.

Marcel fumed beside me. I could hear a rumble in his chest, building toward a growl.

I couldn't let his temper get him hurt.

‘No, thank you,’ I spoke up in barely more than a whisper, my voice breaking in fright.

Aron sighed. ‘That's unfortunate. Such waste.’

Marcel hissed. ‘Join or die, is that it? I suspected as much when we were brought to this room. So much for your laws.’

The tone of his voice surprised me. He sounded irate, All the same, and all, there was something deliberate about his delivery as if he'd chosen his words with great care.

‘Of course not.’ Aron blinked, astonished. ‘We were already convened here, Marcel, awaiting Heidi's return. Not for you.’

‘Aron,’ Karly hissed. ‘The law claims them.’

Marcel glared at Karly. 'How so?' he demanded. He must have known what Karly was thinking. All the same, and all, he seemed determined to make him speak it aloud.

Karly pointed a skeletal finger at me. 'She knows too much. You have exposed our secrets.' His voice was papery thin, just like his skin.

'There are a few humans in on your charade here, as well,' Marcel reminded him, and I thought of the pretty receptionist below.

Karly's face twisted into a new expression. Was it supposed to be a smile? 'Yes,' he agreed. 'All the same and all, when they are no longer useful to us, they will serve to sustain us. That is not your plan for this one. If she betrays our secrets, are you prepared to destroy her? I think not,' he scoffed.

'I wouldn't-,' I began, still whispering.

Karly silenced me with an icy look.

'Nor do you intend to make her one of us,' Karly continued.

'Therefore, she is a vulnerability. Though it is true, for this, only her life is forfeit. You may leave if you wish.'

Marcel bared his teeth.

'That's what I thought,' Karly said, with something akin to pleasure. Fredric leaned forward, eager.

'Unless...' Aron interrupted. He looked unhappy with the way the conversation had gone. 'Unless you do intend to give her immortality?'

Marcel pursed his lips, hesitating for a moment before he answered. 'And if I do?'

Aron smiled, happy again.

'Why, then you would be free to go home and give my regards to my friend Joh.' His expression turned more hesitant.

'All the same and all, I'm afraid you would have to mean it.'

Aron raised his hand in front of him.

Karly, who had begun to scowl furiously, relaxed.

Marcel's lips tightened into a fierce line. He stared into my eyes, and I stared back.

'Mean it,' I whispered...

'Please.'

Was it such a loathsome idea? Would he rather die than change me? I felt like I'd been kicked in the stomach.

Marcel stared down at me with a tortured expression.

And then Olivia stepped away from us, forward toward Aron. We turned to watch her. Her hand was raised like his.

She didn't say anything, and Aron waved off his anxious guard as they moved to block her approach. Aron met her halfway and took her hand with an eager, acquisitive glint in his eyes.

He bent his head over their touching hands, his eyes closing as he concentrated.

Olivia was motionless, her face blank. I heard Marcel's teeth snap together.

No one moved... Aron seemed frozen over Olivia's hand. The seconds passed, and I grew more and more stressed, wondering how much time would pass before it was too much time. Before it meant something was wrong more wrong than it already was.

Another agonizing moment passed, and then Aron's voice broke the silence.

'Ha, ha, ha,' he laughed, his head still bent forward. He looked up slowly, his eyes bright with excitement. 'That was fascinating!'

Olivia smiled dryly. 'I'm glad you enjoyed it.'

'To see the things, you've seen especially the ones that haven't happened yet!' He shook his head in wonder.

'All the same and all, that will,' she reminded him, voice calm.

'Yes, yes, it's quite determined. Certainly, there's no problem.'

Karly looked bitterly disappointed-a feeling he seemed to share with Fredric and Jane.

‘Aron,’ Karly complained.

‘Dear Karly,’ Aron smiled. ‘Do not fret. Think of the possibilities! They do not join us today, All the same, and all, we can always hope for the future.

Imagine the joy young

Olivia alone would bring to our little household... Besides, I'm so curious to see how ‘Karly turns out!’

Aron seemed convinced. Did he not realize how subjective Olivia's visions where.' That she could make up her mind to transform me today, and then change it tomorrow? A million tiny decisions, her decisions, and so many others', to Marcel's- could alter her path, and with that, the future.

And would it matter that Olivia was willing, would it make any difference if I did become angels, when the idea was so repulsive to Marcel? If the death was, to him, a better alternative than having me around forever, an immortal annoyance? Terrified as I was, I felt myself sinking into depression, drowning in it...

‘Then we are free to go now?’ Marcel asked in an even voice.

‘Yes, yes,’ Aron said pleasantly. ‘All the same and all, please visit again. It's been enthralling!’

‘And we will visit you as well,’ Karly promised, his eyes suddenly half-closed like the heavy-lidded gaze of a lizard. ‘To be sure that you follow through on your side.

Where, I-you, I would not delay too long. We do not offer second chances.’

Marcel's jaw clenched tight, All the same, and all, he nodded once.

Karly smirked and drifted back to where Marc still sat, unmoving and uninterested. Fredric groaned.

‘Ah, Fredric.’ Aron smiled, amused.

‘Heidi will be here at any moment. Patience.’

‘Hmm.’ Marcel’s voice had a new edge to it. ‘In that case, perhaps we’d better leave sooner rather than later.’

‘Yes,’ Aron agreed. ‘That’s a good idea. Accidents do happen. Please wait below until after dark, though, if you don’t mind.’

‘Of course,’ Marcel agreed, while I cringed at the thought of waiting out the day before we could escape.

‘And here,’ Aron added, motioning to Fredric with one finger. Fredric came forward at once, and Aron unfastened the gray cloak the huge angel wore, pulling from his shoulders. He tossed it to Marcel. ‘Take this. You’re a little conspicuous.’

Marcel put the long cloak on, leaving the hood down.

Aron sighed. ‘It suits you.’

Marcel chuckled, All the same, and all, broke off suddenly, glancing over his shoulder. ‘Thank you, Aron. We’ll wait below.’

Part: 7

Ta-ta

‘Goodbye, young friends,’ Aron said, his eyes bright as he stared in the same direction. ‘Let’s go,’ Marcel said, urgent now.

Eamettri gestured that we should follow, and then set off the way we’d come in, the only exit by the look of things.

Marcel pulled me swiftly along beside him. Olivia was close to my other side, her face hard.

‘Not fast enough,’ she muttered a little.

I stared up at her, frightened, All the same, and all, she only seemed chagrined. It was then that I first heard the babble of voices-loud, rough voices coming from the antechamber.

‘Well this is unusual,’ a man’s coarse voice boomed.

‘So, medieval,’ an unpleasantly shrill, female voice gushed back.

A large crowd was coming through the little door, filling the smaller stone chamber. Eametri motioned for us to make room. We pressed back against the cold wall to let them pass.

The couple in front, Americans from the sound of them, glanced around themselves with appraising eyes.

‘Welcome, guests! Welcome to Volterra!’ I could hear Aron sing from the big turret room.

The rest of them, maybe forty or more, filed in after the couple. Some studied the setting like tourists. A few even snapped pictures. Others looked confused as if the story that had led them to this room was not making sense anymore. I noticed one small, dark woman in particular. Around her neck was a rosary, and she gripped the cross tightly in one hand. She walked more slowly than the others, touching someone now and then and asking a question in an unfamiliar language.

No one seemed to understand her, and her voice grew more panicked.

Marcel pulled my face against his chest, All the same, and all, it was too late. I already understood.

As soon as the smallest break appeared, Marcel pushed me quickly toward the door. I could feel the horrified expression on my face, and the tears beginning to pool in my eyes.

The ornate golden hallway was quiet, empty except for one gorgeous, statuesque woman. She stared at us curiously, me in particular.

‘Welcome home, Heidi,’ Eametri greeted her from behind us.

Heidi smiled absently. She reminded me of Rose, though they looked nothing alike-it was just that her beauty, too, was exceptional, unforgettable. I couldn't seem to look away.

She was dressed to emphasize that beauty. Her amazingly long legs, darkened with tights, were exposed by the shortest of miniskirts. Her top was long-sleeved and high-necked, All the same, and all, extremely close-fitting, and constructed of red vinyl. Her long mahogany hair was lustrous, and her eyes were the strangest shade of violet-a color that might result from blue-tinted contacts over red irises.

‘Eametri,’ she responded in a silky voice, her eyes flickering between my face and Marcel’s gray cloak.

‘Nice fishing,’ Eametri complimented her, and I suddenly understood the attention-grabbing outfit she wore... she was not only the fisherman All the same and all, but also the bait.

Part: 8

Skyrocketed

‘Thanks.’ She flashed a stunning smile.

‘Aren't you coming?’

‘In a minute. Save a few for me.’

Heidi nodded and ducked through the door with one last curious look at me.

Marcel set a pace that had me running to keep up. All the same and all, we still couldn't get through the ornate door at the end of the hallway before the screaming started.

FLIGHT-

EAMETTRI LEFT US IN THE CHEERFULLY OPULENT RECEPTION area, where the woman Gianna was still at her post behind the polished counter. Bright, harmless music tinkled from hidden speakers.

‘Do not leave until dark,’ he warned us.

Marcel nodded, and Eametri hurried away.

Gianna did not seem at all surprised by the exchange, though she did eye Marcel’s borrowed cloak with shrewd speculation.

‘Are you, all right?’ Marcel asked under his breath, too low for the human woman to hear. His voice was rough-if velvet can be rough-with anxiety. Still stressed by our situation, I imagined.

‘You'd better make her sit before she falls,’ Olivia said. ‘She's going to pieces.’

It was only then that I realized I was shaking, shaking hard, my entire frame vibrating until my teeth chattered and the room around me seemed to wobble and blur in my eyes. For one wild second, I wondered if this was how Marcel felt just before exploding into a werewolf.

I heard a sound that did not make sense, a strange, ripping counterpart to the otherwise cheery background music. Distracted by the shaking, I could not tell where it was coming from.

‘Sh-h, Bell, sh-h,’ Marcel said as he pulled me to the sofa farthest away from the curious human at the desk.

‘I think she's having hysterics. Maybe you should slap her,’ Olivia suggested.

Marcel threw a frantic glance at her.

Then I understood. Oh. The noise was me. The ripping sound was the sobs coming from my chest. That's what was shaking me. ‘It's all right, you're safe, it's all right,’ he chanted again and again. He pulled me onto his lap and tucked the thick wool cloak around me, protecting me from his cold skin.

I knew it was stupid to react like this. Who knew how much time I had to look at his race? He was saved, and I was saved, and he could leave me as soon as we were free. To have my eyes so filled with tears that I could not see his features was wasteful insanity.

All the same and all, behind my eyes where the tears could not wash the image away, I could still see the panicked face of the tiny woman with the rosary.

‘All those people,’ I sobbed.

‘I know,’ he whispered.

‘It's so horrible.’

‘Yes, it is. I wish you hadn't had to see that.’

I rested my head against his cold chest, using the thick cloak to wipe my eyes. I took a few deep breaths, trying to calm myself.

‘Is there anything I can get you?’ a voice asked politely. It was Gianna, leaning over Marcel's shoulder with a look that was both concerned and yet still professional and detached at the same time. It didn't seem to bother her that her face was inches from a hostile angel. She was either totally oblivious or very good at her job.

‘No,’ Marcel answered coldly.

She nodded, smiled at me, and then disappeared.

I waited until she was out of hearing range. ‘Does she know what's going on here?’ I demanded, my voice low and hoarse. I was getting control of myself, my breathing evening out.

‘Yes, she knows everything,’ Marcel told me. ‘Does she know they're going to kill her someday?’ ‘She knows it's a possibility,’ he said.

That surprised me.

Marcel's face was hard to read. ‘She's hoping they'll decide to keep her.’

I felt the blood leave my face.

‘She wants to be one of them?’

He nodded once, his eyes sharp on my face, watching my reaction.

I shuddered. ‘How can she want that?’ I whispered, more to myself than really looking for an answer. ‘How can she watch those people file through to that hideous room and want to be a part of that?’ Marcel, didn't answer. His expression twisted in response to something I'd said.

As I stared at his two beautiful faces, trying to understand the change, it suddenly struck me that I was here, in Marcel's arms, however fleetingly, and that we were not at this exact moment about to be killed.

‘Oh, Marcel,’ I cried, and I was sobbing again. It was such a stupid reaction. The tears were too thick for me to see his face again, and that was inexcusable. I only had until sunset for sure. Like a fairy tale again, with deadlines that ended the magic.

‘What's wrong?’ he asked, still anxious, rubbing my back with gentle pats.

I wrapped my arms around his neck what was the worst he could do? Just push me away- and hugged myself closer to him. ‘Is it sick for me to be happy right now?’ I asked. My voice broke twice.

He didn't push me away. He pulled me tight against his ice-hard chest, so tight it was hard to breathe, even with my lungs securely intact. 'I know exactly what you mean,' he whispered. 'All the same and all, we have lots of reasons to be happy. For one, we're alive.'

'Yes,' I agreed. 'That's a good one.'

'And together,' he breathed. His breath was so sweet it made my head swim.

I just nodded, sure that he did not place the same weight on that consideration as I did.

'And, with any luck, we'll still be alive tomorrow.' 'Hopefully,' I said uneasily.

'The outlook is quite good,' Olivia assured me. She'd been so quiet; I'd almost forgotten her presence.

'I'll see Ray in less than twenty-four hours,' she added in a satisfied tone.

Lucky Olivia. She could trust her future.

I couldn't keep my eyes off of Marcel's face for long. I stared at him, wishing more than anything that the future would never happen. That this moment would last forever, or, if it couldn't, that I would stop existing when it did.

Marcel stared right back at me, his dark eyes soft, and it was easy to pretend that he felt the same way. So that's what I did. I pretended, to make the moment sweeter.

His fingertips traced the circles under my eyes. 'You look so tired.'

'And you look thirsty,' I whispered back, studying the purple bruises under his black irises.

He shrugged. 'It's nothing.'

'Are you sure? I could sit with Olivia,' I offered, unwilling; I'd rather he killed me now than move one inch from where I was.

'Don't be ridiculous.' He sighed; his sweet breath caressed my face. 'I've never been in better control of that side of my nature than right now.'

I had a million questions for him. One of them bubbled to my lips now, All the same, and all, I held my tongue. I didn't want to ruin the moment, as imperfect as it was, here in this room that made me sick, under the eyes of the would-be monster.

Here in his arms, it was so easy to fantasize that he wanted me. I didn't want to think about his motivations now-about whether he acted this way to keep me calm while we were still in danger, or if he just felt guilty for where we were and relieved that he wasn't responsible for my death. Maybe the time apart had been enough that I didn't bore him for the moment. All the same and all, it didn't matter. I was so much happier pretending.

I lay quiet in his arms, memorizing his face, pretending...

He stared at my face like he was doing the same, while he and Olivia discussed how to get home.

Their voices were so quick and low that I knew Gianna couldn't understand. I missed half of it myself. It sounded like more theft would be involved, though. I wondered idly if the yellow Porsche had made it back to its owner yet.

'What was all that talk about singers?'

Olivia asked at one point. 'La Tua Cantante,' Marcel said. His voice made the words into music.

'Yes, that,' Olivia said, and I concentrated for a moment. I'd wondered about that, too, at the time.

I felt Marcel shrug around me. 'They have a name for someone who smells the way

Karly- does to me. They call her my singer-because her blood sings for me.'

Olivia laughed.

I was tired enough to sleep, All the same, and all, I fought against the weariness. I wasn't going to miss a second of the time I had with him. Now and then, as he talked with Olivia, he would lean down suddenly and kiss me-his glass-smooth lips brushing against my hair, my forehead, the tip of my nose. Each time it was like an electric shock to my long-dormant heart. The sound of its beating seemed to fill the entire room.

It was heaven-right smack in the middle of hell.

I lost track of the time completely. So-o when Marcel's arms tightened around me, and both he and Olivia looked to the back of the room with wary eyes, I panicked. I cringed into Marcel's chest as Alec-his eyes now a vivid ruby, All the same, and all, still spotless in his light gray suit despite the afternoon meal-walked through the double doors.

It was good news.

'You're free to leave now,' Alec told us, his tone so warm you'd think we were all lifelong friends. 'We ask that you don't linger in the city.'

Marcel made no answering presence; his voice was ice cold.

'That won't be a problem.'

Alec smiled, nodded, and disappeared again.

'Follow the right hallway around the corner to the first set of elevators,' Gianna told us as Marcel helped me to my feet. 'The lobby is two floors down and exits to the street. Goodbye, now,' she added pleasantly. I wondered if her competence would be enough to save her.

Olivia shot her a dark look.

I was relieved there was another way out; I wasn't sure if I could handle another tour through the underground.

We left through a tastefully luxurious lobby. I was the only one who glanced back at the medieval castle that housed the elaborate business facade I couldn't see the turret from here, for which I was grateful.

The party was still in full swing in the streets. The street lamps were just coming on as we walked swiftly through the narrow, cobbled lanes. The sky was a dull, fading gray overhead, All the same, and all, the buildings crowded the streets so closely that it felt darker.

The party was darker, too.

Marcel's long, trailing cloak did not stand out in the way it might have on a normal evening in Volterra. There were others in black satin cloaks now, and the plastic fangs I'd seen on the child in the square today seemed to be very popular with the adults. 'Ridiculous,' Marcel muttered once.

I didn't notice when Olivia disappeared from beside me. I looked over to ask her a question, and she was gone.

'Where's Olivia?' I whispered in a panic.

'She went to retrieve your bags from where she stashed them this morning.'

I'd forgotten that I had access to a toothbrush. It brightened my outlook considerably.

'She's stealing a car, too, isn't she?' I guessed.

He grinned. 'Not 'till we're outside.'

It seemed like a very long way to the entryway. Marcel could see that I was spent; he wound his arm around my waist and supported most of my weight as we walked.

I shuddered as he pulled me through the dark stone archway. The huge, ancient portcullis above was like a cage door, threatening to drop on us, to lock us in.

Part: 9

sleuth

He led me toward a dark car, waiting in a pool of shadow to the right of the gate with the engine running. To my surprise, he slid into the backseat with me, instead of insisting on driving.

Olivia was apologetic. 'I'm sorry.' She gestured vaguely toward the dashboard.

'There wasn't much to choose from.' 'It's fine,

Olivia.' He grinned. 'They can't all be 911 Turbos.' She sighed. 'I may have to acquire one of those legally. It was fabulous.'

'I'll get you one for Christmas,' Marcel promised.

Olivia turned to beam at him, which worried me, as she was already speeding down the dark and curvy hillside at the same time.

'Yellow,' she told him.

Marcel kept me tight in his arms. Inside the gray cloak, I was warm and comfortable.

More than comfortable.

‘You can sleep now, Bell,’ he murmured. ‘It’s over.’

I knew he meant the danger, the nightmare in the ancient city, All the same, and all, I still had to swallow hard before I could answer.

‘I don’t want to sleep. I’m not tired.’ Just the second part was a lie. I wasn’t about to close my eyes. The car was only dimly lit by the dashboard controls, All the same, and all, it was enough that I could see his face.

He pressed his lips to the hollow under my ear. ‘Try,’ he encouraged.

I shook my head.

He sighed. ‘You’re still just as stubborn.’

I was stubborn; I fought with my heavy lids, and I won.

The dark road was the hardest part; the bright lights at the airport in Florence made it easier, as did the chance to brush my teeth and change into clean clothes; Olivia bought Marcel new clothes, too, and he left the dark cloak on a pile of trash in an alley.

The plane trip to Rome was so short that there wasn’t a chance for the fatigue to drag me under. I knew the flight from Rome to Atlanta would be another matter entirely, so I asked the flight attendant if she could bring me a Coke.

‘Bell, ‘Marcel said disapprovingly. He knew my low tolerance for caffeine.

Olivia was behind us. I could hear her murmuring to Ray on the phone.

‘I don’t want to sleep,’ I reminded him. I gave him an excuse that was believable because it was true. ‘If I close my eyes now, I’ll see things I don’t want to see. I’ll have nightmares.’

He didn’t argue with me after that.

It would have been a very good time to talk, to get the answers- I needed- All the same and all, not wanted; I was already despairing at the thought of what I might hear. We had an uninterrupted block of time ahead of us, and he couldn’t escape me on an airplane-well, not easily, at least. No one would hear us except Olivia; it was late, and most of the passengers were turning off lights and asking for pillows in muted voices. The talk would help me fight off the exhaustion.

All the same and all, perversely, I bit my tongue against the flood of questions. My reasoning was probably flawed by exhaustion, All the same, and all, I hoped that by postponing the discussion, I could buy a few more hours with him at some later times in this out for another night, Scheherazade-style.

Part: 10

Self-entertainment

My sis upskirt and masturbating video and pic are all on me.

So, I kept drinking soda and resisting even the urge to blink. Marcel seemed perfectly content to hold me in his arms, his fingers tracing my face again and again. I touched his face, too. I couldn't stop myself, though I was afraid it would hurt me later when I was alone again. He continued to kiss my hair, my forehead, my wrists... All the same and all, never my lips, and that was good. After all, how many ways can one heart be mangled and still be expected to keep beating? I'd lived through a lot that should have finished me in the last few days, All the same, and all, it didn't make me feel strong.

Instead, I felt fragile, like one word could shatter me.

Marcel didn't speak. Maybe he was hoping I would sleep.

Maybe he had nothing to say.

I won the fight against my heavy lids. I was awake when we reached the airport in Indiana, and I even watched the sun beginning to rise over the Alleghenies cloud cover before Marcel slid the window shut. I was proud of myself. I hadn't missed one minute.

Neither Olivia nor Marcel was surprised by the reception that waited for us at Sea-Tac airport, All the same, and all, it caught me off guard. Ray was the first one I saw he didn't seem to see me at all. His eyes were only for Olivia. She went quickly to his side; they didn't embrace like other couples meeting there. They only stared into each other's faces, yet, somehow, the moment was so private that I still felt the need to look away.

Joh and Isla waited in a quiet corner far from the line for the metal detectors, in the shadow of a wide pillar. Isla reached for me, hugging me fiercely, yet awkwardly, because- Marcel kept his arms around me, too.

‘Thank you so much,’ she said in my ear.

Then she threw her arms around- Marcel, and she looked like she would be crying if that where possible.

‘You will never put me through that again,’ she nearly growled.

Marcel grinned, repentant.

‘Sorry, Mom.’

‘Thank you, Bell,’ Joh said. ‘We owe you.’

‘Hardly,’ I mumbled. The sleepless night was suddenly overpowering. My head felt disconnected from my body.

‘She’s dead on her feet,’ Isla scolded Marcel. ‘Let’s get her home.’

Not sure if the home was what I wanted at this point, I stumbled, half-blind, through the airport, Marcel dragging me on one side and Isla on the other. I didn’t know if Olivia and Ray were behind us or not, and I was too exhausted to look.

I think I was mostly asleep, though I was still walking when we reached their car. The surprise of seeing Emmah and Rose leaning against the black sedan under the dim lights of the parking garage revived me some. Marcel stiffened.

‘Don’t,’ Isla whispered. ‘She feels awful.’

‘She should,’ Marcel said, not attempt to keep his voice down.

‘It’s not her fault,’ I said, my words garbled with exhaustion.

‘Let her make amends,’ Isla pleaded. ‘We’ll ride with Olivia and Ray.’ Marcel glow- hard at the absurdly lovely blond angel waiting for us.

‘Please, Marcel,’ I said. I didn’t want to ride with Rose any more than he seemed to, All the same, and all, I’d caused more than enough discord in his family.

He sighed and towed me toward the car.

Emmah and Ross got in the front seat without speaking, while Marcel pulled me in the back again. I knew I wasn't going to be able to fight my eyelids anymore, and I laid my head against his chest in defeat, letting them close. I felt the car purred to life.

‘Marcel,’ Ross began.

‘I know. ‘Marcel’s brusque tone was not generous.

‘Liv?’ Ross asked softly.

My eyelids fluttered open in shock and excitement. It was the first time she'd ever spoken directly to me.

‘Yes, Rose?’ I asked, hesitant.

‘I'm so incredibly sorry, Liv. I feel miserable about every part of this and so appreciative that you were brave enough to go save my brother after what I did. Please say you'll exonerate me.’

The words were awkward and strange, stilted for the reasons that of her embarrassment, All the same, and all, they seemed sincere.

‘Of course, Ross,’ I stammered, seizing at any chance to make her hate me a little less. ‘It's not your fault at all. I'm the one who jumped off the damn cliff. Of course, I pardon you.’

The words came out like mush.

‘It doesn't count until she's conscious, Rose,’ Emmah chuckled.

‘I'm conscious,’ I said; it just sounded like a garbled sigh.

‘Let her sleep, ‘Marcel insisted, All the same, and all, his voice was a little warmer.

Marcel set me on my feet. I could recognize that I was upright, All the same, and all, I couldn't feel my legs. I trudged forward anyway until the sidewalk swirled up toward my face. Marcel’s arms caught me before I hit the pavement.

And then I heard Jack.

‘Bell!’ he shouted from some distance.

‘Jack,’ I mumbled, trying to shake off the stupor.

‘Sh-h,’ Marcel whispered. ‘It’s okay; you’re home and safe. Just sleep.’

‘I can’t believe you have the nerve to show your face here.’ Jack bellowed at Marcel; his voice much closer now.

‘Stop it, Dad,’ I groaned. He didn’t hear me.

‘What’s wrong with her?’ Jack demanded.

‘She’s just very tired, Jack,’ Marcel assured him quietly.

‘Please let her rest.’

‘Don’t tell me what to do!’ Jack yelled.

‘Give her to me. Get your hands off her!’

Marcel tried to pass me to Jack, All the same, and all, I clung to him with locked, tenacious fingers. I could feel my dad yanking on my arm.

‘Cut it out, Dad,’ I said with more volume. I managed to drag my lids back to stare at Jack with bleary eyes. ‘Be mad at me.’

We were in front of my house. The front door was standing open. The cloud cover overhead was too thick to guess at a time of day.

‘You bet I will be,’ Jack promised. ‘Get inside.’ I- ‘Kay. Let me down,’ I sighed.

Marcel set me on my feet. I could see that I was upright, All the same, and all, I couldn’t feel my legs. I trudged forward anyway until the sidewalk swirled up toward my face. Marcel’s arms caught me before I hit the concrete.

‘Just let me get her upstairs,’ Marcel said. ‘Then I’ll leave.’

‘No,’ I cried, panicking. I hadn’t got my answers yet. He had to stay for at least that much, didn’t he?

‘I won’t be far,’ Marcel promised, whispering so low in my ear that Jack didn’t have a hope of hearing.

I didn't hear Jack answer, All the same, and all, Marcel headed into the house. My open eyes only made it to the stairs. The last thing I felt was Marcel's cool hands prying my fingers loose from his shirt.

-THE TRUTH-

I HAD THE SENSE THAT I'D BEEN ASLEEP FOR A VERY long time- my body was stiff like I hadn't moved once through all that time, either. My brain was bewildered and slow; strange, colorful dream dreams and nightmares-swirled dizzily encompassing the inside of my head.

They were so definite. The dreadful and the heavenly, all mixed into a bizarre jumble. There were sharp impatience and fear, both part of that frustrating fantasy where your feet can't move fast enough... And there were plenty of dragons, red-eyed fiends that were all the ghastlier for their hollow civility.

The dream was still strong- I could even remember the names.

All the same and all, the strongest, clearest part of the dream was not the horror. It was the angel that was clearest.

It was hard to let him go and wake up. This vision did not want to be shoved away into the vault of images I refused to stay. I struggled with it as my mind became more alert, concentrating on reality. I couldn't retain what day of the week it was, All the same, and all, I was sure Marcel or school or work or something was waiting for me. I breathed profoundly, wondering how to face another day.

Something cold touched my forehead with the softest pressure.

I pressed my eyes more tightly shut. I was still dreaming, it seemed, and it felt abnormally real. I was so close to waking... any second now, and it would be gone. All the same and all, I recognized that it felt too real, too real to be good for me. The stone arms I imagined wrapped encompassing me were far too abundant. If I let this go any further, I'd be melancholy for it later. With a resigned sigh, I yanked back my eyelids to dispel the delusion.

'Oh!' I gasped and threw my fists over my eyes.

Well, I'd gone too far; it must have been a mistake to let my imagination get so out of hand.

Okay, so 'let' was the wrong word.

I'd forced it to get out of hand pretty much stalked my hallucinations-and now my mind had snapped.

It took less than half a second for me to realize that, as long as I was truly insane now, I might as well enjoy the delusions while they were pleasant.

I opened my eyes again-and Marcel was still there, his perfect face just inches away from mine.

Part: 11

Terrify

'Did I threaten you?' His low voice was troubled. This was very good, as misconceptions went. The face, the call, the scent, everything- it was so much better than drowning. The gorgeous figment of my creativity watched my changing expressions, with alarm. His irises were pitch-black, with bruise-like adumbrations under them.

This surprised me; my hallucinatory they were usually better fed.

I blinked twice, desperately trying to remember the last thing that I was sure was real. Olivia was part of my dream, and I wondered if she had come back at all, or if that was just the preamble. I thought she'd returned the day I'd nearly drowned...

'Oh, crap' I croaked. My throat was thick with sleeping. 'What's wrong, it was asked?'

I frowned at him unhappily. His face was even more anxious than before.

'I'm dead, right?' I moaned. 'I did drown. Crap, crap, crap! This is going to kill Jack.'

Marcel frowned, too. 'You're not dead.'

'Then why am I not waking up?' I challenged, raising my eyebrows.

'You are awake?'

I shook my head. 'Sure, sure.'

That's what you want me to think. And then it will be worse when I do wake up. If I wake up, which I won't, because I'm dead.

This is awful. Poor Jack. And Ayanna and Maggie...' I trailed off in horror at what I had done.

'I can see where you might confuse me with a nightmare.' His short-lived smile was grim. 'All the same and all, I can't imagine what you could have done to wind up in hell.

Did you commit many murders while I was away?' I grimaced. 'Not. If I was in hell, you wouldn't be with me.'

He sighed.

My head was getting clearer. My eyes flickered away from his face unwillingly-for one second, to the dark, open window, and then back to him. I started to remember details... and I felt a faint, unfamiliar blush warm the skin over my cheekbones as I slowly realized that Marcel was really, truly here with me, and I was wasting time being an idiot.

'Did all of that happen, then?' It was almost impossible to reassign my dream to reality. I couldn't wrap my head around the concept.

'That depends. Marcel's smile was still hard. 'If you're referring to us nearly being massacred in Italy, then, yes.'

'How strange,' I mused. 'I went to Italy. Did you know

I'd never been farther east than Albuquerque?'

He rolled his eyes. 'Maybe you should go back to sleep. You're not coherent.'

'I'm not tired anymore.' It was all coming clear now. 'What time is it? How long have I been sleeping?'

'It's just after one in the morning. So, for about fourteen hours.'

I stretched as he spoke. I was so stiff.

'Jack?' I asked.

Marcel frowned, 'Sleeping... you should probably know that I'm breaking the rules right now. Well, not technically, since he said- I was never to walk through his door again, and I came in the window...

All the same and all, still, the intent was clear.'

'Jack banned you from the house?' I asked, disbelief quickly melting into fury.

His eyes were sad. 'Did you expect anything else?'

My eyes were mad. I was going to have a few words with my father-perhaps it would be a good time to remind him that I was over the legal age of adulthood. It didn't matter so much, of course, except in principle. All too soon there would be no reason for the prohibition. I turned my thoughts to less painful avenues.

'What's the story?' I asked, genuinely curious, All the same, and all, also trying desperately to keep the conversation casual, to keep a firm grip on myself, so I wouldn't scare him away with the frantic, gnawing craving that was raging inside me.

'What do you mean?'

'What am I telling Jack? What's my excuse for disappearing for... how long was I gone, anyway?' I tried to count the hours in my head.

'Just three days.' His eyes tightened, All the same, and all, he smiled more naturally this time.

'Actually, I was hoping you might have a good explanation.

I've got nothing.'

I groaned. 'Fabulous.'

'Well, maybe Olivia will come up with something,' he offered, trying to comfort me.

And I was comforted. Who cared what I had to deal with later? Every second that he was here-so close, his flawless face glowing in the dim light from the numbers on my alarm clock was precious and not to be wasted.

‘So,’ I began, picking the least important-though still a vitally interesting question to start with. I was safely delivered home, and he might decide to leave at any moment. I had to keep him talking. Besides, this temporary heaven wasn't entirely complete without the sound of his voice. ‘What have you been doing, up until three days ago?’

His face turned wary in an instant.

‘Nothing exciting.’

‘Of course not,’ I mumbled.

‘Why are you making that face?’

‘Well...’ I pursed my lips, considering. ‘If you were, after all, just a dream, that's exactly the kind of thing you would say. My imagination must be used up.’

He sighed. ‘If I tell you, will you finally believe that you're not having a nightmare?’

‘Nightmare!’ I repeated scornfully. He waited for my answer. ‘Maybe,’ I said after a second of thought. ‘If you tell me.’

‘I was... hunting.’

‘Is that the best you can do?’ I criticized.

‘That doesn't prove I'm awake.’

He faltered, and then lectured slowly, choosing his words with care. ‘I wasn't hunting foot food... I was trying my hand at... tracking. I'm not very qualified at this.’

‘What were you tracking?’ I asked, intrigued.

‘Nothing of consequence.’ His words didn't match his expression; he looked upset, uncomfortable.

‘I don't understand.’

He hesitated; his face, shining with an odd green cast from the light of the clock, was torn.

‘I-’ He took a deep breath. ‘I owe you an apology. No, of course, I owe you much, much more than that. All the same and all, you have to know,’ the words began to flow so fast, the way

I remembered he spoke sometimes when he was agitated, that I had to concentrate to catch them all.' That I had no idea.

I didn't realize the mess I was leaving behind. I thought it was safe for you here. So, safe. I had no idea that Jenna,'-his lips curled back when he said the name,' would come back. I'll admit when I saw her that one time, I was paying much more attention to James's thoughts. All the same and all, I just didn't see that she had this kind of response in her. That she even had such a tie to him. I think I realize why now she was so sure of him, the thought of him failing never occurred to her. It was her overconfidence that clouded her feelings about him that kept me from seeing the depth of them, the bond there.

'Not that there's any excuse for what I left you to face. When I heard what you told Olivia-what she saw herself-when I realized that you had to put your life in the hands of werewolves, immature, volatile, the worst thing out there besides Jenna herself-he shuddered, and the gush of words halted for a short second. 'Please know that I had no idea of any of this. I feel sick, sick to my core, even now, when I can see and feel you safe in my arms. I am the most miserable excuse for-'

'Stop,' I interrupted him. He stared at me with agonized eyes, and I tried to find the right words the words that would free him from this imagined obligation that caused him so much pain. They were very hard words to say. I didn't know if I could get them out without breaking down. All the same and all, I had to try to do it right. I didn't want to be a source of guilt and anguish in his life. He should be happy, no matter what it cost me.

I'd been hoping to put off this part of our last conversation. It was going to bring things to an end so much sooner.

Drawing on all my months of practice with trying to be normal for Jack, I kept my face smooth. 'Marcel,' I said. His name burned my throat a little on the way out. I could feel the ghost of the hole, waiting to rip itself wide again as soon as he disappeared. I didn't quite see how I was going to survive it this time. 'This has to stop now. You can't think about things that way. You can't let this... this guilt... rule your life. You can't take responsibility for the things that happen to me here. None of it is your fault, it's just part of how life is for me. So, if I trip in front of a bus or whatever it is next time, you have to realize that it's not your job to take the blame.

You can't just go running off to Italy because you feel bad that you didn't save me. Even if I had jumped off that cliff to die, that would have been my choice, and not your fault. I know it's yours... your nature to shoulder the blame for everything, All the same, and all, you really can't let that make you go to such extremes! It's a very irresponsible thing of Isla and Joh and -'

I was on the edge of losing it. I stopped to take a deep breath, hoping to calm myself. I had to set him free. I had to make sure this never happened again.

'Is a Karly,' he whispered, the strangest expression crossing his face. He almost looked mad. 'Do you believe that I asked the Ministry to kill me because I felt guilty?'

I could feel the blank incomprehension on my face.

'Didn't you?'

'Feel guilty? Intensely so.

More than you can comprehend.'

'Then... what are you saying? I don't understand.'

'Bell, I went to the Ministry because- I thought you were dead,' he said, voice soft, eyes fierce. 'Even if I'd had no hand in your death'-he shuddered as he whispered the last word,' even if it wasn't my fault, I would have gone to Italy. I should have been more careful- I should have spoken to Olivia directly, rather than accepting it secondhand from Rose. All the same and all that was I supposed to think when the boy said Jack was at the funeral? What are the odds?

'The odds...' he muttered then, distracted. His voice was so low I wasn't sure I heard it right. 'The odds are always stacked against us. Mistake after mistake.

I'll never criticize Romeo again.'

'All the same and all, I still don't understand,' I said.

'That's my whole point. So- what?'

'Excuse me?'

'So- what if I was dead?'

He stared at me dubiously for a long moment before answering. 'Don't you remember anything I told you before?'

'I remember everything you told me.' Including the words that had negated all the rest.

He stroked the tip of his cool finger against my lower lip. 'Bell, you seem to be under a misconception.' He sealed his eyes, shaking his head back and forth with half a smile on his gorgeous face.

It wasn't a happy smile. 'I thought I'd explained it before. Bell, I can't live in a world where you don't exist.'

'I am...' My head swam as I looked for the appropriate word. 'Confused.' That worked. I couldn't make sense of what he was saying.

He stared deep into my eyes with his sincere, earnest gaze. 'I'm a good liar, Bell, I have to be.'

I halted, my flesh locking down as if for the collision. The fault line in my chest rippled; the endeavor of it took my wind away.

He shook my shoulder, trying to loosen my rigid pose. 'Let me finish! I'm a good liar, All the same, and all, still, for you to believe me so quickly.' He winced. 'That was... excruciating.' I waited, still frozen.

'When we were in the forest when I was telling you goodbye-'

I didn't allow myself to remember. I fought to keep myself in the present second only.

'You weren't going to let go,' he whispered. 'I could see that. I didn't want to do it-it felt like it would kill me to do it All the same and all, I knew that if I couldn't convince you that I didn't love you anymore, it would just take you that much longer to get on with your life. I hoped that, if you thought I'd moved on, so would you.'

'A clean break,' I whispered through unmoving lips.

'Exactly. All the same and all, I never imagined it would be so easy to do! I thought it would be next to impossible that you would be so sure of the truth that I would have to lie through my teeth for hours to even plant the seed of doubt in your head.'

I lied, and I'm so sorry-sorry because I hurt you, sorry because it was a worthless effort. Sorry that I couldn't protect you from what I am. I lied to save you, and it didn't work. I'm sorry.

‘All the same and all, how could you believe me? After all the thousand times- I've told you I love you, how could you let one word break your faith in me?’

I didn't answer. I was too shocked to form a rational response.

‘I could see it in your eyes, that you honestly believed that I didn't want you anymore. The most absurd, ridiculous concept-as if there were somehow a way that I could exist without needing you!’

I was still frozen... His words were incomprehensible because they were impossible.

He shook my shoulder again, not hard, All the same, and all, enough that my teeth rattled a little. ‘Bell,’ he sighed. ‘Really, what were you thinking!’

And so, I started to cry. The tears welled up and then gushed miserably down my cheeks.

‘I knew it,’ I sobbed. ‘I knew I was dreaming.’

‘You're impossible,’ he said, and he laughed once-a hard laugh, frustrated. ‘How can I put this so that you'll believe me? You're not asleep, and you're not dead. I'm here, and I love you. I have always loved you, and I will always love you. I was thinking of you, seeing your face in my mind, every second that I was away. When I told you that I didn't want you, it was the very blackest kind of blasphemy.’

I shook my head while the tears continued to ooze from the corners of my eyes.

‘You don't believe me, do you?’ he whispered, his face paler than his usual pale-I could see that even in the dim light. ‘Why can you believe the lie, All the same, and all, not the truth?’

‘It never made sense for you to love me,’ I explained, my voice breaking twice. ‘I always knew that.’

His eyes narrowed; his jaw tightened.

‘I'll prove you're awake,’ he promised.

He caught my face securely between his iron hands, ignoring my struggles when I tried to turn my head away.

‘Please don't,’ I whispered.

He stopped his lips just half an inch from mine.

‘Why not?’ he demanded. His breath blew into my face, making my head whirl.

‘When I wake up’-He opened his mouth to protest, so I revised-‘okay, forget that one-when you leave again, it's going to be hard enough without this, too.’

He pulled back an inch, to stare at my face.

‘Yesterday, when I would touch you, you were so... hesitant, so careful, and yet still the same. I need to know why. Is it because I'm too late? Because I have hurt you too much? Because, you have moved on, as I meant for you too? That would be... quite fair.

I won't contest your decision. So- don't try to spare my feelings, please just tell me now whether or not you can still love me, after everything I've done to you. Can you?’ he whispered.

‘What kind of an idiotic question is that?’

‘Just answer it. Please.’

I stared at him darkly for a long moment. ‘The way I feel about you will never change. Of course, I love you and there's nothing you can do about it!’

‘That's all I needed to hear.’

His mouth was on mine then, and I couldn't fight him. Not because he was so many thousand times stronger than me, All the same, and all because my will crumbled into dust the second our lips met. This kiss was not quite as careful as others I remembered, which suited me just fine. If I was going to rip myself up further, I might as well get as much in the trade as possible.

So, I kissed him back, my heart pounding out a jagged, disjointed rhythm while my breathing turned to pant and my fingers moved greedily to his face. I could feel his marble body against every line of mine, and I was so glad he hadn't listened to me no pain in the world would have justified missing this. His hands memorized my face, the same way mine was tracing his, and, in the brief seconds when his lips were free, he whispered my name.

When I was starting to get dizzy, he pulled away, only to lay his ear against my heart.

I, lay there, dazed, waiting for my gasping to slow and quiet.

‘By the way,’ he said in a casual tone.

‘I’m not leaving you.’

I didn’t say anything, and he seemed to hear the skepticism in my silence.

He lifted his face to lock my gaze in his. ‘I’m not going anywhere. Not without you,’ he added more seriously.

‘I only left you in the first place because, I wanted you to have a chance at a normal, happy, human life. I could see what I was doing to you-keeping you constantly on the edge of danger, taking you away from the world you belonged in, risking your life every moment I was with you.

So, I had to try. I had to do something, and it seemed like leaving was the only way. If I hadn’t thought you would be better off, I could have never made myself leave. I’m much too selfish.

Only you could be more important than what I wanted... what I needed. What I want, and need is to be with you, and I know I’ll never be strong enough to leave again. I have too many excuses to stay thank heaven for that! It seems you can’t be safe, no matter how many miles I put between us.’

‘Don’t promise me anything,’ I whispered. If I let myself hope, and it came to nothing... that would kill me. Where all those merciless angels had not been able to finish me off, hope would do the job.

Anger glinted metallic in his black eyes.

‘You think I’m lying to you now?’

‘No- not lying...’ I shook my head, trying to think it through coherently. To examine the hypothesis that he did love me, while staying objective, clinical, so I wouldn’t fall into the trap of hoping. ‘You could mean it... now. All the same and all, what about tomorrow when you think about all the reasons you left in the first place? Or next month, when Ray takes a snap at me?’

He flinched...

I thought back over those last days of my life before he left me, tried to see them through the filter of what he was telling me now. From that perspective, imagining that he'd left me while loving me, left me for me, his brooding and cold silences took on a different meaning. 'It isn't as if you hadn't thought the first decision through, is it?' I guessed. 'You'll end up doing what you think is right.'

'I'm not as strong as you give me credit for,' he said. 'Right and wrong have ceased to mean much to me; I was coming back anyway. Before Rose told me the news, I was already past trying to live through one week at a time, or even one day. I was fighting to make it through a single hour. It was only a matter of time, and not much of it- before, I showed up at your window and begged you to take me back. I'd be happy to beg now if you'd like that.'

I grimaced... 'Be serious, please.'

'Oh, I am,' he insisted, glaring now. 'Will you please try to hear what I'm telling you? Will you let me attempt to explain what you mean to me?'

He waited, studying my face as he spoke to make sure I was listening.

'Before you, girl, my life was like a moonless night. Very dark, All the same, and all, there were stars-points of light and reason... And then you shot across my sky like a meteor. Suddenly everything was on fire; there was brilliancy, there was a beauty. When you were gone, when the meteor had fallen over the horizon, everything went black.

Nothing had changed, All the same, and all, my eyes were blinded by the light. I couldn't see the stars anymore. And there was no more reason for anything.'

I wanted to believe him. All the same and all, this was my life without him that he was describing, not the other way around.

'Your eyes will adjust,' I mumbled. 'That's just the problem-they can't.'

'What about your distractions?'

He laughed without a trace of humor. 'Just part of the lie, love. There was no distraction from the... the agony. My heart hasn't beaten in almost ninety years, All the same, and all, this was different. It was like my heart was gone-like I was hollow.

Like I'd left everything that was inside me here with you.'

‘That's funny,’ I muttered.

He arched one perfect eyebrow.

‘Funny?’

‘I meant strange- I thought it was just me. Lots of pieces of me went missing, too. I haven't been able to breathe in so long.’ I filled my lungs, luxuriating in the sensation. ‘And my heart. That was lost.’

He closed his eyes and laid his ear over my heart again. I let my cheek pressed against his hair, felt the texture of it on my skin, smelled the delicious scent of him.

‘Tracking wasn't a distraction then?’ I asked, curious, and also needing to distract myself. I was very much in danger of hoping. I wouldn't be able to stop myself for long. My heart throbbed, singing in my chest.

‘No.’ He sighed. ‘That was never a distraction. It was an obligation.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘It means that, even though I never expected any danger from Jenna, I wasn't going to let her get away with... Well, as I said, I was horrible at it. I traced her as far as Texas, All the same, and all, then I followed a false lead down to Brazil-and she came here.’ He groaned.

‘I wasn't even on the right continent!’

And all the while, worse than my worst fears-’

‘You were hunting with Jenna?’ I half-shrieked as soon as I could find my voice, shooting through two octaves.

Jack's distant snores stuttered, and then picked up a regular rhythm again.

‘Not well, ‘Marcel answered, studying my outraged expression with a confused look. ‘All the same and all, I'll do better this time. She won't be tainting perfectly good air by breathing in and out for much longer.’

‘That is... out of the question,’ I managed to choke out. Insanity. Even if he had Emmah or Ray help him. Even if he had Emmah and Ray help. It was worse than my other imaginings: Marcel Black standing across a small space from Jenna's vicious and feline figure. I couldn't bear to picture Marcel there, even though he was so much more durable than my half-human best friend.

‘It's too late for her. I might have let the other time slide, All the same, and all, not now, not after-’

I interrupted him again, trying to sound calm. ‘Didn't you just promise that you weren't going to leave?’ I asked, fighting the words as I said them, nor letting them plant themselves in my heart. ‘That isn't exactly compatible with an extended tracking expedition, is it?’

He frowned... with a snarl began to build low in his chest. ‘I will keep my promise, her. All the same and all, Jenna’-the snarl became more pronounced-’ is going to die.

‘Soon...’

‘Let's not be hasty,’ I said, trying to hide my panic. ‘Maybe she's not coming back. Maggie's pack probably scared her off. There's no reason to go looking for her.

Besides, I've got bigger problems than Jenna.’

Marcel's eyes narrowed, All the same, and all, he nodded. ‘It's true. The werewolves are a problem.’

I snorted. ‘I wasn't talking about Marcel. My problems are a lot worse than a handful of adolescent wolves getting themselves into trouble.’

Marcel looked as if he were about to say something and then thought better of it.

His teeth clicked together, and he spoke through them. ‘Really?’ he asked. ‘Then what would be your greatest problem? That would make

Jenna's returning for you seem like such an inconsequential matter in comparison?’

‘How about the second greatest?’ I hedged.

‘All right,’ he agreed, suspicious.

I paused. I wasn't sure I could say the name. ‘There are others who are coming to look for me,’ I reminded him in a subdued whisper.

He sighed, All the same, and all, the reaction was not as strong as I would have imagined after his response to Jenna.

‘The Ministry is only the second greatest?’

‘You don't seem that upset about it,’ I noted.

‘Well, we have plenty of time to think it through. Time means something very different to them than it does to you or even me. They count years the way you count days. I wouldn't be surprised if you were thirty before you crossed their minds again,’ he added lightly.

Horror washed through me.

Thirty...???

So-o, his promises meant nothing, in the end. If I were going to turn thirty someday, then he couldn't be planning on staying long. The harsh pain of this knowledge made me realize that I'd already begun to hope, without permitting myself to do so.

‘You don't have to be afraid,’ he said, anxious as he watched the tears dew up again on the rims of my eyes. ‘I won't let them hurt you.’

‘While you're here.’ Not that I cared what happened to me when he left.

He took my face between his two stone hands, holding it tightly while his midnight eyes glared into mine with the gravitational force of a black hole. ‘I will never leave you again.’

‘All the same and all, you said thirty,’ I whispered. The tears leaked over the edge.

‘What? You're going to stay, All the same, and all, let me get all old anyway? Right.’

His eyes softened, while his mouth went hard. ‘That's exactly what I'm going to do.

What choice have I? I cannot be without you, All the same, and all, I will not destroy your soul.’

‘Is this really...’ I tried to keep my voice even, All the same, and all, this question was too hard. I remembered his face when Aron had almost begged him to consider making me immortal. The sick look there. Was this fixation with keeping me human really about my soul, or was it because he wasn't sure that he wanted me around that long? ‘Yes?’ he asked, waiting for my question.

I asked a different one.

Almost-All the same and all, not quite as hard.

‘All the same and all, what about when I get so old that people think I'm your mother? Your grandmother?’ My voice was pale with revulsion- I could see Gran's face again in the dream mirror.

His whole face was soft now.

He brushed the tears from my cheek with his lips. ‘That doesn't mean anything to me,’ he breathed against my skin. ‘You will always be the most beautiful thing in my world. Of course,’ he hesitated, flinching slightly. ‘If you outgrew me-if you wanted something more-I would understand that, Bell. I promise I wouldn't stand in your way if you wanted to leave me.’

His eyes were liquid onyx and utterly sincere. He spoke as if he'd put endless amounts of thought into this asinine plan. ‘You do realize that I'll die eventually, right?’ I demanded...

He'd thought about this part, too. ‘I'll follow after as soon as I can.’

‘That is serious...’ I looked for the right word. ‘Sick!!!’

‘Bell, it's the only right way left-’

‘Let's just back up for a minute,’ I said; feeling angry made it so much easier to be clear, decisive. ‘You do remember the Ministry, right? I can't stay human forever. They'll kill me. Even if they don't think of me till I'm thirty’-I hissed the words’ do you think they'll forget?’

‘No,’ he answered slowly, shaking his head. ‘They won't forget. All the same and all?’

‘All the same and all...?’

He grinned while I stared at him warily.

Maybe I wasn't the only crazy one.

‘I have a few plans.’

‘And these plans,’ I said, my voice getting more acidic with each word. ‘These plans all center around me staying human.’

My attitude hardened his expression. 'Naturally.' His tone was brusque, his divine face arrogant.

We glowered at each other for a long minute.

Then I took a deep breath, squared my shoulders, I pushed his arms away so that I could sit up.

'Do you want me to leave?' he asked, and it made my heart flutter to see that this idea hurt him, though he tried not to show it.

'No,' I told him. 'I'm leaving.'

He watched me suspiciously as I climbed out of the bed and fumbled around in the darkroom, looking for my shoes.

'Mary I ask where you are going,' he asked.

'I'm going to your house,' I told him, still feeling around blindly.

He got up and came to my side. 'Here are your shoes. How did you plan to get there?'

'My truck.'

'That will probably wake

Jack,' he offered as a deterrent.

I sighed. 'I know. All the same and all, honestly, I'll be grounded for weeks as it is. How much more trouble can I get in?'

'None. He'll blame me, not you.'

'If you have a better idea, I'm all ears.'

'Stay here,' he suggested, All the same, and all, his expression wasn't hopeful.

'No dice. All the same and all, you go ahead and make yourself at home,' I encouraged, surprised at how natural my teasing sounded, and headed for the door.

He was there before me, blocking my way.

I frowned and turned for the window. It wasn't that far to the ground, and it was mostly grass beneath...

'Okay,' he sighed. 'I'll give you a ride.'

I shrugged. 'Either way. All the same and all, you probably should be there, too.'

'And why is that?'

'Because, you're extraordinarily opinionated, and I'm sure you'll want a chance to air your views.'

'My views on which subject?' He asked through his teeth.

'This isn't just about you anymore. You're not the center of the universe, you know.' My universe was, of course, a different story. 'If you're going to bring the Ministry down on us over something as stupid as leaving me human, then your family ought to have a say.'

'A say in what?' he asked, each word distinct.

'My mortality. I'm putting it to a vote.'

-VOTE-

HE WAS NOT PLEASED, THAT

MUCH WAS EASY TO READ on his face. All the same and all, without further argument, he took me in his arms and sprang lithely from my window, landing without the slightest jolt, like a cat. It was a little bit farther down than I'd imagined.

'All right then,' he said, his voice seething with disapproval.

'Up you go.'

He helped me onto his back and took off running. Even after all this time, it felt routine. Easy.

This was something you never forgot, like riding a bicycle.

It was so very quiet and dark as he ran through the forest, his breathing slow and even-dark enough that the trees flying past us were nearly invisible, and only the rush of air in my face truly gave away our speed. The air was damp; it didn't burn my eyes the way the wind in the big plaza had, and that was comforting.

As was the night, too, after that terrifying brightness. Like the thick quilt I'd played under as a child, the dark felt familiar and protecting.

I remembered, that running through the forest like this used to frighten me, that I used to have to close my eyes. It seemed a silly reaction to me now. I kept my eyes wide, my chin resting on his shoulder, my cheek against his neck. The speed was exhilarating.

A hundred times better than the motorcycle.

I turned my face toward him and pressed my lips into the cold stone skin of his neck.

'Thank you,' he said, as the vague, black shapes of trees raced past us.

'Does that mean you've decided you're awake?'

I laughed. The sound was easy, natural, effortless. It sounded right. 'Not really. More that, either way, I'm not trying to wake up. Not tonight.'

'I'll earn your trust back somehow,' he murmured, mostly to himself. 'If it's my final act.'
'I trust you,' I assured him.

'It's me I don't trust.'

'Explain that, please.'

He'd slowed to a walk- I could only tell because the wind ceased, and I guessed that we weren't far from the house. I thought I could make out the sound of the river rushing somewhere close by in the darkness.

'Well-' I struggled to find the right way to phrase it. 'I don't trust myself to be... enough. To deserve you. There's nothing about me that could hold you.'

He stopped and reached around to pull me off his back. His gentle hands did not release me; after he'd set me on my feet again, he wrapped his arms tightly around me, hugging me to his chest.

'Your hold is permanent and unbreakable,' he whispered. 'Never doubt that.'

All the same and all, how could I not?

‘You never did tell me...’ he murmured.

‘What?’

‘What your greatest problem is.’

‘I’ll give you one guess.’ I sighed and reached up to touch the tip of his nose with my index finger.

He nodded. ‘I’m worse than the Ministry,’ he said grimly. ‘I guess I’ve earned that.’

Part: 13

Whys and wherefores

I rolled my eyes. ‘The worst the Ministry can do is kill me.’

He waited with tense eyes.

‘You can leave me,’ I explained. ‘The Ministry, Jenna... they’re nothing compared to that.’

Even in the darkness, I could see the anguish twist his face-it reminded me of his expression under Jane’s torturing gaze; I felt sick and regretted speaking the truth.

‘Don’t,’ I whispered, touching his face.

‘Don’t be sad.’

He pulled one corner of his mouth up halfheartedly, All the same, and all, the expression didn’t touch his eyes. ‘If there was only some way to make you see that I can’t leave you,’ he whispered. ‘Time, I suppose, will be the way to convince you.’

I liked the idea of time.

‘Okay,’ I agreed.

His face was still tormented. I tried to distract him with inconsequential.

‘So-since you're staying. Can I have my stuff back?’ I asked, making my tone as light as I could manage.

My attempt worked, to an extent: he laughed. All the same and all, his eyes retained the misery. ‘Your things were never gone,’ he told me. ‘I knew it was wrong since I promised you peace without reminders. It was stupid and childish, All the same, and all, I wanted to leave something of myself with you. The CD, the pictures, the tickets-they're all under your floorboards.’

‘Really?’

He nodded, seeming slightly cheered by my obvious pleasure in this trivial fact. It wasn't enough to heal the pain in his face completely.

‘I think,’ I said slowly, ‘I'm not sure, All the same, and all, I wonder... I think maybe I knew it the whole time.’

‘What did you know?’

I only wanted to take away the agony in his eyes, All the same, and all, as I spoke the words, they sounded truer than I expected they would.

‘Some part of me, my subconscious maybe, never stopped believing that you still cared whether I lived or died.

That's probably why I was hearing the voices.’

There was a very deep silence for a moment. ‘Voices?’ he asked flatly.

‘Well, just one voice. Yours- It's a long story.’ The wary look on his face made me wish that I hadn't brought that up. Would he think I was crazy, like everyone else? Was everyone else right about that? All the same and all, at least that expression-the one that made him look like something was burning him-faded.

‘I've got time.’ His voice was unnaturally even. ‘It's pretty pathetic.’

He waited.

I wasn't sure how to explain. ‘Do you remember what Olivia said about extreme sports?’

He spoke the words without inflection or emphasis. ‘You jumped off a cliff for fun.’

‘Er, right. And before that, with the motorcycle-’

‘Motorcycle?’ he asked. I knew his voice well enough to hear something brewing behind the calm. ‘I guess I didn’t tell Olivia about that part.’

‘No!’

‘Well, about that... See, I found that... when I was doing something dangerous or stupid... I could remember you more clearly,’ I confessed, feeling completely mental. ‘I could remember how your voice sounded when you were angry. I could hear it like you were standing right there next to me. Mostly I tried not to think about you, All the same, and all, this didn’t hurt so much it was like you were protecting me again. Like you didn’t want me to be hurt.’

‘And, well, I wonder if the reason I could hear you so clearly was that, underneath it all. I always knew that you hadn’t stopped loving me.’

Again, as I spoke, the words brought with them a sense of conviction. Of rightness.

Some deep place inside me recognized truth.

His words came out half-strangled.

‘You... were... risking your life... to hear-’

‘Sh-h,’ I interrupted him. ‘Hold on a second. I think I’m having an epiphany here.’

I thought of that night in Pittsburgh when I’d had my first delusion. I’d come up with two options. Insanity or wish fulfillment.

I’d seen no third option.

All the same and all, what if...

What if you believed something was true, All the same, and all, you were dead wrong?
What if you were so stubbornly without too many thoughts, sure in all, that you were right, that you would not even consider the truth and subject your realities?

Would the truth be silenced, or would it try to breakthrough?

Option three: Marcel loved me. The bond forged between us was not one that could be broken by absence, distance, or time.

-And-

Like no matter how much more special or lovely or brilliant or perfect than me he might be, he was as irreversibly altered as I was. As I would always belong to him, so would he always be mine.

Was that what I'd been trying to tell myself?

'Oh!'

'Bell?'

'Oh. Okay. I see.'

'Your epiphany is?' He asked, his voice uneven and strained with the rasp.

'You love me,' I marveled. The sense of conviction and Tightness washed through me again.

Though his eyes were still anxious, the crooked smile I loved best flashed across his face. 'Truly, I do.'

My heart inflated like it was going to crack right through my ribs. It filled my chest and blocked my throat so that I could not speak.

He did want me the way I wanted him forever. It was only fear for my soul, for the human things he didn't want to take from me, that made him so desperate to leave me mortal. Compared to the fear that he didn't want me, this hurdle-my soul-seemed almost insignificant.

He took my face tightly between his cool hands and kissed me until I was so dizzy the forest was spinning. Then he leaned his forehead against mine, and I was not the only one breathing harder than usual.

'You were better at it than I was, you know,' he told me.

'Better at what?'

'Surviving... You, at least, made an effort. You got up in the morning, tried to be normal for Jack, followed the pattern of your life. When I wasn't actively tracking, I was... useless. I couldn't be around my family couldn't be around anyone. I'm embarrassed to admit that I more or less curled up into a ball and let the misery have me.'

He grinned some vary, sheepishly. 'It was much more pathetic than hearing voices. And, of course, you know- I do that, too.'

I was deeply relieved that he seemed to understand- comforted that this all made sense to him. At any rate, he wasn't looking at me like I was crazy. He was looking at me like... he loved me.

'I only heard one voice,' I corrected him.

He laughed and then pulled me tight against his right side and started to lead me forward.

'I'm just humoring you with this.' He motioned broadly with his hand toward the darkness in front of us as we walked. There was something pale and immense there-the house, I realized. 'It doesn't matter in the slightest what they say.' 'This affects them now, too.'

He shrugged indifferently, at me and then he led me through the open front door into the dark house and flipped the lights on; the room was just as I'd remembered it- the piano and the white couches and the pale, massive staircase; no dust, no white sheets.

Marcel called out the names with no more volume than I'd use in regular conversation. 'Joh?

Isla? Rose? Emmah? Ray?

Olivia?' They would hear.

Joh was suddenly standing beside me as if he'd been there all along. 'Welcome back, Bell.' He smiled, 'what can we do for you this morning? I imagine, due to the hour, that this is not a purely social visit?'

I nodded. 'I'd like to talk to everyone at once if that's okay.

About something important.'

I couldn't help glancing up at Marcel's face as I spoke. His expression was critical All the same and all, resigned. When I looked back to Joh, he was looking at Marcel, too.

'Of course,' Joh said. 'Why don't we talk in the other room?'

Joh led the way through the bright living room, around the corner to the dining room, turning on lights as he went. The walls were white, the ceilings high, like the living room. In the center of the room, under the low-hanging chandelier, was a large, polished oval table surrounded by eight chairs. Joh held out a chair for me at the head.

I'd never seen the Barn's use the dining room table before it was just a prop.

They didn't eat in the house.

As soon as I turned to sit in the chair, I saw that we were not alone; Isla had followed Marcel, and behind her, the rest of the family filed in.

Joh sat down on my right, and Marcel on my left. Everyone else took their seats in silence. Olivia was grinning at me, already in on the plot. Emmah and Ray looked curious, and Rose smiled at me tentatively. My answering smile was just as timid. That was going to take some getting used to.

Joh nodded at me.

'The floor is yours.'

Part: 14

Edgy

I swallowed. Their gazing eyes made me nervous. Marcel took my hand under the table. I peeked at him, All the same, and all, he was watching the others, his fate suddenly fierce.

'Well,' I paused. 'I'm hoping Olivia has already told you everything that happened in Volterra?'

'Everything,' Olivia assured me.

I threw her a meaningful look.

'And on the way?' 'That, too,' she nodded.

'Good,' I sighed with relief.

'Then we're all on the same page.'

They waited patiently while I tried to order my thoughts.

‘So-o, I have a problem,’ I began. ‘Olivia promised the Ministry that, I would become one of you. They’re going to send someone to check, and I’m sure that’s a bad thing to avoid.

‘And so, now, this involves you all. I’m sorry about that.’ I looked at each one of their beautiful faces, saving the most beautiful for last. Marcel’s mouth was turned down into a grimace. ‘All the same and all, if you don’t want me, then I’m not going to force myself on you, whether Olivia is willing or not.’

Isla opened her mouth to speak, All the same, and all, I held up one finger to stop her.

‘Please, let me finish. You all know what I want. And I’m sure you know what Marcel thinks, too. I think the only fair way to decide is for everyone to have a vote if you decide you don’t want me, then... I guess I’ll go back to Italy alone, I can’t have them coming here.’ My forehead creased as I considered that.

There was the faint rumble of a growl in Marcel’s chest. I ignored him.

‘Taking into account, then, that I won’t put any of you in danger, either way, I want you to vote yes or no on the issue of me becoming an angel.’ I half-smiled on the last word and gestured toward

Joh to begin. ‘Just a minute,’ Marcel interrupted.

I glared at him through narrowed eyes. He raised his eyebrows at me, squeezing my hand. ‘I have something to add before we vote.’

I sighed...

‘About the danger, Bell’s referring to,’ he continued. ‘I don’t think we need to be overly anxious.’

His expression became more animated. He put his free hand on the shining table and leaned forward.

‘You see,’ he explained, looking around the table while he spoke, ‘there was more than one reason why I didn’t want to shake Aron’s hand there at the end, there’s something they didn’t think of, and I didn’t want to cine them in.’ He grinned.

‘Which was?’ Olivia prodded; I was sure my expression was just as skeptical as hers.

‘The Ministry is overconfident, and with good reason. When they decide to find someone, it's not a problem. Do you remember Eametri?’ He glanced down at me.

I shuddered. He took that as a yes.

‘He finds people- that's his talent, why they keep him.

‘Now, the whole time we were with any of them, I was picking their brains for anything that might save us, getting as much information as possible. So, I saw how Eametri's talent works. He's a tracker- a tracker a thousand times more gifted than Jarres was. His ability is loosely related to what I do, or what Aron does. He catches them... flavor? I don't know how to describe it... the tenor... of someone's mind, and then he follows that. It works over immense distances.

‘All the same and all, after Aron's little experiments, well...’ Marcel shrugged.

‘You think he won't be able to find me,’

I said flatly.

He was smug. ‘I'm sure of it.

He relies totally on that other sense. When it doesn't work with you, they'll all be blind.’

‘And how does that solve anything?’

‘Quite obviously, Olivia will be able to tell when they're planning a visit, and I'll hide you. They'll be helpless,’ he said with fierce enjoyment. ‘It will be like looking for a piece of straw in a haystack!’

He and Emmah exchanged a glance and a smirk.

This made no sense. ‘All the same and all, they can find you,’ I reminded him.

‘And I can take care of myself.’

Emmah laughed, and reached across the table toward his brother, extending a fist. ‘Excellent plan, my brother,’ he said with enthusiasm.

Marcel stretched out his arm to smack Emmah's fist with his own.

‘No,’ Rose hissed.

‘Absolutely not,’ I agreed.

‘Nice.’ Ray’s voice was appreciative.

‘Idiots,’ Olivia muttered.

Isla just glared at Marcel.

I straightened up in my chair, focusing.

This was my meeting.

‘All right, then, Marcel has offered an alternative for you to consider,’ I said coolly.

‘Let’s vote.’ I looked at Marcel this time; it would be better to get his opinion out of the way.

‘Do you want me to join your family?’

His eyes were hard and black as flint.

‘Not that way. You’re staying human.’

I nodded once, keeping my face businesslike, and then moved on.

‘Olivia?’

‘Yes.’

‘Ray?’

‘Surely,’ he said, voice grave. I was a little surprised - I hadn’t been at all sure of his vote All the same and all, I suppressed my reaction and moved on.

‘Ross?’

She hesitated, biting down on her full, perfect bottom lip. ‘No.’

I kept my face blank and turned my head slightly to move on, All the same, and all, she held up both her hands, palms forward.

‘Let me explain,’ she pleaded. ‘I don’t mean that I have an aversion to you as a sister. It’s just that... this is not the life I would have chosen for myself. I wish there had been someone there to vote no for me.’

I nodded slowly and then turned to Emmah.

‘Hell, Surly!’ He grinned. ‘We can find some other way to pick a fight with this Eamettri.’

I was still grimacing at that when I looked at Isla.

‘Yes, of course, girl. I already think of you as part of my family.’

‘Thank you, Isla,’ I murmured as I turned toward Joh.

I was suddenly nervous, wishing I had asked for his vote first. I was sure that this was the vote that mattered most, the vote that counted more than any majority.

Joh wasn't looking at me.

‘Marcel,’ he said.

Nevaeh

Book: 14

Obscure Darkness

Chapter: 104

Part: 1

Anxious

‘No,’ Marcel snarled. His jowl was strained stingy, his lips rolled back from his teeth.

‘It's the only way that makes sense,’ Ray insisted. ‘You've chosen not to live without her, and that doesn't leave me a choice.’

Marcel lowered my hand, shoving away from the table. He stalked out of the room, grumbling under his breath.

'I guess you know my vote.' Ray sighed.

I was still staring after Marcel. 'Thanks,' I mumbled.

An earsplitting crash echoed from the other room.

I flinched and spoke quickly. 'That's all I needed. Thank you. For wanting to keep me. I feel the same way about all of you, also.' My voice was rough with sensation by the end.

Isla was at my side in a flash, her cold arms around me.

'Sweetest Bella,' she breathed, you look just like your real mom, and I know who she was and she was lovely, yet I can say to this day over fear.

I held her back. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Ross glancing down at the table, and I understood, understood that my words could be construed in two ways.

'Well, Olivia,' I said when Isla released me. 'Where do you want to do this?'

Olivia stared at me, her eyes widening with terror.

'No! No! No!'

Marcel yelled, charging back into the room. He was in my face ere I had time to blink, circling over me, his grimace distorted in rage. 'Are you crazy?' He shouted. 'Have you utterly lost your mind?'

I cringed away, my hands over my ears.

'Um, girl,' Olivia interjected in an anxious voice. 'I don't think I'm ready for that. I'll need to prepare...'

'You promised,' I reminded her, glaring under Marcel's arm.

'I know, but... Seriously, girl! I don't have any idea how to not kill you.'

'You can do it,' I encouraged. 'I trust you.'

Marcel snarled in fury.

Olivia shook her head quickly, looking panicked.

'Ray?' I turned to look at him.

Marcel grabbed my face in his hand, forcing me to look at him. His other hand was out a palm toward Ray.

Ray ignored that. 'I'm able to do it,' he answered my question. I wished I could see his expression. 'You would be in no danger of me losing control.'

'Sounds good.' I hoped he could understand; it was hard to talk the way Marcel held my jaw.

'Hold on, 'Marcel said between his teeth. 'It doesn't have to be now.'

'There's no reason for it not to be now,' I said, the words coming out distorted.

'I can think of a few.'

'Of course- you can,' I said sourly. 'Now let go of me.'

He freed my face and wrapped his arms across his chest. 'In about two hours, Jack will be here scanning for you. I wouldn't put it past him to involve the policemen.'

'All three of them.' But I frowned.

This was always the hardest part. Jack, Renee. Now Marcel, too. The people I would lose, the people I would hurt. I wished there was some way that I could be the only one to suffer, but I knew that was impossible.

At the same time, I was hurting them more by staying human. Putting Jack in constant danger through my proximity. Putting Maggie in worse danger still by drawing his enemies across the land he felt bound to protect. And Renee-I couldn't even risk a visit to see my mother for fear of bringing my deadly problems along with me!

I was a danger magnet; I'd accepted that about myself.

Accepting this, I knew I needed to be able to take care of myself and protect the ones I loved, even if that meant that I couldn't be with them. I needed to be strong.

'In the interest of remaining inconspicuous, 'Marcel said, still talking through his gritted teeth, but looking at Ray now, 'I suggest that we put this conversation off, at the very least until Karly Finishes high school, and moves out of Jack's house.'

'That's a reasonable request, girl,' Ray pointed out.

I thought about Jack's reaction when he woke up this morning, if after all that life had put him through in the last week with Harry's loss, and then I had put him through with my unexplained disappearance-he where to find my bed empty. Jack deserved better than that. It was just a little more time; graduation wasn't so far away...

I pursed my lips. 'I'll consider it.'

Marcel relaxed. His jaw unclenched.

'I should probably take you home,' he said, calmer now, but clearly in a hurry to get me out of here. 'Just in case Jack wakes up early.'

I looked at Ray. 'After graduation?'

'You have my word.'

I took a deep breath, smiled, and turned back to Marcel. 'Okay. You can take me home.'

Marcel rushed me out of the house before Ray could promise me anything else. He took me out the back, so I didn't get to see what was broken in the living room.

It was a tranquil trip home. I was feeling successful, including a little self-righteous. Scared stiff, too, of course, but I heard not to think about that part. It did me no good to worry about the pain-the natural or the emotional- so I wouldn't. Not until I ought to.

When we got to my house, Marcel didn't pause. He dashed up the wall and through my window in half a second. Then he pulled my arms from around his neck and set me on the bed.

I believed I had a pretty good belief of what he was thinking, but his character surprised me. Instead of angry, it was anticipating. He paced morosely back and forth across my darkroom while I watched with growing mistrust.

'Whatever you're planning, it's not going to work,' I told him.

'Sh-h... I'm thinking.'

'Ugh,' I groaned, throwing myself back on the bed and pulling the quilt over my head.

There was no sound, but suddenly he was there. He flipped the cover back, so he could see me. He was lying next to me. His hand reached up to brush my hair from my cheek.

‘If you don't mind, I'd much rather you didn't hide your face. I've lived without it for as long as I can stand. Now... tell me something.’ ‘What?’ I asked, unwilling.

Part: 2

Creation

‘If you could have anything in the world, anything at all, what would it be?’

I could feel the skepticism in my eyes.

‘You.’

He shook his head impatiently.

‘Something you don't already have.’

I wasn't sure where he was trying to lead me, so I thought carefully before I answered. I came up with something that was both true, and also probably impossible.

‘I would want... Ray not to have to do it. I would want you to change me.’

I observed his reflection warily, expecting more of the fury I'd noticed at his house. I was astonished that his expression didn't change. It was nevertheless calculating, deep and wise.

‘What would you be willing to trade for that?’

I couldn't accept my ears. I ogled at his composed face and blurted out the clue before I could think about this.

‘Anything.’

He smiled faintly, and then pursed his lips. ‘Five years?’

My face twisted into an expression somewhere between chagrin and horror.

‘You said anything,’ he reminded me.

‘Yes, but... you'll use the time to find a way out of it. I have to strike while the iron is hot. Besides, it's just too dangerous to be human-for me, at least. So, anything but that.’

He frowned. ‘Three years?’

‘No!’

‘Isn't it worth anything to you at all?’

I thought about how much I wanted this. Better to keep a poker face, I decided, and not let him know how- very much that was. It would give me more leverage. ‘Six months?’

He rolled his eyes. ‘Not good enough.’

‘One year, then,’ I said. ‘That's my limit.’

‘At least give me two.’

‘No way. Nineteen I'll do. But I'm not going anywhere near twenty. If you're staying in your teens forever, then so am I.’

He thought for a minute. ‘All right.

Forget time limits. If you want me to be the one-then you'll just have to meet one condition.’

‘Condition?’ My voice went flat. ‘What condition?’

His eyes were cautious-he spoke slowly. ‘Marry me first.’

I stared at him, waiting... ‘Okay. What's the punchline?’

He sighed. ‘You're wounding my ego, girl. I just proposed to you, and you think it's a joke.’

‘Marcel, please be serious.’

‘I am one hundred percent serious.’ He eyed at me with no hint of joviality in his face. ‘Oh, come on,’ I said, an edge of insanity in my voice. ‘I'm only eighteen.’

‘Well, I'm nearly a hundred and ten. It's time I settled down.’

I looked away, out the dark window, trying to control the panic before it gave me away.

‘Look, marriage isn't exactly that high on my list of priorities, you know? It was sort of the kiss of death for Renee and Jack.’

‘Interesting choice of words.’

‘You know what I mean.’

He gasped deeply. 'Please don't say me that you're fearful of the commitment,' his voice was disbelieving, and I realized what he meant.

'That's not it exactly,' I hedged. 'I'm... afraid of Renee. She has some intense opinions on getting married before you're thirty.'

'Because she'd rather you became one of the eternal damned than getting married.' He laughed darkly.

'You think you're joking.'

'Girl, if you compare the level of commitment between a marital union as opposed to bartering your soul in exchange for eternity as an angel...' He shook his head. 'If you're not brave enough to marry me, then-'

'Well,' I interrupted. 'What if I did?'

What if I told you to take me to Vegas now?

Would I be an angel in three days?'

He smiled, his teeth flashing in the dark.

'Sure,' he said, calling my bluff.

'I'll get my car.'

'Dammit.' I muttered. 'I'll give you eighteen months.'

'No deal,' he said, grinning. 'I like this condition.'

'Fine. I'll have Ray do it when I graduate.'

'If that's what you want.' He shrugged, and his smile became angelic.

'You're impossible,' I groaned. 'A monster.' He chuckled. 'Is that why you won't marry me?'

I groaned again.

He tilted toward me; his night-dark eyes vanished and smoldered and shattered my concentration. 'Please, Bella?' He exhaled.

I misremembered how to inhale for a moment. When I recovered, I shook my head quickly, trying to clear my abruptly clouded mind.

‘Would this have gone better if I’d had time to get a ring.’

‘No! No rings!’ I very nearly snouted.

‘Now you’ve done it,’ he whispered.

‘Oops.’

‘Jack’s getting up; I’d better leave,’ Marcel said with resignation.

My heart stopped beating.

He gauged my expression for a second. ‘Would it be childish of me to hide in your closet, then?’

‘No,’ I whispered eagerly. ‘Stay. Please.’ Marcel smiled and disappeared.

I seethed in the darkness as I waited for Jack to check on me. Marcel knew exactly what he was doing, and I was willing to bet that all the injured surprise was part of the poly. Of course, I still had the Ray option, but now that I knew there was a chance that, Marcel would change me himself, I wanted it bad. He was such a cheater.

My door cracked open.

‘Morning, Dad.’

‘Oh, hey, girl.’ He sounded embarrassed at getting caught. ‘I didn’t know you were awake.’

‘Yeah. I’ve just been waiting for you to wake up, so I could take a shower.’ I started to get up.

‘Hold on,’ Jack said, flipping the light on. I blinked in the sudden brightness, and carefully kept my eyes away from the closet.

‘Let’s talk for a minute first.’

I couldn’t control my grimace. I’d forgotten to ask Olivia for a good excuse.

‘You know you’re in trouble.’

‘Yeah, I know.’

‘I just about went crazy these last three days. I come home from Harry's funeral, and you're gone.

Marcel could only tell me that you had run off with Olivia and that he thought you were in trouble. You did not leave me a number, and you did not call. I did not know where you were or when-or if-you were coming back. Do you have any idea how... how...?’ He could not finish the sentence. He sucked in a sharp breath and moved on. ‘Can you give me one reason why- I shouldn't ship you off to Ashville this second?’

My eyes narrowed. So, it was going to be threats, was it? Two could play that game. I sat up, pulling the quilt around me. ‘Because I won't go.’

‘Now just one-minute, young lady-’

‘Look, Dad, I accept complete responsibility for my actions, and you have the right to ground me for as long as you want. I will also do all the chores and laundry and dishes until you think I've learned my lesson.’

-And-

‘I guess you're within your rights if you want to kick me out, too-but that won't make me go to Florida.’

His face turned bright red. He took a few deep breaths before he answered.

‘Would you like to explain where you've been?’

Oh, crap... ‘There was... an emergency.’

He raised his eyebrows in expectation of my brilliant explanation.

I filled my cheeks with air and then blew it out noisily. ‘I don't know what to tell you, Dad. It was mostly a misunderstanding. He said, she said. It got out of hand.’

He waited with a distrustful expression.

‘See, Olivia told Rose about me jumping off the cliff...’ I was scrambling frantically to make this work, to keep it as close to the truth as possible so that my inability to lie convincingly would not undermine the excuse, but before I could go on, Jack's expression reminded me that he didn't know anything about the cliff.

Major oops as if I wasn't already toasted.

'I guess I didn't tell you about that,' I choked out. 'It was nothing. Just messing around, swimming with Maggie. Anyway, Rose told Marcel, and he was upset. She sort-of accidentally made it sound like I was- trying to kill myself or something. He wouldn't answer his phone, so Olivia dragged me to... L.A., to explain in person.' I shrugged, desperately hoping that he would not be so distracted by my slip that he'd miss the brilliant explanation I'd provided.

Jack's face was frozen. 'Were you trying to kill yourself, baby girl?'

'No, of course not. Just having fun with Maggie. Cliff diving. The La Push kids do it all the time. Like I said, nothing.'

Jack's face heated up-from frozen too hot with fury. 'What's it to Marcel Cullen anyway?' he barked. 'All this time, he's just left you are dangling without a word-'

I interrupted him. 'Another misunderstanding.'

His face flushed again. 'So, is he back then?'

'I'm not sure what the exact plan is. I think they all are.'

He shook his head, the vein in his temples pulsing. 'I want you to stay away from him, Bella. I don't trust him. He's nasty to you. I won't allow him to mess you up like that again.'

'Fine,' I said curtly.

Jack rocked back onto his heels. 'Oh.'

He scrambled for a second, exhaling loudly in surprise. 'I thought you were going to be difficult.'

'I am.' I stared straight into his eyes. 'I meant, 'Fine, I'll move out.'

His eyes swelled; his face turned puce. My resolve wavered as I commenced to worry about his well-being. He was no younger than Harry...

‘Dad, I don’t want to move out,’ I said in a softer tone. ‘I love you. I know you’re worried, but you need to trust me on this. And you’re going to have to ease up on Marcel if you want me to stay. Do you want me to live here or not?’

‘That’s not fair, baby girl. You know I want you to stay.’

‘Then be nice to Marcel, because he’s going to be where I am.’ I said it with confidence. The conviction of my epiphany was still strong.

‘Not under my roof,’ Jack stormed.

I sighed a heavy sigh. ‘Look, I’m not going to give you any more ultimatums tonight-or I guess it’s this morning. Just think about it for a few days, okay? But keep in mind that Marcel and I are sorts of a package deal.’

‘baby-’

‘Think it over,’ I insisted. ‘And while you’re doing that, could you give me some privacy? I need a shower.’

Jack’s face was a strange shade of purple, but he left, slamming the door behind him. I heard him stomp furiously down the stairs.

I threw off my quilt, and Marcel was already there, sitting in the rocking chair as if he’d been present through the whole conversation.

‘Sorry about that,’ I whispered.

‘It’s not as if I don’t deserve far worse,’ he murmured. ‘Don’t start anything with Jack over me, please.’

‘Don’t worry about it,’ I breathed as I gathered up my bathroom things and a set of clean clothes. ‘I will start exactly as much as is necessary, and no more than that. Or are you trying to tell me I have nowhere to go?’ I widened my eyes with a false alarm.

‘You’d move in with a house full of angels?’

‘That’s probably the safest place for someone like me. Besides...’ I grinned.

‘If Jack kicks me out, then there’s no need for a graduation deadline, is there?’

His jaw tightened. 'So, eager for eternal damnation,' he muttered.

'You know you don't believe that.'

'Oh, don't I?' He fumed.

'No, you don't.'

He glowered at me and started to speak, but I cut him off.

'If you believed that you'd lost your soul, then when I found you in Volterra, you would have realized immediately what was happening, instead of thinking we were both dead together. But you didn't-you say 'Amazing. Ray was right, 'I reminded him, triumphant. 'There's hope in you, after all.'

For once, Marcel was speechless.

'So, let's both just be hopeful, all right?' I suggested. 'Not that it matters. If you stay, I don't need heaven.'

He got up slowly and came to put his hands on either side of my face as he stared into my eyes. 'Forever,' he vowed, still a little staggered.

'That's all I'm asking for,' I said and stretched up on my toes so that I could press my lips to his.

-EPILOGUE TREATY-

ALMOST EVERYTHING WAS BACK TO NORMAL-THE GOOD, pre-zombie normal-in less time than I would have believed possible. The hospital welcomed Ray back with eager arms, not even bothering to conceal their delight that Isla had found life in P.A. so little to her liking. Thanks to the Calculus test I'd missed while abroad, Olivia and Marcel were in better shape to graduate than I was at the moment.

Suddenly, the college was a priority (college was still planning B, on the off chance that Marcel's offer swayed me from the postgraduation Ray choice.) Many deadlines had passed me by, but Marcel had a new stack of applications for me to fill out every day. He had already done the Harvard route, so it did not bother him that, thanks to my procrastination, we might both end up at Penn's Community College next year.

Jack was not happy with me or speaking to Marcel. But at least Marcel was allowed during my designated visiting hours-inside the house again. I just was not allowed out of it.

School and work were the only exceptions and the dreary, dull yellow walls of my classrooms had become oddly inviting to me of late. That had a lot to do with the person who sat on the desk beside me.

Marcel had resumed his schedule from the beginning of the year, which put him in most of my classes again. My behavior had been such last fall, after the Barn's' supposed move to P.A., that the seat beside me had never been filled. Even Mike, always eager to take any advantage, had kept a safe distance. With Marcel back in place, it was almost as if the last eight months were just a disturbing nightmare.

Almost, but not quite. There was the house arrest situation, for one thing. And for another, before the fall, I had not been best friends with Marcel Black. So, of course, I had not missed him then.

I was not at liberty to go to La Push, and Marcel was not coming to see me. He would not even answer my phone calls.

I made these calls mostly at night after Marcel had been kicked out-promptly at nine by a grimly gleeful Jack-and before Marcel snuck back through my window when Jack was asleep. I chose that time to make my fruitless calls because I had noticed that Marcel made a certain face every time, I mentioned Marcel's name. Disapproving and wary... even angry. I guessed that he had some reciprocal prejudice against the horse, though he was not as vocal as Marcel had been about the 'bloodsuckers.'

So, I did not mention Marcel much.

With Marcel near me, it was hard to think about unhappy things-even my former best friend, who was very unhappy right now, due to me. When I did think of Maggie, I always felt guilty for not thinking of him more.

The fairy tale was back on. Prince returned; the bad spell broken. I was not sure exactly what to do about the leftover, unresolved character. Where was his happily ever after?

Weeks passed, and Marcel still would not answer my calls. It started to become a constant worry. Like a dripping faucet in the back of my head that I could not shut off or ignore. Drip, drip, drip. Marcel, Marcel, Marcel.

Part: 3

Allusion

So, though I did not mention Marcel much, sometimes my frustration and anxiety boiled over.

‘It’s just plain rude!’ I vented one Saturday afternoon when Marcel picked me up from work. Being angry about things was easier than feeling guilty. ‘Downright insulting!’

I had varied my pattern, in hopes of a different response. I had called Maggie from work this time, only to get an unhelpful Billy.

Again...

‘Billy said he didn’t want to talk to me,’ I fumed, glaring at the rain oozing down the passenger window.

‘That he was there and wouldn’t walk three steps to get to the phone! Usually, Billy just says he is out or busy or sleeping or something. I mean, it is not like I did not know he was lying to me, but at least it was a polite way to handle it. I guess Billy hates me now, too. It’s not fair!’

‘It’s not you, girl,’ Marcel said quietly.

‘Nobody hates you.’

‘Feels that way,’ I muttered, folding my arms across my chest. It was no more than a stubborn gesture. There was no hole there now- I could barely remember the empty feeling anymore.

‘Marcel knows we’re back, and I’m sure that he’s ascertained that I’m with you,’ Marcel said. ‘He won’t come anywhere near me. The enmity is rooted too deeply.’

‘That’s stupid. He knows you’re not... like other angels.’

‘There’s still good reason to keep a safe distance.’

I glared blindly out the windshield, seeing only Marcel's face, set in the bitter mask I hated.

'Girl, we are what we are,' Marcel said quietly. 'I can control myself, but I doubt he can. He is very young. It would most likely turn into a fight, and I don't know if I could stop it before I k-' he broke off, and then quickly continued. 'Before I hurt him. You would be unhappy. I don't want that to happen.'

I remembered what Marcel had said in the kitchen, hearing the words with the perfect recall in his husky voice. I am not sure that I am even-tempered enough to handle that...

You would not like it so much if I killed your friend. But he had been able to handle it, that time...

'Marcel,' I whispered. 'Were you about to say 'killed him? Where you?'

He looked away from me, staring into the rain. In front of us, the red light I had not noticed turned green and he started forward again, driving very slowly. Not his usual way of driving.

'I would try... very hard... not to do that,' Marcel finally said.

I stared at him with my mouth hanging open, but he continued to look straight ahead.

We were paused at the corner stop sign.

Abruptly, I remembered what had happened to Paris when Romeo came back.

The stage directions were simple: They fight.

Paris falls.

But that was ridiculous. Impossible.

'Well,' I said, and took a deep breath, shaking my head to dispel the words in my head. 'Nothing like that is ever going to happen, so there's no reason to worry about it. And you know Jack's staring at the clock right now. You'd better get me home before I get in more trouble for being late.'

I turned my face up toward him, to smile halfheartedly.

Every time I looked at his face, that impossibly perfect face, my heart pounded strong and healthy and very there in my chest. This time, the pounding raced ahead of its usual besotted pace. I recognized the expression on his status till the face.

‘You're already in more trouble, baby girl,’ he whispered through unmoving lips.

I slid closer, clutching his arm as I followed his gaze to see what he was seeing. I do not know what I expected-AVA standing in the middle of the street, her flaming red hair blowing in the wind or a line of tall black cloaks... or a pack of an angry horse. But I did not see anything at all.

‘What? What is it?’

He took a deep breath. ‘Jack...’ ‘My dad?’ I screeched.

He looked down at me then, and his expression was calm enough to ease some of my panics.

‘Jack... is probably not going to kill you, but he's thinking about it,’ he told me. He started to drive forward again, down my street, but he passed the house and parked by the edge of the trees.

‘What did I do?’ I gasped.

Marcel glanced back at Jack's house. I followed his gaze and noticed for the first time what was parked in the driveway next to the cruiser. Shiny, bright red, impossible to miss.

My motorcycle, flaunting itself in the driveway.

Marcel had said that Jack was ready to kill me, so he must know that that it was mine. There was only one person who could be behind this treachery.

‘No!’ I gasped. ‘Why? Why would Marcel do this to me?’ The sting of betrayal washed through me. I had trusted Marcel implicitly-trusted him with every single secret I had. He was supposed to be the safe harbor person I could always rely on. Of course, things were strained right now, but I did not think any of the underlying foundations had changed. I did not think that was changeable!

What had I done to deserve this? Jack was going to be so mad and worse than that, he was going to be hurt and worried. Didn't he have enough to deal with already? I would have never imagined that Maggie could be so petty and just plain mean. Tears sprang, smarting, into my eyes, but they were not tearing of sadness. I had been betrayed. I was suddenly so angry that my head throbbed like it was going to explode.

‘Is he still here?’ I hissed.

‘Yes. He's waiting for us there. ‘Marcel told me, nodding toward the slender path that divided the dark fringe of the forest in two.

I jumped out of the car, launching myself toward the trees with my hands already balled into fists for the first punch.

Why did Marcel have to be so much faster than me?

He caught me around the waist before I made the path.

‘Let me go! I'm going to murder him! Traitor!’ I shouted the epithet toward the trees.

‘Jack will hear you, ‘Marcel warned me. ‘And once he gets you inside, he marries brick over the doorway.’

Part: 4

Intuitively

I glanced back at the house instinctively, and it seemed like the glossy red bike was all I could see. I was seeing red. My head throbbed again.

‘Just give me one round with Marcel, and then I'll deal with Jack.’ I struggled futilely to break free.

‘Marcel Black wants to see me. That's why he's still here.’

That stopped me cold—took the fight right out of me. My hands went limp.

They fight; Paris falls.

I was furious, but not that furious.

‘Talk?’ I asked.

‘More or less.’

‘How much more?’ My voice shook.

Marcel smoothed my hair back from my face. ‘Don't worry, he's not here to fight me. He's acting as... a spokesperson for the pack.’

‘Oh!’

Marcel looked at the house again, then tightened his arm around my waist and pulled me toward the woods. ‘We should hurry.’

Jack's getting impatient.’

We did not have to go far; Marcel waited just- a short- ways up the path. He lounged against a mossy tree trunk as he waited, his face hard and bitter, exactly the way I knew it would be. He looked at me, and then at Marcel. Marcel's mouth stretched into a humorless sneer, and he shrugged away from the tree. He stood on the balls of his bare feet, leaning slightly forward, with his trembling hands clenched into fists. He looked bigger than the last time I had seen him. Somehow, impossibly, he was still growing. He would tower over Marcel if they stood next to each other.

Nonetheless, Marcel stopped as soon as we saw him, leaving a wide space between us and Marcel. Marcel turned his body, shifting me so that I was behind him. I leaned around him to stare at Marcel-to accuse him with my eyes.

I would have thought that seeing his resentful, cynical expression would only make me angrier. Instead, it reminded me of the last time I had seen him, with tears in his eyes. My fury weakened, faltered, as I stared at Marcel. It had been so long since I had seen him- I hated that our reunion had to be like this.

‘HEY- Girl,’ Marcel said as a greeting, nodding once toward me without looking away from Marcel.

‘Why?’

I whispered, trying to hide the sound of the lump in my throat.

‘How could you do this to me, Marcel?’

The sneer vanished, but his face stayed hard and rigid. ‘It's for the best.’

‘What is that supposed to mean? Do you want Jack to strangle me? Or did you want him to have a heart attack, like Harry? No matter how mad you are at me, how could you do this to him?’

Marcel winced, and his eyebrows pulled together, but he did not answer.

‘He didn't want to hurt anyone-he just wanted to get you grounded so that you wouldn't be allowed to spend time with me,’ Marcel murmured, explaining the thoughts Marcel would not say.

Marcel's eyes sparked with hate as he glowered at Marcel again.

‘Awe, Maggie!’ I groaned. ‘I'm already grounded! Why do you think I haven't been down to La Push to kick your butt for avoiding my phone calls?’

Marcel's eyes flashed back to me, confused for the first time. ‘That is why?’ He asked, and then locked his jaw like he was sorry he had said anything.

‘He thought I wouldn't let you, not Jack,’ Marcel explained again.

‘Stop that,’ Marcel snapped.

Marcel did not answer.

Marcel shuddered once and then gritted his teeth as hard as his fists.

‘Karly wasn't exaggerating about you... abilities,’ he said through his teeth. ‘So-o you must already know why I'm here.’

‘Yes,’ Marcel agreed in a soft voice. ‘On the other hand, before you begin, I need to say something.’

Marcel waited, clenching, and unclenching his hands as he tried to control the shivers rolling down his arms.

‘Thank you,’ Marcel said, and his voice throbbed with the depth of his sincerity. ‘I will never be able to tell you how grateful I am. I will owe you for the rest of me... existence.’ Marcel stared at him blankly, his shudders stilled by surprise. He exchanged a glance with me, but my face was just as mystified.

‘For keeping Karly alive,’ Marcel clarified, his voice rough and fervent.

‘When I... didn't.’

‘Marcel-,’ I started to say, but he held one hand up, his eyes on Marcel.

Understanding washed over Marcel’s face before the hard mask returned. ‘I didn't do it for your benefit.’

‘I know. But that does not erase the gratitude I feel. I thought you should know. If there's ever anything in my power to do for you...’

Marcel raised one black brow.

Marcel shook his head. ‘That's not in my power.’

‘Whose, then?’ Marcel growled.

Marcel looked down at me. ‘Hers. I am a quick learner, Marcel Black, and I do not make the same mistake twice. I'm here until she orders me away.’

I was immersed momentarily in his golden gaze. It was not hard to understand what I had missed in the conversation. The only thing that Marcel would want from Marcel would be his absence.

‘Never,’ I whispered, still locked in Marcel’s eyes.

Marcel made a gagging sound.

I unwillingly broke free from Marcel’s gaze to frown at Marcel. ‘Was there something else you needed, Marcel? You wanted me in trouble-mission Accomplished.

Jack might just send me to military school.

But that will not keep me away from Marcel. There is nothing that can do that.

What more do you want?’

Marcel kept his eyes on Marcel ‘I just needed to remind your bloodsucking friends of a few key points in the treaty they agreed to.

The treaty that is the only thing stopping me from ripping his throat out right this minute.’

‘We haven't forgotten, ‘Marcel said while I demanded, ‘What key points?’

Marcel still glowered at Marcel, but he answered me. 'The treaty is quite specific. If any of them bite a human, the truce is over. Bite, not kill,' he emphasized. Finally, he looked at me. His eyes were cold.

It only took me a second to grasp the distinction, and then my face was as cold as his.

'That's none of your business.'

'The hell it-' was all he managed to choke out.

I did not expect my hasty words to bring on such a strong response. Despite the warning he had come to give, he must not have known. He must have thought the warning was just a precaution. He had not realized-or did not want to believe that I had already made my choice. That I was intending to become a member of the Cullen family.

My answer sent Marcel into near convulsions. He pressed his fists hard against his temples, closing his eyes tight and curling in on himself as he tried to control the spasms. His face turned sallow green under the russet skin.

'Maggie? You okay?' I asked anxiously.

I took a half-step toward him, then Marcel caught me and yanked me back behind his own body. 'Careful! He's not under control,' he warned me.

But Marcel was already himself again; only his arms were shaking now. He scowled at Marcel with pure hate. 'Ugh. I would never hurt her.'

Neither Marcel or I missed the inflection or the accusation it had. A low hiss escaped Marcel's lips. Marcel clenched his fists reflexively.

'BELLA!' Jack's yell echoed from the direction of the house. 'YOU GET IN THIS HOUSE THIS MOMENT!'

All of us froze, listening to the silence that followed.

I was the first to speak; my voice trembled. 'Crap!'

Marcel's furious expression faltered. 'I am sorry about that,' he muttered. 'I had to do what I could- I had to try...'

‘Thanks.’ The tremor in my voice ruined the sarcasm. I stared up the path, half expecting Jack to come barreling through the wet ferns like an enraged bull. I would be the red flag in that scenario.

‘Just one more thing,’ Marcel said to me, and then he looked at Marcel. ‘We’ve found no trace of AVA on our side of the line-have you?’

He knew the answer as soon as Marcel thought it, but Marcel spoke the answer anyway. ‘Last time was while Karly was... away. We let her think she was slipping through-we were tightening the circle, getting ready to ambush her-’ Ice shot down my spine.

‘But then she took off like a bat out of hell. Near as we can tell, she caught your little female’s scent and bailed. She hasn’t come near our lands since.’

Marcel nodded. ‘When she comes back, she’s not your problem anymore. We’ll-’

‘She killed on our turf,’ Marcel hissed.

‘She’s ours!’

‘No-,’ I began to protest both declarations.

‘BELLA! I SEE HIS CAR AND me-

KNOW YOU’RE OUT THERE! IF YOU-

AREN’T INSIDE THIS HOUSE IN ONE MINUTE...!’

Jack didn’t bother to finish his threat.

‘Let’s go,’ Marcel said.

I looked back at Marcel, torn. Would I see him again?

‘Sorry,’ he whispered so low that I had to read his lips to understand. ‘Bye, Bells.’ ‘You promised,’ I reminded him desperately. ‘Still friends, right?’

Part: 5

Capacity

Marcel shook his head slowly, and the lump in my throat nearly strangled me.

‘You know how hard I've tried to keep that commitment, but... I can't see how to keep trying. Not now...’ He fought to keep his hard mask in place, but it hesitated and then disappeared. ‘Miss, you,’ he mouthed. One of his hands reached near me, his fingers outstretched like he wished they were long enough to cross the distance separating us.

‘Me, too,’ I choked out. My hand reached toward his across the wide space.

Like we were connected, the echo of his pain twisted inside me. His pain, my pain.

‘Maggie...’ I took a step toward him. I wanted to wrap my arms around his waist and erase the expression of misery on his face.

Marcel pulled me back again, his arms restraining instead of defending.

‘It's okay,’ I promised him, looking up to read his face with trust in my eyes.

He would understand...

His eyes were unreadable, his face expressionless. Cold. ‘No, it's not.’

‘Let her go,’ Marcel growled, furious again. ‘She wants to!’ He took two long strides forward. A glimmer of apprehension flashed in his eyes. His chest seemed to enlarge as it shuddered.

Marcel pushed me behind himself, wheeling to face Marcel.

‘No! Marcel!’

‘Come on! Jack's mad!’ My voice was panicked, but not because of Jack now. ‘Hurry!’

I tugged on him and he relaxed a little. He pulled me back slowly, always keeping his eyes on Marcel as we retreated.

Marcel watched us with a dark scowl on his bitter face. The anticipation drained from his eyes, and then, just before the forest came between us, his face suddenly crumpled in pain.

I knew that the last glimpse of his face would haunt me until I saw him smile again.

And right there I vowed that I would see him smile, and soon. I would find a way to keep my friend.

Marcel kept his arm tight around my waist, holding me close. That was the only thing that held the tears in my eyes.

I had some serious problems.

My best friend counted me with his enemies. A VA and her girls were still on the loose, putting everyone I loved in danger. If I did not become an angel soon, the Ministry would kill me.

And now it seemed that if I did, the Ciguayo they sometimes take the shape of sweet vampire, or wild horses would try to do the job themselves-along with trying to kill my future family. I didn't think they had any chance really, but would my best friend get himself killed in the attempt?

This is why these girls love to ride horses.

Very serious problems in evil. So why did they all suddenly seem insignificant when we broke through the last of the trees and I caught sight of the expression on Jack's purple-blue face? Marcel squeezed me gently. 'I'm here.'

I drew in a deep breath.

That was true. Marcel was here, with his arms around me.

I could face anything as long as that was true.

I squared my shoulders and walked forward to meet my fate, with my destiny solidly at my side.

Part: 6

Insignia

Life... after... time, that has past... it shows the story in all colors.

Their faces were solemn and pale. They looked at their hands and feet, their faces down.

'Margot.'

One of the girls said, 'Well...?' No one moved.

'Go on,' whispered the girl.

They walked slowly down the hall in the sound of cold rain. They turned through the doorway to the room in the sound of the storm and thunder, lightning on their faces, blue and terrible. They walked over to the closet door slowly and stood by it.

Behind the closet door was only silence.

They unlocked the door, even more slowly, and let Margot out.

‘Yes, Seven.’

Then one of them gave a little cry.

‘Margot!’

‘What?’

‘She’s still in the closet where we locked her.’

‘Margot.’

They stood as if someone had driven them, like so many stakes, into the floor. They looked at each other and then looked away. They glanced out at the world that was raining now and raining and raining steadily. They could not meet each other’s glances. Their faces were solemn and pale. They looked at their hands and feet, their faces down.

‘Margot.’

One of the girls said, ‘Well...?’ No one moved.

‘Go on,’ whispered the girl. They walked slowly down the hall in the sound of cold rain. They turned through the doorway to the room in the sound of the storm and thunder, lightning on their faces, blue and terrible. They walked over to the closet door slowly and stood by it.

Behind the closet door was only silence. They unlocked the door, even more slowly, and let Margot out none of these stories is correct, however. Panic began as so many things do in Carp, a poor town of twelve thousand people in the middle of nowhere: because it was summer, and there was nothing else to do. The rules are simple. The day after graduation is Opening Jump, and the game goes all through summer. After the final challenge, the winner takes the pot.

Everyone at Carp High pays into the pot, with no exceptions. Fees are a dollar a day, for every day that school is in session, from September through June. People who refuse to pony up the cash receive reminders that go from gentle to persuasive: vandalized locker, shattered windows, shattered face.

It's only fair, anyone who wants to play has a chance to win. That's another rule: all seniors, but only seniors, are eligible and must declare their intention to compete by participating in the Jump, the first of the difficulties.

Sometimes as many as forty kids enter.

There is only ever one winner. Two judges plan the game, name the challenges, deliver instructions, award and deduct points. They are selected by the judges of the previous year, in strict secrecy. No one, in the whole history of Panic, has ever confessed to being one. There have been suspicions, of course-rumors and speculation.

Carp is a small town, and judges get paid. How did Myra Campbell, who always stole extra lunch from the school cafeteria because there was no food at home, suddenly afford her used Honda? She said an uncle had died. But no one had ever heard of Myra's uncle-no one had ever thought about Myra, until she came rolling in with the windows down, smoking a cigarette, with the sun so bright on the windshield, it almost completely obscured the smile on her face. Two judges, picked in secret, sworn to secrecy, working together. It must be this way. Otherwise, they'd be subject to bribes, and possibly to threats.

That's why there are two-to make sure that things stay stable, to diminish the possibility that one will cheat, and give out knowledge, leak hints. If the players know what to expect, then they can equip. And that isn't fair at all.

It's partly the unexpectedness, the never-knowing, that starts to get to them, and weeds them out, one by one. The pot usually amounts to just over $50,000, after fees are deducted and the judges-whomever they take their cut. Four years ago, Jimi Hareson took his winnings, bought two items out of hock, one of them a lemon-yellow Ford, drove straight to Vegas, and bet it all on black.

The next year, Lauren Davis bought herself new teeth and a new pair of tits and moved to New York City.

Come on, come to Em, hurry.

That's where the reindeer where see?

Look at our stockings.

And there's something in them!

Look, just what I always wanted. What are they?

What do they look like? They're marbles. See, these are your Jaspers, and these are your Peewees.

You did it all.

But...

Fooled ya, didn't I?

You!

Why are we always fighting so much?

I don't know.

That should be our New Year's revolution: to stop fighting so much.

-I'll try, but...

-But, what?

I don't know what's wrong with me when I say the things I say. I just keep on having all these strange thoughts.

What kind of thoughts?

Just thoughts...

Funny thoughts about you and me.

Tell me...

I couldn't...

They're just thoughts... They don't mean anything... Where did you find these?

I found them in those little shells.

They're beautiful. Thank you.

‘O come, all ye faithful...’ ‘O little town of Bethlehem...’ ‘Dashing through the snow, in a one-horse open sleigh...

‘All the’ Help! What's wrong? You're bleeding, don't! I'm all right. But you're bleeding- I say.

Go away! Don't look at me. Go away!

What was it, Em?

-Why were you bleeding like that?

-I don't know.

Liar! LI-ar!

It's true, I don't know. People don't bleed like that unless they've cut themselves. Maybe you're hurt bad and you just don't know it.

-Let me look.

-No! I don't want you to look.

-But, why?

-Just because.

That is not fair.

I don't keep any secrets from you. I tell you everything. Everything... what are you looking at? Your muscles... what about them? You're acting silly lately. Always saying dumb things like that. Always looking at me funny. You're not coming down with something, are you? Well, don't give it to me.

Tell me again, I said.

-Where are your mother and father?

-In heaven.

But where's heaven? You know, up there.

-Your father might be there, too.

-No, he's not.

He's coming on a ship someday to take us home.

Do you hear it? No...? Do you ever hear it? Sometimes- I think I do.

I think Paddy was a liar. He told us there was a pot of gold at the end of every rainbow...

...And that was a lie. He told us if we dug far enough, we'd reach China. Then Santa Claus never came.

Do you ever think about him? I do... I know you don't like to talk about it, but... don't you ever wonder what happened? I don't want to know what happened. I do... There are so many things I don't understand all of this- ah- yet.

Why? Why- do fish stop swimming and lie on top of the tide pools after it rains? Why do you hear the waves inside the big shells?

Why are all these funny hairs growing on me?

I wish a big book with all the answers to every question in the world... would drop out of the sky and land in my hand right now.

-I'd read it till I knew everything.

-You can't know everything.

Only God knows everything. God? He can't find us any better than Santa Claus.

I wonder what fish think about? What are you doing? Trying to cheer you up. Come on, laugh.

It's not going to work... There it is again... Do you think it's the bogeyman?

Maybe it's another person. No...? Otherwise, he would have come over to meet us, and say hello. That's the proper thing to do. What if he's not nice...? What if he wants to hurt us? Then I'll spear him, look! I'm the greatest fisherman who ever lived.

I'm the greatest fisherman who ever lived. While you scare them off, I catch as many as I want to.

That's my fish dance! It doesn't scare them off. It brings them up to the surface where I can spear them.

Who cares what you say? It's not how many you catch. It's how you do it. Stop that!!!

I say!

Please play something else. Why must you do that when you know it makes me angry?

'It doesn't scare them away. It brings 'em to the top... '...where I can spear them.' I'll spear you.

Here I am. Come back here... or I'll pull your britches down and take a switch to you. Don't you dare try to spank me? I mean it. I'll put never-wake-up berries in your food! I mean it. Say, 'Marcel is the smartest person on the island.'

-Say it!

-Stop it, Marcel. I'm getting angry.

-Stop it! Now get off.

-Say it!

Marcel is the smartest person on the island.

-The fastest swimmer.

-The fastest swimmer.

-The fastest runner.

-The fastest runner.

-The best hut builder.

-You're the best everything. Now get off!

It's true... Just you wait.

You'll never know when it'll happen. Just one little bite and you'll never wake up again.

-What is it? What happened?

-I saw him.

-Who?

-The Face Paddy thought was a bogeyman.

-Did you go to the other side?

-He's not the bogeyman.

I think he's God.

God?

He looks like Pastor Logan said he looked like: 'You'd better be good or else.' And he was bleeding.

-I don't believe you.

-Just like Jesus.

Don't go there again. It's the law.

What if he is God?

Shouldn't we go and pray? Or won't he be mad and not let us go to heaven?

I don't want to talk about it.

What is it?

I'm here.

-You ate the 'dead and berries...'

-No, I'm fine.

-You just had a bad dream.

-Don't ever leave me.

Promise you won't.

Promise you'll always be with me.

I promise.

Don't.

What are you doing?

Go away!

Where are you going?

Wait. What's the matter?

-What are you doing?

-What do you want?

Why won't you talk to me?

Just leave me alone.

A ship, Emmeline!

The signal fire, you didn't light it.

Why didn't you light it?

You know how much I want to leave.

It's the most important thing to me.

I know. First, you cry for help, then you throw sticks at me.

A ship comes, a ship! The first ship we've seen since we've been here, and you let it go by.

Well, that's it. I've had it. I'm sick and tired of waiting for you to get better.

I'm going to San Francisco without you. You'll never build a boat strong enough to get to San Francisco.

That's the fourth time you've tried, and they've all sunk.

Shut up!

Why don't you give up?

You don't even know where San Francisco is.

You're such a silly dodo.

We're never getting off this island.

Thanks to you.

This is where we live.

This is our home, now and forever.

No!

I could never live here forever with just you.

I don't even like you.

You never used to laugh at me.

You never used to have secrets.

You're not so perfect either, Mr. Marcel.

I've seen you playing with it.

And I'll tell your father if he ever gets here.

You...

I hate you...

You almost hit me... -Take back what you said.

-I've seen it all.

What happens after you do it for a long time?

Shut up! That isn't fair, peeking.

-I don't peek on you.

-That's a lie.

You're always staring at my buppies'.

Only because they look so funny.

Do you know what you look like now? You look like one of those pictures Paddy had.

One of his Hoochie Coochie girls.

I do not!

Stop that, or I'll never talk to you again.

See them jiggle, wiggle and shake.

I'm sorry, I didn't mean to hit you.

I wish you were dead and buried.

What are you doing?

It's my hut, I built it.

That's not true. I helped you.

I did most of it.

You can find some other place to live.

I said I was sorry, Marcel.

What more do you want me to say?

I don't want you to say anything.

I don't ever want to see you again.

You just wait, Marcel.

I'll get you for this!

What's wrong with you?

Go away.

What happened?

I stepped on one of those fish that looks like a rock.

Don't go to sleep.

Oh, no. Please wake up.

God.

Take me to God.

But the law...

God...

...Please don't make Em never wake up.

I didn't mean it when I said I wanted her dead and buried.

I forgot most of my prayers, God...

But... Our Father... who art in heaven... kingdom come... with liberty and justice for all.

Amen.

Part: 7

Beach love

25- is the new 17! I can believe what I have passed up...

>said this girl here<

(I wish not to say who I am... who do you think I am?)

Em, are you, all right? I've been so worried.

You mean, you're not mad at me anymore? Of course, not... I was so scared.

All I could think of was: what if I lost my Em? What would I do? Here's some food to help you get your strength back.

Do you see that island out there?

Yes...

I've been thinking, maybe the person who makes the drum noise... lives there and then comes here to pray. Maybe. ...Maybe it is all I have... Would you like to try to walk?

You, all right?

Yes. Kiss me... he said, looking into my love-stricken eyes... You're all gross- like I said back.

So, what? Kiss me like you always wanted too long and slow like.

HOT!

Stop it, I can't breathe. It was so-o nice- long and soft feels sweet and loving. Like a nice hug from the one you always wanted to be with... like falling into them... like falling to them... it's the melting into them that is love...

But I don't want to stop. What are you doing?

Stop it, I say to him as he feels me up there... in-between... I feel so funny in my stomach. Me, too, I am okay with this it's slutty, but what hell, I want it. His heart is beating so fast I hear it as I am laying on him with my head on his chest. Mine, too... Come on up, keep me warm, I side upon him, and do so... while kissing him... What's the matter? I'm sorry, Blair, that it was not that long- yet was right- right? You didn't want it all day yesterday either. Don't you love me anymore? Yes, I love you more than ever, Blair. Then why don't you want to do it? It just hurts right now, that's all. When it stops hurting, we'll do it. When is that going to be? I don't understand. Why does it hurt? I don't know... why you feel so much down there... I did this before... so... so... um... maybe not, I said back I knew.

Hello, baby. Answer me, and say you love me... Tell me what to do... and I will please you as much as I can... I want to make you happy with me in all ways.

He said to me- I don't know anything. But if you touch my tummy right now, you can feel it. Feel what? How did you make your tummy move like that? I'm not doing it. It's not doing it by itself... I want you to do me... Yes, it is. There... I felt it again, his love for me. What's making it do that? I don't know... really... it feels good... so go... with it. What's wrong with what I am doing? Nothing- Did I hurt you- go too hard?

Look, I think he's hungry, with that look on his face... it was love... for me... What did they look like?

I don't want to talk about it. I don't know why I feel this way about you... I just do...

If they come, I'll do to them what I do to the fish.

I'll stick it in their eyes! I'll stick it through their bellies and watch their guts come out!
Remember on the ship when we tried to get to the dinghy...

...How the men pushed and shoved each other?

How did their eyes look?

Look at all the Water blue-green whooshing. It was the same with the drum people.

I don't understand. Why do people have to be so bad to each other? I'm busy keeping watch. Come here, hurry. Come on, you have to see this. You taught him to swim. around the tree, there was a boat, that we used for are fun-we had this loved spot all to ourselves- the lost beach- where we went to have what was so wrong to them. Look at the bird. Look, Priced-Day.

Do you see some fish? What do you see? We're out there we are now in the water naked- looking at all the things in the sea do you see that ship? Big- I said. Blair.

Yes? He said my name. as we rain back up on the lost lovers' beach, we're making footprints- being playful with each other. Remember the snowball fights we had every time it snowed? We say together- side by side and tight... it's freezing no... I remember that... look at us now... It's was cold.

I love you...

~*~

I want to see it again... and- over and- over- and over. What are you doing? Get those out of your mouth. she swallowed some.

Come here.

Don't close your eyes...Please don't go to sleep. Please.

(Fade)

I thought you were afraid. Of not being with me- take me there? Sure. I go there for bananas, myself... not getting along... at all at this point. Are you coming?

The next day in the hut- they made- it was part of the fun of doing this they said. Can we go closer to me jezz? Sorry- let's go- were now out- I'll see the moonlight, swimming now with her over a careful reef. Look at that face, it was a thought I had. The blue boat was overhead.

I can't stop this, yet we're drifting, for the boat... Look how far out we are! Shark!
Look... When it hits the water, you can hear it hiss. Look, see? Hear it?

-Where did you get those?

-Get those out of your mouth.

I can't make it out...

Swim... swim...

And we did...

Not by much, we made it out...

Remember me Shy-?

I got what I wanted too... Thanks, Jenny for being a d*ck, it took this long for your shit to stop- and get I boy to love me. ROT IN HELL!

B*TCH!

This was always where the girl came with their guys back in the day... the cove... next to the falls...

Part 8

Anecdotes

(Cut)

She recovered to Carp two Christmases later, stayed just long enough to show off a new purse and an even newer nose, and then blew back to the downtown. Hearsays floated back: she was dating the producer of some reality TV weight-loss show; she was becoming AVA's Secret model, though no one has ever seen her in a catalog. (And many of the boys have seen.)

Conrad Spurlock went into the manufacture of methamphetamines-his father's line of business-and poured the money into a new shed on Mallory Road, after their last place burned straight to the ground.

But Sean McManus used the money to go to college; he's thinking of becoming a doctor.
And this was the way life was forever on the planet Venus, and this was the schoolroom of the children of the rocket men and women who had come to a raining world to set up civilization and live out their lives.

In seven years of playing, there have been three deaths-four including Jimi Hareson, who shot himself with the second thing he'd bought at the pawnshop after his number came up red.

Do you see? Even the winner of Panic is afraid of something. So: back to the day after graduation, the opening day of Panic, the day of the Jump. Rewind to the beach but pause a few hours before Maggie stood on the ridge, suddenly petrified, afraid to jump.

Turn the camera slightly. We're not quite there. Almost, though. Marcel NO ONE ON THE BEACH WAS CHEERING

FOR Marcel Mason-no one would cheer for him either, no matter how far he got.

It didn't matter. All that mattered was the win. And Marcel had a secret-he knew something about Panic, knew more about it, probably than any of the other people on the beach.

He had two secrets. Marcel liked secrets... They fueled him, gave him a sense of power. When he was little, he'd even fantasized that he had his secret world, a private place of shadows, where he could curl up and hide.

Even now-on Dayna's bad days, when the pain came roaring back and she started to cry, when his mom hosed the place down with Fiberize and invited over her newest Piece of Shit date, and late at night Marcel could hear the bed frame hitting the wall, like a punch in the stomach every time he thought about sinking into that dark space, cool and private.

Everyone at school thought Marcel was a pussy. He knew that.

He looked like a pussy. He'd always been tall and skinny-angles and corners, his mom said, just like his father. As far as he knew, the angles-and the dark skin- where the only things he had in common with his dad, a Dominican roofer his mom had been with for one hot second back in Miami. Marcel could never even remember his name... Roberto. Or Rodrigo... Some shit like that.

Back when they'd first gotten stuck in Carp (that's how he always thought about it getting stuck-he, Dayna, and his mom was just like empty plastic bags skipping across the country on fitful bits of wind, occasionally getting snagged around a telephone pole or under the tires of some semi, pinned in place for a bit), he'd been beaten up three times: once by Greg O'Hare, then by Zavic Keller, and then by Greg O'Hare again, just to make sure that Marcel knew the rules. And Marcel hadn't swung back, not once.

He'd had worse before. Besides that, it was Marcel's second secret and the source of his power. He wasn't afraid. He just didn't care, and that was very, very different.

The sky was streaked with red and purple and orange. It reminded Marcel of an enormous bruise, or a picture taken of the inside of a body. It was still an hour or so before sunset and before the pot, and then the Jump would be announced.

Marcel cracked a beer. His first and only. He didn't want to be buzzed and didn't need to be either.

But it had been a hot day, and he'd come straight from Home Depot, and he was thirsty. The crowd had only just started to assemble. Periodically, Marcel- heard the muffled slamming of a car door, a shout of greeting from the woods, the distant blare of music.

Whippoorwill Road was a quarter-mile away; kids were just starting to emerge from the path, fighting their way through the thick underbrush, swatting away hanging moss and creeper vines, carting coolers and blankets and bottles and iPod speakers, staking out patches of sand. The school was done for good, forever. He took a deep breath. Of all the places, he had lived- New Orleans-New York, Chicago, DC, Dallas, Richmond, Ohio, Rhode Island, Oklahoma, smelled the best. Like growth and change, things turning over and becoming other things. Ray Hanrahan and his friends had arrived first. That was unsurprising.

Even though competitors weren't officially announced until the moment of the Jump, Ray had been bragging for months that he was going to take home the pot, just like his brother had two years earlier. Luke had won, just barely, in the last round of Panic. Luke had walked away with fifty- grand. The other driver hadn't walked away at all. If the doctors were right, she'd never walk again. Marcel flipped a coin in his palm, made it disappear, then reappear easily between his fingers. In fourth grade, his mom's boyfriend- he couldn't remember which one had bought him a book about magic tricks.

They'd been living in Oklahoma that year, a shithole in a flat bowl in the middle of the country, where the sun singed the ground to dirt and the grass to gray, and he'd spent a whole summer teaching himself how to pull coins from someone's ear and slip a card into his pocket so quickly, it was unnoticeable. It had started as a way to pass the time but had become a kind of obsession. There was something elegant about it: how people saw without seeing, how the mind fills in what is expected, how the eyes betrayed you.

Terror, he knew, was one big magic trick. The judges where the magicians; the rest of them were just a dumb, gaping audience.

Part: 9

Lifeguard Chair

Mike Dickinson came next, along with two friends, all of them visibly drunk. The D*ck's hair had started to thin, and patches of his scalp were visible when he bent down to deposit his cooler on the beach. His friends were carrying a half-rotted lifeguard chair between them: the throne, where Diggin, the announcer, would sit during the event. Marcel heard a high whine. He smacked unthinkingly, catching the mosquito just as it started to feed, smearing a bit of black on his bare calf. He hated mosquitoes. Spiders, too, although he liked other insects, found them fascinating. Like humans, in a way -stupid and sometimes vicious, blinded by need.

The sky was deepening; the light was fading and so were the colors, swirling away behind the line of trees beyond the ridge, as though someone had pulled the plug. Maggie Nill was next on the beach, followed by Nat Velez, and lastly, Bishop Marks, trotting happily after them like an overgrown sheepdog. Even from a distance, Marcel could tell both girls were on edge. Maggie had done something with her hair. He wasn't sure what, but it wasn't wrestled into its usual ponytail, and it even looked like she might have straightened it. And he wasn't sure, but he thought she might be wearing makeup.

He debated getting up and going over to say hi. Maggie was cool. He liked how tall she was, how tough, too, in her way. He liked her broad shoulders and the way she walked, straight-backed, even though he was sure she would have liked to be a few inches shorter could tell from the way she wore only flats and sneakers with worn down soles.

But if he got up, he'd have to talk to Natalie-and even looking at Nat from across the beach made his stomach seize up like he'd been kicked. Nat wasn't exactly mean to him-not like some of the other kids at school but she wasn't exactly nice, either, and that bothered him more than anything else. She usually smiled vaguely when she caught him talking to Maggie, and as her eyes skated past him, through him, he knew that she would never, ever, actually look at him. Once, at the homecoming bonfire last year, she'd even called him Dave.

He'd gone just because he was hoping to see her. And then, in the crowd, he had spotted her; had moved toward her, buzzed from the noise and the heat and the shot of whiskey he'd taken in the parking lot, intending to talk to her, really talk to her, for the first time. Just as he was reaching out to touch her elbow, she had taken a step backward, onto his foot.

'Oops! Sorry, Dave,' she'd said, giggling.

Her breath smelled like vanilla and vodka. And his stomach had opened up, and his guts went straight onto his shoes. There were only 107 people in their graduating class, out of the 150 who'd started at Carp High freshman year. And she didn't even know his name. So, he stayed where he was, working his toes into the ground, waiting for the dark, waiting for the whistle to blow and for the games to begin. He was going to win Terror. He was going to do it for Dayna. He was going to do it for revenge.

Maggie 'TESTING, TESTING. ONE, TWO, -THREE.' THAT WAS DIGGING, testing the megaphone. The old quarry off Whippoorwill Road, empty since the late 1800s, had been flooded in the fifties to make a swimming hole. On the south side was the beach: a narrow strip of sand and stone, supposedly off-limits after dark, but rarely used before then; a dump of cigarette butts, crushed beer cans, empty Baggies, and sometimes, disgustingly, condoms, scattered limply on the ground like tubular jellyfish.

Tonight, it was crowded-packed with blankets and beach chairs, heavy with the smell of mosquito repellent and booze.

Maggie closed her eyes and inhaled. This was the smell of Panic- the smell of summer. At the edge of the water, there was an explosion of color and sound, shrieks of laughter. Firecrackers. In the quick glare of red and green light, Maggie saw Kaitlin Frost and Shayna Lambert laughing, doubled over, while Patrick Culbert tried to get a few more flares to light. It was weird. Graduation had been only yesterday- Maggie had bailed on the ceremony, since Krista, her mom, wouldn't show, and there was no point in pretending there was some big glory in floating through four years of mandated classes. But already she felt years and years away from high school like it had all been one long, unmemorable dream.

Maybe, she thought, it was because people didn't change. All the days had simply blurred together and would now be suctioned away into the past. Nothing ever happened in Carp. There were no surprises. Digging's voice echoed through the crowd.

Part: 10

Hollered

'Welcome to the second challenge,' Digging boomed out.

'Suck it, Rodgers,' a guy yelled, and there were whoops and scattered laughs.

Someone else said, 'Sh-h.' Digging pretended he hadn't heard:

'This is a test of bravery and balance-'

'And sobriety!'

'Dude, I'm going to fall.'

More laughter. Maggie couldn't even smile. Next, to her, Natalie was fidgeting turning to the right and left, touching her hip bones. Maggie couldn't even ask what she was doing.

Digging kept plowing on: 'A test of speed, too, since all the contestants will be timed-'

'Jesus, get on with it.' Digging finally lost it. He wrenched the megaphone from his mouth. 'Shut the hell up, Lee.' This provoked a new round of laughter. To Maggie, it all felt off like she was watching a movie and the sound was a few seconds too late.

She couldn't stop herself from looking up now-at that single beam, a few bare inches of wood, stretched fifty feet above the ground. The Jump was a tradition, more for fun than for anything else, a plunge into the water. This would be a plunge to the hard earth, packed ground. No chance of surviving it.

There was a momentary stutter when the truck engine gave out, and everything went dark. There were shouts of protest; and when, a few seconds later, the engine gunned on-again, Maggie saw Matt: standing in the beam of the headlights, laughing, one hand in the back of Delaney's jeans. Her stomach rolled over. Weirdly, it was that fact-the way he had his hand shoved up against her butt-more than even seeing them together, that made her sick. He had never once touched her in that way, had even complained that couples who stood like that, hand-to-butt, should be shot.

Maybe he'd thought she wasn't cute enough. Maybe he'd been embarrassed by her. Maybe he had just been lying then, to spare her feelings.

Maybe she'd never really known him.

This thought struck her with terror.

If she didn't know Joel Flores- the boy who'd once applauded after she burped the alphabet, who'd even, once, noticed that she had a little period blood on the outside of her white shorts and not made a big deal of it, and pretended not to be grossed out-then she couldn't count on knowing any of these people, or what they were capable of.

Suddenly she was aware of stillness, a pause in the flow of laughter and conversation, as though everyone had drawn breath at once. And she realized that Kim Hollister was inching out onto the plank, high above their heads, her face stark-white and terrified and that the challenge had started. It took Kim forty-seven seconds to inch her way across, shuffling, keeping her right foot always in front of her left.

When she reached the second water tower safely, she briefly embraced it with both arms, and the crowd exhaled as one.

Then came Fred Harte: he made it even faster, taking the short, clipped steps of a tightrope walker. And then Merl Tracey. Even before he'd crossed to safety, digging lifted the megaphone and trumpeted the next name. 'Maggie Nill! Maggie Nill, to the stage!'

'Good luck, Heath- bar,' Natalie said.

'Don't look down.'

'Thanks,' Maggie said automatically, even as she registered it as ridiculous advice.

When you're fifty feet in the air, where else do you look but down?

She felt as though she were moving in silence, although she knew, too, that that was unlikely-Digging couldn't keep his mouth off that stupid megaphone for anything. It was just because she was afraid; afraid and still thinking, stupidly, miserably, about Matt, and wondering whether he was watching her with his hand still shoved down the back of Delaney's pants.

As she began to climb the ladder that ran up one leg of the eastern water tower, her fingers numb on the cold, slick metal, it occurred to her that he'd be staring at her butt, and feeling Delaney's butt, and that was sick.

Then it occurred to her that everyone could see her butt, and she had a brief moment of panic, wondering if her underwear lines were visible through her jeans, since she just couldn't stomach thongs and didn't understand girls who could. She was already halfway up the ladder by then, and it further occurred to her that if she was stressing so hard about underwear lines, she couldn't truly be afraid of the height.

For the first time, she began to feel more confident. But the rain was a problem. It made the rungs of the ladder slick under her fingers. It blurred her vision and made the treads of her sneakers slip. When she finally reached the small metal ledge that ran along the circumference of the water tank and hauled herself to her feet, the fear came swinging back.

There was nothing to hold on to, only smooth, wet metal behind her back, and air omnipresent. Only a few inches' difference among being alive and not. A tingle worked its way from her feet to her legs and up into her palms, and for a second, she was worried not of falling but of jumping, springing out into the mysterious air.

She shuffled sideways toward the wooden beam, pressing her back as hard as she could against the tank, praying that from below she didn't look as frightened as she felt. Crying out, hesitating-it would all be counted against her.

'Time!'

Digging's voice boomed out from below. Maggie knew she had to move if she wanted to stay in the game. Maggie forced herself away from the tank and inched forward onto the wooden plank, which had been barely secured to the ledge utilizing several twisted screws. She had a sudden image of wood snapping under her weight, a wild hurtle through space. But the wood held.

She raised her arms unconsciously for balance, no longer thinking of Matt or Delaney or Joh Joh staring up at her, or anything other than all that thin air, the horrible prickling in her feet and legs, an itch to jump.

She could move faster if she paced normally, one foot in front of the other, but she couldn't bring herself to break contact with the board; if she lifted a foot, a heel, a toe, she would collapse, she would swing to one side and die.

She was conscious of deep silence, a quiet so heavy she could hear the fizz of the rain, could hear her breathing, shallow and quick. Beneath her was blinding light, the kind of light you'd see just before you died.

All the people had merged with shadow, and for a second, she was afraid she had died, that she was all alone on a tiny, bare surface, with an endless fall into the dark on either side of her. Inch by inch, going as fast as she could without lifting her feet.

And then, all at once, she was done -she had reached the second water tower and found herself hugging the tank, like Kim had done, pressing flat against it, letting her sweatshirt get soaked. A cheer went up, even as another name was announced: Ray Hanrahan.

Her head was ringing, and her mouth perceived like alloy. Over. It was over. Her arms felt suddenly useless, her flesh weak with relief, as she made her way stumblingly down the ladder, dropping the last few feet and taking two stumbling steps before righting herself. Souls reached out, hugged her shoulders, patted her on the back. She didn't know if she grinned or not.

'You were amazing!' Nat barreled to her through the crowd. Maggie barely registered the feel of Nat's arms around her neck. 'Is it scary? Where you freaked?'

Maggie shook her head, conscious of people still watching her. 'It went quick,' she said. As soon as the words were out of her mouth, she felt better. It was over. She was standing in the middle of a crowd: the air smelled like damp fleece and cigarette smoke.

Solid- Real!

'Forty-two seconds,' Nat said proudly. Maggie hadn't even heard her time be announced.

'Where's Joh Joh?' Maggie asked. Now she was starting to feel good. A bubbly feeling was working its way through her. Forty-two seconds. Not bad.

'He was right behind me...' Nat turned to scan the crowd, but the truck's headlights turned everyone into silhouettes, dark brushstroke-people. Another cheer erupted.

Maggie looked up and saw that Ray had crossed already. Digging's voice echoed out hollowly: 'Twenty-two seconds! A record so far!'

Maggie swallowed back a sour taste. She hated Ray Hanrahan. In seventh grade, when she still hadn't developed boobs, he stuck a training bra to the outside of her locker and spread a rumor that she was taking medicine to turn into a boy. 'Got any chin hairs yet?' he'd say when he passed her in the halls. He only left her alone once Joh Joh threatened to tell the cops that Luke Hanrahan was selling weed from Pepe's, where he worked, slipping bags of pot under the slice if patrons asked for 'extra oregano.' Which he was.

It was Zavic Keller's turn next.

Part: 11

Root For

'Ladies and gentlemen, I have an announcement: the school's out for summer.' Everyone cheered... There was a no their pop- pop- pop, a burst of firecrackers. They were in the middle of the woods, five miles from the nearest house. They could make all the noise they wanted. They could shout. They could scream. No one would hear them.

Maggie's stomach seized up. It was starting. She knew Nat must be freaking out. She knew she should say something encouraging to her-Maggie and Bishop were there for Natalie, to give her moral support. Bishop had even made a poster: Go, Nat, he had written. Next, to the words, he had drawn a huge stick figure -Natalie could tell it was supposed to be here because the stick figure was wearing a pink sweatshirt-standing on a pile of money.

'How come Nat's not wearing any pants?' Maggie had asked.

'Maybe she lost them during the Jump,' Bishop said. He turned, grinning, to Nat. Whenever he smiled like that, his eyes went from syrup brown to honey-colored. 'Drawing was never my thing.'

Maggie didn't like to talk about Matt in front of Bishop. She couldn't stand the way he rolled his eyes when she brought him up as she'd just switched the radio to a bad pop station.

But finally, she couldn't help it. 'He's still not here.' Maggie spoke in a low voice, so only Nat would hear her.

‘Sorry, Nat. I know this isn’t the time- I mean; we came for you-’

‘It’s okay.’ Nat reached out and squeezed Maggie’s hand with both of her own. She pulled a weird face-like someone had just made her chug a limeade. ‘Look. Matt doesn’t deserve you. Okay? You can do better than Matt.’

Maggie half laughed. ‘You’re my best friend, Nat,’ she said. ‘You aren’t supposed to lie to me.’ Nat shook her head. ‘I’m sure he’ll be here soon. The game’s about to start.’ Maggie checked her phone again, for the millionth time. Nothing. She’d powered it down several times and rebooted it, just to make sure it was working.

Digging’s voice boomed out again:

‘The rules of Panic are simple. Anyone can enter. But only one person will win.’

Digging announced the pot.

$67,000.

Maggie felt as though she’d been punched in the stomach. $67,000. That had to be the biggest pot ever. The crowd began to buzz-the number ran through them like an electric current, jumping from lip to lip. Shit, man, you’d have to be crazy not to play. Nat looked as though she’d just taken a large spoonful of ice cream.

Digging plunged on, ignoring the noise. He announced the rules-a half-dozen events, spaced throughout the summer, conducted under conditions of strictest privacy; eliminations after every round; individual challenges for each contestant who made it past the halfway, mark- but nobody was listening. It was the same speech as always. Maggie had been watching Panic since she was in eighth grade.

She could have made the speech herself.

That number-67,000-wrapped itself around her heart and squeezed. Without meaning to, she thought of all she could do with the money; she thought of how far she could go, what she could buy, how long she could live. How many miles away from Carp she could get.

But no. She couldn’t leave Matt. Matt had said he loved her. He was her plan. The grip on her heart eased a little, and she found she could breathe again. Next, to Maggie, Natalie shimmied out of her jean shorts and kicked off her shoes. ‘Can you believe it?’ she said. She took off her shirt, shivering in the wind. Maggie couldn't believe she'd insisted on that ridiculous bikini, which would fly off as soon as she hit the water. Natalie had only laughed. Maybe, she'd joked, that would earn her extra points.

That was Natalie: stubborn. Vain, too. Maggie still couldn't understand why she'd even chosen to play. Nat was afraid of everything.

Someone-probably Billy Wallace- whistled. 'Nice ass, Velez.' Nat ignored him, but Maggie could tell she had heard and was pretending not to be pleased.

Maggie wondered what Billy Wallace would say if she tried to wear a scrap of fabric like that on her butt. Whoa. Look at the size of that thing! Do you need a permit to carry that thing around, Maggie? But Matt loved her. Matt thought she was pretty. The noise on the beach swelled, grew to a roar: hoots and screams, people waving homemade banners and flags, firecrackers exploding like a smattering of gunfire, and she knew it was time. The whistle would blow.

Terror was about to begin. Just then Maggie saw him. The crowd parted temporarily; she could see him, smiling, talking to someone; then the crowd shifted again, and she lost sight of him. 'He's here. Nat, he's here.' 'What?' Nat wasn't paying attention anymore.

Maggie's voice dried up in her throat. Because the crowd had opened again, just as she'd started moving toward him, as though directed by gravity-relief welling in her chest, a chance to make things right, a chance to do things right, for once-and in that second, she had seen that he was speaking to Delaney O'Brien.

Not just speaking. Whispering...

And then: kissing. The whistle blew sharp and thin in the sudden silence, like the cry of an alien bird.

Maggie reached the top of the ridge just as Derek Klieg got a running start and hurled himself into the air, body contorted, shouting.

A few seconds later, a cheer went up as he hit. Natalie was crouching a few feet away from the edge, her face pale; for a second,

Maggie thought she heard her counting. Then Nat turned and blinked repeatedly, as though trying to bring Maggie's face into focus. She opened her mouth and closed it again.

Maggie's heart was beating hard and high. 'Hey, Nat,' she said, just as Natalie straightened up.

'What the hell are you doing?' Natalie spat out. Now Maggie registered everything, all at once: the ache in her hands and thighs, the pain in her fingers, the sharp bite of the wind. Natalie looked furious. She was shaking, although that might have been the cold.

'I'm going to jump,' Maggie said, realizing, as she said it, how stupid it sounded how stupid it was. All of a sudden, she thought she might puke.

I'll be cheering for you; Maggie had said to Natalie. The guilt was there, throbbing alongside nausea. But Matt's voice was bigger than everything.

Matt's voice, and underneath it a vision of the water stains above her bed; the dull thud of music from the park; the smell of weed and cigarettes; the sounds of laughing, and later, someone screaming, you're a dumb piece of... Shit! 'You can't jump,' Nat said, still staring. 'I'm jumping.'

'We'll jump together,' Maggie said.

Natalie took two steps forward. Maggie noticed she was balling her fists almost rhythmically. Squeeze, relax.

Squeeze, relax. Three times.

'Why are you doing this?' The question was almost a whisper.

Maggie couldn't answer. She didn't even know, not exactly. All she knew-all she could feel was that this was her last chance.

So-o she just said, 'I'm going to jump now. Before I chicken out.'

When she turned toward the water, Natalie reached for Maggie, as if to pull her back. But she didn't.

Maggie felt as though the rock underneath her had begun to move, bucking like a horse. She had a sudden terror that she was going to lose her balance and go tumbling down the rocky slope, cracking her head in the shallows.

Fear. She took small, halting steps forward, and still reached the edge far too quickly.

‘Announce yourself!’ Digging boomed out. Below Maggie, the water, black as oil, was still churning with bodies. She wanted to shout down-move, move, I’m going to hit you-but she couldn’t speak. She could hardly breathe. Her lungs felt like they were being pressed between two stones.

And suddenly she couldn’t think of anything but Chris Heinz, who five years ago drank a fifth of vodka before doing the jump and lost his footing. The sound his head made as it cracked against the rock was delicate, almost like an egg breaking. She remembered the way everyone ran through the woods; the image of his body, broken and limp, lying half-submerged in the water.

‘Say your name!’ Digging prompted again, and the crowd picked up the chant: Name, name, name.

She opened her mouth. ‘Maggie,’ she croaked out. ‘Maggie Nill.’ Her voice broke, got whipped back by the wind.

The chant was still going: Name, name, name, name. Then: Jump, jump, jump, jump.

Her insides were white; filled with snow. Her mouth tasted a little like puke. She took a deep breath. She closed her eyes.

She jumped.

Part: 12

SATURDAY, JUNE 25

~Maggie~

MAGGIE HAD ONCE READ AN ARTICLE ONLINE ABOUT how time was relative and moved faster or slower depending on where you were and what you were doing. But she had never understood why it moved slower during the awful stuff-math class, dentist appointments-and speeded up whenever you tried to make time go slow. Like when you were taking a test, or at your birthday party.

Or, in this case, dreading something.

Why? Why- did time have to be the wrong kind of relative? She had never regretted anything as much as she regretted making the decision, on the beach, to enter the game. In the days that followed, it seemed to her like a kind of insanity. Maybe she'd inhaled too much booze-vapor on the beach. Maybe seeing Matt with Delaney had driven her temporarily psychotic.

That happened, didn't it? Weren't whole defenses built on that kind of thing, when people went crazy and hacked their ex-wives to pieces with an ax? But she was too proud to withdraw now. And the date of the first official challenge kept drawing nearer. Even though the breakup made her want to go into permanent hiding, although she was doing her best to avoid everyone who knew her even vaguely, the news had reached her: the water towers near Copake had been defaced, painted over with a date. Saturday. Sundown.

A message and invitation to all the players.

Matt was gone. The school was over.

Not that she'd ever liked school, but still. It got her out of the house; it was something to do. Now everything was over and done. It occurred to her that this was her life: vast and empty, like a coin dropping down a bottomless well. She moved as slowly as she could, spent her nights curled on the couch watching TV with her sister, Lily, turned off her phone when she wasn't obsessively checking it for calls from Matt...

She didn't want to deal with Bishop, who would lecture her and tell her that Matt was an idiot anyway; and Nat spent three days giving her the cold shoulder before admitting, finally, that she wasn't that mad anymore. Time tumbled, cascaded on, as though life had been set to fast-forward. Finally, Saturday came, and she couldn't avoid it anymore.

She didn't even have to bother to sneak out. Earlier in the evening, her mom and her stepdad, Bo, had gone over to some bar in Ancram, which meant they wouldn't be stumbling home until the early hours or, possibly, Sunday afternoon-bleary-eyed, reeking of smoke, probably starving and in a foul mood. Maggie made mac 'n' cheese for Lily, who ate in sullen silence in front of the TV. Lily's hair was parted exactly down the middle, combed straight, and fixed in a hard knot at the back of her head. Recently she had been wearing it like that, and it made her look like an old woman stuck in an eleven-year old's body.

Lily was giving her the silent treatment, and Maggie didn't know why, but she didn't have enough energy to worry about it. Lily was like that: stormy one minute, smiley the next. Recently, she'd been more on the stormy side- more serious, too, very careful about what she wore and how she fixed her hair, quieter, less likely to laugh until she snorted milk, less likely to beg Maggie for a story before she went to bed-but Maggie figured she was just growing up. There wasn't that much to smile about in Carp. There wasn't much to smile about in Fresh Pines Mobile Park.

Still, it made Maggie's chest ache a little. She missed the old Lily: sticky Dr. Pepper hands, the smell of the bubblegum breath, hair that was never combed, and glasses that were always smudgy. She missed Lily's eyes, wide in the dark, as she rolled over and whispered, 'Tell me a story, Maggie.' But that was the way it worked- evolution, she guessed; the order of things. At seven-thirty p.m., Bishop texted her to say that he was on his way.

Lily had withdrawn to the Corner, which was what Maggie called their bedroom: a narrow, cramped room with two beds squeezed practically side by side; a chest of drawers missing a leg, which rocked violently when it was opened; a chipped lamp and a varnish-spotted nightstand; clothes heaped everywhere, like snowdrifts. Lily was lying in the dark, blankets drawn up to her chin.

Maggie assumed she was sleeping and was about to close the door, when Lily turned to her, sitting up on one elbow. In the moonlight coming through the dirty windowpane, her eyes were like polished marbles.

'Where are you going?' She said. Maggie navigated around a tangle of jeans and sweatshirts, underwear and balled-up socks.

She sat down on Lily's bed. She was glad that Lily wasn't asleep. She was glad, too, that Lily had decided to talk to her after all.

'Bishop and Nat are picking me up,' she said, avoiding the question. 'We're going to hang out for a little while.'

Lily lay down again, huddling in her blankets. For a minute, she didn't say anything. Then: 'Are you coming back?' Maggie felt her chest squeeze up.

She leaned over to place a hand on Lily's head. Lily jerked away. 'Why would you say something like that, billy-goat?'

Lily didn't answer. For several minutes Maggie sat there, her heart racing in her chest, feeling helpless and alone in the dark. Then she heard Lily's breathing and knew she had fallen asleep. Maggie leaned over and kissed her sister's head. Lily's skin was hot and wet, and Maggie had the urge to climb into bed with her, to wake her up and apologize for everything: for the ants in the kitchen and the water stains on the ceiling; for the smells of smoke and the shouting from outside; for their mom, Krista, and their stepdad, Bo; for the pathetic life they'd been thrust into, narrow as a tin can. But she heard a light honk from outside, so instead, she got up, closing the door behind her.

Maggie could always tell Bishop was coming by the sound of his cars. His dad had owned a garage once, and Joh-John was a car freak. He was good at building things; several years ago, he'd made Maggie arise out of petals of copper, with a steel stem and little screws for thorns.

He was always tinkering with rusted pieces of junk he picked up from God-knows-where. His newest was a Le Sabre with an engine that sounded like an old man trying to choke out a belt buckle. Maggie took the shotgun. Natalie was sitting in the back. Weirdly, Natalie always insisted on sitting b*tch, in the exact middle, even if there was no one else in the car. She'd told Maggie that she didn't like picking sides-left or right-because it always felt like she was betting on her life. Maggie had explained to her a million times that it was more dangerous to sit in the middle, but Nat didn't listen. 'I can't believe you roped me into this,' Joh Joh said when Maggie got in the car. It was raining the kind of rain that didn't so much fall as materialize, as though it was being exhaled by a giant mouth. There was no point in using an umbrella or rain jacket-it was coming from all directions at once and got in collars and under shirtsleeves and down the back.

Part: 13

Failsafe

‘Please...’ She cinched her hoodie a bit tighter. ‘Cut the holier-than-thou crap. You’ve always watched the game.’

‘Yeah, but that was before my two best friends decided to go bat-shit and join.’

‘We get it, Joh-John,’ Nat said. ‘Turn on some music, will you?’

‘No can do, my lady.’ Joh-John reached into the cup holder and handed Maggie a Slurpee from 7-Eleven. Blue. Her favorite. She took a sip and felt a good freeze in her head. ‘Radio’s busted. I’m doing some work on the wiring-’ Nat cut him off, groaning exaggeratedly. ‘Not again.’

‘What can I say? I love fixer-uppers.’ He patted the steering wheel as he accelerated onto the highway. As if in response, the Le Sabre made a shrill whine of protest, followed by several emphatic bangs and a horrifying rattle, as if the engine were coming apart.

‘I’m pretty sure the love is not mutual,’ Nat said, and Maggie laughed, and felt a little less nervous. As Joh- John angled the car off the road and bumped into the narrow, packed-dirt one-liner that ran the periphery of the park, NO TRESPASSING signs were lit up intermittently amid his headlights.

Already, a few dozen cars were parked on the lane, most of them squeezed as close to the woods as possible, some almost entirely swallowed by the underbrush.

Maggie spotted Matt’s car right away-the old used Jeep he’d inherited from an uncle, its rear bumper plastered with half-shredded stickers he’d tried desperately to key off, as though he had backed up into a massive spider web. She remembered the first time they’d ever driven around together, to celebrate the fact that he had finally gotten his license after failing the test three times. He’d stopped and started so abruptly she’d felt like she might puke up the doughnuts he’d bought her, but he was so happy, she was happy too.

All-day, all week, she’d been both desperately hoping to see him and praying that she would never see him again.

If Delaney was here, she really would puke. She shouldn’t have had the Slurpee.

‘You okay?’ Joh Joh asked her in a low voice as they got out of the car. He could always read her: she loved and hated that about him at the same time.

‘I’m fine,’ she said, too sharply.

‘Why’d you do it, Maggie?’ he said, putting a hand on her elbow and stopping her. ‘Why’d you do it?’ Maggie noticed he was wearing the same outfit he’d been wearing the last time she’d seen him, on the beach- the faded-blue Lucky Charms T-shirt, the jeans so long they looped underneath the heels of his Converse-and felt vaguely annoyed by it. His dirty-blond hair was sticking out at crazy angles underneath his ancient Pittsburgh- hat. He smelled good, though, a very Joh Joh smell: like the inside of a drawer full of old coins and Tic Tacs.

For a second, she thought of telling him the truth: that when Matt had dumped her, she had understood for the first time that she was a complete and total nobody.

But then he ruined it. ‘Please tell me this isn’t about Matthew Haipley,’ he said.

There it was. The eye- roll.

‘Come on, Joh Joh.’ She could have hit him. Even hearing the name made her throat squeeze up into a knot.

‘Give me a reason, then. You said yourself, a million times, that Panic is stupid.’ ‘Nat entered, didn’t she? How come you aren’t lecturing her?’

‘Nat’s an idiot,’ Joh Joh said. He took off his hat and rubbed his head, and his hair responded as though it had been electrified, and it promptly stood straight up. Joh Joh claimed that his superpower was electromagnetic hair; Maggie’s only superpower seemed to be the amazing ability to have one angry red pimple at any given time.

‘She’s one of your best friends,’ Maggie pointed out.

‘So? She’s still an idiot. I have an open-door idiot policy on friendship.’

Maggie couldn’t help it; she laughed. Joh Joh smiled too, so wide she could see the small overlap in his two front teeth.

Joh Joh shoved on his baseball hat again, smothering the disaster of his hair. He was one of the few boys she knew who was taller than she was-even Matt had been exactly her height, five-eleven. Sometimes she was grateful; sometimes she resented him for it like he was trying to prove a point by being taller.

Up until the time they were twelve years old, they'd been the same height, to the centimeter. In Joh Joh's bedroom was a ladder of old pencil marks on the wall to prove it.

'I'm betting on you, Nill,' he said in a low voice. 'I want you to know that. I don't want you to play. I think it's idiotic. But I'm betting on you.' He put an arm over her shoulder and squeezed her, and something in his tone of voice reminded her that once- ages and ages ago, it felt like she had been briefly head-over-heels in love with him.

Freshman year, they'd had one fumbling kiss in the back of the Hudson Movie- Plex, even though she'd had popcorn stuck in her teeth, and for two days they'd held hands loosely, suddenly incapable of the conversation even though they'd been friends since elementary school. And then he had broken it off, and Maggie had said she understood, even though she didn't. She didn't know what made her think of it.

She couldn't imagine being in love with Joh Joh now. He was like a brother-an annoying brother who always felt the need to point out when you had a pimple. Which you did, always. But just one. Already, she could hear faint music through the trees, and the crackle and boom of Digging's voice, amplified by the megaphone.

The water towers scrawled with graffiti and imprinted faintly with the words Allegheny-counties, where lit starkly from below. Perched on rail-thin legs, they looked like overgrown insects. No-like a single insect, with two rounded steel joints. Because Maggie could see, even from a distance, that a narrow wooden plank had been set between them, fifty feet in the air.

The challenge, this time, was clear.

By the time, Maggie, Nat, and Joh Joh had arrived at the place where the crowd was assembled, directly under the towers, her face was slick. As usual, the atmosphere was celebratory- the crowd was keyed up, antsy, although everyone was speaking in whispers.

Someone had managed to maneuver a truck through the woods. A floodlight, hooked up to its engine, illuminated the towers and the single wooden plank running between them and lit up the mist of rain. Cigarettes flared intermittently, and the truck radio was playing old rock song thudded quietly under the rhythm of conversation. They had to be quieter tonight; they weren't far from the road.

'Promise not to ditch me, okay?'

Nat said. Maggie was glad she'd said it; even though these were her classmates, people she'd known forever, Maggie had a sudden terror of getting lost in the crowd.

'No way,' Maggie said. She tried to avoid looking up, and she found herself unconsciously scanning the crowd for Matt. She could make out a group of sophomores huddled nearby, giggling, and Shayna Lambert, who was wrapped in a blanket and had a thermos of something hot, as though she was at a football game.

Maggie was surprised to see Vivian Travin, standing by herself, a little ways' apart from the rest of the crowd. Her hair was knotted into dreadlocks, and in the moonlight, her various piercings glinted dully. Maggie had never seen Viv at a single social event-she'd never seen her doing much of anything besides cutting classes and waiting tables at Dot's. For some reason, the fact that even Viv had shown made her even more anxious.

'Joh Joh!' Avery Wallace pushed her way through the crowd and promptly catapulted herself into Joh Joh's arms, as though he'd just rescued her from a major catastrophe. Maggie looked away as Joh Joh leaned down to kiss her. Avery was only five feet-one and standing next to her made Maggie feel like the Jolly Green Giant on a can of corn.

'I missed you,' Avery said when Joh Joh pulled away. She still hadn't even acknowledged Maggie; she'd once overheard Maggie call her 'shrimp faced' and had never forgiven her. Avery did, however, look somewhat shrimplike, all tight and pink, so Maggie didn't feel that bad about it. Joh Joh mumbled something in return. Maggie felt nauseous, and heartbroken all over again. No one should be allowed to be happy when you were so miserable-especially not your best friends. It should be a law.

Avery giggled and squeezed Joh Joh's hand. 'Let me get my beer, okay? I'll be back. Stay right here.' Then she turned and vanished. Immediately, Joh Joh raised his eyebrows at Maggie. 'Don't say it.' 'What?' Maggie held up both hands. Joh Joh stuck a finger in her face. 'I know what you're thinking,' he said, and then jabbed at Nat.

'You too.'

Nat did her best innocent face.

'Unfair, Marks. I was just thinking about what a lovely accessory she makes. So-o small and convenient.'

‘The perfect pocket liner,’ Maggie agreed.

‘All right, all right.’ Joh Joh was doing a pretty good job of pretending to be angry.

‘Enough.’

‘It’s a compliment,’ Nat protested.

‘I said, enough.’ But after a minute, Joh Joh leaned over and whispered, ‘I can’t keep her in my pocket, you know. She bites.’ His lips bumped against Maggie’s ear-by accident, she was, sure- and she laughed. The weight of nerves in her stomach eased up a little. But then someone cut the music, and the crowd got still and very quiet, and she knew it was about to begin. Just like that, she felt a numbing cold all over, as though all of the rain had solidified and frozen on her skin.

Part: 14

Disremembered

Maggie forgot about looking for Joh Joh. She watched, transfixed, as Zavic moved out onto the plank. From the safety of the ground, it looked almost beautiful: the soft haze of rain, Zavic’s arms extended, a dark black shape against the clouds. Ray hadn’t come down the ladder. He must have been watching too, although he had moved behind the water tank, so he was invisible.

It happened in a split second; Zavic jerked to one side, lost his footing, and was falling. Maggie heard herself cry out. She felt her heart rocket into the roof of her mouth, and in that second, as his arms pin-wheeled wildly and his mouth contorted in a scream, she thought, Nothing and none of us will ever be the same.

And then, just as quickly, he caught himself. He got his left foot back onto the board, and his body stopped swaying wildly from right to left, like a loose pendulum. He straightened up.

Someone screamed Zavic’s name. And then the applause began, turning thunderous as he made his way, haltingly, the remaining few feet. No one heard the time that- Digging shouted. No one paid any attention to Ray as he came down the ladder. But as soon as Zavic was on the ground, he flew at Ray. Zavic was smaller than Ray and skinnier, but he tackled him from behind and the move was unexpected. Ray was on the ground, face in the dirt, in a second.

‘You are a freaking asshole. You threw something at me.’ Zavic raised his fist; Ray twisted, bucking Zavic off him.

‘What are you talking about?’

Ray, staggered to his feet, so his face was lit in the glare of the spotlight. He must have cut his lip on a rock. He was bleeding. He looked mean and ugly. Zavic got up too. His eyes were wild -black and full of hatred. The crowd was still, frozen, and Maggie once again thought she could hear the rain, the dissolution of a hundred thousand different drops at once. Everything hung in the air, ready to fall.

‘Don’t lie,’ Zavic spat out. ‘You hit me in the chest. You wanted me to fall.’

‘You’re crazy.’

Ray started to turn away. Zavic charged him. And then they were down again, and all at once, the crowd surged forward, everyone shouting, some pushing for a better view, some jumping in to pull the boys off each other.

Maggie was squeezed from all sides. She felt a hand on her back and she barely stopped herself from falling.

She reached for Nat’s hand instinctively.

‘Maggie!’ Nat’s face was white, frightened. Their hands were wrenched apart, and Nat went down among the blur of bodies.

‘Nat!’ Maggie shoved through the crowd, using her elbows, thankful now to be so big. Nat was trying to get up, and when Maggie reached her, she let out a scream of pain.

‘My ankle!’ Nat was saying, panicked, grabbing her leg. ‘Someone stepped on my ankle.’ Maggie reached for her, then felt a hand on her back: this time deliberate, forceful. She tried to twist around to see who had pushed her, but she was on the ground, face in the mud before she could. Feet churned up the dirt, splattered her face with moisture. For just one moment, Maggie wondered whether this-the seething crowd, the surge was part of the challenge. She felt a break in the crowd, a fractional release.

‘Come on.’ She managed to stand up and hook Nat under the arm.

‘It hurts,’ Nat said, blinking back tears. But Maggie got her to her feet. Then a voice came blaring, suddenly, through the woods, huge and distorted.

‘Freeze where you are, all of you...’

Cops...

Part: 15

Beams of Light

Everything was chaos. Beams of light swept across the crowd, turning faces white, frozen; people were running, pushing to get out, disappearing into the woods. Maggie counted four cops—one of them had wrestled someone to the ground, she couldn’t see who. Her mouth was dry, chalky, and her thoughts disjointed. Her hoodie was smeared with mud, and the cold seeped into her chest.

Joh- John was gone. Joh Joh had the car.

Car. They needed to get out or hide.

She kept a hand on Nat’s arm and tried to pull her forward, but Nat stumbled. Tears welled up in her eyes.

‘I can’t,’ she said.

‘You have to.’ Maggie felt desperate. Where was the hell, Joh Joh? She bent down to loop an arm around

Nat’s waist. ‘Lean on me.’ ‘I can’t,’ Nat repeated. ‘It hurts too bad.’

Then Marcel Mason came out of nowhere. He was suddenly next to them, and without pausing or asking permission, he put one of his arms around Nat’s waist as well, so that she could be carried between them. Nat gave a short cry of surprise, but she didn’t resist. Maggie felt like she could kiss him.

‘Come on,’ he said. They passed into the woods, stumbling, going as quickly as possible, moving away from the booming megaphone-voices, the screaming, and the lights. It was dark. Marcel kept his cell phone out; it cast a weak blue light on the sodden leaves underneath them, the wet ferns and the shaggy, moss-covered trees.

‘Where are, we are going?’ Maggie whispered. Her heart was pounding. Nat could barely put any weight on her left leg, so every other step, she leaned heavily into Maggie.

‘We have to wait until the cops clear out,’ Marcel replied. He was short of breath. A few hundred feet beyond the water towers, nestled in the trees, was a narrow pump house.

Maggie could hear mechanical equipment going inside it, humming through the walls, when they stopped so Marcel could shoulder the door open. It wasn’t locked.

Inside, it smelled like mildew and metal. The single room was dominated by two large tanks and various pieces of rusted electrical equipment; the air was filled with a constant, mechanical thrush, like the noise of a thousand crickets.

They could no longer hear shouting from the woods.

Part: 16

Twisted

‘Probably sprained,’ Marcel said.

‘Jez-us.’ Nat exhaled heavily and maneuvered onto the ground, extending her left leg in front of her, wincing. ‘It hurts.’

He sat down as well, but not too close.

‘I swear I felt someone crack it.’ Nat leaned forward and began touching the skin around her ankle. She inhaled sharply.

‘Leave it, Nat,’ Maggie said. ‘We’ll get some ice on it as soon as we can.’ She was cold and suddenly exhausted. The rush she’d felt from completing the challenge was gone.

She was wet and hungry, and the last thing she wanted to do was sit in a stupid pump house for half the night. She pulled out her phone and texted Joh Joh. Where are you?

‘How’d you know about this place?’ Nat asked Marcel. ‘Found it the other day,’ Marcel said. ‘I was scouting. Mind if I smoke?’

‘Kind of,’ Maggie said.

He shrugged and replaced the cigarettes in his jacket. He kept his cell phone out, on the floor, so his silhouette was touched with blue.

‘Thank you,’ Nat blurted out. ‘For helping me. That was really... I mean, you didn’t have to.’

‘No problem,’ Marcel said.

Maggie couldn’t see his face, but there was a weird quality to his voice like he was being choked.

‘I mean; we’ve never even spoken before....’ Marrybe realizing she sounded rude, Nat trailed off.

For a minute, there was silence.

Maggie sent another text to Joh Joh.

What The F*ck?

Then Marcel said abruptly, ‘We spoke before. Once. At the pep rally, last year. You called me David.’

‘I did?’ Nat giggled nervously.

‘Stupid. I was probably drunk. Remember, Maggie? We took those disgusting shots.’

‘Mmmm.’ Maggie was still standing. She leaned up against the door, listening to the sound of the rain, which was drumming a little harder now. She strained to hear, underneath it, the continued sounds of shouting. She couldn’t believe Joh Joh still hadn’t texted her back. Joh Joh always responded to her messages right away.

‘Anyway, I’m an idiot,’ Nat was saying. ‘Anyone will tell you that. But I couldn’t very well forget a name like Marcel, could I? I wish I had a cool name.’

‘I like your name,’ Marcel said quietly.

Maggie felt a sharp pain go through her. She had heard in Marcel’s voice a familiar longing, a hollowness-and she knew then, immediately and without doubt, that Marcel liked

Natalie. For a second, she had a blind moment of envy, a feeling that gripped her from all sides. Of course. Of course, Marcel liked Nat. She was pretty and giggly and small and cute, like an animal you'd find in someone's purse.

-Like-

Avery. The association arrived unexpectedly, and she dismissed it quickly. She didn't care about Avery, and she didn't care whether Marcel liked Nat, either. It wasn't her business. Still, the idea continued to drum through her, like the constant patter of the rain: that no one would ever love her.

'How long do you think we should wait?' Nat asked.

'Not too much longer,' Marcel said. They sat in silence for a few minutes. Maggie knew she should make a conversation, but she was too tired.

'I wish it wasn't so dark,' Nat said after a few minutes, rustling. Maggie could tell from her voice she was getting impatient.

Marcel stood up. 'Wait here,' he said and slipped outside. For a while, there was silence except for a tinny banging-something moving through the pipes and the hiss of water on the roof.

'I'm going to go to L.A.,' Nat blurted out suddenly. 'If I win.' Maggie turned to her. Nat looked defiant, as though she expected Maggie to start making fun of her. 'What for...?' Maggie asked.

'The surfers,' Nat said. Then she rolled her eyes. 'Hollywood, bean brain. What do you think for?' Maggie went over to her and crouched. Nat always said she wanted to be an actress, but Maggie had never thought she was serious-not serious enough to do it, definitely not serious enough to play Panic for it. But Maggie just nudged her with a shoulder.

'Promise me that when you're rich and famous, you won't forget the bean brains you knew back when.'

'I promise,' Nat said. The air smelled faintly like charcoal.

'What about you? What will you do if you win?' Maggie shook her head. She wanted to say: Run until I burst. Build miles and miles and miles between me and Carp. Leave the old Maggie behind, burn her to dust. Instead, she shrugged. 'Go somewhere, I guess.'

Sixty-seven grand buys a lot of gas.'

Nat shook her head. 'Come on, Maggie,' she said quietly. 'Why'd you enter?'

Just like that, Maggie thought of Matt, and the hopelessness of everything, and felt like she would cry. She swallowed back the feeling. 'Did you know?' she said finally.

'About Matt, I mean, and Delaney.'

'I heard a rumor,' Nat said carefully.

'But I didn't believe it.'

'I heard she ... with him...'

Maggie couldn't say the words. She knew she was probably a little prude, especially compared to Nat. She was embarrassed about it and proud of it at the same time: she just didn't see what was so great about fooling around. 'At the frigging

Arboretum.' 'She's a whore,' Nat said matter of- factly. 'Bet she gives him herpes. Or worse.'

'Worse than herpes?' Maggie said doubtfully.

'Syphilis... Turns you into a mutter.

Puts holes in the brain, swiss- cheese- style.' Maggie sometimes forgot that Nat could always make her laugh. 'I hope not,' she said. She managed to smile. 'He wasn't that smart, to begin with. I don't think he has a lot of brains to spare.'

'You hope so, you mean.' Nat mimed holding up a glass.

'To Delaney's syphilis.'

'You're crazy,' Maggie said, but she was laughing full-on now.

Nat ignored her. 'Marry it turn Joel Flores's brain to delicious, gooey cheese.'

'Amen,' Maggie said and raised her arm.

'Amen.' They pretended to clink. Maggie stood up again and moved to the door. Marcel was still not back; she wondered what he was doing.

‘Do you think-’ Maggie took a deep breath. ‘Do you think anyone will ever love me?’ ‘I love you,’ Nat said. ‘Joh Joh loves you. Your mom loves you.’ Maggie made a face, and Nat said, ‘She does, Heath bar, in her way.

-And-

Lily loves you too.’

‘You guys don’t count,’ Maggie said.

Then, realizing how that sounded, she giggled. ‘No offense.’ ‘None took,’ Nat said. After a pause, Maggie said, ‘I love you, too, you know. I’d be a basket case without you. I mean it. I’d be carted off and, I don’t know, drawing aliens in my mashed potatoes by now.’

‘I know,’ Nat said. Maggie felt as if all the years of their lives together, their friendship, where welling up there, in the dark: the time they’d practiced kissing on Nat’s mom’s sofa cushions; the first time they’d ever smoked a cigarette and Maggie had puked; all the secret texts in classes, fingers moving under the desk and behind their textbooks. All of it was hers, hers and Nat’s, and all those years were nestled inside them like one of those Russian dolls, holding dozens of tiny selves inside it.

Maggie turned to Nat, suddenly breathless.

‘Let’s split the money,’ she blurted out.

‘What?’

Nat blinked...

‘If one of us wins, let’s split it.’ Maggie realized, as soon as she said it, that she was right. ‘Fifty-fifty. Thirty grants can still buy a lot of gas, you know.’

For a second, Nat just stared at her.

Then she said, ‘All right. Fifty-fifty.’ Nat laughed. ‘Should we shake on it? Or pinkie swear?’

‘I trust you,’ Maggie said.

Marcel returned at last. ‘It’s clear,’ he said.

Maggie and Marcel supported Nat between them, and together they made their way beneath the water towers and into the clearing that had so recently been packed with characters. Now the only evidence of the crowd was the trash left behind: stamped-out cigarette butts and all the joints, crushed beer cans, towels, a few umbrellas. The truck was still parked in the mud, but its engine was stopped.

Maggie imagined the cops would bring out a tow for it later. The quiet was strange, and the whole scene felt weirdly creepy. It made Maggie think that everyone had been spirited away into thin air.

Marcel gave a sudden shout. 'Hold on a second,' he said and left Nat leaning on Maggie. He moved several feet away and scooped something up from the ground—a transportable cooler. Maggie saw, when he angled his cell phone light onto it, that it still contained ice and beer. However, the Joh Joh's phone was still going straight to voicemail and was getting cut off on the second ring. Matt and Delaney were probably intimate sun and warm wooden plank, and the itch in the soles of her feet, telling her to jump.

'Jackpot,' Marcel said. He smiled for the first time all night. He took the cooler with them, and when they reached Route 22, he made a substitute ice pack for Nat's ankle.

There were three beers left, one for each of them at that time, and they drank so much collectively on the side of the road, in the pouring rain, while they waited for the bus to appear. Nat got giggly after just a few sips, and she and Marcel joked about smoking a cigarette to make the bus come quicker, and Maggie knew she should be satisfied.

<3

Nevaeh

Book: 15

Seventeen

Chapter: 105

Part: 1

(Back)

It all started two years ago; I drew for her, to see what she would think. She likes it... but it was not enough to get her talking. To week later she was with him... what does she see in him?

Sometimes- I go to see her... at this little place in the same town. Where she is the worth that I can feel in what is left of my broken heart.

Sending letters that the father never gave- yes, as much as I can, I go to be around her, to see that smile and these braces on her teeth that smile that brightens my day. Not always with success do I get attention, but at least I can see her and her amazing eyes.

Who knows it might even get a hello from her- she is perfect in every way! I did see anything wrong with having a seventeen-year-old dream girl at the time.

Back then it all started with me making the crazy decision to ask her to marry me, over a social networking site, I sure her boyfriend loved me asking her that question. But at the time I did not give a shit, I knew what I wanted, and I was not going to let anything get in the way.

She must think I am smoking something, or that I am just completely waked! For the reason that I hardly even know her in true reality, but yet, I know everything about here in my mind.

I have never felt so attached to anyone like this before. Just thinking about here is making me foolish. Not knowing anything about her, yet, I cannot help it, but feel as if she is the one for me. That the search is finally over! I believe that I found the one for me maybe, there is one more issue and that is her family.

My mind is running fast and with intention what should I do next. Oh, networking is a double-edged sword her profile on the web is a tease.

But then again is love? I guess...? Let's just say that I did get an answer, but I did know that there was so much more than I need to wait for...

Part: 2

Ponder

Did I just scare her away?

Oh no- what did I do? Maybe she will see that I admire her? Maybe she will think what I ask was sweet my she thinks I am a freak. Hum- What does Olivia think? It is like- 'Open mouth insert foot,' or not say anything and lose her to him.

What should I do, what can I do?

Her boyfriend Brandon is going to kill me! Yet, I have a heart ring sitting on my nightstand. Is she going to single soon, just because you have photos and relationship status as taken but doesn't mean that you're his mind, body, and soul? Or are you dating him because that is what others want, like your family?

Without me knowing what to do or think, this thought popped in into my head? Would her friends approve of us even being together? I know some of them may, and then again how do I know what they might say, hopefully, it is all good. Will I ever know?

Oh yes, she is still in high school, and I am six years older; but age is just a number, right?

She did a drawing, and it was breathtaking, I commented, and things started to work out. But will this blessed luckily streak last?

However, the ice has been broken.

Artwork and creativity can open up all kinds of doors even the one to the heart... Did she make this impress me? As of now, I don't know, however it was excessive, wonderful and beautiful. Just what I was looking for, someone that enjoys the same things that I do.

What more can I ask for?

The 28th I don't know what to think? Yes, no, maybe? Someone give me a sign or something? The love heart line kind of flat-lined until the 14th of the next month, which was a win I felt that the relationship finally took off some.

The online conversion were light-hearted, and modest.

Nevertheless, it was a remarkable achievement of accomplishment; looking back at how completed it can be just to have her know that I am even there. Just have to see what the next couple of days bring.

Maybe there is a date on the way. I wished her goodnight and sweet dreams and have to see what the next day brings me.

The 22nd what an amazing day, I got to speak to her at last in the place where one can meet and greet, yet I had a few interruptions; I could help it, I was unusually popular that day.

She was so cute about it... with her braces on her teeth, and the way she looks at me. When she waked up to me, I could not speak because of the other that was wanted my - complete attention in the place.

Finally, at the cash register that magic spot for flirting together... we talked more face to face, no screen of allowance no button to click just real stimulation of interaction. It was all nervously publicized to one another so that just lead to the plans to talk online more, awesome!

The perfect girl what can I say, to be so close yet, feel miles away. Want to run to her but have to walk out the door the ether way. The only words spoken to her is- 'Have a nice day.'

Thinking about her and the summer and what it could be- with her it reminds me of Seventeen- you're on my mind all the time and I think about you yet we're not together. The stars shining combined with ribbon holding hands forever.

This is the days we could have together it could be like Sunflowers, Hayfields, kissing in the rain, no more brick walls, falling teardrops no more prize paces remain.

True love shouldn't be such a game; does she feel the same. She's is everything she is seventeen. What if every day could be like this: Dimmed rings, football games, and a movie on the weekends? Its plan to see you belong to me, she's is everything that reminds me of Seventeen everything that is in our dreams. Everything she does is amazing, but then again, I am just speculating.

The 26th I don't have much to say, it feels there is something in the way, let's see what happens in another day. The 27th I give her a guitar pick to make into a nickel, I hope she liked it, I got her to smile! But is she going to know the meaning behind it or not?

She looked at the message that I made from before 4:58 pm. That I told her about let's see if this becomes a date?

The 29th so when are you going to let me take you out, to a movie or something of your choice?

The 30th is it all over 'I don't know...' Those are the words that answer all the unanswered questions.

Note: I wish I would have met her sooner so that we could have been together. Back when I was in school. It would have been nice to be the same age and to be seventeen again and know what I know now, and doing the same things... but it's ok hopefully we can still make it work. Even if I can't date her, I still want to be a part of her life.

The 1st it's a new moth is love going to start up for me? But right now, he is still in the way. The leaves are changing and so am I, but I just can't wait any longer? October is in the air, and it would be perfect to get together!

The 2nd I can't sleep, I can't think, I can't breathe, hell I eat a whole box of apple jacks in one day. Am I falling in love with a girl that I know that I can never have, yes, she is seventeen?

And what gets me is that I feel that she feels the same way about me, yet the social world thanks to that he is the one for her... why not he is her age and the boy toy that most of the high school girls drool over. All I have to say is that we will have to see, what is meant to be?

The 5th I don't know what to think.

The 12th it's not over if anything it's a new start!

The 19th being romantic is not dead, and it does exist. You just need to be with the right guy, which can show you what real expressions of love is! :0

Where do you consider being places for romance? - Romance doesn't exist don't kid yourself has a guy ever asked you to marry him? - Yes, but not whom you would expect :0

The 22nd I got to see my girl today and invited her to my book thing so... ya-ah me! Let's see if she comes to see me.

The 28th everyone sucks in this town but what else is new, and I learned that it's uncool to tie your shoes. Carved Halloween stuff...

The 6th of November I saw here today, and it was awesome like magic, and I go to her too small because of an inside joke. The 7th and 6th are forecasted to be romantic let's see if we make it into a joined partnership.

She is going to feel this on the 7th.

Today you will have a chance to change certain areas of your life, especially your love life. You will seek adventure - not in the physical sense of a journey anywhere, but the metaphysical sense of a journey within. You get a new perspective on your relationship and feel like a whole new world has opened up to you.

Partners will never seem the same again.

The 8th so I asked via the social network, how is your Thursday going? What have you been up to! – She answered on another web page her reply to me, it's like a secret message to me, however, she is with him; seeing a scary movie that is boring to her to the point of agony.

'I think that If you're with the right person, then you should not be bored, or watching the movie.' You should, making out the whole time, and cuddling with one another. Does she want to be with me, but can't be? However, is she happy being unappreciated by him? What is going to happen? Is this seventeen-flame going workout or happen?

There is a lot of speculation circulating about your love life at the moment. It could take a new and very different path forward, sooner than you think. All this is good news, although you may worry about how your relationship will be affected. Shake off that pessimistic view and allow a miracle to unfold. Then take that first step forward.

11/ 9/ 13

I don't know why but I feel say it is going to be an amazing day!

You've had a lot of dates and met a lot of interesting people, but at times like the beginning of the week, you yearn for that special someone in your life who knows you well, someone you can tell all of your problems to.

Platonic friends can turn into something more if there's an attraction combined with intimacy midweek. Taking the relationship to the next level can be complicated but fulfilling. The flow of dating energy is different at the beginning of the week, so take advantage of it and mix things up a little.

When you go somewhere out of the ordinary you open up your chances of meeting exciting new people! You run up against some stiff competition at the end of the week. Whether you like it or not, you'll have to prove yourself if you want to 'win' the affection of your latest crush.

The 9th it's all over and I don't know what to do!

The 13th Bartering is the name of the game to get you back-

Sometimes, I get so preoccupied trying to perfect everything that I forget to appreciate the things that are already perfect, have you ever been in love with a girl that you can't have?

I am getting older by the moment and feel as if I am weathering away. Yes, just one day closer to the casket, or am I in it. This life I have had has done nothing but pressure me into becoming what I never intended to be. Then again look at what I get to show for it. I got everything I ever wanted just not in the way I want it to be.

I sit with a non-filled heart of thinking that life is so unfair, listening to my mind as it spins like a tornado through Kansas and all the thoughts of what can and can't be rushing like a bolt through my brain. All this takes me to a place that I will never be again. If only I would have done this and not that... If only is all I think about.

Nonetheless, mostly I think of all the existences from back in the days of seventeen. Why seventeen you ask? While it was everything real to me, the only thing I wanted, all that I still think about. 'She was a black-haired beauty with big blue dog eyes.' Her eyelashes could put you in trances as they blinked. She was petite in her stature, but she had it all if you know what I am saying.

Pulse I was going get into that skirt, and the way I could. She has those sweet pink lips, which could curl up your toes, even to this day, oh yes! I was young once, but you grow old fast, if you don't have anything keeping you young, what the hell do I have to live for?

Back when she was on the edge of seventeen and my life was entertaining, pleasurable, and stimulating. Everything seems flawless when with her; she was, and still is flawless in my eyes. But everything changes and everything moves on. But she still talks to me and dances around me.

Yet we can't be together as we would like to be you see. Those days were over a long time ago.

She was the gasoline that lit my match on fire, and only she had the right moisture or what it took to extinguish it out. I guess we filled each other up with our hopes, and dreams let's not forget about the compassion.

We filled each other up on the pitches and surrounding grounds to, don't get me wrong. But there was more there than just young stupid lust here. Something deeper that sucks down on you to the point you don't know what you're going to do. You feel that your head is going to explode, it will make your brain spin and go numb. But is this what you would call love?

Is this what we all come back for more of? All this year, I think of what I have missed out on. All these years I said this is true love? But to this day I don't know if love is real or just a state of mind, which is a ghost that haunts me. How do you love something that cannot be shown to everyone that they love you back? I still have a two-carat heart-shaped diamond ring around my neck on the ball chain that my ex's did, the ring was going to be hers; it will most likely go to the grave with me, and the tag will be in her padded box forever.

Love is not-love unless it is shown to the world-right? Is love just getting it on, or is it about being soul mates? I am, and an old man and I still have no clue... What is love; to some love is L for lust that makes you want to get it all, to do whatever you can to please.

O is Oh shit this is going to be crazy, and what should I do next. V is for virgins having victory getting to the next level, saying I got to touch and feel it. E is for Exposed, and unsatisfied, that is love for some.

On the other hand, if you're like me I try to believe that Nat King Cole sings love the way it should be, but most of the time that kind of love is just a fantasy. If you're like me you have to believe in a little of both, just to see what it's all about.

My life is just like flipping through the pages of an organized book, you will understand my life and what it was all about, was it a waste of time? Or did my life have something more? I guess we will have to gaze into notes to see.

I was told in 1945, I was a twenty-two-year-old soldier back from the battlefields and the air raids, and looking for my innocents, and Olivia Sartre's was the girl for me.

Her father was a teacher at the local high school; he knew that and believed that I had found love within it his precious little girl. This man hated my guts, but the feeling was mutual. around this time when I was at war Olivia was a worker at the local café. She was only seventeen, and a shy as can be in her ways and was so sweet to talk to and even sweeter to gaze at.

Plus, up to this point in her life, she was not that interested in any other boys, but we were close associates all of our lives, so would say more than friends.

However, destiny has its plans that no one can foresee, do you believe in soul mates? If you are anything like me, you still do not know what the hell I am doing when it comes to love. Love can make you seem crazy to the ones that just do not understand.

With Olivia, I felt like I had the world by the ass and was loved. I had to leave my little coal mine town to go and fight.

Oh, I am not saying that war didn't fix us boys up with or ladies the nights to make us man... but I felt that I was the man that I was supposed to be before I left. Anyways that type of girl was not my style.

Oh, the temptation can make you go out of your mind, but there was only one thing that was stopping me. That was a promise that I made to Olivia, who was about to turn seventeen in a month or so at the time. I wrote her a love letter every day If I could, I still have all of them sitting here on my desk breaking apart in old age.

But as of now and this present day my heart is heavy, and my hands are weak, as she sits with memory at my feet. Yah, I am not the rock that I used to be, but her rock displeases her name, and her birthdate this is one thing that I have now that reminds me, of what she ones were to me, and what she is to me as of now. I could not hold a pen in my hands if I tried, but I walk to see her every day or at least I try, seeing that gleaming stone just make me want to cry anyway but still I do it, I hope for the day that I die, is that wrong?

Some would say that it not manly to keep a scrapbook; well I do not give two shits or care what others think, you see. This book holds the memories of us, and even more that no one has ever seen before. It a book of secrets that no one knows about other than me, but it's in my last will and testament that Kristen will be given it, and what she does what it is completely up to her at that time.

In the winter, I like to sit in my chair at night in the living room and go through the pages one by one. Knowing that when I get to the end; I will most likely close the book, and start all over again, maybe seeing something that I missed from before. Every time something comes to mind, all the things that happened during that moment in time, that are escaping my mind slowly. Beholding the photographs, and notes reading, and looking at them so intently by the light of the fireplace, that my eyes shoot blood... Maybe, I need to get new bifocal glasses?

Each page comes to life, and the photo starts to move as if I can look into that time and place just like a slow-moving film clip. I can see all the scenes play out, I can feel, taste, and even hear, what was going on in the frame; as I view into each and everyone, just like a porthole of the bygone.

Some of these relics make my heart beat rapidly fast and others bring tears to my eyes, some make me joyful, and others very disheartened. I think that I have been blessed for all this time that I have had. Blessed for the times we had, and all that was part of my life, most of them are going, nevertheless, I can still get the sensation from them all, as I recall them and let them shine into my collective soul.

Besides in times of creed, she takes me to a higher place- with her arms wide open, and wings vast in the midair. This was all part of her sacrifice... yet how are we going to be remembered? When - am the only one that remembers her now?

In my book with a brown cover, I start from the beginnings and see our little faces in shades of gray. Though faded I can still make it all out. The first pages are ripping and tattered from being so timeworn. The binding of my book is hard there any more you and see the strings that hold it together, and some pages are falling out.

All my notes of my life are- now yellowing, all the love letters I wrote with a pen that I had to dip into an inkwell, all of this is my life that I planned on making into a book someday.

But someday never came for me, I plan that this story of us yet, I thought it would be quite different; the end of the scrapbook or manuscript has not been made yet, because I do not have an end to show or write as of now. To me, the end was in the middle, and that is when I lost interest in creative expressions.

Part: 3

warfare

All these notes... some from Olivia, some from the war, some from others that loved me, this all tells a story, and it's just all history now.

'Nothing lasts forever it is all going to be dust in the wind.' 'Evenhandedly I gave you everything, just for you to die with a smile; all you wanted was to live for a while. You took everything, but it left you empty.' So much we don't understand, all I ever wanted to be was a happily ever after.'

I am so tired of being here, without you, even if you are here next to me in ghostly form. You are the evanescence of my Immortal love. All of this time has passed, after you pass away, yet it cannot erase you from me, now or ever. I whipped your tear then and I would even now, nothing has changed, only the moment in time. 'You still have all of me!'

I see myself in the glossy stone one more, and I see that the young man is gone, and this timeworn outer self is all that is left. This deep-rooted body is all that reminds me of what I used to be, and it mocks and howls at me as I try to be as I was back then.

The moon sheens and the rock are shown as a colorless shade of grey against the black starfield heavens, the grave is all that is alive, and the world is dying around me.

I can see my breath wobbling within puffs out of my mouth as exhaling; yes, I try to walk away and leave it all this behind me, but the bound is just too tight she was all ways so tight. So, tight she could squeeze, just like she was when she was seventeen.

The feeling I have is more intense than anyone could imagine. 'Some of them just hurt, and some of them hurt so well. Yet the best was with her when she was alive.'

Olivia grabs me by the ankles, and she rises to hold close to me, being this old it terrifies the shit out of me quite truthfully, but I love it because I adore her.

She knows all this, yet she follows me on the trail back to the homestead. She is the worth that I had now, that my blood is getting so cold.

On the way home I have to rest, as I said I am not what I used to be, I walk to the gazebo on the pond; the pathway is overgrown with tall grasses and last roses of summer now, and the old yellow wood rowboat float over the mist tied by its rope that is fraying away.

The whitewashed timber bridge is splinted and falling apart just as is the gazebo itself. But then again, I am just too damn old to fix it, in a sighing breath heavily- thinking that no one else knows what this place means to me, and no one cares, really it is just one of those places that were our memories. If I could choose a song that would fit my life somewhat it would be – ‘Remember When’ by Alan Jackson.

That song plays in my mind as I sit, and think now that I have lived an undaunted, yet all right life; you have what you have, and you are blessed when you have it, so do not take it greedily or you will lose it. I reason with myself drawing in a breath and letting it go slowly. I cannot remember who I was, back then, as my heart is heavy, and my hands are shaky now.

Besides looking back into the depths, and craves of my mind, I can see that she was a wolf in sheep’s clothing, and I was the prey.

Will you do pay for your sins, yet she creeps and plays with my brain and the visions or so real but are they an illusion or something more? She ties up my thoughts but is it all a waste? It is enough to drive you out of your mind. You know that I cannot say that I have any regrets.

Nash- The chrome grill is pitted, and the headlight glass smashed, and the inside is trashed, from getting wet too many times.

It needs some love, just like me.

But it is more work than what I can do anymore, so it’s just another memory of our memories.

We used to drive around, running all the traffic lights, wild and crazy as could be and share our time, and make are secrets in the back sets. I would kick up dirt in the air as would drive to our spot, the gazebo on the pond. If that car could talk it would remember more than it does.

Maybe I should write a story about it the car coming back to life and haunting me, I could give the car a cute name, or has someone already done that? I can't remember, but that would be a book, or maybe I have read it... shit, it sucks to get old. It is impossible to love and be wise, it makes your brain soft.

I love some of this new saying these young kids say, Just the same as saying in today's terms being what is called whipped; this is what she was to me. However, I still do not mind it being that way. Having her whipping me makes me feel alive. The more pain the more I feel from her the more she knows that I love her, and she loves me.

Pain is love! Pain is all I have; pain is like the rain without her on top of me, rain and pain it washes the memories away from my mind. Pain and the rain are all that comes from these old eyes, that I rub red, pain as the rain that will cry over the spot that will hold my old remands.

I was the pray, but I see it as more like be scarred for life. Though back then I was praying to get next to her in any way possible. If I could only to myself back, then... it comes around.

She was the one that was going to take me to places and give me expressions that I could not be expressed or had with any other girl. To this day I am not sure what to make of my own story, because it never going to be easy for me to explain.

What was in the past is in the past, and I do not care anymore about what is in my future. What I have lived for was a dream that was never going to be, a dream that burnt me to a crisp, and I will arouse from the ashes someday.

Oh shit! I did not remember to tell you my name while it Deniel, or did I tell you that? This is my story of what it takes to have a sweetheart or love, what it takes to walk away, and yes never look back all your life, never hear that voice again, never hear that laugh again.

Also, back then some of these times sadden me even more then than now. Knowing that all the coldness that I am feeling is me dying inside, but I am going to go through this story one more time before my time is upon this earth.

I recall when I was nineteen my life transformed incessantly, and all I had that keep me going was a love that I nicknamed seventeen Olivia. It, not an easy story for me to tell, it has its twists and turns, and it's- turns- on's,

Just like having the land with its mountains of majesty that were blissful, that contrast with its tragic storms. Just the same as us we have the hopes', and our joys and we had a lot of disappointments, now that I am older, so much older, I can close my eyes and all I have is a photographic snapshot in my mind to remain me just like showing the mountains we climb together, she was ripped away from my grasp hands. Just like that last hug, she has pulled away in tears.

Yes, as much as I could, I want to be around her, and to see that smile, I remember when she was thirteen with those cute braces on her teeth and that smile that looked at me so gently. It has never changed in my mind.

Not always with success did I get her full attention, there was someday that she was moody, but that was okay by me all girls have that time that they need to deal with, she would just tell to say way. Besides, sometimes others are wanting her devotion, as her asshole dad, but I was mostly happy then because at least I can see her and look into her amazing blue eyes.

I can still hear her saying hello and saying my name. She was so perfect in every way! I did not see anything wrong with having a seventeen-year-old dream girl at the time. She was my mystery fantasy that was real in my life.

Looking at my hands you can read all the crevasses, and the split forks in the trail that was my life, the paths that ended far too soon. No, my hands and palms are not the same as they once were back then. They are not like the ones she held, what happened to my lifeline, heart line, and most importantly marriage line? The lines have changed, but why if the plans were made?

Where- they- taken from me? What did I do? To this day, I don't know. There must have been some reason for this to happen this way? I look at my fingerprint each finger different, and so unlike hers.

Everyone has unique prints, which we leave behind. She had some of the smallest hands I ever seen in my life, but they were sweet and felt amazingly perfect on me.

Every line that was on her palms was strong and showed her love of the flesh, her true faith, and love for life, she was a giver, she never asked for anything, but love return. But she just had given it all away.

The fingerprints she made on me are now going forever. It is just like that kiss that comes to me in my shot drams at the don, it is just a trance that you always had over me.

Looking back in the 1940s: I have never felt so attached to anyone like this before. Just thinking about her now is making me foolish. She can say my name, and it makes my week even now. I cannot help it! Back then I had the feeling as if she is the one for me. That the search is finally over, I know this senses day one! I believe that... I believed that I found the one for me, maybe... there is one large issue, and that was her dad, he was in love with her senses she was born, but not the kind of love that most have for their little girls, this was oddly different.

Nonetheless, it was not long until I had her completely and forever. Be careful in what you wish for you may just get it one way or another. Reality is never as it seems, and life likes to skew with you.

At this time, I was living in a one-bedroom house that I rented for 17 dollars a month, I few years before my mother and father we all lived in a house on 17th street, anyways both of my parents typed to fly off a bridge together and live... yeah, that's not going to happen. They were coming home from a new year's party smashed.

So, I have been on my senses I was seventeen. Seventeen, seventeen! Is the number that has been hunting me down for years.

Part: 4

Although I felt lucky because I had a radio in my home, the home I always wanted what the one in the pond. We were going to live here together.

I feel that I could do anything if I just imagined I could. That is the way you think when you are young. So-o, one day I left I made the crazy decision to ask her Olivia 'seventeen' to marry me, in a letter that I handed to her. But here was the shitter; I was stepping foot on a bus that was taking me to this far away land. She was the only one to see me off as her dad pulled us apart, I can still see what she was wearing a light blue dress; with a white daisy in her heart.

I am sure her overprotective father loved me asking her that question because he nosed in all of our stuff, and keep things that I sent to her to hidden, and that was the beginning of the end.

Because he had to know everything about her, yes, I mean everything. But at the time I did not give a shit, I knew what I wanted, and she wanted me, and I was not going to let anything get in the way, not even the war or at least that is what we wanted to believe.

That reminds me now sometimes I walk into the bathroom and she writes the word seventeen in blood on the mirror, and her faces show up in the shower mist as I wash. She just loves to play around with me in that room. Ha, that's kind of cute! She has a way about her that makes me lovesick.

Back to my story- The journey to hell is not where I wanted to go at all, no this was hell on earth, I am in a far-off land from what I was used where no one even knows my name, yes to go and kill the slanted eyed mean, to this day I still have no idea why this event took place. It was senseless and stupid, I am not a baby killer or a tree hugger, yet the metals on my chest would say that I am.

They all remind me of what I had to endure, and all the friends that I lost like Jack Row and Tom Richford, that went missing at sea in their planes, there are more but I can't remember their names, I have a photo of all of us but the faces are nameless to me now. But I do remember how I lost you.

Like I am supposed to be proud of killing another human being, I do not know...not really, I just do not think it is an honor worthy only if truly needed.

The air force they threw my bony ass into a plain faster than you can say suck on this Japs, shit! There is nothing like having rounds of ammunition flying past your head. Every bolt you think it is all over, besides having what appeared to look like Satan's face coming at you as your in-flight, get ever so closer till you could see them snarling at you. Never backing down, until their right in front of you; anticipating the whole time that the baster goes down before you do. Now I sit back and think that my grandbaby drives an orange Toyota Corolla, nice right and there it is sitting in the driveway.

So back in the plane, I was hoping that the bullets that I was firing would go through their head because in World War II you had one choice kill or be killed.

For the reason that if not it always ended in a death spiral.

Those that were going down, a- lot of them where clever ass holes if they knew that they were dying they would take out a ship with them, it was like a bam explosion, or they would land in the ocean never to be seen again, this was all part of Pearl Harbor, and I still cannot believe that I made it out of there in one piece.

But whom the hell cares any more, it seems as if today people do not remember the story of the past, hell most- young people do not even believe that the Holocaust even existed?

Most just sit in their mother basement licking the peanut butter off bananas, and popping cherries, and talking shit about nothing relevant. Yes, that is a metaphor if you went to school, and got an education you would know that.

You know that is what this cauterary need is- another good war, so your smartass new what it is like to not have every damn thing handed to you. Then you would see how smart you are in boot camp and the bush.

I was a drill sergeant also, so I don't take bull shit from anyone. I will march your ass off until you have some respect for authority, and something more than your simple little life. Then again, I have seen all this with my own two eyes, and I can still taste the blood, and the smell of rotting flesh, you have no idea what that is like, that smell is something that is locked up in your mind and never leaves your wisdom.

I flew through the air in a single-engine, single-seat monoplane, with a mockery of a half-naked pinup girl painted on the front which just reminded me of my own seventeen baby- back home. Things were so crude back then you fringing a gun was like a pissing your name in the snow.

I remember squinting with the one eye, firing the gun in one hand, and flying the plane with the other, and your feet controlling the flaps, it was ridiculous how difficult it was. Especially when most pilots had never flown- a plane before in his life just like me.

Yet hoping that we all can make it home in one piece, most of my colleagues did not. Those poor bastards are still out in the ocean just fish food, and yet no one cares or gives a damn about them. They are just an eighty-year-old story of who gives a shit.

The day I left I made the crazy decision to ask her to marry me, in a letter that I handed to her, As I stepped foot on the bus that was taking me to this far away land, she was the only one to see me off that I treasured, I can still see what she was wearing a light blue dress with a white daisy in her heart.

I am sure her overprotective father loved me asking her that question. But at the time I did not give a shit, I knew what I wanted, and I was not going to let anything get in the way, not even the war.

My letter reads- My sweet Olivia; I must say how I feel about you. That there is nothing more I would want to be yours forever and ever. When you are reading this, I will already be one my way. Nevertheless, I ask you to weigh for me to return, it not that long so we can be together once more. That is if you love me, as I love you. However, I have to go far, far away as of now. I have gotten to know you in every way, and I will think of you every day.

I would have liked to say this to you, but I am making you this promise if I make it back from this war. I want to be the one that is married to you.

I wish I would have said all of this sooner, so that we could have been together, but is age only a number? Even if I don't see you again, I am now forever part of your life.

Your devoted lover- Brandon.

~*~

Back when I was in school, she was too young for me. It would have been nice to be the same age, yes it would be nice to be seventeen again, and know what I know now, and do so of the same things.

But you can't live twice. To this day, I don't know if she had ever seen this love note or not, yet she has not said. But up till now, she seems to know what I wanted and that was her.

After I give this letter to her, I know that my life would never be the same. Though I did not know if that was a good thing or a bad thing, it was just the way it had to be.

Plus, I had never been away from home; I have never been more than ten miles away from my hometown of Coalville. I planned on putting this ring on her tiny finger, but I never got the chance to do it.

The journey of life is through uncovering the true beauty that lies behind the eyes. It is not what is seen all the time it is what is felt, the same as how I feel towards Olivia, she made me joyful and blissful. Someday soon our souls can be rejoined as one as they were in this life.

I feel as if I will never be happy again, even though I have my granddaughter she just reminds me of everything I can and cannot have anymore.

My greatest fear is being alone and dying alone, I look at myself now and there's not one trait about myself that I find desirable, yet I have Army photos of back in the day, the snapshot stuck that are lost in time, I wonder what happened to me. I believe that my current state of mind is not a healthy one. Maybe I am just old or crazy or I just do not care anymore. One of the others I need a deep sleep anyway. So maybe I will go in my sleep with her ghost on top of me. But I always thought that I would go into the arms of my beloved Olivia.

I never had any great achievements in my life, I never went to college. I worked in the coal mines most of my career, and all I have now to show for it is blacked lungs and Parkinson's disease. They drop you down in the hole, and you work on your stomach like a rat. With the water running down your back and into your ass crack, the work sucked.

Shoveling for nickels and dimes and giving it all back to the company. But I made enough to get my dream house on the pond but had one little girl to share it with and that was our baby that she named Abbie. I came back from the war and was handed a baby to raise. At the time, I did know if I could do it or not. But I did my best. Everything was fine until she was seventeen; I don't want to say any more about it right now.

I lived in this town most of my life, I have seen people come and go, of seen houses being built, and I have seen the same very house being ripped down. That's when you know you have a life too long. I watched babies grow up before my eyes- into things that cannot be controlled, and I saw- my grandbaby's too. I ask what more do I need really?

Part: 5

Honey

I am probably the easiest person to get along, as I know, and

I understand how this world works. As of now, I dislike everything about my appearance, my skin blotchy, and my hair is gray, my eyes are faded green in color.

Looking back if I could change one thing about my life, I would go back into time and do all the things that I never did or got to see with her next to me and do all the things that-I was going to do throughout life, I had plans and those dreams could come true without her.

Born to live, born to die, some say... while- my saying is all is fair in love and war, because; I have done both, with each of them having the same consequences.

I will never lie to anyone or tell them something untrue. My type of personality is to be blunt and to the point, as you should know by now. If I think you are an ass hole, will I will tell you that to your face. I am not a very forgiving person anymore, you have three chances with me, and after that, I am done with you. You would be the same way if you had a life like mine. Call me better; call me pathetic, your names mean nothing to me anymore nor did they ever.

My mind goes back to these days often because she pulls at my heartstrings, like a gutter being tuned too tightly. To the point that I feel as if I am going to choke on the wood splinters.

Like the first time we meet I was in the first grist grade, in a one-room schoolhouse that had all eight grades in one sitting arrangement, she was crying because of separation anxiety, or that she had to walk to school in freezing rain either way she was upset, or maybe it was something more. I guess that I was the only one there that cared or know how she felt, or maybe I was the only one that was under her influence.

I tried to make it okay for her, from that point I had a crush on her that never seems to subside. I was going to do whatever I could to be there for her.

Why?

Why- I do not know, it just seemed that she was unlike anyone or anything that was in my life at that time, I was mesmerized.

She had everything that I desired even back then up through school, and she now it, it confusing how love works?

The ice has been broken; artwork and creativity can open up all kinds of doors, even the one to the heart. Did she make this impress me a drawing that I still have?

As of now, I do not know, however it was excessive, wonderful and beautiful. Just what I was looking for, someone that enjoys the same things that I do.

What more can I ask for?

I remember this one day when I was in school, she did a drawing, and it was breathtaking, I made a comment, and things started to work out for me, but just me being a boy I had no clue what I was doing. But will this blessing of a lucky streak last till the end of my life or will it change my life forever!

I remember art class and sitting behind her wanting to touch her hair because it looked so soft, I feel a high just by being in her presence and smelling that scent that was uniquely here's which after all these years never changed.

My granddaughter's name is Kristin, she is all I have left; she just had her seventh birthday, so I wonder how much longer I will have her in my life?

Indeed, Kristen is the only thing that keeps me going, she is the only light in my life. She reminds me of the girl that I affectionately named 'seventeen.' Yes, in every way, her personality, action, laughter and when I look into her eyes it's all the same as if am looking into the eyes of my love. I have never spoken about seventeen until now to her; no one even knows about the story but, yet Olivia would be her grandmother, not even my granddaughter now about seventeen.

Now that I am getting older, and getting closer to that casket, I feel that I should share my story with someone, so I decide on Kristen.

I have some of it on paper, yet my royal typewriter just smiles at me.

Because, I start and stop, plus the button letter N has gone missing, where it has to go is a mystery too. Now that would be a good book... 'The Missing N' by Brandon Deniel- ha! Now that's funny. Yes, I am an author in my mind!

So... that's just okay with me I am not a writer, I can even get a complete thought on the first page. There is nothing more annoying than that first white page, maybe there is, but I need to get this down somehow to get this despair to stop playing in my head. The paper is so old now that it is yellow in color.

The stack is just like my cracked teeth; hell, the little bell doesn't even go ding anymore. Plus, my hands hurt most of the time now... Ahh- never mind. I have spent most of my life trying to become what I am not. That is just another damn dream that was gone down the shitter and just like the planes in world war two.

Taking a drink and choking on it hard as it goes down- Anyways Kristen's parents Abbie and Divide, back in the day it is still mysterious what happened exactly. But I believe that David pushed her car off the side of a cliff as he was chasing behind her in his old work truck. The black marks on the highway made me believe that as so; you wouldn't have such making on the road if it wasn't forced?

Kristen's dad ended up with glass going through his chest cutting through his spine but lived paralyzed from the hips down. Abbie whom I didn't speak of until now ended up with the steering column through her heart at the age of seventeen.

The steering column through the heart was not from the fall, it was done before the car went over the drop-off. It seems so unfair... only seventeen at the time. She could have had it all, a college degree, she could have been a doctor or something like that; no, she had to choose to be his b*tch, and she sucked his ass from day one until she died.

The divide was a monster just the same as Olivia's dad was to her; this just seemed to be an evil pattern in my life. The ones I love were gone forever at the age of seventeen, and then they hunt me because I was the one that cared about them.

They call me to their graves at night, and what can I do? I have to go and talk to them. They hug me, and then I come home and sit at the typewriter. With the desk lamp lighting, the keys and my hands are shaking on top of the buttons.

Thinking maybe I can tell someone of what goes on in my life. But their voice calls out to me Paul... Pa-ul and I have to stop, it like they do not want others to know what they do to me.

Kristen thinks I have flipped my nuts! There is no point in trying to find the key to their heart if you don't know the shape of the lock, so why keep going.

Only one of these spirit girls stays with me all the time. She follows me everywhere the spirit of seventeen-year-old Olivia. When people die, they stay the same age even in the afterlife. They look the same just transparent; Olivia is a tiny girl; she stands at five nothing.

And still her eye peers into my eyes into my soul like always.

Exhale noisily- Abbie used to come to me crying, with black eyes, and blood dripping from her inner thighs, saying to me look at what he is doing to me, I would say stay here... you don't need him, but she always went back to him, and there was not a thing I could do. He had an almost demonic power over her just the same did Olivia father, they sucked the life out of these girls, in more ways than one, and used them whenever they wanted, and then throw them out like trash when they don't.

Divided was even more obnoxious to my grandbaby

Kristen, God only knows what he did to her... Kristen has a memory that terrifies my thought of mind. It reminds me of what Olivia went through in her child's life, it all the same only the names change, or so it seems to be, it is the curse of seventeen. When thinking about it creeps me out.

I wish all of those ass holes would have taken their belts and hanged himself with it, no! That would be too good for them... either way, justice comes with a price, and that was seventeen-years-old innocents and seventeen-year-old existences. These so-called men can fry in hell!

But that's a life I know one thing, I always try to do the right thing because after they're gone you have nothing but sad misgivings.

Raged David as I called him walked away, but later that year he put a rifle in his mouth and blow his brains all over his bedroom walls, on a life-size poster of my little granddaughter.

So now Abbie clings to my ankles as I walked to the cemetery as well. Yet I can't help but say I told you so, and she says I-NO-O in a moaning vocal sounding whisper!

Some say Abbie drove her blue Chevy bell air off the side of a mountain in a suicide; it was easier from them to say, then saying that a coal truck smashed into her and pushed her off the highway.

At least I have a seventeen-year-old friend, and his name is Jack Daniels, weird ever girl I ever love has died at the age of seventeen even my daughter, so I just made the choice to never love again, and I have kept that promise up till this point.

All these years... I have been pinning or what I cannot have, so I guess it is okay to drown my sorrows.

Abbie, she had a lover at the age of fifteen you see, she had Kristen at sixteen, little did I know that when I was fighting in the war Olivia was seven weeks pregnant it's so scary how this all happened so fast, so it seemed, however Olivia keeps that a complete secret from everyone even her dad until it started to show.

Part: 6

Hop

I remember going to the movies on the weekends, and what you would call making out the whole time. I remember going to dances and learn how to jitterbug with her. I could twirl her around like you would not believe, I remember going rollerblading on Sundays too, wishing the days would never end, oh yes, it's all coming back to me, those were the good old days.

I walk with a cane now, and ever since I got back from the war, I was shot in the foot. So, I was discharged earlier than expected, with the Medal of Honor, for the reason of my so called bravery; that I had in the mission of flight number you gusset it flight number seventeen. My best friend Aaron, went down in his plane if I would have known that I would have at least have said goodbye.

Yes, I was the only plane that survived, and that was me in plane number seventeen, with the black-haired blue-eyed pinup girl on the front.

When I got back that medal meant nothing to me, because I lost all ever had to the war, so no that honor sits on top of her stone that is under the weeping willow tree that we sit in as lovers, looking over the golden waters, and the gazebo of passionate love. When the wind blows the ferns in this immense tree, I can feel her soft warm body molding perfectly into mine, we line up as one being.

Anyways back to Abbie's car accident, it was flipped over on its roof there was Kristen, who was only about three at the time still inside the vehicle. It was only through the grace of God she survived somebody pulled her free. I think this because the door handle was broke- off with force, Kristen was only a baby at the time, she was not given to me...

This person stole her out of the car and then claimed her as one of her children. Jamie Keller keeps her locked up in a chamber that was cold, damp, and dark with only a light bulb having from wires under the tin roof tiles. No bathroom, the windows covered up with wood planks, with the smell of shit everywhere in that basement.

To this very day, nobody knows who this evil person was, or what she was all about. It is like she was there and going before anyone got to know her. Who knows if that was her real name, I sure don't?

Until one day... I got one knock on my front door, and by the time I got there, the woman was gone. They're sitting at the doorstep was my granddaughter. She is now seven years old, there is was nude wraps in a blanket in a cardboard box, and I do not know how I feel if it was the emotion of being overjoyed or horrified?

Kristen had a broken cut up the wrist, and her fingernails were chewed down to the bone, her eyes bloodshot and tears running down her cheeks, and everything in-between bit up, you could see the human teeth marks.

She was Just left there cold and lonely snow falling on her tiny chest... With a note attached to her neck, saying this is your granddaughter; she is damn responsibility now, and I cannot take care of her any longer! Till this very day; I have never found this woman, it like she never existed.

She better hopes that I never do! I may be in the end stages of my seventies, but I can still kick some ass.

For years, I thought my granddaughter was deceased. That was what the wright up in the Coalville gazette babbled along with the cops said, for seven years this woman would have stomped, beat, slam, and tie-down my grandbaby, to a bed, and twist her feet and limbs until the bones would crunch, and her heels would be where her toes should be.

Without even knowing that she could have gotten away, but because she had a fear of wrath she never attempted. It is amazing how someone can brainwash some that are young. What can a little girl do to deserve this?

So, what could I do? I was not going to leave her out in the cold, plus how could I resist that adorable little girl. She always did have a way of melting my heart, and I guess always will. It would not have been for this little girl I would have given up on a life a long time ago. Now that she is nearing the age of seventeen, she does not need me as much as she used too; I guess that my mission in life is over. Life goes by like a blink of an eye.

I did the best I could, but I often wonder if my best was good enough. But I often wonder if she is going to be the next seventeen-year-old girl on the list of heartbreak.

The only hobby I have as I get older is looking at the scenery that surrounds me, looking over gazebo that cascades a reflection on the pond along the walkway. Stumbling back and forth for the kitchen, I mumble in whispers, to the voices, while trying to write my fragmented thoughts down on paper, as they rush in my head faster than I can scribble with my pencil.

whispers I can hear, whispers I can feel, whispers the used to give me a thrill, whispers from the ones the kill, whispers that give me a chill, I recall whispers while making love, I hear them whispering from the wings of the dove, even the whispers for the above one. I hear whispers!

The seasons seem to change in a blink of my eye; the house I live in is surely over a- 100 years old, it is a craftsman in its style, nothing fancy just your ordinary house in the middle of the country land.

In this house, I have a gallery of all the photos that I made me into the person I am today, some are black-and-white, so are in color. Then some of them have never been taken at all there in my thoughts...

Those are the ones I missed most because they are fading away, especially the pictures that I never had of me in her, I wonder what she would have looked like as she aged, I wonder if we would have done more thing together, like travel the world, I wonder if we would of have a bigger family, and maybe a son that keep the name going.

I wounded if the curse of seventeen would have even happened if only I could go back in time. I wonder why- I lost all of my love when they turned seventeen.

One photo, in particular, is a picture of me standing next to my World War II plane, and another my favorite photograph that is in the center of them all is one that was considered quite risqué for the time, it is a sensual photograph of Olivia looking amazingly sexy she so poured in nature as can be in that stripped-down pose, I used to have that picture with me at all times, it slightly sticks out of my uniform pocket, and now it is in an old frame.

I kissed a photo so much that I wore a whole, on the lips.

Looking down my gallery, you will see a photograph of Kristen when she was ten years old, green-eyed girl to this day I cherish, with strawberry blond hair, she was a hell-raiser for her age, just like her grandfather.

Also, until this very day, nothing has changed she's still a holy terror that lingers in my head. My mind is like a slideshow projector that never turns off, yet the frames snag and twitches in the cogs until it's all distorted.

One of the other photographs that I find unique and intriguing depicts this very house with green siding and white trim, and the distance along the lane, that used to be lit by flickering lanterns, those lanterns are long gone... Just to be replaced with posts that modern electric candlelight that some work and some don't, as of now on to old change light bulbs.

Hell, I still have about over the fear heights... Which sounds ridiculous coming from a World War II pilot? This property is becoming too much for me, I was hoping that I would live long enough to wear my granddaughter could inherit my empire of dirt, but as of now, it seems like a far stretch.

The house was once part of the working farm in the 1900s. As you can see from the old windmill and horse-drawn plow, sitting in the front yard. I sometimes wonder if the course I have is not for the seventeen-year-old girl named Megan that lived in this house, who hung herself supposedly accidentally in the whipping willow tree in 1917. She was broken-hearted that night, so the story goes because her lover was cheating on her with an even younger girl. The tree was the place Meghan went for her an escape.

Somehow, she was going to jump off in the fight however the rope got caught around her neck, and she was not found till the next mooring, I know this because she has talked with me to... Now and again I can see Meghan swing at night in a glowing white, singing the words to the to 'America the Beautiful.' The song that she was sings that night. Her voice is beautiful, but it is spooky to me. The rope swing that is hanging from the branches is still here, after all these years.

The windmill; yes, its missing halfwits its blades, yet it still twirls in the breeze, the ancient Watermill is still standing yet decrepit. Oh, how we used to swim around in the pound while the water proud on top of us, we were holding onto one each other, say that we would never let go. That is a French kiss that I long for! She keeps her promise; I do what I believe is right! I am human I have made mistakes.

Looking at how it is still turning into woe clanking and cracking as the giant while goes around. You know I know how it feels; I feel the same way. I would have to say, I love and hate it here, I cannot make up my mind. It is probably the only thing that I still love in my life other than my granddaughter, but it is all dead, and that is what I hate the most! Just like the curse of seventeen, will it dye at pace or will it live on?

The treehouse was where I and Olivia played as children, and learn the defenses, between me being a boy and she a girl, Olivia was amazing to me even then.

The house was made by the Janz family, the dad made this house for his little girl named Meghan this was her spot but in her time. The treehouse is about 47 feet off the ground and has a swing.

From the porch, you can see the hayfields for miles, and that was when I had her hand for the first time, I would say she was about the age of seven. Looking at it now not much has changed the spring steep still wrap around the trunk, the wood and rope bridge spends over 20 feet accursed the trees. It was like a little castle that was only ours when we were kids. Meghan's name is scratched in the hardwood, along with this poem she wrote it cries when you read it, but does it mean anything?

The treehouse: If you read this your love will be with your forever. The dwellings that our love began where we became more than just friends. The place where you took my soul, the place you made me your fool. The treehouse tells the story of you and me, and how you made me cry.

The is the place where it all going to end, and so will I, without the love, it's all going to die, this is my time to say goodbye, and I will make sure that any couple that comes in here will always be more than a friend, even if life comes to an end. Your soul is with mine, at this time, there is nowhere you can hide, for she and I will always be at your side.

All of this is a part of me, and it going to go to the grave with me most likely, as I know that Olivia will never let go, now or ever. And the lands well, dissolve into nothing but dust, and rolling hills will end up with no memories, other than or gave stones with the names chipped away from old age.

Just as the sun it is going to burn out, my fire is fading just like the heat for a summer's day from the past, so why to live at all, if you don't have love, you do not have any worth living for, and having this type of love has been killing me slowly for years, I have been dying seen she was seventeen.

Generally, every day at its end I sit, and an antique chair and stare out the window and watch as the world goes by. And I think, and I think... to the point that I am probably going to end up with dementia.

I find myself laughing in my head for no reason, and then becoming very sad as I think about the life I had. Sad to think that she never really had much of a life and neither did Abbie ether. I would give up everything I have to bring both of them back.

I remember my first date, some would call it quite bland in today's state standards, but that is just what we did back in those days, we used to walk along the railroad tracks, and watch the stars... And the many galaxies, we used to play chicken with the oncoming steam trains. And lock lips under the moonlight, my first kiss was not until my thread date.

My date second with Olivia was at the ancient weeping willow tree with the swing; we would climb the tree, and sit holding hands. Maybe that was when the spell stated, I do not know.

Maybe it was because of Megan? Maybe she was the one that did this to me, maybe not, either way, I still wound why, who, and when.

My third date is the one that is still vivid in my mind, it was in a gazebo that is on my property now today, we walked along the lovely white bridge that links the walkway across the waters on the pond to the structure itself, and that is when things, was supernatural, there is no other word describe the touching the feeling, the thrusting.

All the emotions coming together at once, we made love under the scarlet black skies.

We were attached forever from that movement. We could hear the wave hitting the side of the land, which swayed and voyaged in the moving waters, which splashed against the gazebo frame.

You can smell the mist, I can still smell her perfume, for some reason it reminds me of strawberries. I am sure if that is right or not the right at all, but that is what I compare it to. Just like our love that was left inside an awareness, it can be washed away, the waves remind me of her coal-black hair lying in layers puddled on the wood plank flooring of the gazebo.

We were like the one at the twilight breeze, and it seemed as if our bodies were floating on top of the glassy pond in which we were on. Now that breeze brings me to my knees, as I scream the word, 'WHY DID YOU DO THIS TO ME!'

Whom would I know that Abbie was in the making that night? I had no clue, back then you had one move and one style. Now a day's you have to be an Olympian just to get the job done. In my opinion that takes all the romance out of the state of affairs.

Let us not forget to mention in those days you did not put shrink-wrap, on it, or have and have a plan of getting rid of it... you went against the odds, and fate would take place or not, you had to think about what you were doing. Along with I was thinking at the time I do I want this, and I am I going to live with it no matter what happens. I did not care at all really; I was truly in love with Olivia, so I live with the consequences, and I good a new life in my life but only for seventeen years.

Part: 7

Confidential

I will never forget Olivia saying, I know you want me! Like I want all of you, I want to, I need to taste you, feel you inside me, and I know that you have been dreaming about me since we were really little. Besides you know you want it. I recollect saying I feel the same way about you. I remember her swallowing down hard, and saying I want to do this more than you even know, and gasping on the words. Of course, I have dreamed of this moment with you.

Olivia said that she fantasized about me scene she was about eight years old, every night to the point she could not sleep at night. She said that she would lick her fingers, and reach down and tickle herself until her fantasy would peak with a thrilling squirting spray that drizzled all over her bedsheets. She still looks to me as I sleep. Anyways she said that gave her worth and satisfaction, within her body and mind. Afterward, her dreams would begin as she would be relaxed into a deep slumber holding her teddy bear as if it was me.

That night in the gazebo, she was so wet down there and so tight, she pulled my pants down so fast the button zip like a stone on top of the pond. Her breasts shined in the moonlight, and her nipples were pointed as if they were looking at me as we were doing it, staring at me sweetly; just the same as she was during the whole time, everything on her was bouncing up and down as well as around. Her hips smacking into mine, she said that she loved me on top of her, and she wrapped herself arms around me.

I had never felt anything like this before in my life when I entered, we lost our virginities to one another. I will never forget her eyes rolling, the sounds she made, and the faces she made out of passion, it still takes my breath away.

We went for about two minutes; she was moaning the words like. And I can hear that same moaning every day. But back the words were like 'Oh yes, right their baby.'

I will never forget awards she began to cry so hard that that droplet of blood would run down her sweet little face, so I just held her in my arms all night, until she falls asleep with her head on my chest. She said she likes to listen to my heartbeat. Naturally, that was one amazing summer.

I remember sliding down her pink panties that night and sliding her dress up and off of her petite little figure. I remember her fingers touching me everywhere, I remember putting my fingers in places I had never had them before.

She made me tingle and still does. She was so gorgeous when she was looking up at me; well she was on her knees. But nothing ever compared to her legs spread out before me, she had one of the savory flavors of strawberries.

Those are the nights that I will never forget even this old mind can forget that. The nights that are love ignited and never snip apart and yes, it is still going strong. I could never think of another girl this way ever again. She was the first, my first love; my first in everything, all this happen before she was seventeen, and she was my first ghost, that embraces me.

Who would have thought my first time, would be my only time with her, yes is the only one that, I have loved in my life?

I have gone most life without now because there is no other girl I want to be connected with. It is more than just a collection of bodies; it is mating of hearts and souls as well and I do not us to ever end that bond. Besides once you make these connections, in my opinion, they can never be broken, you always remember your first, and they hold something sacred to you and yours that you and she will never forget. It would never be the same it never perishes.

Nothing has even given me the slight of interest afterward; once you get it, you want more from the same person over and over, for a whole summer's break that was all we did, we christened that gazebo every night, buy joining hearts and souls.

Besides now is beside are bond always and endlessly until the end of all time. As you know my heaven with her all end, and my hell began.

There was nothing more exhilarating than the thunderstorms, the pouring down rain, you know that everything is better when gone! She would claw her nails into my back to the point my back bleeding. As I crested her seventeen-year body as lightly and softly as possible; yes, I have scars to this very day, just like a permit tattoo of devotion.

I think this is one reason I am hex not being able to let go, I loved her love that she had for me and that she gives to me.

So, does that make any sense? It is just what happens to come to mind now and again. That I have the marking of seventeen on scared in my back, you can still see it today and oddly it looks like the number seventeen.

Just like Olivia's spirit that follows me everywhere I go, yes- she is still in connecting with me every a-waken hour of the day. Even though she is no longer alive on this planet we can still communicate, almost like a telegraphic power, I can hear whispers along with others that I have adored.

After I give this letter to her, I know that my life would never be the same again. I did not know if that was a good thing or a bad thing, it was just the way it had to be at the time.

It was not what I truly wanted, plus I had never been away from home. I have never been more than ten miles away from my hometown of Coalville.

I have never been away from her loving arms and soft warm body all my life. I knew that I was going to miss her, her personality, her ways, and hear everything.

My attention goes back to these days often because she pulls at my heartstrings like a gutter being tuned too tightly. That she likes to play in my ears now and then. This happens to the point that I feel as if I am going to choke on the wood splinters.

I remember the first time we meet; I was in the first grist grade. We were in a one-room schoolhouse that had all eight grades in one sitting arrangement, she was crying because of separation anxiety-tears of blood because she had to walk to school in freezing rain and snow. I guess that I was the only one there that cared to know how she felt?

I tried to make it okay for her, from that point; you know I had a crush starting then on her that never seems to subside. I was going to do whatever I could to be there for her no matter what. Why I do not know it just seemed that she was unlike anyone or anything that was in my life, at that time I was mesmerized it was love at first sight.

Still, the ice had been broken for us and we become friends. Artwork and creativity can open up all kinds of doors even the one to the heart... she made a drawing that impresses me so much that I still have it. It was a drawing of a girl sitting on a swing with a big tree in the background; it was wonderful, beautiful, and yet spooky.

She was just what I was looking for in my life. We were the love that we need that we both never had before in our young lives. We brought joy to one another, just the same as we do even now. What more can I ask for?

I remember- all the classes and sitting behind her wanting to touch her hair, because it looked so soft, and looking at her backside, I felt a high just by being in her presence, and smelling that scent that was uniquely hers with never changed.

Speaking of that drawing, and it was breathtaking— you can see it is hanging in that frame over there on the wall, it's yellowing now from old age and tattered in its look, but I still have it!

I remember- that I made a comment at the time, and she gives it to me, and that is where things started to work out for me like never before, but just me being a boy I had no clue what I was doing, but I knew- I wanted more. But was all this a blessing or a lucky streak or not.

Either way, it is going to last all my life and never end, yet it ended all my other chances forever!

Yet her spirit- is like a snowstorm in December cool and lonely, yet beautiful like a fall day and berth taking in the memory of thinking about the days we had together in the summer before the beginning of the end.

After the war my injury did stop me from working in the coal mines, something is thrilling about working seven miles on the ground, in total darkness. The coal mine was not the job I wanted, but it the one I had that paid the bills.

I remember the coalmines walking to that cage of a shattered dream; you can see the conveyors and lights in the dissents along with the stars, which are glowing in the midnight skies to not see the light of day for hours. Yes, only to end up with blackened lungs, to make a working man's play for the family that I have.

They drop us down that hole, and it feels like your lunch is going to come up into your mouth. You snap that light on, and you remanded that if there is a rockfall that you will never see your loved ones again.

Bouncing along on the mantrip, to get off and start the day, that seems to never end. That shaft is so low that you are always bent over, water run down your slacks constantly. You feel like you pissed yourself. Oh, being six miles down and six miles out is bone-chilling.

Having a respirator just plan sucks, so I hardly ever have one on my face, I just chew gum; all I have to do is think about what I am leaving behind if I do not for some reason make back home. She and the little one knows that I love them. But could they live without me? Yet we know that they would be protected.

Part: 8

Thank you, Next

(Past)

I never really wanted to live a day without her next to me, I remember how we used to go to this little amusement park that still has the old standing to this very day aside friction wood rollercoaster built-in 1902.

It has these big old comfy train cars that sit two in the front and two in the back, they rattle back and forth on the track, but we loved it because you could not help but bump into one another hips and put your hand on each other's knees and legs. Back then everything was done by hand; like pushing the car on the chine to go up the lift hill of 41 feet, and to stop was done by a man that would pull on a handle, to have the brakes grind the train car to a halt when coming into the station.

The costar next to the lake has a top speed of 17 miles per hour not fast but it was romantic for its day, on this coaster was the first time- I put my arm around her and we became more than friends, that last leap you get airborne, and get to snuggle your love and squeeze what you like.

We still ride this coaster now and then, but with Kristen, and Olivia hovers above us.

Just about every day Kristen and I sit down at the dining room table and, I tell her stories of back in the day. We have the same meal of canned soup, canned peaches, and Pepsi in a can. I have not had a home-cooked meal in years.

Every morning I have a peanut butter and jelly sandwich doubled over, a cup black coffee with three spoons full of sugar that so strong it could walk, it makes me cough going down, then I start popping the peals that keep me going. I have not slept in a bed for years; I sleep in my char in the living room.

The bed has never used; the sheets have never slept in the bed and have a canopy in soft purple just the way she always wanted.

Why you ask because that was the bed, we planned on being in together. She grow-up with a mattress on the floor, and only had one blanket, and a teddy bear that I give her, she was lucky to have a pillow, times were trying during The Great Depression.

I remember as a kid my dad giving me a pace of old bread with coffee on top and that was all I got in the one-day meal. Olivia's mom before she died made her dresses out of floral flower bags. So much wind and dust, no one can believe it unless you lived it, yet we had one another.

Television did not come out until the about 1950's, and it was snowy as hell, shit you only had one channel and had to get off your ass to turn it on and off, plus it went off the air at midnight.

Everything was on the radio, and back then, or You talked to your neighbor about your day and what was going on, as well as sit on the porch at night. Not like today at all!

Part: 9

NY

I remember my dad telling me about this new highest building in New York is that was just compiled, and that was The Empire State Building. Think about that I and Olivia planed on to see it, along with the Statue of Liberty, but it never happened.

I have to pop peels now; I do not know if any of them do anything. They make me feel like I did in the 1960s my mind starts thinking and it takes me back. They say I should not have a drink now, because I am on so many medications, but I do not care anymore.

The only thing that could happen is that I would kick the bucket, hell that would be a good thing. Put me under the tree next to my lover, I have lived too long now, 80 years is too long without love. Yes, I am 92 years old and still kicking, just not as high.

I think of when she and I were about 10 years old, she used to ride sitting on top of my handlebars on my pulled bike, going down the hill as fast as we could, having her hair blowing in my face. I can still hear giggling in my ears while she would saying go faster... faster!

I remember this one-time way back when I had what it took to get another girl that was in the 1960s. Hell way not everyone needs what is real to feel consoled.

Sometimes, you have to stray away to know what you love in life, that is what it is all about.

Life tip If you stay in one place too long life gets old fast, I fun before you get old, or start to have doubts.

It is just like the footprints in the snow, sometimes you see two sets, and sometimes not. Now and then you look back on the path you made that is your life, and only see on set. However, they are not yours, so I have come to realize that is when I was carried through the hard or difficult times.

Did I have to get another lover? Well, that is up to you to figure out? Just remember it is not always what you do that stops you from what you wanted in life, it is something or some that being there and pulling at you!

Furthermore, afterward, you look back on life and think, maybe I should have done this, or maybe I should have done that, do not waste your time. It is all meant to be even if you cannot foresee.

The journey is not always clear, however, I always got where I wanted to go, I remember a time when I had an opportunity to find love again in a living form. On the other hand, I would hear the voices calling out say 'Listen you do not need to talk to her okay. Do not try to ask her on dates or anything.'

Life tip- You need to make yourself lesion to what you want to hear even if it difficult to move on. Life is a fight for what you want. If you want it you are going have to corroborate and let go of the past. Love is just like fighting in a warplane, your ether- got- shot down, or you have someone else firing a bolt at you. Either way, it always ends in a climaxing explosion, it is just how it is going to come about in the end.

I think this... about the voices, you do not have control over what I can and cannot do... so shut up, please. And the voices say to me...

'No need to talk to her.' Well, I say- I can talk to whomever I want, and you are not going to stop me. Over the years, I have come to see it is not a true relationship if the person is afraid of what they can and cannot do.

Just because it is the way it is now, does not mean shit. All relationships are going to end naturally or not, it is all up to you and what you want, I choose to say in this relationship forever, and doing it is to different sometimes.

Just remember you have chosen, so are you going to run scared? So, are you going to listen to your inner voice?

The voice that follows you is the one that you choose to lesion to, there is a good one, and evil ones just recollect about that statement, and you will see that it is true.

Kristen- I live with my grandpa; I am all he has at this point, I know that he was a good man, but I think he is a little too guppy for his good.

Brandon- Kristen has a very high-pitched squeaky voice, that is so cute, and unlike any other girl I ever knew. Her hand can fit into the palm of my hand, her giggling laugh is the only thing that warms me and feels the emptiness in the space of my heart, just like a snare drum I not so hollow when around her. She just has a way of making my day complete. Without her I would not have any beat or cadence to play, she is a rhythm to my melody.

She just like Olivia was at that age so cute ... with her braces on her teeth and the way she looks at me. When she waked up to me, I sometimes find it hard to speak because she looks so much like her.

I remember Olivia had a summer job at the 5 and 10 where is made five cents an hour while standing on the perfect little feet. Back then you had to be nice to the people in the stores, besides, ask them if they need help with anything.

Now it is like they are doing- a fever for you just to get checked out. 'Get your shit and get out.'

Anyway, back to my story so I used to go in there and talk to her at the cash register that magic spot for flirting together. The perfect girl what can I say.

Kristen, she was a lot like you! Blue eyes and so damn sweet, back then she was all I wanted to do was run to her. But instead, I had to walk out the door, just remember this Kristen that 'True love should not be such a game; you need to feel the same.'

I don't remember said Brandon; it will come back to me in flashes... Kristen asked; so, where do you consider being places for romance? Brandon- Romance does not exist do not kid yourself, honey.

YES- yes, its dose said Kristen, how is that said, Brandon?

Brandon- you can't have romance if you're not in love.

Kristen- Okay I remember the first time having sex in the restaurant man's bathroom! On the fool with me on top... oh god!

I don't need to know that said Brandon, that not Romantic that is rap. You are not even seventeen yet, that shit should have been a secret to only and perishes to you and saved for marriage! At least love the guy.

Oh, papa you are so old fashion said Kristen, yes maybe so whispered, Brandon ... however, in my day we would have not even thought about doing such a thing, with being in love.

So, has this guy ever asked you to marry him? Yes, but not whom you would expect, I do not think that I loved him. Maybe your right, I should've- loved him, all we are is just friends with benefits.

Though I do not think that being romantic is not dead this day, it does exist. You just need to be with the right guy, which can show you what real expressions of love is!

Brandon- enough of this babbling... back to my story. Yes, she is still in high school, and I am six years older; but age is just a number- right? I guess said, Kristen!

After Kristen goes to her room at night I look out my window in the summer, and my wondering eyes overlook the honey golden lake that splashes as the sunlight flashes and shines my life before my eyes in one blink as the sun sets, and the darkness comes to let me know that I am sitting here in my home alone, thinking that on this very lake we had our the first kiss on the bridge that is along the walkway to the gazebo.

The sight of beauty is worth beholding forever even if only exists in my memory as it once was. Look at this house, look at the life I have had what does it stand for... what?

What do you think it stands for Kristen? Kristen said I don't know yet you have not said anything yet that makes any sense to me, but that okay I still love ya!

In 1944 I, do not know what to think? Yes, no, maybe? Someone give me a sign or something? That was what I was thinking Kristen if you learn anything from this story is that man- are damn stupid, when it comes to being smooth around a crush. It is like every song is about her; everything you see is not as good as her... do you know what I mean? Love is the heart line that just happiness when you least expect it.

Back then it was not about friends approving of us even being together like it is today? I know some of them may, and then again how do I know what they might say, hopefully, it is all good. Back then everything about a girl that was a mystery. Not like the days, it is like everything is given away in an instant and that is the end of the innocence.

The conversion were light-hearted, and modest.

Nevertheless, it was a remarkable achievement of accomplishment; looking back at how completed it can be, you had to wait a week before even know that your letter got back home, or if it would be returned to sender, and I got most of them back because of her dad.

It should be that cupid's arrow strikes at a most unlikely time, and you may realize that they have been in front of you all along that is what love is all about, a relationship that will change you in many ways for good. It is a time when a new relationship looks like it is about to deliver on the promises that came with it. Life may never be the same again without them.

So just to have her know that I am even there even now that's what I call love. Wishing her goodnight and sweet dreams even though she not here and have to see what the next day brings just like she is beside me.

So back to my story Ha! Will I guess as of now I know I am going to call this the curse of seventeen?

Oh, yes to be under the spell of girl is like getting hit below the belt. When you have a love like this see it is going to be like instant nausea.

To know that she is going to be the only one that I can love, but the one in need to love, even if she does not love me anymore in this life... She is it... the one, the only... the seventeen dream that now haunts me, that tease me, that toys with me and plays around in my dreams and my day to day activities.

That reminds me that I am all alone in my old age, with seventeen black cats, and Kristen how has grown up too fast.

Oh, I field to mention that Kristen's mother Abbie was only seventeen at the times she died, and she haunts me just the same but only at the graveyard, however, Olivia spirits swarm in my brain and around my mind constantly, and their past life rushes through my veins.

She speaks and talks to me in whispers, to the point I collapse in exhaustion from being overwhelmed with emotions.

Kristen's father does not speak to me, as far as I am concerned, he can burn in hell, for what he did my daughter. Yet all these spirits are like a snowstorm in December cooled and lonely, yet some are beautiful and breathtaking in their memory.

Just like thinking about Olivia back in the days, we had together before the beginning of the end.

Ha, I am getting a vision, oh yes- I remember this day, Kristen comes here, and let tell you about this story.

Legend has it- Jamie Keller was out in her yard during a storm digging graves for her seven children, and she was killed by the underwire in her bra by getting struck by lightning. I have no clue if this true or not, but she needed to fit if it is real.

Kristen remembers the seven girls, two of them tweens, I can remember their names, but I can feel their discomfort. This woman is in hell now, for what she did to my Kristen and her kids.

That reminds me that finding someone else to love it was like me putting an elevator in the old shit house outback it is just not going to work now or ever. I knew that your great-grandfather had problems Kristen but who could have foreseen what he did to Olivia your grandmother.

I later found out her dad used to keep her locked in a room, like a dog locked in a cage, she was like a puppy that has her snout hit too many times with the newspaper.

This girl was broken mentally, emotionally psychologically, and spiritually, the evenly she went mad because I was not there for her. The sick ass hole would come into her room and look at her and stroke her as she would sleep. She had to sleep with one eye open at all times. But that did not stop what happened.

I remember some night when she little she would climb outside the window of her dad house, by picking the lock with her hair clip, and climbed down the trellis that was littered with roses in the summer night; in her nightdress, just, because she said that she was lonely for me.

But I now know that was not the only reason. And just like that she would be standing in front of me she would take off her night top and placed it on the rocking chair that was agent to my bed, and then she would crawl in with me, and hold on to me so tightly, that I felt that she was suffocating the life out of me. Little did I know that is exactly what she was doing?

She always fell asleep resting her head on my chest, she must have felt safe in my arms. I guess that is why she was always so tired because of him, I guess that is why she loved me, I was always there for her, and after everything, she went through. Plus, she said that she liked to hear my heart beating. Back then there was nothing more I ever wanted to be then was her hero!

Just like the one night, I noticed that her legs and inner thighs were all cups up, she said that it was because she was out on the river in her yellow rowboat and it capsized.

She said- 'you know that I can swim very well...' and that the rocks were sharp. I did by a word of it. I knew the markings on her legs were done with a razor blade or a dull knife. She never wanted me to ask about it again... so I didn't.

That night she told me about the time that she nearly drowned when she was seven-years-old. Back then I had no idea that her dad was holding her down under the water in the bathtub by her hair, and that was the first time he laid his hands and fingers on her.

To this very day, I could slaughter that man for what he did to my lovely seventeen- girl. But by the time I got back from the war he was on the ground. Nonetheless, that did not stop me from pissing on his gravestone! That maybe Kristen's great-grandfather but I have no respect for the man, and neither will she... no one will.

Part: 10

Golden

All we ever had was the gazebo on top of the golden water, with my seventeen-year-old lover; the blue eyes shekel into mine lost in time. Tell pasture grasslands blowing in the breeze, kissing her would bring on our knees.

The flowers in bloom all around in the spring, the trees with colors that display their majesty just for us. Leasing to her sing in my ears added to all the lust, she was whispering sweet nothing that I can still lightly hear.

I was the only one she could trust, being together was a must for both of us. No matter what the weather, our love was forever and ever, I will remember.

Her hands that I loved to hold, the story that we told. We said that we be together even when we got old. Just like that song ‘Remember When’ that would be the story of our lives. That is, we would have bands of gold, and someday it is our baby to hold.

I forgot about this, but she would sing to me, she had the voice of an angel!

You know that Kristen looks and sounds just like her... I do believe that reincarnation is possible?

So, I gave Kristen all the poems I wrote to Olivia because she would hide under her pillow anyway, plus now they have been made into songs that Kristen play to me on this old piano that sits here in the living room.

Speaking of interments to this day I still have Olivia’s 1920’s guitar, the wood is now cracked, and the high E string is broken, it most likely it will never play a song in tune again, but I do not have the heart to throw it away, it was played with love and compassion by her.

So, I plan on giving it to Kristen so that maybe we can get it working again if I have the energy. It is on my to-do list! A list that seems to get longer as my days are getting shorter.

You know it is like me when I look out my window, I can still see her out on that boat just floating the day away.

Yes, that was one of our hobbies that we would like to do.

Going out on the water, and embarrass one another until it was so back out that we could not see the dock any longer. All we could see was the lights and reflections flickering in the water, that was so picturesque and tranquil, it was a fairytale-like.

From the gazebo, that seemed to be the creation of everything, we were at the time. We had the perfect elements for love, a forbidden lovers’ equestrian on the water of time that seem to ever steal when locking as one.

On the other hand, in are fairytale there were many dark storms, that the father caused, he was going to end it at all costs, even if that meet heartbreak and torture.

In addition to that he did he said that I was the one that did all those terrible twisted things to his daughter, and that is why I listed in the Army, I had to leave. There was nothing I could do but hand here my note.

Nothing, that I could do or say again; because- I never saw her again after that. All I had was notes that never got to her.

I remember- in the summer, my wondering eye overlooks the honey golden lake that splashes, as the sunlight flashes. It shines my life before my eyes in one blink as the sun sets, and the darkness comes to let me know that I am walking back to my home alone.

Thinking that on this very lake we had our first kiss on the bridge that is along the walkway to the gazebo.

Part: 11

Lifetime

Look at this house it is the home we always wanted to have together, look at the life; I have had what does it stand for... what? What do you think it stands for Kristen? Kristen said it shows that you cared! Yes, said Brandon, that is true love.

Back to them Hope and her love- Nevaeh's tells about her life and the ones before.

1944, I do not know what to think? Yes, no, maybe? Someone give me a sign or something that has happened? That was what I was thinking Kristen if you learn anything from this story, it's like every song is about was about her everything you see is not as good as her... do you know what I mean?

Love is the heart line of happiness. With that kind of flat-lined something is going to snap, and it did.

Just to have her know that I am even there. Oh, just too able to be with her for a couple of days again in life. Maybe there is a date on the way at the end of my life. While Kristen it is getting least, we will talk about all tomorrow, go get some rest.

It is interesting that when Kristen is asleep, I check in on her often. You know there is nothing more comforting than hearing her snoring away, she is so adorable! I do this for two reasons that I have a hard time sleeping at night. Two that I want to make sure that she is still berthing because I do not think, I could take another loss.

My heart is just too weak, and she is the only one that, I love left in my life. I look around the room, and the white laces on the windows are tied back, with lavender ribbons.

I know that she is content, holding her teddy bear, under her canopy bed, she may be seventeen in two weeks but as for now, she will always be my little girl.

The crystal chandelier is dimmed as low as it can go, with a soft glimmering creamy warmth.

So now that I know that everything is okay, I shut the door keeping it cracked slightly. I will shuffle my feet back down the staircase, make my way back to my old chair, which is in the living room. Then stare out the window at the pond and gazebo until the sunrise.

I remember my saying to me when I was a boy 'Early to bed and early to rise, shell makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.'

My mother used to say to me every night; I still try to believe that is so. Nonetheless, I cannot help but scratch my head and mull in my mind these questions. Just because one is wealthy does not mean that they need to be a d*ck to everyone that has less. Just because one is healthy does not mean that they cannot become deathly sick, that saying just does not work for me.

Not too many out there know what it's like to have a seventeen-year-old transparent ghost in all white in your face being playful and animated all the time. Even when you take my glasses off, she is showing up in your face as clear as day. It makes it hard to slumber throughout the night.

Why; for the reason that you are going to realize that, you are all alone when you're not alone. That even the dreams that you have are just as painful as being awake.

Not painful as being injured or cut, but as emotionally and psychologically difficult, and it is straining on the old brain to grasp.

Just like a Chicago song; she was my inspiration, Kristen she is now what gave me my life meaning, and she is the only thing that gave me any feeling, without I am just an empty body.

'Before I go to the place of no return, I remember that I had to live in a land of gloom and utter darkness.' So true, I do not fear the unknown anymore. 'For though I should walk in the center of the through the valley of death, they have comforted me before so maybe it will have to be my turn, even on earth the spirits are with me, I will fear no evil anymore.'

Part: 12

Nibbana

Olivia is from the paradise above: I would say that she is looking over me, she comforts me as much as she can. But then it is hard not having her here, in her earthly body. It can be hard having faith in something that cannot be expressed in words.

But it is just something that you can feel, like the rain on a warm spring day, like the blossoms from the pear trees landing on your shoulders as a walk down the path to the gazebo, similar to the haze from the golden water; it all reminds me of Olivia when she was my seventeen.

I still go to the same church that I have going to all my life, and I give what I can. I sit in the back, with Kristen by my side; she is the only youth there. It seems that faith is gone away. I have a pad for all my sins, and that is what I want to Kristen know, always to do the right things at all times. To think before you do something because you may just have to live with it or it all life and it stays with you forever.

I can hear her whispering Paul, Paul- I am still with you, and I love you, I lo-v-e you, Brandon! It is drawn out, and sweet and soft and lingering. It makes the hair on my arms stand up. Yet it is stimulating and yet melancholy at the same time. Kristen must think that I am going loopy... ha- well I am old; she thinks that all old people are irrational.

Hell, I was the same way at her age... saying that 'I hope I would die before I get old.' Whom the hell used to say that good shit, well I can't remember... who? I have seen a lot come and go in my life; I just wish I could remember all of it, like Woodstock.

All I remember was mud all over all the nude people, it smelt like shit, and Jenny Hendrix was playing the star-spangled banner, which was astonishing weird. It seems that all good musicians dye to young. Life comes and goes just like a hit song, and once you get sick of the riff, and the fame that is when it is all over. The same can be said about existence!

Here is one of the notes that I fished: Thinking about her and the summer and what it could be, with her it reminds me of Seventeen- you're on my mind all the time and, I think about you yet we're not together. The stars shining combined with ribbon holding hands forever you are my eternal love.

Part: 13

Memory forfeiture

Me freaking out video being the top room, on MFC! ≈ Past remembers of Karly... ≈

Sometimes I get so preoccupied trying to perfect everything that I forget to appreciate the things that are already perfect. Like, have you ever been in love with a girl that you cannot have in your life?

My mind is achy half on and half off, most of the time. A lot of my dreams are the true reality, so it seems to me, then when I am awakened, I am frightened by what I do not see, and curious about what I do.

In my life, I try to put these thoughts and moments down into a story. And this is what I am telling you. What I'm saying right now I wonder if it even makes any sense. But this was my true reality, a tragic love story... That did not end, the way I wanted.

There is one thing that is on my mind, and that is Kristen so-called boyfriend, he drives up in a piece of shit car, honks the horn three times, and my sweet innocent granddaughter goes running out the door in a short skirt, to him like he is the only guy in the world. Jayson Parker in the ass hole that deflowered my little girl.

I can't stand him; he is a cocky blue balled punk. You know when you take a girl out you should meet her at the door of the home and walk her to the car open the damn car door for her. If I would have done that back in my day... God, you would never hear the end of it. It - is just not right.

Not only that but he expects her to pay for the date, the food or whatever they do. Plus, then he wants to bump and grinds on her too. God-talk about selfish, yet she thinks he is the only one with one in his trousers.

So, I told him- 'I have bolt cutter out in the shed, and I am not afraid to use them; that what said to Jayson'. Then when they get back, they make out in the car, and he kicks her out like she is nothing to him. Back in my day you walked the girl up to the door and maybe you got a little kiss, besides your tongue didn't need to go down each other's throat along with other things, it's sick.

I said to Kristen don't though your life away but that what is going to do. But you can only talk about someone so much, young people are going to do what they want to do. I was the same way back in the day, ha... but they don't need to know that. It is just my time to move on. And lose another seventeen-year-old girl.

Just to think that my little girl is going to have her seventeenth birthday, it just seems like yesterday that she was born so much has changed scenes than.

All she has to do is say my name and my knees get a week, I am in love or am I in too deep? What I am feeling that makes me want more and more.

But I know that I have to walk out that door of life. Yet, I know that I can never I cannot hold you in my arms forever.

There is always someone in the way or, so it seems. I believe in not saying one negative word so that I can receive my blessings that will, and can bring me joy.

My Kirsten is my everything to me, all her blue eyes still shine for me, and Olivia kisses still takes my breath away tell this very day, you are mine and I would not have it another way. Even if I have to eat coal dust, and even if I have lost it all to the hex of seventeen.

Part: 14

Swathe

Video: MFC me nude showing it all for you saying: 'ant- I the cutest!' ≈ Past remembers of Karly... ≈

So, there is only one more thing to do and that is this. Please do not open this letter until you think it is the last day of your life.

This was the last note she wrote to me.

So, all these years- I have been wording what is in this envelop? I always felt that nothing word change how I felt, nor did I don't care, I will open it and read it.

It reads- you will know what happened to me, I never leave you ever. When you burn this note, which is the end of your life. Also, it is the end of me being with you in spirit.

We can finally be together in eternal life, so my sweet Brandon burn this letter, and we can be in love once again.

Olivia after- I left she could take anymore she killed her father with an ax; it was a crime of passion and hatred. And that is the night she made this me the love letter that I have in my hand, I never that it was also a suicide letter.

She left her home for the last time, naked as the day she was born, and laid down on the railroad tracks weighting for the next train to run her over. It was over...on her seventeenth birthday. And my life was empty ever senses, but I did not know how it happened all these years.

Her spirit may be with me, and it may hunt me, but it is nothing like having that worm seventeen body next to me. Never to kiss those lips again to hear her voice again, and never hear her laugh again.

All I have left some crumpled up photo in a letter of abandonment. All I can say is I hope that we both end up being in the heavens together once more. Just remember do not let your dreams go with you to the grave.

It is time to burn this note! Brandon's last berth on earth and first in the heavens... There she was the same as the last time I saw her seventeen a glowing but this time she is mine forever, now that is love. Kristen, this is the story of a seventeen-year-old girl, the love of my grandpa's life.

The man was the rock in my life too. I found some of his notes and enjoyed his story so much that, I need to write them down into this book.

I never know that what was he was telling me over the year was all true; I made him the promos to publish this story so that he could always be remembered.

For love, he had for the one that never left his side. All I can say is that the curse of seventeen went to the grave with him, so I believe. For the reason that- I am still here, and I am now the age of seventeen.

Yet, he is still with me in spirit.

Nevaeh

Book: 16

Crescent Moon

Chapter: 106

The Confusion?

Karly- I got Miss. Cammy girl award, you voted, and I won! ≈ Past remembers of Karly... ≈

2016- Boys today feel that feeling is hummping! Olivia always feels absent-minded after the kids come home from school and seeing her husband after a long hard day at work. She forgets everything about her day when seeing them, it's the highlight of her day. Even though their day is about to end hers is about to start, she races off without even a hug. Yet that's just me- I have a hectic life. 'Well?' she prompted. She had wanted to save the news, to torture her by not telling, but he had to talk.

~*~

I read a book that had the first chapter like this- and it oh so reminds me of life and how it is becoming. 2021- 'It was a yearning to burn.' The computers and robots have taken over the world, nobody needs to read any of that shit, or think. Everything is at our fingertips with cell phones, I- pads, and PC's, without looking through old dusty pages, plus its agents the law to think for yourself, and read any books. We burn books like most have the burning itch to have unpredicted sex. They were dragging the two women; we saw last night by the hair. I don't want to look, I didn't want to stare, and I just acted like I didn't care. Both girls where complete bare. Their lives where over it seemed so unfair.

A girl without a name just a number of hers- I look at my girlfriend and said and said- we just so two hookers getting whacked and jacked. She said- yeah, I no let's get in the house before they get any ideas about us. There was a thump and a bump in the night, and not the kind of thump and bump you want or want to feel and hear. Honey- hon wake up; I think there is someone in the house! Go and see!

Wh-a- what? I looked and there is someone at the foot of the bed!

Blood dripping, from her chest, she is scared to look down yet does it anyway. She was thrown around the room by something dark. It wasn't a woman yet; it was a thing it wasn't anything but unfairness. It was unlike anything she had ever seen. But what was it? No face, no name, nobody... what could it be, and what does it want with me? A flash of lightning appeared in the sky, letting her see the gigantic outline of the grim reaper is what I got by them! Doing exercise helps to boost the power energy nevertheless, she could not boost it enough, not enough to escape from the... Thing. It was sucking the life out of her with its dark back lips. Slowly closing her eyes, she was with me, in my mind. Yet never alive after that day.

Nothing but impressions of life...

~*~

Start: 1941- Grandpas Natalie story- he'd remember... been fresh out of high school not a day over seventeen. I had five cents to my name, I was still living at home, but not for long. I was a virgin, to the world! I never saw anything other than farmland. I didn't know what I was in for. Yet I had to go... Hitler was taking over, killing babies and baring them alive of all things. I will never forget the sounds of the troop train steaming through, dropping off more maggots like me to kill the Nazis'.

Knowing that ninety percent of them would not make it back home. I never thought I would live this long, and I never thought young-uns would doubt the war and the Holocaust.

I have seen men, women, and kids being lined up on their knees and shot in the back of the head, for no reason at all. It's incredible, tragic, and despicable, how one man's loathing can start so much destruction. I do believe that history is going to repeat; it's just a matter of time. I just hope I can fish this story with you all before I am fished myself. He had to share it with someone. He put the plate down, came into the living room, and sat on the couch, which me here this all there was more yet he passed midline.

As I wake alone this morning, I miss the feeling of last night the softness of the sheets between my thighs. I look around the room and nothing has changed, she still sleeps next to me, yet sees can't see me. Yet I see her, and in a way, I think she can feel me there, yet I am not quite sure... I have been gone for so long now I don't think she even remembers what it's like to be with me as we were oh so long ago. It like I was never there, but I was there at one time holding her, I still there, yet I ask not... I would love to be alive, once more. I could talk to him now, yet I don't want too, for being a meanie as she said to me!

He and Diana had nicknamed the Butt. 'It was a bust,' he said. 'Cops came the night of this party.' She watched him carefully.

'Are you sure you want to do this, Marcel?' she said unobtrusively. 'Come on, Diana.' He was annoyed that she'd even asked. He hoven on her legs into his lap. The message was in order on the back butt and in-between her, the only thing that would keep them from total atrophy, and he still insisted on working her calves every day, even though she'd been saying for a long time that it was useless.

Diana, she had seen a few or more different doctors. And she'd been going to physical therapy for well over a year now. But there'd been no change. No improvement. She'd never walk again. Come on, honey, let's get you ready for bed I was 13 at the time. I am no special your girl here, just a collective girl here doing a thing as I should, think of boys and rubbing myself on then in my thoughts at night, I read, I think, I even poop too, throw girl is not allowed to say that right, not in these times. All way with sweet and common girly thoughts. I've led a common little life. There is no testimonials dedication to me or for me, yet I may be dying of something bad, I can say. Plus, my name Dinia will soon be unable to be remembered by all that was of the past days. But in single deference, I thrived as magnificently as anyone who ever lived a young dumb yet cute life.

Looking good, girl. As I walk the halls of this big creepy place. 'I feel okay today.' Yours truly here feels that she loved another boy with all my heart, and soul body and mind. My soul and for me, that has always been enough to give to him if that would be his wish.

How's it feeling and doing, hunnie- bunnies? Going to kick it- I keep trying to die, but they won't let me they say I am so stinking cute. Well, you can't have everything even if it's fading or living without pain on both.

Immense day today I have planned.

You say that every day, with the cutest smile of your little blond-haired blue-eyed face, you little angel. It's a lovely day outside. Let's take a walk, outside of today, We, don't think so, you're not able to- at all- yet. (Wishful thinking) Well, we've got to get you out of this room. Come on now, honey goes to the playroom and does coloring and things like that. Some fresh air is what I want! Grrrr!

Chapter: 107

fixable

Karly- Video of me running around the room nude  $\approx$  Past remembers of Karly...  $\approx$  The delusions?

It's all good I do what I always do no compacts, -Good morning. Me- I am so sad and sorry at this point of my beginnings starts of my young little life, it's not a good day, to be me I want to play and dance and sing and do girl little cute-z thing like painting my toenail to match my Paullieger-ie ones. I have a long sunn-ie dress and not as much hair as I did, but it's fixable if I work for it. OUTSIDE??? I asked she said - baby- girl- I don't think it can happen. Nurse says- she's up for anything.

Chapter: 108

Ciao

Karly- Photo of me sucking one-off... my dildo that is, for the show  $\approx$

Past remembers of Karly...  $\approx$  The girl?

Hello? (Boy) I like him, he's-a funny and handsome. This is me! doors fly open as she runs and stops runs and stops looking in at the dying kids in their rooms and beds, older boy Daved- he comes to read to you. Read a kiddie story of hope and love and goo-goo-ness, with unicorns and ponies? Yeah- No that pain starts within me and I feel as I had to run to the bathroom to not keep it down the treatments are talking to me; I don't know if this is a goodie thing-ie. Oh, come on, back to bed, and sleep this off, it goes in OUCH-ies, and her sweet little light goes out.

Ahh... snoring, yet one old betty said - All right now, that keep her away for three hours.

(Noon)

Where did we leave off? In the story... Oh, yeah, yeah, here it is- baby. It was the night of the carnival, a news story this time, I knew yet I didn't remember it, I lose something I can feel yet they don't tell me anything so I pulled out what I can, yet that not much being my age. 'Daved, was there with his friends, and Maraca.' -Daved?

-That's where those both met- them... It was at the time and date of September- 19th of 14, Dinia was years nine old or so. (Girl) She has the same name as me.

See then there at the park- groundwater squirting game: Little girl wins a prize. He tied to get her something yet epic fail! -Foo-ie! I watched that off so hard, no dingaling here. -Thank you for playing the boy. Hah, you're really funny I am a man here not a boy. Man, I clobbered, it's all good she bears hugged him for being just him and that was some time being, cute yet very dumb for the acting of dumbness. I bet that thing, Yakie- funny it didn't come off, oh that that thing. I'm telling you I did baby; these games are rigged.

Chapter: 109

Time to turn in

The span?

Nighttime before bedtime, Hello, it was him I kind of remember some of the stories now, that he said earlier... How are you, good- feeling good? Howdy, what's your name, U- NO it baby think- hard ...???... I don't think I do- and story time starts for her, as she thinks on. Footstep comes right up here now. Over the knob, certainly. Whoa.

Yeah, singing it out in a hum-

-Who's this girl with Maraca?

-Her name's Dinia Samilton.

She's here for the summer with her family.

Dad's is the poorest around, yet she cute right good butt for you.

Ha- funny then why haven't you been with her yet?

Walked apart to go see this girl.

-Hello, Paullie!

-Hi, honey.

Look, I won you a prize, he rips one down from the mouse game as she walked towards him.

That woman was P-O-ed, at the game, yet they walk off one arm wrapped around.

Paullie- oh, thank you! She giggled without thoughts on the thought of him and she was run around like the mouse on the wheel of the game.

Osha! A bear- cute- Love! He said Yeah, -sure- kiss me! They did... Hey great, huh I look at Daved like I hooded her?

Chapter: 110

Trendy

The happening?

Hey Dinia, you want some cotton candy baby-girl? - Umm, okay honey. That would be so much fun if your pants', someone. Sure, look down there... GOD keep it in there I don't wanna see it, she said. You only get one chance, teenager. You want to dance with me or rid with me, or on me, or something like that?

I'm Daved Talhhoun.

SO-o?

-So, it's nice to meet you.

-Dinia, who is this guy?

-I don't know, Daved Talhhoun.

-I would like to take you out.

-Friend! Do you mind?

You can't sit more than two people in a chair, Daved.

Go out?

-No.

-Why not?

-CUZ- I don't want to.

David, she's with us, so don't chase her away with your dumbness, and crap.

Hey Dinia, you want to ride the merry-go-round?

Up down, up-down, Up Down-they went their love life would go.

-I'd love to sugggggerrrr.

They are kissing and feeling each other out in the tornal of love.

-All right the boy said in the 1st seat.

Love is all we need right- the book closes for the night as she falls asleep on him.

(Boy) walks out of the room kissing her forehead and said I never forget you as you did with me, yet love and luck don't always go hand and hand.

Chapter: 111

Collective

Photos of my sis, online to at her age, asking like a slut, all over me and my friends. It shows her puss and running come, shot.

When and why?

Reason with me. Plea me. - Daved Talhhoun.

-What?

Works down at the McDonald's with Paullie age seventeen.

Oh... Did you see he was standing like that god do you think it's- like- oh?

Run up- he dad- like not even one inch away from her face? GOD- what do you want from me, she said not happy, yeah, I saw, said the girlfriend, that's Daved, though. Always doing the crazies, are you at all surprised, not at all I like it yet I don't, we'll see, maybe, I don't know yet, I girl what can I say.

He even came over to you, like was he going to kiss you and not even know your name first.

Sweet but creepy!

I think he likes you, she said with delight. Yeah, my dad would too. I think nah- for now anyway. Hey what... jerk... as he pulled my hair, saying I was cute. Get off me, I said as he was all wrapped around me going for it all. God older boy- Don't touch me. -Hey! I love you, girl, without a name! - Well, I... ugh! HUM, I thought about him and what I saw there. What are you doing tonight? Hey, you can't do that as she runs off the merry-go-round! As she was there, he almost falls on his tush-ie, I'll pay you when I get off, Dan.

-He asked you out-

Yes, he did- I like him- eyes rolled dreamily, both hands fly up on her reading cheeks. Okay, Dan, I'll get- it- oh- off, all right. Get off, Daved, you need to come.... (Girls-What?) Award stop in his yelling words- 'OFF' as it spins around, you need to come- what...? Off. He tripped you're going to kill yourself for her boy!

Daved, cut it out, boy. Now, will you go out with me as he hopped on my hose-ie?

What the freak? - No?

Hey boy, she just told you.

It keeps going around. Rings being tossed in the mouth of the clown.

Lean into it so you don't fall getting off, it goes, fast.

Why not?

I don't know you at all, and because I don't want to. You don't need to know me to 1st date girl. How else do you get to know someone if you don't try first- dates, go by what your friends say?

Daved!

Come again? Would you- GO!

NO! He said.

Girl- Well, you leave me no other choice then. Oh, my God gets it in your head and not that one I don't want it.

I'm not kidding, I am falling too you.

Daved, stop misleading around.

-What are you doing?

-I'm going to ask you one more time, he kisses her on the cheek, from behind. Will you... NOW as he gets up on her and the house, doing things I can say, yet think like a boy. Will you go out with me? Daved, you best come on and stop it.

Girlfriend next one over... my leg is slipping. Then get down and off, you- idiot. That way I am doing if she says- yes. Not until she decides. 'Ah, go on out with him, baby said some old dude in next row.' All right, all right, her and goes down his undies, and then see feel it and push him off, I'll go out with you. She knew it was all love she was feeling it too. It was up to my butt so- yeah- feel in the blanks here.

Chapter: 112

The who and then what?

What?

Who?

When?

Why?

They?

It?

Some?

Doing it?

No, don't do me any favors if you say yes, he spun out on the floor of the ride.

No, no. Do I want to, yes?

Do you want to?

Did she say Sucking- yes!

Do you want to?

Yes!

Say it again.

I want to go out with you- now.

Say it again.

I want to go out with you.

All right, all right God keep it in your pants!

We'll go out.

You think you're so clever, do you not?

Daved, you- idiot! She said

She remembers my name- yes!

Girlfriend- That wasn't funny, nope, it's okay hun, I'll take care of this boy soon.

Girl asked- on her deathbed- I remember the girl from the Carnival, right... she was my friend, right?

Do you remember me? I asked with wondering thoughts- of hope.

Yeah, sure, the boy that reads to me, not the boy- what was he called- Mr. Bonner, was it? He looked pickled. How could I overlook the speculations of me wondering though-age? I wanted to clear that up with you, for the reason that I'm categorically regretful about that all. It remained an imprudent thing to do... on that ride, to talk to somebody. But then again, I had god was saying she was my baby angel sent from the heavens. I had to see I could get her naked before the night was over. To be next to you. I was being been so pulled from you. Um... oh, what a saying here, it's nice, so nice! Do you use that on all the barbs?

-No, not all just you hun.

-Right, you're dumb.

I saw you all rubbed up to your little girlie-friend what's her name with the brown hair and green eyes.

-What are you doing tonight?

-Could you repeat that? Go out tomorrow night?

What do you say, baby? What about this weekend, say at a hotel or whatever?

I know what you want I don't give that to boys.

- Why?

Our date then?

Maybe- she walked away- skipping, and humming show tunes.

I did not even say; I would go on that date with you.

The date that you agreed to go on with me.

No...!

Yes, you promised.

You pledged, and you swore it did you not.

Sound good, I speculate the thoughts of yes or no: Yeah for you would have killed me with it behind me if not. I changed my mind over time to yes or no, I have to see, maybe? Look, I know you get some dirty boys coming up to you on the street doing crazy things... I don't know him. Why do act as if I do? You don't know me by now don't you, I know me and that's good enough, right?

Chapter: 113

Trinkets

Who did what?

Plus, when I see something that I like, I got to love it see the small-town charms- ha... I love it. I go... I mean, I go crazy for it. Okay, what are you speaking of? Well, you, see into me, I feel, that you do. Oh, you're good at this ant you. What the Hel-? You're so moral. Certainly not. No, you're getting me wrong. You have it all now, yet not me. But you- You're something ain't you. You are you ain't nothing bad. You're whimsical, fanciful, unusual, imaginative, original, creative, and quirky, and I would even give you impulsive and capricious.

Hugh?

I'm not.

You're so stupid, I think I like that...

Chapter: 114

Emotional

The good and the bad- you are so-o goooooood, I'm mesmerized. I'm not frequently like this, I'm sorry. You make me dumb feeling and acting.

Uh-oh, oh my- like- yes, you are.

I can be amusing if you want... thoughtful, uh, smart, um, illogical, and courageous. And uh... I can be light on my feet. I could be your all and wonder, and magical, whatever you want. You just tell me what you want me to be and I do that- love. I'll be that for you forever and ever never letting go of you to the day you or me, is not around to say- I love you.

You're CUTEY dumb and love me I see that. OKAY! You win, not smart- I could be that for yah too. Come on, let's go for this date, you want as bad as me.

What's it going to hurt if we do things after and now? Umm... ah- unh- I don't think as a result so maybe it's okay if I am like you. Fine, what can I do to change your mind?

Dinia, you remember- Daved, don't you? The move adds to start with supposition- You'll total and get something out. You unquestionable she's coming for it hard? Lessen, chum, it's all set up. We are meeting her for the late show tonight so back off her.

Look... what did... I tell you what? Come on now and see this movie picture.

Oh, my goodness, it's bad, his hand on mine... I feel more to come. What a happenstance she felt! Kissing him with popcorn, and the taste of butter, and Pepsi, I need to talk to you for a second. He's here! Him sitting on my hand, and the other way around, Yes, I remember- Yah.

Chapter: 115

Levels

The tell of tells- the tale of my butt plug ha! I'm- cute no?

-Come here.

-Paullie!

-Hi.

-You look great.

-Hello.

-It's nice to see you yet again.

-You too.

-Aw, thanks.

You look great and feel good next to me. She is kissing my ear, saying sweet nothings.

You do look great. You look great.

And I know I look great, said Paullie so could we please go see this movie now and hush up? The show's about to start. After you, he asked for a kiss on the lips. You come back here, baby. You ain't going to catch me, she runs for the water's edge and prattled-boats.

Swans all-round them as they kiss in the sunshine, next to the old steam train puffing down next to the oak trees and picnic tables.

See her as she runs, wild and carefree, in stupid love, with so poor boy.

I'm supposed to catch you! Kiss, kiss, kiss, lip bite, eyes tight, and lashes long on his cheeks. I'm faster than you. 'Nah- you- ant.' 'You- ant- you- ant- you ant!!! Nope, No!' I am wet for you know, just drenched with the water on the edge.

I'll get you, baby girl! I'm going to get... Here I come! Let me love you. You better run fast! And then met slowly in a hug, run and it's falling in love again being apart for that long. Park and outlying past them all that looked passed all the rides too. Love after, after falling madly in love, love, love, la- love. The big wheel in the sky is lighting as fireworks off above and inward. Wait for me, baby girl- I see you there, never about where they, never- ever apart- I would even sleep with me in the night for I said I was scared, and ran in his bed, held tightly.

(Back on the first date)

Want to walk with me to my house? He did old ways I said- mom will love you for this. Her- what happened? ...In that movie? We didn't even see it I could not even tell you for sure. Here you go. Thank you for this night we didn't even kiss at the door mom was looking so yeah. What are you guys doing now and then? We giggled and did say anything but the truth.

Even if I was opened up to him now.

Yeah, what's going on you too? Yeah, is that all...

....???

Just a and movie no more no less- um she now by the look on my face, and the glow your un-flow-her-ed-ness. Mom passed a week later of what I have. Do you guys feel it for each other? Yes- yes- we do.

Do you-ah Love each other? Yes- I love him! I love her too. Oh, I get it. You guys do love each other, THEN HUN? Don't do anything you're going to regret I wouldn't do. Unacceptable, goodbye. All right, all right. Mmm...

That was fun we going to do it again. Mm-hmm. I haven't seen a movie, in ages. Really? Huh-uh. Not meanwhile I was a little kid. Pardon?

Nope-ie, I, uh...what?

I'm busy, you know, I don't have that much time don't ya- sec. Are you busy? hmm- Mm- I have a very stern agenda.

My days are all planned out even back then, I had to dale with this crap. I get up in the morning... banquet, school day, get it in- here- work on homework here, play some all alone, reading time, bath time and sleep time and do it all over and over and over and over and over and over and over. Math, English tutor, lunch at some point if I can hold it down, music lessons- piano lesson, and that about all they will like me do, TV. It is nice when it works also. And after dinner and blowing it all over- I spend time with my family, for three hours before they go home, and I say here all alone in this glowing white and could room, next to my bedmate Sam.

She does do or say much she has a week to live and she is five years old.

And then l... I catch up on some reading, she is sawing logs! Wow, stop breathing- um I think about that one hard and then say Nah- don't do that.

Oh, Mom and Daddy see you soon pull through one more day baby.

We decide to pull the plug- so she would not suffer- age ten.

We all gather around to see her. Everything is over... they look down on the life she never had- yet she has a sketchbook of her short life here. No, not everything is readable- however, it's all there in her handwriting. But the important thing is she was remembered for her. And then everything else, she was not. And that way youth and innocence with young love mixed in. free- and wild to see life fad fast. You get to decide all by yourself to live on or let go? She didn't we did- it the hardest thing a dad has to do is she, someone, you love to go- before you. It had to be I would say- it had to be this way. I don't get it either.

Why? God- or whomever why make the plan of killing sweet little kids? Why the hell do you want to do this to me- why? Mom- she never did stop crying it's been four years now.

I'll always think of you that way I'll pull you in the morning sun and when the night is new...

I'll be looking at the moon and think of you...

But the first time I ever saw your face... The first time I ever saw your face I'll be seeing you.

Morning, Mr. Talhhoun.

Mr. Talhhoun? Call Dr. Mandite Von and USC, okay? I've got no, I got no pulse anymore- she said. I've got nothing to say just how I love you and you feel that even now with things gone like even if your heart in new it feels the same to me and you.

Let them know we are in full arrest.

Call me- on my cell if you can, if you can this evening, I see you tomorrow if I can and you can. All right, we will do this if we can. We talked about this. It's all right now sleep, and rest now think about your life and how it was. Come on, come on, sweetie. Okay, yes, come on, let's go. Time to go- It's okay, baby, come on. You know it is.

Just try it not to get her over happy she needs rest not a boyfriend right now, said, mom.

Oh, Mr. Talhhoun you came to see her.

Welcome back, the baby girl sees that you want it through all that. How do you feel? Paulie. Apt as a swindle. Where are you going girl at the stand asked? I was just taking a walk, thinking about how- I can't sleep without her. Fine, you know you're not supposed to, it's against the rules.

Yeah, I know. You weren't going for a walk, where you? You were going to see Miss Dinia again wasn't yah. I just got out of the hospital and I miss her you see.

Mr. Talhhoun, I'm sorry you can be coming in out of her room like that at night, but I can't let you see her tonight. Here and now you're going to have to go back to your room. As for me, I'm going to go downstairs and get myself a cup of coffee. I won't be back to check on you for a while, so don't do anything foolish- I want to go to do that- I just want to see him if I can-

Hi.

Daved.

Daved.

Hi, Baby girl. I'm sorry I haven't been able to be here to read to you.

I didn't know what to do. I was frightened you were not ever coming back to my love. I'll continuously come back. What's going to happen when I can't remember anything to any further extent? What will you do? I'll be here always and ever. I'll never- ever leave you. I need to ask you something. What is it, Baby girl? Do you think that our love can make marvels? Sure, I do if the same. That's what conveys you back to me each time. Do you think our love could take us away together even if I go away from you? I think our love can do something we want it to.

I love you.

- I love you, Dinia.

Good night.

- Good night.

I'll be seeing you there soon.

I want to show you something the boy said I have this it was hers.

- Daved, what are you doing? As the pages sated to show and he read out- to them as he did with her- day in and day out. -What now? She loves to paint.

Yeah? -Mm-hmm. Huh. Most of the time, I have all these drawings showed in here and look over than seeing her do them going back to the time she did them.

Thoughts bouncing around in my head. Are you okay? Why are you crying? It's all good, I said whipping them away.

(Memory)

Do you want to dance with me? Now? Sure. -Mm-hmm. Is are the song playing in the background? -Mm-hmm.

I want to fly like a colorful bird- so I don't have to be here and see the world until then an I rush over their heads, are you going to be one-two? If you're a birdie, I'm a birdie. Come on, darling, don't do this to yourself- What are you doing? You need to hear this all there is the thing you don't know about us. Don't. Don't! Okay then if you insist. Here we go, reading easily- Okay, okay. We were crazy about each other. Yah we know - Okay, Daddy- Oh, and Daddy I love him- she said here in her book quoting her life.

I want to meet her in heaven now. This young man is not going to make it.

Heartbroken he is... Okay. I am okay... Nope... he ain't. Good night, Daddy, as she ran to me and left you for a night out- of fun and games.

Good night first kisses we had- like- like- like- do you see this?

Oh, that's lovely, dear. Her dream was like a movie- I want a big old porch that wraps around the walkway and a big old entire into the house. We can drink sugary soda and candy... nonstop. Big windows and open doors to watch the sun go down, no shades, like here. Do you promise? This for me? Hmm- Mm, I promise. Yeah! -Where are you going? Is something happening to me?

Here...

Always next to you. Wow... This is the part you all need to here for sure. What that dear? Ha-hum? She said- make love to me. Daved. -Yeah?

The old-rick-a-t-ie Covered Bridge I waited for her to say when and where.

Did she say- Daved? Okay, I want you? I want you to- And It all happened... all and everything, which makes a girl a woman. And...?

Did...???... you...?

?... Um...? I know I said, the kiss... I want you to make love to me, she asked once more.

So, I did- we did- it was not easy for me- know what I was doing and she not. She said- you're going to have to walk me through this sex like this, it broke, she feels, so did I the kissing lots. Right.

You, all right? -Yeah, it's okay- it's okay. I asked- Did I hurt you? -No, no. Dad said we know... boy we know- it was good she had her magical boyfriend he was you, which was her dying wish, to have love and feel the love. I'm just having a lot of thoughts, of age and things. It's Okay! I should go- over this I feel... No, I don't want you to go. I got to think... about what I did here. Come here and talk to us.

You're not leaving till it's all been said.

I'm so happy that you did? Um- yes. You got so much ahead of you. Yet not love, he said. It's true... I will never love another girl, at all. I'm not going to have nice things, fancy things, sure but not her... I don't want to live without it. It's never going to happen for me. Sh-h- boy-stop. It's not in the cards for me, don't you see it was all ripped away, like her life, why? Stop it!

You going to die to and we don't need that on- top. Oh! You know what? I'm going to do it. It's over.

Okay?

What's over? Come here.

The first time I ever saw her face- was...

He passed for a broken heart.

(Falling to the floor with a thud.)

Not without a miracle. Despite the daily massages, Daina's legs were thin stalky and pale, like something that would grow on a flower. Unfluctuating as her face had come to be overweight, the flesh of her arms looser and her legs continued to wither.

Close much...?

Interval

Deceiving my end

Part: 1

Here is something that only a short girl can do...

We- can kiss as I slide upon him as it goes out, and then that makes me able to reach his face to kiss, and I go back in and I have to leave the kiss to get it in me, so each time I go down, we part just for me to come to him to meet his waiting kiss, I have my hand under his head, and I pull him into for the lip lock. Over and over until... and we let it all in- and make out for an hour or so.

Finally, today is the day that I am finally saying it. The day that I say for sure that I love Marcel, I am in love with that boy. Sometimes, I reflect that he knew this all along. That they would laugh in my face if I would say it, to him in front of them.

He is- One of the most amazing things that can happen is finding someone who sees everything you are and won't let you be anything less. They see the potential for you. They see endless possibilities. And through their eyes, you start to see yourself the same way. As someone who matters.

As someone who can make a difference in this world. If you're lucky enough to find this person, never let them go.' 'Hey,' he says, surprised. 'You're not going to sit with me?' I try to keep walking down the aisle, but he grabs my arm. Are you kidding me?

You have to sit with me.' He looks around to see if anybody's listening.

'You're my girlfriend.' I shake him off. 'We're breaking up soon, aren't we? We might as well make it look more realistic.' When I slide into the seat next to her, Chris is shaking her head at me. 'What? I couldn't just let you sit alone. You came here for me, after all.' I open up my backpack and show her the snacks. 'See? I bought your favorite things. What do you want to eat first? Gummies or sugar or sugar?'

'It's barely even morning,' she grouses. Then: 'Hand me the gummies.'

Smiling, I rip open the bag for her. 'Have as much as you want.' I stop smiling when I see him get on the bus and sit down in the seat next to me, he wants to be.

'You did that to him,' 'For you!' Which isn't true, not really. I think maybe I'm just tired of all this. This in-between-ness of being somebody's girlfriend but not really. He stretches. But- 'You can never wholly know anyone, no matter how well you think you do. There will always be some truth about them you don't ever get to know.' I stuff a gummy into my mouth and chew, and swallow too hard. I watch Maggie whisper something in Lizzie's ear, and Marcel falls asleep right away just like she said, his head on my shoulder. It's implausible how you can affect someone else so deeply and never know.

Two days before my death- school trip.

(Remembering as he sleeps)

Listen to him and the music in my one ear. Head on my shoulder I say I love you; I recall that- 'I enjoyed the hot tub moments.' 'I always do- flashback.' I'm shaking.

Is it true?

I love him!

Things don't get better just because you want them to. The unwise thing about anger is how people hurt you, and then you let them keep hurting you by being angry about how they originally hurt you. It's a vicious cycle... Could he be right? It's interesting how something that comes so easily to one person can be so impossible for someone else, no one can be everything you want them to be.

The physical attraction that strong is addictive.

As well as knowing what kind of magic isn't just a fantasy makes me want to find it again. But what about being with someone who makes me a better person? What about sharing my life with someone who adores me as much as I adore him, whom I can always count on, who benefits me find my way when- I'm lost? I want deeper connections with the people around me. I need to reach out more. For the reason that not everyone leaves. Every so often if you reach out, the person you're trying to reach will be right there waiting.

The past doesn't just disappear after it's happened or was it happening to me for you to see? Sometimes amid all your boy drama, you just need a cupcake... like I would love to eat one with him now, both biting at the same time kissing getting on our nose and oddly like that off. He licked me... so- yeah. It's up to me to create the life I want. He never gives up on who I am or who I could be. He doesn't run away when things get complicated.

Now that I know where this life is going, it's time to decide how I'll get there.

Just when it seems like life is getting good, something always has to come along and ruin it, waiting for my real life to start is no excuse to waste the life I have right now. One of the most amazing things that can happen is finding someone who sees everything you are and won't let you be anything less. They see the potential for you. They see endless possibilities. And through their eyes, you start to see yourself the same way. As someone who can make a difference in this world. If you're lucky enough to find that person, never let them go.

It used to be extremely common for families to have two parents. They stayed together because that's what all the other parents did. Now there are so many options, so many different ways to be a family. So many ways to rip a family apart. But maybe those things are like background noise if you're from here.

Maybe you have to experience this as a whole new place to appreciate it as I do. The only person I can count on is myself. It's up to me to create the life I want. I can't blame my parents or him or her or she or anyone else for the way things are... I just never stopped believing that what I wanted could be real, seriously, if we stayed inside the lines on everything we're supposed to be doing, we wouldn't get anything done. Know what I mean?

~*~

When I open my back door, Marcel is holding his phone over his head playing ‘Stay with me he put lyrics to my piano.’

‘Happy anniversary,’ he says.

‘You remembered!’ I’ve been wondering if he was going to remember that our first date was one month ago today. He didn’t say anything at school.

So, I didn’t say anything, either. I didn’t want to come off like a total spaz over being together for a month.

Now I’m so happy I didn’t ruin his surprise. I had no idea he was organization this when he said he wanted to come over tonight. He comes in and kisses me. Still holding his phone over his head. Still playing ‘In Your Eyes.’

‘You imperative,’ I tell him.

‘I don’t rule yet. Maybe I’ll rule when we get to where I’m taking you to celebrate. If you like what we’re doing.’

‘You didn’t have to do all this.’

Marcel hugs me tight. ‘I wanted to make tonight special.’

It’s hard to believe we’ve only been together for one month now. It feels like I’ve known him forever.

In the present day at lunch, we were talking about last Saturday night. We were driving around in Ethan’s car with no destination in mind. I was supposed to be home in half an hour.

But I was desperately trying to block out the harsh reality of time.

The sex- all the first week...

‘And we got the motel room for safety. You were tired, and we were worried you might fall asleep at the wheel.’ ‘Exactly. Your mom would buy that, right?’

‘As much as your mom would.’ We smirked at each other. Both moms would see right through that scam. He reached into my lap and held my hand. This was always the worst part of the night when we knew we'd have to go home soon. I wanted to drive around all night. Holding hands in my lap or his. Singing along to the radio. Getting lost down side streets to make out. We're both shocked by how much alone time we want together. Neither of us has ever felt this way before.

Ethan loves having lots of people around. He's a classic extrovert like me. We're both into going out and meeting new people. But nothing compares to how happy I am when it's just the two of us. A Pearl Jam or maybe STP or some rock song. Ethan started laughing.

'Could you repeat that?' I asked.

'Incomprehensible situation.'

'Try me.'

'How are you so breathtaking?'

'How are you so tremendous?'

'We're both geeks at heart. That makes us both splendid and cute-z.'

'I love our unintelligible awesomeness.' 'I love everything about you.'

Stay with me! He said as I look back on it. He made me melt when he said that. I was melting right into the passenger seat. My bones went soft and my heart swelled, and I couldn't imagine ever feeling happier than I did right that second. I knew he could see how much I loved him when he looked into my eyes. We haven't said 'I love you!' to each other yet or did I want to confess that to him or me. But we both know it's there.

That night in his car feels like it was three weeks ago. Nevertheless, it was only three days ago. When we're together, time dilates and stretches in mysterious ways. It's like we enter our private universe. Expressly when we are alone.

Specifically, when we're making out.

When he is touching me and kissing me and were pressed against each other in bed, I never want it to end. I wish we could stay together forever. We usually go to my apartment after school. One minute it will be forever and never-ending to me, and we'll have three whole hours until he has to be home for dinner.

The next thing we know it's after seven. How do hours pass in a space of time that feels like minutes or forever?

~*~

I suspect back in the room, I change into my blarney nighty and put on thick socks. I don't even go wash up. I just turn out the lights and crawl into bed. I can't fall asleep, though. Every time I close my eyes, I see his face. How dare he say I need to grow up? What does he know about anything? As if he's so mature!

But... is he right about me? Do I only like the boys I can never have? I've always known Marcel was out of my reach, yet not out of my hands. I've always known he didn't belong to me.

But tonight, he said he liked me. The thing I've been in suspense for, he said it. So why didn't I just tell him I liked him hindmost when I had the chance? Because I do. I like him back.

Of course, I do. What girl would not fall to him, the most handsome boy of all the handsome boys?

Now that I know him, I know he's so much more than that. I don't want to be afraid anymore. I want to be brave. I want life to start fashionably. I want to fall in love and I want a boy to fall in love with me back. Formerly I can talk myself out of it, I put on my puffy coat, slip my keycard in my pocket, and head off to the hot tub.

THE HOT TUB IS OVERDUE the foremost cottage, tucked in the woods on a wooden platform. On the way there, I run into kids with wet hair who are on their way back to their rooms before the time limit set by mom. Curfew is at eleven for me, and it's already ten fifty-five. There's not much time left.

~*~

Kellie- I hope Ray still out there. I don't want to lose my nerve. So, I quicken my pace and that's when I spot him, alone in the hot tub, his head tipped back with his eyes closed. Time is going to pass even faster tonight. I have no idea where Ethan's taking me to celebrate. But something tells me it's going to be romantic. 'In Your Eyes' finishes playing. Ethan smiles in that way he has where his eyes sparkle like I'm the most important person to him. 'Are you prepared?' he asks. Why does it seem like he's asking about more than just tonight? Ethan won't give me any hints in his car. He even takes a few random turns to fake me out.

Our small town is already shut down for the night. The river, piers, and boats all seem like they're sleeping. I'm surprised when we end up at his house. 'Didn't see that coming,' I say. 'You have no idea... What I go through' No one's home at Ray's house. We go up to his room. Which is filled with candles. Candles in different shapes, sizes, and colors are on every available surface. Candles are on the windowsills, the dresser, the desk, the shelves, and the night table. There are even some big pillar candles clustered in a corner on the floor. He turns the lights off. He starts lighting candles.

'Have a seat,' he says.

'This might take a while.'

(Romanic only for her) I lie back on

Ray's big bed and watches him light the candles. I love watching him. One time he fell asleep in my room. I watched him for almost an hour, memorizing the slope of his nose, the curves of his cheeks, and the shape of his lips. He is the gorgeous boy I've ever seen. And he picked me... over them all and even my sis that he freaked first, and I have to live with that. How did I get so lucky? After the lights the last candle, Ray grabs his I- Pod.

He lies down next to me. Then he puts one earbud in my ear and the other in his. 'Thanks again for the song last night, you know I wanted it- and you too' he says. 'I loved it.' where my I love you, I asked him for it and got love yah! I was so nervous about sending Ray 'Everything' by Lifehouse.

I have had that song on repeat ever since the day Ethan first asked me out.

To me, it's Ray's love song for us. It sounds like him. It feels like him. I love losing myself in the sound of him. I'm so deep in the love haze, I can't remember what I used to think about before Ray. Last night I was suddenly inspired to share the song with him. The message I wrote with it said that he's all I want. He's all I need.

What we have is amazing.

The second I sent the song, I worried that it was too much. The last thing I want to do is scare him away. Nevertheless, he isn't a representative boy. He doesn't get freaked out by strong emotions. And he's so romantic. 'Your song inspired me to find one for you,' Ethan says.

Haunting, resonant music starts playing in our earbuds. 'You're the Inspiration' 'Their music is beautiful. Just like you.' Melting- On- The bed.

'I don't have the words to tell you how I feel about you. So, I found a song in another language to do it for me. I read that it's about two people falling in love. How they spend the day together walking around downtown and enjoying being in their world where they understand each other better than anyone ever has before.

It's called 'An all right Start.'" I have to know its love- before I fall!

'You were being sweet. You're the sweetest girl I've ever known.'

More than your sister, more the 100 girls of the past too. You're 101 and that right... so right for me.

'You always out- romantic me. I thought I was being all sweet sending you everything. You're like, 'I had to go to a whole other philological to tell you how I feel!' I put my head on his chest, breathing with him and listening to the music. Ethan slides his fingers through my hair over and over.

'Excellent,' Ray says.

'Yeah- yepper?'

'I love you- baby-love.'

~*~

I lift my head to look at him. He glows in the candlelight. Just looking at him takes my breath away. 'I love you, too,' I tell him. Say it- say it- say it I was thinking over and over- I do this for you. I more that way... (She more into her then he is her.)

How could it be any better than this? 'Hi,' I say, and my voice resonances into the woods. His eyes fly open. Nervously, he looks over my shoulder.

'Liv- Jean! What are you doing out here?' 'I came to see you,' I say, and my breath comes out in white puffs. I start taking off my boots and socks. My hands are shaking, and not because it's cold. I'm nervous. 'Uh... what are you doing?' Marcel's looking at me like I'm senseless.

~*~

‘I’m getting in!’ Shivering, I unzip my puffy coat and set it on the bench. Steam is rising out of the water. I dip my feet in and sit down on the edge of the hot tub. It’s hotter than a bath, but it feels nice. Marcel’s still watching me warily.

My heart is sprinting out of control and it’s difficult to look him in the eyes. I’ve never been so scared in my life. ‘That thing you brought up earlier... you caught me off guard, so I didn’t know what to say. But ... well, I like you too.’ It comes out so fumbling and uncertain, and I wish I could start over and say it smoothly and confidently. I try again, louder. ‘I like it! Silly!

He blinks, and he looks so young all of a sudden. ‘I don’t understand you girls. I think I have you figured out, and then- and then... then, I hold my breath as I wait for him to speak. I’m so nervous; I keep swallowing soft and hard, and it sounds loud to my ears. Even my breathing sounds loud, even my heartbeat.

His pupils are dilated he’s looking at me so hard. He’s staring at me like he’s never seen me before. ‘As well as then I do not know.’

I think I stop breathing when I hear him say ‘I don’t know.’ Did I screw things up that badly that now he doesn’t know? It can’t be over, not when I finally found my courage. I can’t let it be.

My heart is pounding like a million trillion beats a minute as I scoot closer to him. I bend my head down and press my lips against his, and I feel his jars some in surprise. Besides, then he’s kissing me back, openmouthed, soft-tipped kissing me back, and at first, I’m nervous, but then he puts his hand on the back of my head, and he reassuringly strokes my hair, and I’m not so nervous anymore. It’s a good thing I’m sitting down on this ledge because I am weak in the knees. He pulls me into the water so I’m sitting in the hot tub too, and my nightgown is soaked now but I don’t care. I don’t care about anything. I never knew kissing could be this awesome.

My arms are at my sides, so the Jets won’t make my skirt fly up. Marcel’s holding my face in his hands, kissing me. ‘Are you okay?’ he whispers. His voice is different: it’s ragged and imperative and susceptible somehow. He doesn’t sound like he and I know; he is not smooth or bored or amused.

The way he's looking at me right now, I know he would do anything I asked, and that's a strange and powerful feeling. I wind my arms around his neck. I like the smell of chlorine on his skin. He smells like pool, and summer, and vacations. It's not like in the movies. It's better because it's real. 'Touch my hair again,' I tell him, and the corners of his mouth turn up. I lean into him and kiss him.

He starts to run his fingers through my hair, and it feels, so nice I can't think straight.

It's better than getting my hair washed at the salon. I move my hands down his back and along his spine, and he shivers and pulls me closer. A boy's back feels so different than a girl's back more muscular, more solid somehow. In between kisses, he says, 'It's a past curfew. We should go back inside.'

'I don't want to,' I say. All I want is to stay and be here, with him, at this moment. 'Me either, but I don't want you to get in trouble,' Ray says. He looks worried, which is so sweet.

Softly, I touch his cheek with the back of my hand. It's smooth. I could look at his face for hours, it's so beautiful- oh so- and lovely. Then I stand up, and immediately I'm shivering. I start wringing the water out of my nightgown, and he jumps out of the hot tub and gets his towel, which he wraps around my shoulders. Then he gives me his hand and I step out, teeth chattering. He starts drying me off with the towel, my arms, and my legs. I sit down to put on my socks and boots.

He puts my coat on me last. He zips me right in. Then we run back inside the lodge. Beforehand he goes to the boys' side and I go to the girls' side, I kiss him one more time and I feel like I'm flying.

Part: 2

Butt up in the air pic! ≈ Past remembers of Karly... ≈

WHEN I SEE he is as the bus the next morning, he's standing around with all his lacrosse friends, and at first, I feel shy and nervous, but then he sees me, and his face breaks into a grin. 'He says, so I go to him and he throws my tote over his shoulder. In my ear he says, 'You're sitting with me, right?'

I nod and look up sweet wetly I am so short next to him that his hip is where my face is- I don't have to get on my knee's girls! As we make our way onto the bus, somebody wolf whistles. It seems like people are staring at us, and at first, I think it's just my imagination, but then I see Genevieve look right at me and whisper to Emily Assbaum. It sends a chill down my spine.

'Genevieve keeps staring at me,' I whisper to Marcel.

'It's because you're so adorably quirky,' he says, and he rests his hands on my shoulders and kisses me on the cheek, and I forget all about Genevieve.

Ray and I sit in the middle of the bus with Gabe and the lacrosse guys. I wave to Tom, so she'll sit with us, but she's cozier with Chad Dickhard. I haven't had a chance to tell her about last night. When I got back to the room, she was already asleep. This morning, we both overslept and there wasn't time. I'll tell her all about it later. But, for now, it's kind of nice that Ray and I are the only ones who know about it. The way down the mountain, I share my sweet sugary sticks with the boys and we play a heated round of Uno, which I also bought. An hour into the trip, we stop at a rest-stop dinner for breakfast. I eat a cinnamon bun, and under the table Ray, and I hold hands.

~*~

I go to use the bathroom, and there is Genevieve, alone, applying lip gloss with a little brush. I step into the stall to pee and hope she'll be gone by the time I come out, but she's still there. I wash my hands quickly, and then she says, 'Did you know that when we were kids, I used to wish I was you?'

I freeze...

Genevieve snaps her compact shut. 'I used to wish your dad was my dad and Margot and Kitty were my sisters. I loved coming over to your house. I would hope and pray that you would invite me to the sleepover.'

Part: 3

(Us- in music trips and class)

'What key is this in?' he asks.

'B- Flat,' I tell him sweetly.

‘My pages are messed up.’ I make some notations on his sheet music with a pencil. ‘Let’s hit it,’ Tom says from behind the drums. Stefan is only happy when he’s behind the drums.

Tom, Killie, and Jenna furer’s are Marcel’s bandmates. Those guys’ high school days are behind them.

Now they’re working random jobs while waiting for the band to get mega-famous. Their band is Invincible. Marcel plays bass and Seath rocks the keyboard. Along with his best friend, Megan, these guys our closest...

~*~

Shy- I hated being at home with my dad.’ Haltingly, I say, ‘I-I didn’t know that. I used to like going to your house because your mom was so nice to me.’

‘She liked you,’ Maddie says.

I screw up all my courage and I ask, ‘So why did you stop being friends with me?’

Maddie narrows her eyes at me.

‘You don’t know?’

‘No!’

‘You kissed Ray that day at my house in seventh grade. You knew I liked him, but you kissed him anyway.’ I recoil, and she remains. ‘I always knew your goody-goody act was fake. It’s no wonder you and my cousin are BFF’s now. Although at least Chad owns her sluttiness. She doesn’t put on an act.’

My whole body goes rigid. ‘What are you talking about?’

She laughs, and it’s chilling how happy she sounds. That’s when I know I’m already dead. I brace myself for whatever mean thing will come out of her mouth, but even still I’m not ready for what comes next.

Part: 4

Video- of my shows- and there over 50 of them all online forever, and 10 pages of me need dripping to come from my puss, with those kinds of pics!

Karly- 'I'm talking about how you and Marcel had full-on sex in the hot tub last night.' My mind goes completely blank. I might even blackout for a second. I can feel myself sway on my feet. Somebody comes quickly with the smelling salts; I'm about to faint. My head is swimming. 'Who told you that?' I choke out. 'Who said that?' Maddie tilts her head to the side.

'Everybody?'

'But then again... we didn't.'

'I'm sorry, but I think it's disgusting. I mean, sex in a hot tub- a public hot tub- is just ...' She shudders. 'God only knows what kind of stuff is floating around in there now.

Families use that hot tub, Lara Jean. There could be a family in there right now.'

Tears are spiking my eyes. 'All we did was a kiss. I don't know why people would even say that.'

'Um, because Marcel telling them you did?'

My whole body goes cold. It's not true. There's no way that's true.

'All the guys think he's a God because he got sweet little Lara Jean Covey to give it up in the hot tub. Just so you know, the only reason Marcel even dated you was to make me jealous.

His ego couldn't take the fact that I dumped him for an older guy. He was using you. If he got free sex out of it, all the better. But he still came running whenever I called.

That's because he loves me. He will never love another girl as much as he loves me.' Whatever she sees in my face must please her, because she smiles. 'Now that Blake and I are done- well, I guess we'll see, won't we?' I stand there mute and numb as she fluffs her hair in the mirror.

'But don't worry. Now that you're a slut, I'm sure you'll have plenty of guys who'll want to date you. For a night.'

I flee. I run out of the ladies' room and out the doors, back onto the bus, and I cry.

PEOPLE ARE STARTING TO FILE back on the bus. I can feel their eyes on me, so I keep my head turned toward the window. I run my finger along the edge of the foggy glass. The window is cold, so it leaves a trail.

Chad slides in next to me. In a low voice, she says, 'Um, I just heard something cray-cray.' Uninterestingly I say, 'What did you hear? That Marcel and I had sex in the hot tub last night?'

'Oh my God! Yeah! Are you okay?'

My chest feels tight. If I get a good breath, I am going to start crying again, I know it.

I close my eyes. 'We didn't have sex. Who told you that?'

'Marcel.' -making his way down the aisle. He stops at our seat. 'Hey, why didn't you come back to the table? Is everything okay?' Marcel is looming over the seat, looking at me with concerned eyes.

In a quiet voice, I say, 'Everybody's saying how we had sex in the tub.'

He groans. 'People need to mind their own business.' He doesn't sound surprised, not at all.

'So, you already knew?'

'Some of the guys were asking me about it this morning.'

'But- where did they even get that idea?' I feel like I'm going to be sick.

He shrugs. 'I don't know, maybe somebody saw us. What does it even matter? It's not true.'

I fasten my lips together tight. I can't cry right now, because if I start, I'll never be able to stop. I will cry the whole way home, and everyone will see, and I can't have that. I fix my observation somewhere over his slick shoulder.

'I don't get it. Why are you mad at me?' He's still confused.

People are starting to bottleneck behind Marcel. They need to get to their seats. 'People are waiting for you,' I say.

He says, 'Chad, can I have my chair here?' Chris looks at me and I shake my head.

Part: 5

A little hair on my puss- yet it's down on my dildo, that sucked to a book, so I can thrill ride it hard, till I scream come, for all you boys, and you knotty girls too.

≈ Past remembers of Karly's sis... ≈

'It's my seat now, D*ckweed,' she says.

'Come on, Liv Jean,' he is saying, touching my shoulder.

I jerk away from him and his mouth drops open. People are looking at us and whispering and snickering.

He glances over his shoulder, his face red. Then he finally makes his way down the aisle.

'Are you okay?' Chad asks.

I can feel my eyes welling up. 'No. Not really.'

She sighs. 'It's not fair for the girl. Guys have it easy. I'm sure they were all acknowledging him, pounding him on the back for being such a stud.' Snuffling, I say, 'Do you think he's the one who told folks?'

'Who knows?'

A tear trickles down to my cheek and Chad wipes it away with her sweater sleeve. 'It might not have been him. But it doesn't matter, Liv- Jean, because even if he didn't encourage all the talk, I doubt he discouraged it, if you know what I'm saying.'

I shake my head.

'What I'm saying is, I'm sure he denied it- with a shit-eating grin on his face. That's how guys like Marcel are. They love to look like the man, have all the other guys look up to them.' Brattie says, 'They care more about their reputation than yours.' She shakes her head. 'But what's done is done. You've just got to hold your head up and act like you don't give a shit.' I nod, but more tears leak out.

‘I’m telling you; he isn’t worth it. Let Gen have him.’ Chris tousles my hair.

‘What else can you do, kid?’

Olivia comes on board last. I quickly straighten up and wipe my eyes and brace myself. But she doesn’t go directly to her seat. She stops at Beth Morgan’s seat and whispers something in her ear. Beth gasps and turns in her seat- and looks right at me.

OMG- Oh my God- my God...

Chad and I watch as Genevieve goes from seat to seat.

‘B*tch,’ Chad respires.

Tears burn my eyes. ‘I’m just going to go to sleep now,’ and I rest my head on Chad’s shoulder, and I cry. She keeps her arm tight around me.

Part: 6

Photo of my boobs ≈ Past remembers of Karly sis... ≈ MAGGIE AND KILLIE PICK ME up from school. They ask me how the trip was if I stayed on the slope all day. I try to be upbeat; I even make up a story about how I went down a blue circle slope. Softly SHE asks, ‘Is everything okay?’

I pause- to the moments within. Maggie always knows when I’m not significant in saying all the truth. ‘Yeah. I’m just tired. Chad and I stayed up late talking.’

‘Take a nap when we get home,’ Maggie’s recommends.

My phone buzzes and I look down at it. A text from Marcel.

Can we talk?

I turn off my phone. ‘I think maybe I’ll just sleep right through Christmas break,’ I say. Thank God and Jesus for Christmas break. At least I have ten days before I have to go back to school and face everyone. Maybe I’ll just never go back. Maybe I can convince Daddy to homeschool me.

When Daddy and Killie go to bed, Margot and I wrap presents in the living room. Middle- wrap, Maggie decides that we should have recital party the day after Christmas. I’d hoped she’d forgotten all about her grand idea to have recital party, but Margot’s memory has always been killer. 'It will is a post- Christmas, Pre- New Year's Eve party,' she says, tying a bow on one of Kitty's presents from Daddy.

~*~

'It's too last-minute,' I say, carefully cutting a sheet of rocking horse wrapping paper. I'm being extra careful because I want to save a strip of it for a background page in Maggie's scrapbook, which is nearly done. 'No one will come.'

'Yes, they will! We haven't had one in ages; tons of people used to come.' She gets up and starts pulling down Mommy's old cookbooks and stacking them on the coffee table.

'Don't be a Grinch. I think this should be a tradition that we bring back for Kellie's sake.' I cut off a strip of fat green ribbon. Maybe this party will help me take my mind off things. 'Find that Mediterranean chicken dish Mommy used to make. With the honey yogurt dip.'

'Yes! And remember the caviar dip? People love the caviar dip. We have to make that, too. Should we do cheese straws or cheese puffs?'

'Cheese puffs,' I say. Margot's so excited about it that even in my current state of self-pity, I can't begrudge her. She gets a pen and paper from the kitchen and starts writing things down. 'So, we said the chicken dish, caviar dip, cheese puffs, punch ... We can bake some cookies or brownies. We'll invite all the neighbors- Josh and his parents, the Shahs, Ms. Child.

Who of your friends do you want to invite? Chad?'

I shake my head. 'Chad is visiting Becca Mitchel her relatives in the upper parts of the state. around this time...

Too quickly I say, 'No. Nothing happened.'

'I think he might be going out of town too.' I can tell Maggie he doesn't believe me, but she doesn't press me further.

(Flashback)

Kellie- She sends the invites out that night, and right away there are five yeses. In the comments section Aunt-e -M. (not our real aunt, but one of Mommy's best friends) writes, Maggie, I can't wait to hear you and dad sing 'Baby, It's Cold Outside!' Another recital party tradition. Maggie and Daddy intone 'Baby, It's Cold Outside' and I am always commissioned to sing 'Santa Baby.' I used to do it lying on top of the piano with my mom's high heels on and our grandma's fox stole. Not this year. No way.

When Maggie tries to get me to go with her and Killie to deliver our cookie baskets to the nationals the next day, I beg off and say I'm tired. I go up to my room to put the finishing touches on Maggie's scrapbook and listen to only the slow songs from Dirty Dancing, and I keep checking my phone to see if Ray texted again.

He hasn't, but Ray has. I heard what happened. Are you okay? So even Josh knows? He's not even in our grade. Does the whole school know? I write back, it isn't true, and he writes back, you don't have to tell me- I didn't believe it for a second, which makes me feel weepy. He and Maggie have hung out once since she's been home, but they haven't taken that DC trip Josh mentioned. It's probably for the best if I go ahead and take the Josh and- Maggie page out of the scrapbook.

I stay up late just in case Ray texts again. I think to myself, if he calls or texts me tonight, I'll know he's thinking about me too and maybe I'll forgive him.

But he doesn't text or calls. around three a.m. I throw away Marcel's notes. I delete the picture of him from my phone; I delete his number. I think that if I just delete him enough, it will be like none of it ever happened and my heart won't hurt so badly.

Part: 7

Kelly- Photo of me using my butt plug, and masturbating over 6 times!

≈ Past remembers of Karly little sister... ≈ Video online forever- CHRISTMAS MORNING, KITTY WAKES Us, Everyone, while it is still- um- dark out, which is her tradition, and Daddy makes waffles, which is his tradition.

We only ever eat waffles on Christmas, for the reason that we all agree it's too much trouble to lug the waffle iron out and clean it and store it back on the cabinet top shelf where we keep it. And anyway, it makes waffles more of a special occasion this way.

We take turns opening presents to make it last longer. I give Maggie her scarf, and the scrapbook, which she loves. She pores over every page, screaming over my handiwork, marveling over my font choices and paper scraps. Hugging it to her chest, she says, 'This is the perfect gift,' and I feel like all the tension and bad feelings between us evaporate into nothingness. Maggie's gift to me is a pale pink cashmere sweater from Scotland.

I try it on over my nightgown and it's so soft and luxurious. Killie's present from Maggie is an art set with oil pastels and watercolors and special markers, which makes Killie squeal like a piglet. In return, Kitty gives her socks with monkeys on them. I give Killie a new basket for her bike and the ant farm she asked for months ago, and Killie gives me a book on knitting. 'So, you can get better,' she says.

The three of us pitched in for Daddy's present, a thick Scandinavian pullover that makes him look like an ice fisherman. It's a little too big, but Daddy insists he likes it that way. He gives Maggie a fancy new e-reader, Kitty a bike helmet with her name on it, Kellie and me a gift certificate to Oliva Grandin. 'I wanted to get you that locket necklace you're always looking at, but it was gone,' he says. 'But I bet you will find something else you like just as much.' I jump up and throw my arms around him. I feel like I could cry.

Santa, aka Daddy, brings silly gifts like sacks of coal and water guns with disappearing ink inside, and also practical things like athletic socks and printer ink and my favorite kind of pens- I guess Santa shops at Costco too. Santa- got Killie a new dildo too, thanks to me!

When we're done the opening presents, I can tell Kitty is disappointed there is no puppy, but she doesn't say anything. I pull her into my arms and whisper to her, 'There's always your birthday next month,' and she nods.

Daddy goes to see if the waffle iron is hot and the doorbell rings. 'Kellie, could you get that?' He calls from the pantry.

Kellie goes to the door, and seconds later we hear her high-pitched scream. Maggie and I leap up and run to the door, and right there on the welcome mat is a basket with a biscuit colored puppy in it and a ribbon around its neck. We all start jumping up and down and high-pitched yell.

Kellie scoops the puppy up in her arms and runs into the living room with it, where Daddy stands grinning. 'Daddy- Daddy- Daddy- Daddy!' she cries. 'Thank you thank you thank you!' I got a goofy small for what I got here and a run me over a hug.

According to Daddy, he picked the puppy up from the animal shelter two nights ago, and our neighbor Ms. Rothschild has been hiding him in her house. It's a boy, by the way, we figure that out pretty quick since he pees all over the kitchen floor.

Part: 8

Karly- Photo of me showing my ass and spread puss-puss!

≈ Past remembers of Karly little sister... ≈

'I always wanted a dog with bangs,' I say, cuddling him to my cheek.

'What should we name him?'

Maggie asks. We all look to Killie, who chews on her bottom lip in a contemplative way.

'I don't know,' she says.

'How about Sandy?' I suggest.

Killie sneers. 'Unoriginal.'

'No thanks,' Kitty says. Cocking her head, she says, 'What about Jenny?'

'Jenny,' Daddy repeats. 'I like it, yet she is not here so do not say...' Maggie nods. 'It has a nice ring to it... yeah moving on.'

'What's her full name?' I ask, setting him down on the floor.

She claps her hands and said it, wagging like mad.

I only check my phone once to see if Marcel called. And he didn't.

THE MORNING OF THE PART- I've come downstairs after ten, and they've been working for hours.

~*~

Kelly- young Holladay's:

'Hello, the toilet needed to be scrubbed anyway!

Besides, it'll all be worth it. We haven't done a recital party in so long.'

She slides a cookie sheet into the oven. ‘Daddy, I’m going to need you to make a run to the store soon. We’re out of sour cream and we need a big bag of ice.’

‘Aye, aye, Captain,’ our dad says.

The only one of us Margot doesn’t put to work is Jamie Fox-Pickle, who is taking a nap under the Christmas tree.

I’m wearing a red-and-green plaid bow tie with a white button-down and a tartan skirt. I read on a fashion blog that mixing plaids is a thing. I go to Kitty’s room to beg her to give me a braid crown, and she curls her lip at me and says, ‘That’s not very sexy.’

I frown... ‘Excuse me? I wasn’t trying to look sexy! I was trying to look festive.’

Hmm... We might need to put some parental controls on the TV.

Killie goes to my closet and pulls out my red off-the-shoulder knit dress with the swishy skirt. ‘Wear this. It’s still Christmassy but less elf-costume.’

‘Fine, but I’m putting my candy cane pin on it.’

‘Fine, you can wear the pin. But leave your hair down. No braid.’ I give her my best sad pouty face, but Killie shakes her head. ‘I’ll curl the ends to give it somebody, but no braids of any kind.’ I plug in the curling iron and sit on the floor with Jamie in my lap, and Kitty sits on the bed and sections my hair off. She wraps my hair around the barrel like a real pro.

The party?’ She asks me.

‘I’m not sure,’ I say.

‘What about Marcel?’

‘He’s not coming,’ I say.

‘Why not?’

‘He just can’t,’ I tell her.

Maggie’s at the piano playing ‘Blue Christmas,’ and our old piano sitting next to her singing along. Across the room, Daddy’s showing off a new cactus to about her divorce when Marcel walks in wearing a green sweater with a button-down shirt underneath, carrying a Christmas tin. I almost choke on my punch.

Kitty spots him when I do. 'You came!' she cries. She runs right into his arms, and he puts down the cookie tin and picks her up and throws her around. When he sets her down, she takes him by the hand and over to the buffet table, where I'm busying myself rearranging the cookie plate.

'Look what Marcel brought,' she says, pushing him forward. He hands me the cookie tin. 'Here. Fruitcake cookies my mom made.' 'What are you doing here?' I whisper accusingly. 'The kid invited me.' He jerks his head toward Kellie, who has conveniently run back over to the puppy. Marcel is standing up now, looking over at us with a frown on his face.

'We need to talk.'

So now he wants to talk. Well, too late. 'We don't have anything to talk about.'

Marcel takes me by the elbow and I try to shake him off, but he won't let go. He steers me into the kitchen. 'I want you to make up an excuse to Kellie and leave,' I say... 'And you can take your fruitcake cookies with you.'

'First, tell me why you're so pissed at me.'

'Because!' I burst out. 'Everyone is saying how we had sex in the hot tub and I'm a slut and you don't even care!'

'I told the guys we didn't!'

'Did you? Did you tell them that all we did was kiss and that's all we've ever done?' Marcel hesitates, and I go on. 'Or did you say, 'Guys, we didn't have sex in the hot tub,' wink-wink, nudge-nudge.'

Marcel glares at me. 'Give me a little more credit than that, Covey.'

'You're such a scumbag, Marcel.'

I spin around. There is Marcel, in the doorway, glaring at Marcel.

'It's your fault people are saying that crap about Lara Jean.' Marcel shakes his head in disgust. 'She'd never do that.'

‘Keep your voice down,’ I whisper, my eyes darting around. This is not happening right now. At recital party, with everyone, I have ever known my entire life in the next room.

Marcel’s jaw twitches. ‘This is a private conversation, Marcel, between me and my girlfriend. Why don’t you go play World of Warcraft or something? Or maybe there’s a Godfather marathon on TV.’

‘Freak you,’ Marcel says. I gasp. To me, Marcel says, ‘Liv, Jean, this is exactly what I’ve been trying to protect you from. He’s not good enough for you. He’s only bringing you down.’ Beside me, Marcel stiffens. ‘Get over it! She doesn’t like you anymore. It’s over. Move on.’

‘You have no idea what you’re talking about,’ Marcel says. ‘Whatever, dude. She told me you tried to kiss her. You try that again, and I’m kicking your ass.’

Marcel lets out a short laugh.

‘Go ahead.’

Panic rises in my chest as Marcel moves toward Marcel with purpose. I pull Marcel’s arm back. ‘Stop it!’ That’s when I see her. Margot, standing a few feet behind Marcel, her hand to her mouth. The piano music has stopped, the world has stopped spinning because Maggie has heard the whole thing.

‘It’s not true, is it? Please tell me it’s not true.’

I open and close my mouth. I don’t have to say anything because she already knows.

Maggie who knows me so well. ‘How could you?’ she asks, and her voice trembles. The hurt in her eyes makes me want to die. I’ve never seen that look in her eyes before.

‘Margot,’ Marcel begins, and she shakes her head and backs away. ‘Get out,’ she says, her voice breaking. Then she looks at me. ‘You’re my sister.

You’re the person- I trust more than anybody.’

‘Go-go, wait-’ But she’s already gone. I hear her feet run up the stairs. I hear her door shut and not slam.

And then I burst into tears.

‘I’m so sorry,’ Marcel says to me. Forlornly, he says, ‘This is all my fault.’ He walks out of the back door.

Marcel moves to put his arms around me, but I stop him. ‘Can you just... can you just go?’

Hurt and surprise register on his face. ‘Sure, I can go,’ he says, and he walks out of the kitchen. I go to the bathroom, off the side of the kitchen, and sit on the toilet and cry. Someone knocks, and I stop crying and call out, ‘Just a minute or so.’

Then I get up and splash cold water on my face. My eyes are still red and puffy. I run water with a hand towel and I wet my face with it.

My mom used to do this for me when I was sick... She had put an ice-cold washcloth over my forehead, and she’d switch it out with a fresh one when it was not cold anymore. I wish my mom was here.

Part: 9

When I step back into the party, Maggie is sitting at the piano playing- ‘Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas,’ and I have my dad cornered on the couch. She’s throwing back champagne, and he has a mildly startled look on his face. As soon he sees me, my dad jumps off the couch and over to me. ‘Oh, thank God,’ he says. ‘Where’s Go-go? We haven’t done our number yet.’

‘She doesn’t feel well,’ I say.

‘Hm. I’ll go check on her.’

‘I think she just wants to be left alone.’

Daddy’s forehead creases.

‘Did she and Marcel fight? I just saw him leave.’

I swallow. ‘Maybe. I’ll go talk to her.’

He pats me on the shoulder.

‘You’re a good sister, honey.’

I force a smile. ‘Thank you, Daddy.’

I go upstairs, and Margot's bedroom door is locked. I stand outside it and ask, 'Can I come inside?' No answer.

'Please, Margot. Please just let me enlighten me...' Still nothing.

'I'm sorry. Maggie, I'm so sorry.

Please talk to me.'

I sit down outside my door and start to cry. My big sister knows how to hurt me best. Silence from her, being shut out by her, is the worst punishment she could conjure up. BEFORE MOMMY DIED, Maggie AND I were friends. We battled constantly, mostly for the reason that, I was always messing up something of hers- some game, some toy. Maggie had a doll she loved named Rochelle. Rochelle had silky auburn hair, and she wore glasses as Margot did.

Mommy and Daddy had given her to her for her sixth birthday. Maggie only doll. She adored her. I remember begging her to let me hold her, just for a second, but Margot always said no.

There was this one time, I had a cold, and I stayed home from school.

I crept into Margot's room and I took... She and I, played with her all afternoon, I pretended she and I were best friends. I got it into my head that, Rochelle's face was kind of plain; she would look better with lipstick on. It would be a favor too- her- if I made them more beautiful.

I got one of Mommy's lipsticks out of her bathroom drawer and I put some on her lips. Right away I knew it was a mistake. I'd drawn it on outside of her lip lines, she looked clownish, not sophisticated. So, then I tried to clean off the lipstick with toothpaste, but it only made her look like she had a mouth disease.

I hid under my blankets until Margot came home. When she found the state Rochelle was in, I heard her screech.

After Mommy died, we all had to realign ourselves. Everybody had new roles. She and I were no longer locked in battle because we both understood that Kellie was ours to take care of now. 'Look out for your sister,' Mommy was always saying. When she was alive, we did it begrudgingly. After she was gone, we did it because we wanted to. Days go by and still nothing. She looks through me, speaks to me only when necessary.

Part: 10

Kelly- Photo of me with my pink vibrates.

≈ Past remembrance of Karly little sister ≈

Kellie watches us with worried eyes. Daddy is bewildered and asks what's going on with us, but doesn't push me for an answer. There is a wall between us now, and I can feel her moving farther and farther away from me. Sisters are supposed to fight and make up because they are sisters and sisters always find their way back to each other. But the thing that scares me is that maybe we won't.

OUTSIDE MY WINDOW, SNOW IS falling in clumps that look like cotton.

The yard is starting to look like a cotton field. I hope it snows all day and all night. I hope it's a blizzard.

There's a knock at my door.

I lift my head from my pillow. 'Come in.'

My dad comes in and sits down at my desk. 'So,' he says, scratching his chin the way he does when he's uncomfortable. 'We need to talk.'

My stomach drops. I sit up and wrap my arms around my knees. 'Did Margot tell you?'

My dad clears his throat. 'She did.' I can't even look at him. 'This is awkward. I never had to do this with Margot, so...' He clears his throat again.

'You'd think I would be better at this since I'm a health professional. I'll just say that I think you're too young to be having sex, Liv, Jean- girls. I don't think you're ready yet.' He sounds like he's about to cry.

'Did- did Marcel pressure you in any way?'

I can feel all the blood rush to my face. 'Daddy, we didn't have sex.'

He nods, but I don't think he believes me. 'I'm your dad, so of course, I'd rather you wait until you're fifty, but...' He clears his throat again. 'I want you to be safe. I'm making an appointment with Dr. Vudeciez on Monday.'

I start to cry. 'I don't need an appointment because I'm not doing anything! I didn't have sex! Not in the hot tub or anyplace. Somebody made the whole thing up. You have to believe me.'

My dad has a pained expression on his face. 'Liv, Jean- girls, I know it's not easy to talk about this with a dad and not a mom. I wish your mom was here to navigate us through this.'

'I wish she was too because she'd believe me.' Tears are running down my cheeks. It's bad enough for strangers to think the worst of me, but I never thought my sister and dad would believe it.

'I'm sorry.' My dad puts his arms around me. 'I'm sorry. I do believe you. If you tell me you're not having sex, you're not having sex. I just don't want you to grow up too fast. When I look at you, you're still as young as Kellie to me. You're my little girl, Liv, Jean- girls.'

I sag against him. There's no place safer than my dad's arms. 'Everything's a mess. You don't trust me anymore; Marcel and I are broken up; Margot hates me.' 'I trust you. Of course, I trust you.'

And of course, you and Margot will make up like you always do. She was only worried about you; that's why she came to me.' No, it's not. She did it out of spite. It's her fault that Daddy thought that of me for even a second.

Daddy lifts my chin and wipes the tears off my face. 'You must like Marcel, huh?'

'No,' I sob. 'Maybe. I don't know.'

He tucks my hair behind my ears. 'Everything will work out.' There is a specific kind of fight you can only have with your sister. It's the kind where you say things you can't take back. You say them for the reason that you can't help but say them because you're so angry it's coming up your throat and out your eyes; you're so angry you can't see straight.

All you see is blood. As soon as Daddy leaves and I hear him go to his room to get ready for bed, I barge into Maggie's room without knocking.

Margot is at her desk on her laptop.

She looks up at me in surprise. Wiping my eyes, I say, 'You can be mad at me all you want, but you had no right to go to Daddy behind my back.'

Her voice is piano- string tight as she says, 'I didn't do that as revenge. I did it because you have no idea what you're doing, and if you're not careful, you're going to end up some sad teenage statistic.' Coldly, as if she is speaking to a stranger, Maggie continues. 'You've changed, Liv, Jenn- girls. I honestly don't even know who you are anymore.'

~*~

'Nope, you don't know me anymore, if you think for one second that I would have sex on a school trip! In a hot tub, in plain view of anybody who might happen to walk by? You must not know me at all!' And then I lay it down, the card I've been holding against her. 'Just because you had sex with Marcel, that doesn't mean I'm going to have sex with Marcel.'

Margot sucks in her breath.

'Lower your voice.'

I feel happy that I've wounded her too. I yell, 'Now that Daddy's already disappointed in me, he can't be disappointed in you, too, right?'

I whirl around to go back to my room, and Margot follows close behind me.

'Come back here!' She shouts.

'No!' I try to close my door in her face, but she wedges her foot inside.

'Get out!'

I lean my back against the door, but Margot is stronger than me. She pushes her way in and locks the door behind her.

She advances toward me and I backed away from her. There's a dangerous light in her eyes. She's the righteous one now. I can feel myself start to shrink, to cower. 'How did you know Marcel and I had sex, Lara Jean?

Did he tell you that himself while you two were going behind my back?' 'We never went behind your back! It wasn't like that.'

'Then what was it like?' She demands.

A sob escapes my throat. 'I liked him first. I liked him all that summer before ninth grade. I thought - thought he liked me back. But then one day you said you were dating, and so I just, I swallowed it. I wrote him a goodbye letter.' Maggie faces twists into a sneer. 'Do you seriously expect me to feel sorry for you know?'

'Nope. I'm just trying to explain what happened. I stopped liking him, I swear I did. I didn't think of him like that again, but then, after you left, I realized that deep down I still had feelings for him. And then my letter got sent and Marcel found out, so I started to pretend to date, Marcel...'

She shakes her head. 'Just stop. I don't want to hear it. I don't even know what you are talking about right now.'

'Marcel and I only kissed one time. Once. And it was a huge mistake, and I did not even want to do it in the first place! You're the one he loves, not me.'

She says, 'How can I believe anything you ever say to me now?'

'Because it's the truth.'

Trembling, I tell her, 'You have no idea the power you have over me. How much your opinion means to me? How much I look up to you.'

Part: 12

Kelly- 2 fingers in the hole, she is snap-chatting.

≈ Past remembers of Karly little sister... ≈

Margot's face screws up like a fist; she is holding back tears. 'You know what Mommy would always say to me?' She lifts her chin higher. 'Take care of your sisters.' So that's what I did. I've always tried to put you and Kellie first. Do you have any idea how hard it was being so far away from you guys? How lonely it was? All I wanted to do was come back home, but I couldn't because I have to be strong. I have to be' she struggles for breath, 'a good example. I can't be weak. I have to show you guys how to be brave.

~*~

Because – 'because Mommy isn't here to do it.'

Tears roll down my cheeks. 'I know. You don't have to tell me, Gogo.

I know how much you do for us.'

'But then I left, and it's like you didn't need me as much as I thought.' Her voice breaks.
'You were fine without me.'

'Only because you taught me everything!' I cry out.

Margot's face crushes like.

'I'm sorry,' I weep. 'I'm so sorry.'

'I needed you, Liv, Jenn- and girls.'

She takes one step toward me and

I take one toward her, and we fall into each other's arms, crying, and the relief I feel is immeasurable. We are sisters, and there's nothing she or I can ever say or do to change that.

Daddy knocks on the door. 'Girls?

Everything okay in there?'

We look at each other and together at the same time, we say, 'We're fine, Daddy.'

IT'S NEW YEAR'S EVE. New Year's Eve has always been a stay-at-home holiday for us. We make popcorn and drink sparkling cider, and at midnight we go outside to the backyard and light up sparklers.

Some of my friends from high school are having a party at a cabin in the woods, and she said she wasn't going to go, that she'd rather stay with us, but Kellie and I made her. I hope that Marcel is going too, and that they'll talk, and who knows what will happen. It's New Year's Eve, after all.

The night of new beginnings.

We sent Daddy to a party someone from the hospital is throwing. Kellie ironed his favorite button-down shirt and I picked the tie and we shoved him out the door. I think Grandma is right; it's not good to be alone.

'Why are you still sad?' Kellie asks me as I dump the popcorn into a bowl for us. We're in the kitchen; she's sitting on a stool at the breakfast bar with her legs dangling. The puppy is curled up like a centipede under her stool, gazing up at Kellie with hopeful eyes. 'You and Maggie made up. What's to be sad about?'

I'm about to deny being sad, but then I just sigh and say, 'I don't know.' Kellie grabs a handful of popcorn and drops a few kernels on the floor, which Jamie gobbles up. 'How can you not know?'

'Because sometimes you just feel sad and you can't explain it.'

Kellie cocks her head to the side.

'PMS?'

I count the days since my last period. 'No. It's not PMS. Just because a girl is sad, it doesn't mean it has anything to do with PMS.'

'Then why?' She presses.

'I don't know! Maybe I miss someone.'

'You miss Marcel?'

I hesitate. 'Marcel.' Despite everything, Marcel.

'So-o call him.'

'I can't.'

'Why not?'

I don't know how to answer her.

It's all so embarrassing, and I want to be someone she can look up to. But she's waiting, her little brow furrowed, and I know I have to tell her the truth.

‘Kellie, it was all fake. The whole thing. We were never really together. He never really liked me.’

Kellie wrinkles. ‘What do you mean it was fake?’

Sighing, I say, ‘It all started with those letters. Remember how my hatbox went missing?’ Kellie nods. ‘I had letters inside, letters I wrote to the boys I loved. They were supposed to be private; they were never supposed to be sent, but then somebody did, and everything turned into a mess.

Marcel got one, and Marcel got one, and I was just so humiliated. Marcel and I decided to pretend to date so I could save face in front of Marcel and he could make his ex-girlfriend jealous, and the whole thing just spun out of control.’ Kellie is biting her lip nervously. ‘Lara Jean - if I tell you something, you have to promise not to be mad.’

‘What? Just tell me.’

‘First promise.’

‘Okay, I promise I won’t be mad.’ Prickles are going up my spine.

In a rush, Kellie says, ‘I’m the one who sent the letters.’

‘What?’ I scream.

‘You promised you wouldn’t be mad!’

‘What?’ I scream again, but less loud. ‘Kellie, how could you do that to me?’

She hangs her head. ‘Because I was mad at you. You were teasing me about liking Marcel; you said I was going to name my dog after him. I was so mad at you.

So, when you were sleeping- I snuck into your room and stole your hatbox, and I read all your letters, and then I sent them. I regretted it right away, but it was too late.’

‘How did you even know about my letters?’ I yell...

She squints at me. ‘Because I go through your stuff sometimes when you’re not at home.’

I'm about to scream at her some more, and then I remember how I read Maggie's letter from- Marcel and me, bite my/our tongue(s.) As calmly as I can, I say, 'Do you even know how much trouble you've caused? How could you be so spiteful to me?'

'I'm sorry,' she whispers. Fat teardrops form in the corners of her eyes, and one plops down like a raindrop. I want to hug her, to comfort her, but I'm still so mad. 'It's fine,' I say in a voice that is the exact opposite of fine. None of this would have happened if she hadn't sent those letters.

Kellie jumps up and runs upstairs, and I think she's going to her room to cry in private. I know what I should do. I should go comfort her, forgive her for real. It's my turn to be a good instance. To be a good big sister.

I'm about to go upstairs when she comes running back into the kitchen.

With my hatbox in her arms.

WHEN IT WAS JUST Maggie- and I, my mom used to buy two of everything, blue for Maggie and pink for me. The same quilt, stuffed animal, or Easter basket in two different colors. Everything had to be fair; we had to have the same number of carrot sticks or French fries or marbles or erasers shaped like cupcakes. Except I was always losing my erasers or eating my carrot sticks too fast, and then I'd beg for just one of Margot's.

Sometimes Mommy would make her share, which even then I realized wasn't fair, that obviously, Margot shouldn't be penalized for eating her snack slowly or keeping track of her erasers. After Kellie was born, Mommy tried to do blue, pink, and yellow, but it's just a- lot harder finding one thing in three different colors. Also, Kellie was enough years undeveloped than us that we didn't want the same kinds of toys as her.

The teal hatbox might be the only gift from Mommy I got that was just for me. I didn't have to share it; this one was mine and mine alone. When I opened it, I expected to find a hat, maybe a straw hat with a floppy brim, or maybe a newsboy- but it was empty.

Part: 13

'This is for your special things,' she said. 'You can put all your most precious, most favorite, most secret things in here.'

‘Like what?’ I said.

‘Whatever fits inside. Whatever you want to keep just for you.’ Kellie’s pointy little chin trembles and she says, ‘I am sorry, Lara Jean.’ When I see that, the chin tremble, I can’t be mad anymore. I just can’t, not even a little bit. So, I go to her, and I hug her tight. ‘It’s all right,’ I say, and she sags against me in relief. ‘You can keep the box. Put all your secrets in it.’ Kellie shakes her head. ‘No, it’s yours. I don’t want it.’ She thrusts it at me. ‘I put something in there for you.’ I open the box, and there are notes.

Notes and notes and notes.

Marcel’s notes. Marcel’s notes I threw away.

‘I found them when I was emptying your trash,’ she says. Hastily she adds, ‘I only read a couple. And then I saved them because I could tell they were important.’

I touch one that Marcel folded into an airplane. ‘Kellie - you know Marcel and I, are not getting back together, right?’

~*~

#- Hashtag: (Got mall?)

Kellie grabs the bowl of popcorn and says, ‘Just read them.’ Then she goes into the living room and turns on the TV. I close the box and take it with me upstairs. When I am in my room, I sit on the floor and spread them out around me.

A lot of the notes just say things like ‘Meet you at your locker after school’ and ‘Can I borrow your chemistry notes from yesterday?’ I find the spider webs’ one from Halloween, plus it makes me smile. Another one says, ‘Can you take the bus home today?’

I want to surprise Kellie and pick her up from school, so she can show me and my car off to her friends.’

‘Thanks for coming to the estate sale with me this weekend. You made the day fun. I owe you one.’ ‘Don’t forget to pack a Korean yogurt for me!’ ‘If you make Marcel’s dumb white-chocolate cranberry cookies and not my fruitcake ones, it’s over.’ I laugh out loud. And then, the one I read over and over: ‘You look pretty today. I like you in blue.’

I have never gotten a love letter before. But reading these notes like this, one after the other, it feels like I have. It's like- it's like there's only ever been, Marcel... Like everyone else that came before him, they were all to prepare me for this. I think I see the difference now, between loving someone from afar and loving someone up close. When you see them up close, you see the real them, but they also get to see the real you.

-And-

Marcel does... he sees me, and I see him. Love is scary: it changes; it can go away. That's part of the risk. I don't want to be scared anymore. I want to be brave, like Margot. It's almost a new year, after all. Close to midnight, I gather up Kellie and the puppy and the sparklers. We put on heavy coats and I make Kellie wear a hat. 'Should we put a hat on Jennie too?' she asks me.

'He doesn't need one,' I tell her.

'He's already got on a fur coat.'

The stars are out by the dozen; they look like faraway gems. We're so lucky to live in the mountains the way we do. You just feel closer to the stars.

To heaven. I light up sparklers for each of us, and Kellie starts dancing around the snowmaking a ring of fire with hers. She's trying to coax Jamie to jump through, but he isn't having it. All he wants to do is pee around the yard. Luckily, we have a fence, or I bet he'd pee his way down this whole block.

Marcel's bedroom light is on. I see him in the window just as he opens it and calls out, 'Song girls!'

Kellie hollers, 'Want to light a sparkler?'

'Maybe next year,' Marcel calls back. I look up at him and wave my sparkler, and he smiles, and there's just this feeling of all rightness between us. One way or another, Marcel will be in our lives. And I'm certain, I'm so suddenly certain that everything is exactly the way it's supposed to be, that I don't have to be so afraid of goodbye because goodbye doesn't have to be forever.

When I'm back in my room in my flattery nightgown, I get out my special flowy pen, and my good thick stationery and I start to write. Not a good-bye letter. Just a plain old love letter.

Dear- Marcel -

Acknowledgments-

To All My Literary Loves:

To you, fairest of them all. I think you and I might just be meant to be.

To you, for putting a ring on it.

All of my love, baby girl! <3

Look, in my opinion, the best thing you can do is find a person who loves you for exactly what you are.

Good mood, bad mood, ugly, pretty, handsome, what have you, the right person is still going to think the sun shines out your ass. That's the kind of person that's worth sticking with.

Part: 14

Come show showing the chat lines, she is masturbating, with over 2,000 boys loving her for making them explode, on the screen for her to see, yet only if you're her top pick. ≈ Past remembers of Karly little sister... ≈ she has become a mini-me...

More and more it has been occurring to me that this, too, will change our procedures. She'll retreat to the North End and make friends with her neighbors, with people richer, and more sophisticated than I am. I'll stay in some crappy apartment on Ebensburg, and I won't miss her, or remember what it felt like to run side by side.

They've warned me that after my procedure I may not even like running anymore, period. Another side effect of the cure: People often change their habits afterward, lose interest in their former hobbies and things that had given them pleasure.

'The cured, incapable of strong desire, are thus rid of both remembered and future pain' ('After the Procedure,' The Safety, Health, and cheerfulness.)

~*~

The world is spinning by, people and streets along, unfurling ribbon of color and sound. We run past St. Vincent's, the biggest all-boys school in town. A half-dozen boys are outside playing basketball, lazily dribbling the ball around, calling to one another.

Their words are a blur, an indistinct series of shouts and barks and short bursts of laughter, the way that boys always sound whenever they're together in groups, whenever you only hear them from around corners or across streets or down the beach. It's like they have a language all their own, and for about the thousandth time, I think how glad I am that segregation policy keeps us separate most of the time. As we run by I- think- I sense a momentary pause, a fraction of a second when all their eyes lift and turn in our direction. I'm too embarrassed to look.

My whole body goes white-hot like someone's just stuck me headfirst into an oven. But a second later I feel their eyes sweeping past me, a wind, latching on to Hana. Her blond hair flashes next to me, a coin in the sun.

The pain is creeping back into my legs, a leaden feeling, but I force myself to keep going as we around the corner of 219- Maine- Juniper Street and Laurel St. Vincent's behind. I feel Hana straining to keep up next to me. I turn my head, barely management to gasp out, 'Duel you.' But as Hana pulls up, arms pumping and nearly passes me, I put my head down and lunge forward, cycling my legs as fast as I can, trying to suck air into my lungs, which feel like they've shrunk to the size of a pea, fighting the screaming in my muscles.

Blackness eats the edges of my vision, and all I can see is the chain-link fence that rises in front of us suddenly, blocking our path, and then I'm reaching out and thwacking it so hard it begins to shake, turning around to yell, 'I won!' as Hanna pulls up a second behind me, gasping for breath.

Both of us are laughing now, hiccupping and taking huge gulping breaths of air as we pace around in circles, trying to walk it off. When she can finally breathe again, Hanna straightens up, laughing. 'I let you win,' she says, an old joke of ours. I toe some gravel in her direction. She ducks away, shrieking. 'Keep telling yourself that.'

My hair has come out of its pigtail, and I wrestle it out of it is flexible, flipping my head down so I get the wind on my neck. Sweat drips down into my eyes, stinging.

‘Nice look.’ Hana pushes me lightly, and I stumble sideways, whipping my head up to swipe back at her. She sidesteps me. There’s a gap in the chain-link fence that marks the beginning of a narrow service road.

This is blocked by a low metal gate. Hana hops it and gestures for me to follow. I haven’t been paying attention to where we are: The service drive threads down through a parking lot, a forest of industrial Dumpsters and cargo storage sheds.

Yonder those are the familiar string of white square buildings, like giant teeth. This must be one of the side entrances of the lab complex. I see now that the chain-link fence is looped on top with barbed wire and marked at twenty-foot intervals with signs that all read: PRIVATE PROPERTY. NO!

TRESPASSING, AUTHORIZED EMPLOYEES- ONLY.

Part: 15

‘I don’t think we’re supposed to-’ I start to say, but Hana cuts me off. ‘Come on,’ she calls out. ‘Live a little.’ I do a quick scan of the parking lot beyond the gate and the road behind us: no one. The small guard hut just past the gate is also empty. I lean over and peek inside.

There’s a half-eaten sandwich sitting on wax paper, and a stack of books piled messily on a small desk next to an old-fashioned radio, which is spitting static and patchy bits of music into the silence. I don’t see any Surveillance cameras, either, though there must be some. All the government buildings are wired. I hesitate for a second longer, then swing myself over the gate and catch up to Hanna. Her eyes are lit up with excitement, and I can tell that this was her plan, and her destination, all along.

~*~

‘This must be how the Invalids got in,’ she says in a breathless rush, as though we’ve been talking about- yesterday’s drama at the labs all this time.

‘Don’t- you think?’ ‘Doesn’t seem like it would have been hard.’ I’m trying to sound casual but the whole thing- the empty service road, and the enormous parking lot, like- the high overpasses, sparkling in the sun, the cobalt dumpsters and the electrical wires across the sky, the sparkling white slope of the lab roof- smack's me uneasy. Everything is silent and very still- frozen, almost, the way things are in a dream, or just before a chief cloudburst.

I don't want to say it to- Hanna, but I'd give pretty much anything to head back to Old Port, to the complex nest of familiar streets and stores. Even though there's no one around, I have the impression of being watched. It's worse than the ordinary feeling of being observed in school and on the street and even at home, having to be cautious about what you do and say, the close, blocked-in feeling that everyone gets used to eventually.

'Yeah...' Hana kicks at the packed dirt road. A plume of dust puffs up, resettles slowly. 'Pretty crappy security for a major medical facility.'

'Pretty crappy security for a petting zoo,' I say.

'I resent that.' The voice comes from behind us, and both Hana and I jump.

I spin around. The world seems to freeze for an instant.

A boy is standing behind us, arms crossed, head cocked to the side. A boy with caramel-colored skin and hair that's a golden-brown color, like autumn leaves getting ready to fall.

Part: 16

It's him... The boy from yesterday, from the observation deck. The Invalid... Except he isn't an Invalid.

He's wearing a short-sleeved navy guard's uniform over jeans, and he's got a laminated government ID clipped to his collar.

'I leave for two seconds to get a refill'-he gestures to the bottle of water he's holdings' and I come back to find a full-fledged break-in.'

I'm so confused I can't move or speak or do anything. Hanna must think I'm scared because she jumps in quickly, 'We weren't breaking in. We weren't doing whatsoever. We were just running and we - hum, we got lost.'

The boy crosses his arms in front of his chest, rocking back on his heels. 'Didn't see any of the signs outside, huh? 'No Trespassing'? 'Authorized Personnel Only?' Hana looks away.

She's panicky too. I can feel it. Hana's a thousand times...

More confident than I am, but neither of us is used to standing in the open and talking to a boy, especially not a- bodyguards, and it must have occurred to Hana that he already has plenty of grounds to arrest us.

‘Must have missed them,’ she... Mumbles...

‘Uh-huh.’ He raises his eyebrows. It’s obvious he doesn’t believe us, but at least he doesn’t look angry. ‘They’re pretty subtle. Solitary a few dozens- of them. I can see how you might not have noticed.’

He looks away for a second, squinting, and I get the feeling he’s trying to stop himself from laughing. He’s not like- any guard I have ever seen- at least, not the typical guards you see at the border and all-around Pitt, fat, and slowly and old. I think about how sure I was the recent past that he came from the Wilds, the solid certainty deep inside of me. I was wrong. As he turns his head, I see the unmistakable sign of someone who is cured: the mark of the procedure, a three-pointed star, just behind the left ear, where the scientists insert a special three the pronged needle used exclusively for immobilizing the patient so that the cure can be administered. Individuals show off their scars like badges of honor; you hardly see any curds with long hair, and the women who haven’t lopped off their hair entirely are careful to wear it pulled back.

Part: 17

My fear recedes. Talking to a cured... Isn’t illegal. The rules of segregation don’t apply...

I’m not sure if he has recognized me or not. If so, he hasn’t given any sign of it. In conclusion- I can’t take it anymore, and I burst out, ‘You, I saw you...’ At the last second, I can’t finish the sentence. I saw you yesterday.

You winked at me.

~*~

Hana looks startled. ‘You two know each other?’ She shoots a look at me.

Hana knows I have hardly ever exchanged two words with a boy before, unless it’s ‘Excuse me’ in the street or ‘Sorry for stepping on your toes’ when I trip on somebody.

We're not supposed to have more than minimal contact with uncured boys outside of our own families. Even after they've been cured, there's hardly a need or excuse for it, unless we are dealing with a doctor or teacher or someone like that.

He turns to look at me. His face is completely professional and composed, but then again, I swear I see something flickering in his eyes, a look of amusement or pleasure. 'Nope,' he says smoothly. 'We have never met. I'm sure I would remember.' The flash in his eyes is back -is he laughing at me?

'I'm Hanna,' Hanna says. 'And this is Jenn.' She jabs me with an elbow. I know I must look like a fish, standing there with my mouth gaping open, but I'm too outraged to speak. He's lying. I know he's the one I saw yesterday, would bet my life on it.

Part: 18

'Marcel- nice to meet you.' Marcel keeps his eyes on me as he and hands.

Then he extends a hand to me. 'Jenn,' she says thoughtfully. 'I've never heard that name before.' I hesitate. Shaking hands makes me feel awkward like I'm playing dress-up in an adult's too-big clothing. Besides, I have never essentially touched skin-to-skin with a stranger. But he's just standing there with his hand out, so after a second, and I reach out and shake. The moment we touch, a tiny electrical shock calls through me, and I pull away quickly.

'It's short for Maggie,' I say.

'Maggie.' Marcel tips his head back, watching me with narrowed eyes.

'Pretty.'

I'm momentarily distracted by the way he says my name. In his mouth, it sounds musical, not clunky and angular, the way my teachers have always made it sound.

Love is in the air... like music!

Part: 19

His eyes are a warm amber color, and as I look at him, I have a sudden, flashing memory of my mother pouring syrup over a stack of pancakes. I look away, feeling ashamed, as though he has somehow been responsible for dredging the memory up, has reached in with his hand and wrenched it from me.

Awkwardness makes me feel irritated, and I press on, 'I do know you. I saw you yesterday in the labs.

You were on the observation deck, watching- observing everything.'

Again, my courage fails me at the last second and I don't say, watching me. I can feel Hanna glaring at me, but I ignore her. She must be furious I haven't told her any of this.

Part: 20

Marcel's face doesn't change. He doesn't blink or drop his smile for even a fraction of a second. 'Case of mistaken identity, I guess. Guards aren't allowed in the labs during evaluations. Especially not part-time guards.' For a second longer, we stand there, staring at each other. Now I know he's lying, and the easy, lazy grin on his face makes me want to reach out and slap him.

I ball my fists and suck in a deep breath, willing myself to stay calm. I'm not the violent type. I don't know why I'm feeling so aggravated.

Hanna jumps in, breaking the tension. 'So, this is it? A part-time security guard and some 'Keep Out' signs?'

Marcel keeps his eyes on me a half-second longer. Then he turns to look at Hanna as though noticing her for the first time. 'What do you mean?'

'I would have thought the labs would be better protected, that's all. It doesn't seem like it would be too hard to break into this place.'

Part: 21

Marcel raises his eyebrows.

'Thinking about attempting?' Hanna freezes, and my blood goes to ice. She has gone too far. If Alex reports us as possible supporters, or troublemakers, or anything, we're in for months and months of surveillance and investigation- besides, we can kiss our chances of passing the evaluations with decent scores goodbye. I picture looking for a lifetime of watching ANNA Kendrick do things to me!

Marcel must sense our fear because he raises both hands. 'Olivia. I was kidding. You don't exactly seem like terrorists.' It occurs to me how ridiculous we must look in our running shorts and sweaty tank tops and neon sneakers. Or at least, I must look ridiculous. Hanna looks like a model for athletic wear. Again, I feel a fit of blushing coming on, followed by a surge of irritation. Nope- wonder the regulators decided on the separation of boys and girls: else, it would have been a nightmare, this feeling livid, self- conscious, disordered, and annoyed all the time.

Kellie- My daddy said- that my one pap passed from a planned rockfall- what is that?
That one of the girls did it the taller one.

~*~

‘This is just the stacking area, anyway, for freight and stuff.’ Marcel gestures out there the line of consignment sheds. ‘Real security starts closer to the facilities. Full-time guards, cameras, electrified fence, the whole shebang.’ Hanna doesn’t look at me, but when she speaks, I can hear the excitement creeping into her voice. ‘The loading area? Like, where the deliveries come?’ In my head I start praying, don’t say anything stupid. Don’t say anything dumb. Do not mention the Invalids.

‘You got it.’

Hanna dances on her feet, shifting her weight back and forth. I try to shoot her a warning look, but she avoids my eyes.

‘So, this is where the trucks come?’

With medical equipment and - and other stuff?’

‘Faithfully.’ O’er I have the impression of something flickering behind Marcel’s eyes, even as the rest of his face stays neutral. I don’t trust him, I realize, and again wonder why he is lying about being in the labs yesterday.

Maybe only because it’s forbidden as he said. Maybe because he was laughing instead of trying to help out. And maybe, after all, he doesn’t recognize me. We made eye contact for only a few seconds, and I’m sure to him I was only a blurry, in-between face, easy to forget. Not pretty. Not that ugly, either.

Just plain, like a thousand other faces you would see on the street.

~*~

Hands- oh hands and holding them...

He, on the other hand, is most definitely not in-between. There's something insane to me about standing in the open talking to a strange boy, even if he is cured, and though my head is whirling, it's like my vision gets razor-sharp, making everything look ultra-detailed. I notice the way a piece of his hair curls around his scar, like a surround; I notice his large brown hands and the whiteness of his teeth and the perfect symmetry of his face. His jeans are faded and belted low on his hips, and the laces in his sneakers are the strangest ink-color blue like he has colored them in with a pen.

Thoughts oh thoughts and having them...

I think about you, this is true, what to do, it's now me and you!

I phenomenon how old he is. He looks my age, but he must be slightly older, maybe fourteen now. I wonder, too-a brief, flitting thought- whether he's already been paired. But of course, he has; he must have been.

I have been staring at him unintentionally and he turns suddenly to look at me. I drop my eyes, feeling a quick, besides, unreasonable trepidation that he has managed to read my thoughts.

'I had love to look around,' Karly hints not-so-o delicately. I reach out and pinch her when Marcel is not looking, in addition to her psychoanalysts away, giving me a guilty look. At least she doesn't start grilling him about what happened former times and get us thrown in the penitentiary or dragged through a questioning, interrogating, and enquiring.

Marcel softball pitches his water magnum in the air, catches it in one small hand. 'Trust me, there's zilch to see- and crap. Unless you're a fan of industrial waste. There's sufficient of that from one place to another here.' He tips his head toward the dumpsters.

'Oh- plus the best view of the bay in Pitt. She all the yellow and black things over the wither- We've got that going for us too.'

'Really?' Karly wrinkles her nose momentarily distracted from her detective assignment.

Marcel nods, tosses the bottle again, catches it. As it arcs through the air the sun winks through the water like light from a charm. 'That I can show you,' he says. 'Come on now.' All I want is to get out of here, but Karly says, 'Sure, thing,' so-o I trudge along after her, mutely cursing her curiosity and obsession with all things invalid-related, and swearing never to let her pick, our running route again.

Marcel and I walk in front, and I pick up scattered bits of their tête-à-tête: I hear him say he takes classes at one of the colleges but miss what he says he studies; Hanna tells him we're about to graduate. He tells her he's fourteen I think; she says that we're both turning I think in several months.

Appreciatively, they avoid talking about the botched evaluations yesterday. The service road connects with another, lesser drive, which runs parallel to Facade Street, slanting precipitously uphill toward the northern boardwalk.

Part: 22

See us-

Here there are rows of long, metal storage sheds. The sun is flat and high and unrelenting. I'm exceedingly thirsty, but when Marcel turns around and offers me a sip from his water bottle, I say, 'Nope,' hurriedly and too flamboyant. The thought of putting my mouth where his mouth has been making me feel anxious all over again.

As we come up to the top of the hill- all three of us panting a little from the climb- the bay unfolds to our right like an enormous map, a sparkling, shimmering world of blues and greens.

Hanna gasps a little.

It is a beautiful view: unobstructed, and just oh so perfect. The atmosphere is full of puffy white clouds that make me think of feather pillows, and seagulls turn lazy arcs over the water, patters of birds forming and dissolving in the sky.

Hanna, not Karly walks forward a few feet. 'It's amazing... So- freakin' gorgeous, isn't it? No matter how long I live here I never get used to it.' She turns and looks at me. 'I think this is my favorite way to see the ocean.'

Middle of the afternoon, sunny and bright. It's just like- a photograph- and that shit. Don't you think, Liv?' I'm feeling so relaxed- relishing the wind at the top of the hill, which sweeps over my arms, and legs, hips, boobs and makes me feel cool and delicious, enjoying the view of the bay and the high, blinking eye of the sun- I've almost forgotten that Marcel is with us. He's been droopy back, standing a few feet behind us, and ever since we came up the hill, he ought to say a word.

Which is why I nearly jump out of my skin when he leans forward and directs a solitary word into my ear: 'Ashen.' 'Come again...?' I whirl around, my heart beating, pounding, and hitting on so very hard.

Part: 23

The lookback: the dubbed take the wanting- Hanna has turned, and twisted back to the water and is going on about wishing she had her camera and how you never seem to have anything you need.

Ray is bent close to me so close I can see his eyelashes, like perfect brushstrokes on a canvas portrait, besides now his eyes are like literally dancing with light, and with me, I feel them move in my and I feel dirty, burning as though on fire. For the lust and the lust- I must have with this boy, not love. I want hotly lost... I am in- love with...? You pick... IDK (I don't know) at this point.

'What did you say?' I repeat. My voice comes out a croaky whisper. Ray leans another inch closer, and it's like the flames seep out of his eyes, and light my whole body on fire. I have never- ever been this close- to a boy before. I feel like fainting and running all at the same time. But I can't move.

'I said, I prefer the ocean when it's grim. Or not gray. A pale, in-between color. It run by again me of waiting for something good to happen.'

Ray does remember- all advantageous everything never- ever forget. He was there. The ground seems to be dissolving under my feet the way it does in the dream about my mother. All I can see are his eyes, the shifting pattern of shadow and light turning there.

'You perjure yourself,' I manage to croak out.

'Why did you lie?'

Ray doesn't answer me. He pulls away a few inches and says, 'Of course it's even prettier at sunset. around eight-thirty the sky looks like it's on fire, especially at Back and Gold Cove. You should see it.' He pauses, and though his voice is low; as well as unpremeditated I get the feeling, he is trying to tell me something important.

'Tonight, it will most likely be amazing!!!'

My mind grinds into action, unhurriedly processing his words, the way he's emphasizing definite details.

Then it clicks: He has given me time, besides a place. He's telling me to meet him. 'Are you asking me to-?' I start to say, but just then Karly innings back up to me, grabbing my arm.

'God,' she says, snickering. 'Can you believe it's after five already?

We've got to go.' She's dragging me retrograde before- I can respond or protest, and by the time I think to look over my shoulder above my armpit adjacent my side boob, too see if Marcel is watching or giving me any kind of sign, he has disappeared from view.

I'll I want-

Is him...

Or her...

Or her...

Or him...

Or love...

Can I have both...? (She asked sweetly) without payback for it! (pouting face and stomp of her left foot.)

Part: 24

'Maggie- 'Mom! Mom! Mom!

Mommy! Mommy! Mommy! Mama!

Mama! Mama! Ma! Ma! Ma! Ma!

Mum! Mum! Mum! Mum! Mummy!

Mama, Mama...'

Shit!

Help me get home I'm out in the woods, I am out on my own. I found me a werewolf, a horrid old pooch It showed me its teeth and went straight for my gut.

Mama, Mama, help me get home I'm out in the woods, I am out on my own.

I was stopped by an angel, a rotting old wreck It showed me its teeth, and went straight for my neck.

Mama, Mama, put me to bed, I won't make it home, I'm already halfdead. I met an Invalid, and fell for his art she showed me her smile and went straight to my heart.

~*~

When I'm setting the table for dinner, I by chance pour wine in Kellie juice cup and orange juice in my uncle's wineglass, and while I'm grating cheese, I for one caught my knuckles so many times in the teeth of the grater my aunt finally sends me- out of the kitchen, saying she had preferred not to have a topping of skin for her ravioli.

I can't stop thinking about the last thing Marcel said to her, the forever and always-shifting pattern of his eyes, the strange expression on his face- like he was inviting me. around seven-thirty- the sky looks like it's on fire, especially at Back and Gold Cove. You should see it...

Is it even remotely, imaginably possible he was sending me a message?

Is it possible he was asking me to meet...?

Him...?

Part: 25

Dizzy- dizzy- dizzy- dizzy- dizzy- dizzy!!!

Am I...!

The idea makes me wobbly, faint- shaky- lightheaded- and dazed! I keep thinking, too, about the single word, directed low and quietly straight into my ear: Steely. He was there; he saw me; he evoked me.

So many inquiries gathering my wits at once, it's, and like one of the famous Pittsburgh (Pitt.) fogs has swept up from the ocean and settled there, making it impossible to think normal, functional thoughts.

My aunt finally notices something's wrong. Just before dinner, I'm helping Jenny with her homework, as always, testing her on her multiplication tables. We're sitting on the floor of the living room, which is squashed up right next to the ‘dining room’ (an alcove that scarcely holds a table and seventh chairs,) as well as I’m holding her workbook on my knees, reciting the problems to her, but my mind is on autopilot and my thoughts are a million miles away.

Otherwise rather, they are exactly 3.5 miles away, down at the marshy edge of Back and Gold Cove. I know the distance exactly for the reason that, it’s a nice run from my house.

Now I’m calculating how quickly- I could get down there on my bike, and then beating myself up for even considering the idea.

‘Seven times eight?’

Jenny pinches her lips together. ‘Fifty-sixth to the one.’ She said- dumbly!

‘Nine times six?’

‘Fifty-two- da- four-sh.’ She said- oh so- moronically.

On the other hand, no law says you can’t speak to a curd.

Curds are safe. They can be mentors or guides to- the un-curd. Even though Marcel is- only- only a year older than I am- I think...? - Right? We are separated, irreparably and totally, by the procedure. He might as well be my grandfather.

‘Seven times eleven?’

‘Seventy-seven- one 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10. somewhere in there it is.’

~*~

‘Liv.’ My aunt has squeezed out of the kitchen, past the dining room table, and is standing behind Jenny. I blink twice, trying to focus. Carol’s face is tight with concern. ‘Is something the matter?’

‘Nope.’ I drop my eyes quickly. I hate it when my aunt looks at me like that like she’s reading all the bad parts of my soul. I feel guilty just for thinking about a boy, even a cured one. If she knew, she would say, o-Oh, Liv. Careful.

Dredge up what happened to your mother. She would say, these diseases tend to run in the blood.

‘Why?’

I keep my eyes trained on the worn carpet underneath me. Carol bends forward, swoops up Jenny’s workbook from my knees, and says loudly in her clear, high voice, ‘Nine times six is fifty-four tenths.’ She snaps the workbook closed. ‘Not fifty-two, Liv. I assume you know your multiplication tables?’ Jenny sticks her tongue out at me.

My cheeks start heating up as I realize my mistake. ‘Sorry. I guess I’m just kind of - distracted.’

There’s a momentary pause. My eyes never leave the back of my neck. I can sense them burning there. I feel like I will shriek, or cry, or confess if she keeps staring at me.

Finally, she sighs. ‘You’re still sophisticated about the evaluations, aren’t you?’ I blow the air out of my cheeks, feel a weight of anxiety ease off my chest.

‘Affirmative. I guess so.’ I venture a glance up at her, and she smiles her little skittering smile.

‘I know you’re disappointed - you have to go through the procedure again but think about it this way - this time you will be even more equipped.’

Nevaeh

Book: 17

Midnight Sun

Interval Two-

Chapter: 116

Dumb love

Marcel's oldest brother is Daved.

Marcel tried not to think about how often, as a kid, those same legs had pumped him forward during a footrace and propelled her into trees when they had climbing wars. She had always been strong- as hard as polished timber, scrappy and made of muscle. Stronger than most boys, and braver, too. For Marcel's whole life, she had been his best friend, his partner in crime.

(One year forward after high school.)

Liv- She was two years older than him and had been the de facto leader of whatever scheme or game they had invented. When he was five, they'd bottled their farts and tried to sell them. Olivia! Only in Pennsylvania would parents throw a dropping-out of-college party for their daughter. Now, to be fair, the invitations didn't acknowledge the whole dropping-out bit. Nothing as crass as that. I mean, this is the Indiana University of Pennsylvania, after all. People have standards. At least when other people are watching. See, the twelve one-dollars-each invitations rolled the whole debacle as a 'sending-off celebration for Olivia.'

Sending-off indeed. Not exactly. At least they got the location right, although even that's a bit of a joke. It's not exactly Rwanda or Haiti or any of the places that Olivia originally intended to go to save the world.

But when your parents know someone who knows someone who knows everyone, you're bound to get hooked up with someone who needs help a little closer to home. But the whole do-gooder motivation?

Total bullsh*t, I should know, it's that way since the begging of the end.

See, I'm Olivia IUP drop- out and soon- to- be resident of Middle- of- Nowhere. And let me tell you, my reasons have nothing to do with charity. I am not that good. Not even close. I certainly don't deserve a freaking party for the things I have done. But I'm an Indiana. Parties are what we do. At this point, I'm just counting myself lucky I talked my mother asking to stay home and not get kicked out, know why I can make it is on my own, I see that now, yet I didn't when I was in high school that is for sure.

Money is hard to come by when you on make two dollars an hour, working your ass off, busing tables. Pa. -wages suck! Like the cops in my hometown all sh*tting through the same whole. Sucking each other off, in the backroom, doing nothing but buying new cars. That's all there good for covers some assholes ass, that takes their sh*t.

I wish I were kidding, about both here, yet I am not. So here I am, dressed in a brand- new cute mélange dress, trying to make everyone believe, I was bitten by the humanitarian bug just in time to bail on my first year of college in music. I would be better, yet I left the band for Jenny also.

The most depressing thing is that everyone seems willing to just go with it as I did, things you do just to be cool makes you lose you in the long run- does it not? Well done, Liv! So proud of you, Olivia! I said to myself when I got all F's Lovely inside and out, I feel now. You can spend all your time doing boys or at the beach when you have no life or money to pay for a living- A-Okay- life... money is everything that makes the world go around. I wised up to this fast, in the first week of leaving home, when I was kicked out, begging to come back and suck on mom sh*t just to eat. Feel like corn?

My best friend, at least, doesn't seem to be buying it. 'Liv, you can't be serious. I mean, where are you going to get your hair highlighted and your designer clothes?' I am not... I said. A good wheel is where I have to shop now, and I wear what I have. Some part of me that deep wants to snap at my oldest friend to stop being so superficial. But the other part of me- the more familiar one- is dying to grab her by the shoulders and give her an oh- my- flipping God-I-know!

Because, the truth is, I have spent way too much time wondering about how I'm going to keep my honey- blond hair just right now from returning to its natural mud color while in the God-awful hometown of mine. I have had the same hairdresser since our mothers decided it was time, we become versed in the difference between highlights and lowlights.

I was inseparable long before that.

Julyan Gorllie- She was the cute brunette to my classy blonde all through twelve years of private school.

Olivia taught me the art of rolling my plaid uniform skirt just enough to be interesting without being obvious, and in return, I was her explanation when she let Eliyn talk her out of her couture lavender dress on prom night at the college. Even when Julyan went off to Pittsburgh to meet up with her girlfriend since she dropped out.

They hooked up and want it to go more like meet mom and dad. Both made a pact to see each other at least a couple of times a month. So, far- like- it seems they have stuck to it.

Two months ago, this was, she's been telling me she will be my best friend no matter what (the no matter what, of course, is the not so minor fact that I won't be finishing my first year with a degree, someday soon, I have spent what seems like years racing after.) Oh, deep down, we both know things have changed.

Phone calls just aren't the same, I don't have one now. I cannot afford one, I need gas for the car I can make payments for like I to have five dollars to spare when all but two goes in the tank that I make.

Weekend nights, are not the same it party and flunk out or read in the dorm and pass what would you do in my shoes? Collage is an expansive way to party your butt off I can say that much- do you want to pay the eighty grand I owe. Dreaming at this point is the height of stupidity like smoking and doing drugs, I have to think about the clock inside me running too. I want to think about that one too a boy may be on the way, if this doesn't work out this time, the last girl broke my heart, and maybe a sex change is what I need in a lover.

~*~

'I'll be home for Thanksgiving,' I say by way of response to her email I see in the school library a place I thought I would never- ever be, just like being in horror over my hair crisis, in high school, it was a no-no! 'I'll make an appointment when I have some change too spare.'

~*~

My best friend purses her glossy lips and takes a sip of pink cava- a tiny one, since champagne has carbs, and Julyan lives in constant fear that her hourglass figure will turn lumpy before she can make it down the aisle in a size- 0 wedding dress. Where lovers yet we come to the point we feel we need boys in our lives too.

It's a big step for a girl that was Bi. I not so anymore, I don't know maybe I am getting too old for all this nonsocial sh*t, and love games. The fun was nice will it lasted, like before I may have to look at it and get on with it. 'So- three-plus months, we did think your mom would call sick.’ She says, giving my hair a once-over. And kiss me goodbye, ‘Your ends might survive it if you don’t flatiron your hair, but the roots... ugh- love yeah- see you around.’ It was a flirty fling- if you want to call it that, we all have in college, I did.

‘Maybe- I could just wear a bag over my head instead of, like my dart pillow- and wishing I was dead, all freaked up, and sped- in the head- days like this I wish I was ahead, with the story’s all read.

Like the preps the jocks, hitting them all that step on my block, I know what I got a hanging sock filled with rocks, I am about to hit anyone that steps on my block, I hate on the preps’ and the jocks, with their nice polo shirts and matching socks, throwing at me like a rock on glass, as they pass.

Just another sauced- like her, oh- I am sorry- I didn’t want it this way, but what you are it if it will never change, I will just be another left behind, life is unkind, I did want it this way, and yet what good is it always, I will be left behind.’ This is here to show you all that I did it! Plus, I am not stopping! Living life on rewind... what do you say about that? I am the only one that would get that, do you? Just like all of you I know that you have too. You can’t define it, this life that you live. All the anger let it out, LET IT OUT!’

Chapter: 117

Tonic

I say, taking a sip of my champagne. A bigger sip than she, because unlike my curvy friend, I’m more of the willowy (read: flat chested) type, and if my parents’ genetics are any indication, my beanpole figure will probably outlast my teeth.

Being able to legally drink at my parents' frequent social gatherings is pretty much the only good thing about getting older. I suspect that's one of the reasons the drinking age is twenty-one. It's as though some wise person way back when knew that alcohol would start to get reaaaaally helpful at that point in your life.

I'm nearly twenty-two, and God knows I've found a drink handy a time or two. Especially in the last year.

I catch a whiff of candy-scented perfume a second before an arm goes around my waist.

'You'll never guess who dared to show his face,' my friend Andrea murmurs in my ear. 'And he brought her.' She and he are giving me that wary, wide-eyed look that everyone gets when Ethan Price and I are in the same room, and before I know it, I'm flanked by four of my other friends, all nearly identical in jewel-colored cocktail dresses and designer high heels. I don't have to turn around to know that the girl- Maddie is so concerned about won't be matchy-matchy with anyone. Ethan's new girlfriend has a distinct style that the socially polite set refers to as unique and the total snobs among us would call weird. In my circle, there's nothing worse than weird.

'Marcel and Karly perfectly wired together, and that is perfectly right for them, or so they both say.'

Olivia and her new love: 'You want to talk about it?' she asks, not looking up. 'I wouldn't even know where to start.' 'She does tend to have that effect on people. They come in expecting to feel kindly but walk away wanting to strangle her.' 'That about sums it up,' I say, tracing a finger through the flour dusting the counter. 'But you're saying this to me?' She asks.

That I may want a boy now, and that we need to see others, it's not you- it's me. I press my lips together as I consider the thoughts of letting go and finding new love. Like the thought of the taste and feel of her lips pressed to mine, it felt so right to me. I don't want to stay that don't want me in their life anymore she said with disappointment. Yet there was some regret in her eyes and voice, I feel that I knew her so well, yet I didn't at all really, you know what kind of loves you have where you want more yet no less. I want to scream at the top of my lungs and hightail my cute ass it back to her apartment as soon as I got home here now, where people buy bread and don't give a sh*t if you want to be alive or died, and where it's not so freaking quiet, or nose with the fart can cars that go by, and where were the girl don't have sexy auburn eyes and sh*tty attitudes. Sometimes like her PMS-ing or over crap.

But then I picture her smug condescension as he stared down at me from that ravaged, once-gorgeous face. I knew I would feel this way. Heck, Julyan made sure that there's nothing to hold me here, other than her love for me and mine for her. More lust than loves, if you want to get- down to it.

It's as though she saw right through my plan to swoop in here like a saintly guardian angel to absolve my sins, and she's telling me he is not going to play with my emotions and brain or life. Getting forgiveness is not going to be as simple as ladling soup into a weary, appreciative soul's gateway.

Maddie gives another of those half-smiles that she seems to have in endless supply. It's a smile that says, Life sucks, but it's always worth living. 'Most people don't admit how frustrating he is,' she is. 'Most of them pretend he's an absolute dear and claims they're the ones who can fix them. Although sometimes they don't bother to pretend, they just do. They just leave within minutes of meeting them.'

‘Can’t say I blame her or her,’ I say, pushing away from the counter.

Looking around and back behind me. ‘But it just so happens I have nowhere else to be.

-And-

I’m also probably not the right person to help him, but then I don’t know if there is such a thing when you’re dealing with him.’

‘Can we forget about the things I said when I was drunk! Sleeping with my close on- and you’re gone! I am my own worst enemy, kicking my sh*t out of me.’ looking out the window last night- ‘Well then.’ Maddie gives the dough a satisfied pat before wiping her hands on a dishtowel, I begged her to love me again for a place to live also, yet don’t tell her that. ‘I’ll show you to your room.’ The upstairs of the house- the apartment is as vast and grand as the downstairs, but its emptiness is a little frightening, she has like noting in here. I follow Madilyn down a long series of hardwood hallways, noting that we pass a half dozen bedrooms- that is not used, not one of which seems to be in use for anything really, they need work I can see.

Of course, they wouldn’t be: her father doesn’t live here yet he pays for her to be and own the building, and I’m assuming her like my mom and her mon for life in this crud hole, in the nearby the ghetto part of the town, wherever this is- it what I call it.

Which means it the worst of the worst being alone. Alone- is not something you want to be walking around this place? You get some you don’t want or mugged. The thought should be terrifying, and it is. But then I remember my reaction to her and also her... and those girls too that are gone. That pure, undiluted surge of desirability, and now, I am frantic on top of being nervous as hell. Thinking about all this sh*t.

‘Here we go,’ Maddie says, stopping at a room on the left at the end of the hall. ‘It’s not the biggest of the guest rooms, but the view’s the best in the house.

Other than the master suite, of course.’ At this point where just kind of bed buddy’s, some there to hold on to yet it’s not the same for me, nor her or so I feel. I think we grow up some, maybe not she soft to hold on to in the night- so- yeah- I will go with that.

‘Is the master suite where Maddie’s father sleeps when he comes off to the home he lives in now after he left her mom also?’ I ask, stepping into the room.

Everyone seems to back up after all the deaths, at clit- high joint schools. The joint meaning joined with the old oak view one next door.

Chapter: 118

Apartments

Here daddy rarely stays the night, yet I like him a lot I could see myself with a man like that.’ She says quietly, and I overhear. Cute yet creepy all at the same time. ‘When he does, he is in the guest room, I may pop in just in to see him, in a see-through night top, and see that man, It’s the only way they can keep the peace in my heart of what it could be like.’ ‘How wonderfully dysfunctional I would have it be with someone like that.’ I mutter in my mind feeling the thoughts of wetness like in my brain making me hot.

But as I take in my new bedroom, I temporarily forget all about the Langdons’ issues, because the room looks like something out of a luxury resort.

The bed is huge, it's bedding a pristine white save for the fur blanket draped across the foot of the bed. The furniture is all-natural wood and has that sort of oversized one-of-a-kind quality look that makes me think it was made locally instead of created in bulk and distributed to thousands of households.

There's a large desk in one corner, a reading chair in another, but the star of the room is the massive windows overlooking the water. 'Wow,' I whisper. 'See, we do have a few things Pittsburgh doesn't,' Maddie says, not bothering to hide the pride in her voice. 'Frenchman Bay is one of them.' I can't argue. I've seen plenty of gorgeous views on summer vacations and spring break trips, but this ranks up there with the best of them because it's unanticipated. It's nearly dark now, but it only adds to the appeal of the shadowy water.

The 'Bathroom's through there,' she says, gesturing to the door opposite the window. 'I put in fresh towels, and there's a small fridge next to the closet with water and a few snacks. I cook three meals a day. Not anything at all fancy, so if you need anything in between, or anything else, you're on your own.' I like she imagined in the bright sunlight it would be postcard-worthy.

'Resonances great,' I say, giving her a small smile. 'Although I'm not hungry when I travel back and forth, I said glad to see, and be home and love you again, she knew it was a line, and a waste of time, so I'm good for tonight on the sofa maybe I crawl in with you like the old times back in the days of high school.' I got in naked and she in a nightgown, it came off and we did the old stuff, it was fun, some of the magic back. We fall asleep looking out at all the lights. Her side hug cuddling me like them. The sun rays were the alarm...

Chapter: 119

Days

Photo of me going down on my 7" long toy, laying on my belly legs kicking.

≈ Past remembers of Karly ≈

Days-

I haven't eaten since breakfast, but may need to eat has, without doubt, deserted me for the jiffies of moments. It probably has something to do with the fact that I have somehow gotten myself into the mother of all disasters. 'For meals, do the caretakers usually eat with her?' I ask...? Her- I want to press my lips together- yet hers with mine just for a moment or a longer.

Like thin never wanting to stop.

'No. He takes almost all of his meals in the study, some in his bedroom. You are of course welcome to eat with Mick and me at any time, although we tend to eat in the small house.'

I like to rock into my man thing-ie replica with the two lumps at the bottom, that I use to get there, sometimes behind me sucking cupped to the wall, as she is coming tough me or him, I rock ever so easy back and forth into it, sapping my hip down on it. (Awwwahhh! Saying in a sexy sigh...)

She says it in that way people have of not expecting you to take them up on the offer, and I admit

I'm a little depressed by the fact that I'm expected to eat by myself. My family has always made a big deal about sharing meals, so the thought of four people living in one home and eating separately seems strange.

Then again, eating alone seems a lot less strange than sharing a meal with Paul. As if he'd even allow it, especially after the way I behaved.

Although, oddly, I still don't regret my over-the-top rudeness. It was worth it for the sheer surprise on his face. And something tells me that surprise is the only thing I'll have going for me if I want to have any chance of keeping the upper hand.

Lindy heads toward the door.

'There's a phone in the kitchen and at the end of the hall, and both have a number listed for the small house. I usually head over there shortly after I get Paul his dinner, so if you need anything-'

'I'll be fine.'

But the file didn't answer any of the things I wanted to know. Like whether she enjoyed that kiss yesterday or was just pretending. Whether she likes guys to hold her face or her hips when they kiss her.

Whether she has a boyfriend.

And, most important - what the fuck is she doing in Maine?

-And-

'Don't go running alone here,' I say. I don't bother to explain all the dangers of a woman running alone in the dark. Bar

Harbor is safe enough, but all it takes is one sick fuck lurking in the bushes to destroy a life.

Chapter: 120

Fooling around

At lunch- a boy asked what does- she use and like, so I know.

Why?

‘I want to date her... is that okay?’

Maybe! You have to pass my test.

Maddie- like all the girls in my group wall a have three, like most girls in the world I feel, I also have the suction cup 7 inches, a rabbit my is blue, and a hot pink seven vibrating functions hard plastic vibrators slash dildo. You asked I have no shame in saying. I have my built-in my handbag now, ‘really’ do you want to see- he said nothing- without even a thought she turns it on, and it bounces on the table and round the food trays. Do have it hop into some one’s milk he said.

Maddie is quite must of the time yet can be silly when you want her to be. She said to the girls- I have Some time- I use a flat looking-glass under me on my bed and rode it bouncing up and down on the bead meatus, letting the bed do the work, he- he, leaning back downing the cowgirl, or forward for old-school freaking feeling all missionary and- aw-ah oh- yeah. Karly, she likes it sideways; I don’t get it?

Do you?

Karly- Madalyn all summed up- she likes, fingering herself- cooking anything and everything. Singing not always hitting the notes, yet sweetly, running, biking, swimming, outdoors hunting, I don’t get that one. Jewelry making all kinds of cool things, look at all these we have, and she has on. Take one to tell her to see if she notices.

Pole dancing working out like Zumba sh*t. Even Knitting- Knitting...??? Gardening at her apartment on her veranda porch. Photography like of her taking pics of her more fallow and of the country land when she is there in the small towns, or school trips like D.C, Teenage, New York, flora, and Canada. Collect Things like old radio's, and records, and typewriters, on is white and platinum, with her name on it, in cloud blue. Which is worth something! Her dad loved the sh*t out of her for that one.

Suck up!

God, I need to which my wording read that one again. Yoga- yah, the only time I get into those positions is when- yah you get it.

Why not do it for fun she said? I want to get some out of me for it if I going to bend it around like that- God! She has funny moments, of randomness too, blurting out sh*t as I do. Too much time with gaming and dumb gaming at the school always on the brown team. Dressing up in dumb sh*t like a lumberjack and once a cow, she was dry humming on me the apple in the hallway.

Pooping three times a day god- I don't sh*t in a week! 'Getting it!' Piss! Fingers! More about that pace of she over there huh- okay, she loves ballroom dancing, and asking all fairy and sh*t. Oh, piss! More...?

Sure, a boy wants to know... noses boy. Do it yourself... ask- her yourself baby- d*ick! I was thinking. Blogging whatever I ask why the freak does she want to PMS- b*tch online for anyway? I don't get...?

Where friends that don't get one another? Belly-Dancing, god- yah no- like- do that on your red flow! Antiques- did I say that? Um- lap Dancing- 'I see it!' I see that your one of those dumb boys ant' yah? Gulp- sure! He said nervously! I love making dumb boys feel awkward!!! Flower arranging... oh, Aromatherapy- 'Yeah got ah-w!' 'Boy said yeah I see we have a lot in-common, hook me up!' Wink- I'll see what I can do! A Boy- I don't even know his name- 'Okay,' she says, surprising me. I narrow my eyes and wait for it, and he squirms. 'Why are you looking at me like that?'

'I've never known a female to acquiesce that easily without a catch. How about you hit me with it now and get it over with.' I shrug'. 'Fine. I was going to say that I won't freak you over if you promise to go with her, but you freak up- I'll cut your balls off- got it.' 'GOD! He said.' Snip- snip- I made that finger moment.

I think he is okay- he does not get any I can see that all over his face and down there too- so as soon as he smells some puss- puss- he'll be all over her- in loving lust. I love looking down at boys! You have to see if it's good enough for your girlfriend if you would do it, by looking at- it is saying hello; she should not have to either. You got feel it too so- yeah. Girls get it.

Feel that hard thing-ie, moving on! I need a cold shower- God! :0 < clown!

What a goof-ball slash clown! It's kind of cute, I have to say, oh boys- right...???

Dumb!!!

Chapter: 121

Squeal

Maddie- 'No,' I say, almost before she's finished her sentence. 'Why not?' he is your type, okay for you. I rap my cane once against the ground. 'Well, for starters, even though there are tortoises that could surpass your sorry excuse for a jog, I'm in no shape to accompany even the most pathetic of runners.’ ‘What a handy skill you have of overloading a sentence with insults,’ she says as she reaches up to adjust her ponytail. ‘That must be helpful, what with your thriving social life and all.’ I thump my cane against the ground again, studying her. ‘Must be nice, picking on the cripple.’ Maddie rolls her eyes like I have to do what with and to this boy. ‘Please. Your soul’s more crippled than your leg.’

She has no idea how right she is, and I have no intention of letting her anywhere close enough to find out. I’ve gotten good at shutting people out by pushing them away... being as nasty as possible until they reach their breaking point. But with her? It’s different. And not only because the three- month rule she has will more her father’s implemented means I can’t scare her away. I irregular she of all people might realize that the caustic, hostile routine isn’t a routine at all. This girl might just figure out what I’m truthfully rotten to the core.

It’s better than she does; I just need to delay that realization for a while.

Three months, specifically. I’m not saying I’m going to be nice to her. I have no intention of going all friendly on her ass. But I’ll do whatever it takes to prevent her from realizing that I’m deader inside than she can know. I’ll do whatever it takes to ensure that little Kellie gets the treatment she needs, the same can be said for all my girls, I look out for. I will not, however, accompany her on her morning ‘runs,’ and I use that word loosely.

The boy will, he freaked up he gets it, honey nut cheerios she will be having I am sure of that, he- he- he! I love it, its time she gets it in, god, like a real on even, I like the real deal! Being me! Get it in- like, your only young ounces, find a boy, girls like me find a boy with the one you like! ‘There’s a treadmill in the gym,’ I say, continuing along the path. We can do it in that room at the school! ‘Is there? Colettolyn said.’ she asks, falling into step beside me.

‘Rumor has it you don’t use it there with you pass meetups.’ ‘You know, this...?’ I say as though realization just struck, in the thought of that girl. Karly said you did. ‘I just had the best idea.

How about we do not do this chatty little shared morning together? You go ahead and scamper back up to the house with your flip-floppy fitting shoes, and I’ll continue slithering along this path alone.

Yeah?’

His- joke- ‘A teacher is teaching a class, and she sees that Johnny isn’t paying attention, so she asks him, ‘If three ducks are sitting on a fence, and you shoot one, how many are left?’ Johnny says, ‘None.’ The teacher asks, ‘Why?’

Johnny says, ‘Because the shot scared them all off.’

The teacher says, ‘No, two, but I like how you’re thinking.’ Johnny asks the teacher, ‘If you see three women walking out of an ice cream parlor, one is licking her ice cream, one is sucking her ice cream, and one is biting her ice cream, which one is married?’ The teacher says, ‘The one sucking her ice cream.’ Johnny says, ‘No, the one with the wedding ring, but I like how you’re thinking!’

Her- Joke back- ‘The teacher asked me, ‘Why is your cat at school today?’ I replied crying, ‘Because I heard my girlfriend tell my mommy, ‘I am going to eat your p*ssy so that is why she is at the school today!’

Nice!

I snort, he so funny, I didn’t want to... ‘Please. Where’d we talk more, online?’ She’s silent for a second. ‘They got great chatting it up.’ ‘I’m sure they did. Probably by people who liked the pretty pink color.’ ‘What’s wrong with the color?’ ‘For lipstick? Nothing,’ I say, even though I have no idea why I'm continuing this conversation. The innocuousness of it feels suspiciously standard.

'Let me guess,' she says. 'Your high school track team placed second in the state like a hundred years ago, and you're still reliving the glory?' I feel the love coming hard from inside me!

Chapter: 122

It sounds dirty

One-day later- Karly- oh...? God...? hose um- down... God, you tow-just freak in the lunchroom tables why don't ya! And the do something like that- yet can picture it, I am done. YAH! JUST GRAB her ASS- a boy-girl down the way said, as they were doing as they do on the Discovery channel! 'A hundred years ago? Exactly how old do you think I am?

And no, I didn't run track in high school.' A thin line of my black lashes lined in and out eyes at her. 'Is that a crack about the thrash?'

'Oh yeah, can we talk about that for a second me and liv, I see I do not need anymore?' she asks, peering down at the object in question. 'That whole snake thing is a reference to your penis, right?' Karly said you want me to kiss you, baby, it will make you feel better. Sure! She said.

We are so freaked up! Is Love- love, right?

Get'n it- form anyone or at any time... that how it is these days, girl brake up one night after sex and do it with your friend the night. That's HIGH SCHOOL for a popular preppie type, like me now. I starting to look more and more like the girl on the cam I said to Liv- 'Awh- that is okay, we all know, anyway.'

Oh- that is NICE! I am not scared to lick or take anything on my girl down there and down more than that in the backside, neither is she if the love you finger and suck it all and in-between too. I kiss every inch, every inch as she does for me.

My footsteps falter than ever before or so it felt to me. This girl looks like a poster child for a church's youth group, opposite of Maddie, and the penis is so not a word I was prepared for. She loves the lord yet not a d*ick. Not in this context, anyway. 'Seriously?' I ask, annoyed at being thrown off guard. Not only does she invade my personal space and invite herself on a walk she undoubtedly wasn't invited on, but she's prying into my past, accusing me of being an old man with that and those don't work for her or me sometimes, and now dropping penis into conversation like we're discussing the weather.

Olivia shrugs but doesn't make any move to head in the opposite direction. 'I think you should have gotten a jaguar cane. That would have been cool.' 'I'm just saying this,' she says with a shrug. 'It's a serpent head, and the way you use it keeps it sort of in the vicinity of, well... your snakehead. I figure that can't be a coincidence.' Sweet baby Jesus. 'It's a cane.

I can't use it and not have it in the vicinity of bull sh*t. Just never mind.

Can you please just trot along back to the house? Your Barbie shoes are going to get dirty out here.' I puckered brow. For a second, I almost tell her that I don't need any help upping the sexy hot factor. Then I remember that I'm not well, not anymore.

I'm the crippled, small-town version. Looking at photos doesn't even remind me, of that day of days and places of places.

I take a long breath of cold morning air to keep myself from letting the despair that's lodged in my throat come rushing out in an angry bellow. If I let her see even a graying of what's inside me, she'll be on her way back to my school days. In addition to alluring as that is, I need her here. At least until I formulate a plan for what the hell to do with my life, now I asked the question, with anger and fear and desperation.

In anticipation of then, I have to keep her around in a way that doesn't make me want to strangle her or push her against a nearby tree and kiss her nonsensically. Or better yet, none at all. 'How long have you been running?' I ask, almost choking on the inane, unimportant question. It's been so long since I've had a casual conversation that it feels both unnatural and strangely familiar.

Plus, it keeps my mind off the way she fills out her pink running shirt. Practicality tells me she's got a sports bra under there- probably pink- but it doesn't stop me from fantasizing about seeing

Olivia in less utilitarian undergarments. 'The running thing's kind of new,' she replies, jerking, lurching, and shuddering me back to the dialogue exchange.

'Tolerant yet as soon as I think I am out they suck me back into them!'

'Shocker,' I mutter out to them in a grumble.

'Well, sorry I'm not you.'

I smile a little at her. 'That's the only sprinter you know, isn't it?'

'Maybe. Jeez. What is it with you and running? I didn't realize that track trivia would be part of the job necessities parts,' she says, her tone maddened, as we take a sharp right turn in the path, bringing us closer to the water.

'I miss it.' My answer is simple and a good deal more revealing than I intended.

I half expect her to mock me. To inform me that there are more important things in life than the ability to run, or to pacify me by telling me that there are other things I can do that are just as great.

Chapter: 123

Everlasting

Nods and gulp's Instead, she nods, and I whip my chin off the spit, but not in a pitying way, just a quick acknowledgment of my statement. 'I started running as an escape,' she says after several seconds of silence. I glance down at her profile, noting that her nose is just slightly upturned and kind of cute. 'An outflow from what?' She glances back at me, and our eyes collide for one charged moment. The message is clear: she'll tell me her secrets when I tell her mine.

Which will be never- ever... never- ever - ever happen.

'Your inhalation's all wide of the mark,' I say, tearing my eyes away from hers.

'My breathing's fine, I feel find you fine, I am fine where all find to move on.' 'Not if you want to run more than three miles. Your breaths are too shallow with a swallow. You need to inhale deeper. Engage your diaphragm. And get used to matching the breaths to your steps. For your slow pace, inhale for maybe three or four steps, then exhale for the same.' 'That seems like a lot of thinking for something that's supposed to be natural.' 'You'll get used to it if you suck it in harder.' 'Okay, what else?' she says, spreading her arms wide, think of your legs when you're with your girlfriend. 'Am I bowlegged? My ponytail not high enough?'

'Just start with the breathing for now,' I say, irritation run in and out starting to set in as I realize how much I want to be the one running, not the one telling somebody else how to run.

'Sure thing, Coach,' she murmurs.

‘So-o, by any chance, does your sudden sympathy for running mean you want to be all by yourself?’ She mopes making a sad face, with a pouting lip and so on. ‘Not really. Why?’
‘Jesus, take a hint and do what is implied- already.’

‘Ah. You want me to leave you to your ruminating.’

‘Yup-per.’

She stops walking immediately and pivots so she’s facing back toward the house. ‘Fine. I’ll try to master your little breathing activity on the way back. Same time tomorrow?’

‘Nope, find another time to run and on my time if you don’t get it.’ ‘I’m getting paid, either way, do what you like its wrong be to do it your way, I’ll keep you company, you know over here looking down on you shaking my head when you F- it up.’

‘Well, do so in silence, and from far afield.’

She sighs as though I’m a peevish child. ‘It’s shocking that none of your other companions stuck around for more than a twosome of weeks.

Shocking, I say.’ ‘See you later,’ I say all with F- you in my mind, not at all happy with the outcome of everything, nodding with my cane back toward the house. ‘See ya, I said to my girls,’ she says as she begins walking backward so that she’s still finished - facing me. ‘Also, fun little trivia for this morning? In the argument for your uncalled - for breathing advice?’ ‘No thanks, do I want more of this sh*t.’

Chapter: 124

Open mouth

She ignores me and points to the cane. ‘That cane? All for the show. You haven’t used it once to support your weight this entire time.’

I open my mouth to argue, but instead, my jaw goes a little slack as it hits me.

She’s right...

...And I haven’t once thought about my leg or my scars.

She’s already jogging away from me, and I stand still for several minutes, watching her until she disappears around a bend in the path. Then I continue with my walk, telling myself I’m relieved to have my solitude back. And if there’s the slightest undercurrent of loneliness, I ignore it.

Olivia- After my shower, I go looking for Paul.

He’s not in his library or the kitchen. Halfway back up the stairs, I hear the hard, driving music from the direction of his bedroom. I didn’t grow up with a brother

(or a sister, for that matter,) but I’m pretty sure all that scary guitar noise is dude code for-

‘keep the hell out.’

Fine with me...

I’m not sure which encounter feels stranger: the kiss in the library last night, or the unexpected predawn walk/run, where we almost connected for like a half-second before he reverted to butt-hole mode.

Returning to my bedroom, I check my email, ignoring everything except the message from Harry Langdon. I hit reply and proceed to vomit out a bunch of lies about how 'Paul and I are going to do just fine together!'

It's not like I can tell him the truth: that I'm not at all sure how to survive three months with his gorgeous, tormented son.

And then, because I have no idea what else I'm supposed to be doing, I take myself on a little tour of the Langdon estates.

The compound is just as enormous and impressive in the morning as it was at twilight, and although everything is state-of-the-art, right down to the sound system in the small house, which Mick insists on showing me, I can't help but feel like I've stepped back into another era where some desolate duke reigns over a semi-abandoned estate.

The gym, in particular, is depressing. It has enough equipment for an entire football team, which is a little pathetic considering only one person is using it, and according to Harry Langdon's earlier emails, Paul only works his upper body- not the leg that so desperately needs rehabilitation.

Yet- I wasn't lying this morning when I pointed out that he doesn't seem to need his cane. Admittedly, my psychology expertise is limited to one throwaway psych class during my freshman year at NYU, but I'd bet serious money that Paul Langdon's issues are a lot more in his head than in his leg.

And I suspect that, deep down, he knows it too.

Which is why he's avoiding me.

He's not trying to run me off with the same sort of hostile enthusiasm he displayed yesterday, but he's certainly not seeking me out. I'm disappointed but not surprised. After all, he's made it very clear that he can't stand anything about me. Not my personality, not my running technique, not my pink shoes- Later, Lindy asks me to take Paul lunch- homemade minestrone and a ham sandwich- but when I bring it into the study, the room is still empty. However, there's a glass of some brown alcohol on the desk that I know wasn't there earlier, so he's not locked in his bedroom anymore.

Yup. Avoiding me. I take the tumbler of liquor out with me after setting the tray on the desk. I'm not a teetotaler by any means, but the last thing this guy needs is to be drinking before noon.

When I get back to the kitchen, I dump the alcohol down the sink, perversely hoping that I've just tossed something extremely expensive.

I spend the next couple of hours in my room. I call my mom and give her a glossy, half-truth-filled version of my first day. Next- I call Bella, and although I fill her in on the fact that Paul is younger than expected and ridiculously sexy (best friend privilege; I can't tell her,) I stop short of confiding that I'm both drawn to him and utterly terrified by him. I certainly don't tell her about the kiss.

But something else has been bothering me since last night.

In those first moments, after I pulled back, deliberately degrading her, she was shocked and angry, as she was supposed to be. But in the moments, that followed, there was something else that pissed me off: resignation. In a matter of seconds, the angry, betrayed light went out of her eyes, and she just stood there, accepting what I'd just done as though it were her due.

I may not know Olivia Middleton well- okay; I don't know her at all, but I do know that she deserves more than what she got from me last night.

There's a soft knock at the door, and I hate that my head shoots up in the expectation and my heart seems to beat just a little bit faster.

Then I remember: Olivia doesn't knock. It's Lindy.

'You look tired,' Lindy murmurs as she sets the tray with my lunch on my desk.

'Yeah.' I dig the heels of my hands into my eyes. 'Rough Night.'

She nods.

'Same with Olivia. She was up early, but I sent her right back to bed. The girl looked like she hadn't slept a wink.'

I catch myself before I can beg for more detail. Did she tell Lindy what happened? I scan the housekeeper's familiar features carefully, looking for any clue, but Lindy's calm and expressionless, as always. I like that about her. She's one of the few people who've figured out how to be there for me without acting like a goddamned battering ram. Are you listening, Dad? And all your doctor and shrinks with your bullsh*t about how PTSD can be cured?

But just for the briefest second, I wish she'd ask. I wish someone would ask what happened. How I am. Something other than the vapid Need anything?

Hell yes, I need something. I need someone to care for.

Nevaeh

Book: 18

Dusking Lust

Chapter: 125

Part: 1

‘You’re not drinking today,’ Lindy says, eyeing my coffee mug.

I raise my eyebrows as if to say, and?

-And-

She shrugs in response. ‘I asked your father for a weekend off. It won’t be for a couple of weeks yet, but I’m giving you a heads-up now.’

‘Fine,’ I muttered, relieved that she dropped the topic of my drinking. I’ve been telling myself all morning I’m laying off the whiskey because of my headache. Not because a certain green-eyed girl has made me all too aware that I might be using alcohol for all the wrong reasons.

‘Mick is taking some time off too,’ Lindy says, heading toward the door. ‘We’re headed to Pittsburgh for a little getaway. Your father offered to get us a hotel. Thought we’d go to the movies. Have someone cook for me for a change.’

Wait, what? My father is giving his employees free vacations now? And the two of them are taking it together? I try to think back to the times I’ve seen Mick and Lindy together. Not often, but then I make a point of ignoring everyone as often as possible. Are they - you know? Good for them if they are. At least someone should be getting some.

‘Cool,’ I say.

Lindy purses her lips. ‘You’ll be fine. For food and stuff. I mean, it won’t be my cooking, but...’

Technically she's talking to me, but I know from her tone she's trying to reassure herself that she's not abandoning me.

I give her a look. 'Do you have any idea what they feed soldiers in Afghanistan? I'll be fine.'

'Olivia tells us she's handy enough around the kitchen,' Lindy responds, as though she didn't hear me. 'I'm sure you can survive on scrambled eggs or grilled cheese, or whatever she has in her repertoire.'

Olivia.

Me and Olivia.

Alone. In the house.

Olivia in itty-bitty pajamas, with full breasts and long, toned legs.

Olivia with her don't-freak-with-me green eyes and lips that taste better than the most expensive Scotch on the market.

I won't survive it.

'Whatever,' I mutter.

I keep one eye on the door as I eat, half expecting Olivia to come barging in with that Andrew Jackson book she's about two pages into, insisting that we share a meal. But the door stays shut. The house stays quiet.

After lunch, I try to read, but I can't concentrate. Instead, I head to the gym. Usually, I hit the gym first thing in the morning, after I walked along the water and before my shower, but I didn't have the energy this morning. Not after last night.

The gym is, admittedly, ridiculous. It's huge by normal standards, but considering that only one person uses it, it's downright absurd. Mick and Lindy are welcome to use it, but they're not exactly fitness buffs. It's just me.

I move steadily through my routine, relishing the familiar burn as I push my upper body to the limit. The truth is, from the waist up, I'm in better shape than I was at the peak of my military training, and that's saying something. On some level, I guess I know that it has to do with overcompensating for the bad leg, but I don't give a sh*t.

For some reason, I can't stop thinking about my leg today, all too aware that it's only going to get weaker and weaker. I keep it in usable shape by taking my daily walks. I'm not a complete idiot. I might not buy any of that physical therapy bullsh*t, but I know that unused limbs atrophy and all that. But I draw the line at any lower-body exercises in here, even for my good leg. It's too much of a reminder of where I used to be, and where I'll never be again. No squats. No lifts. No leg presses -

I push the thought aside, and with the last grunt, I finish my set of presses. I lie on my back on the bench, chest heaving.

'You're going to wind up hideously out of proportion if you keep that up.'

The voice is unexpected, and I sit up so quickly that I almost hit my head on the bar.

Olivia.

She's wearing a sports bra and matching athletic shorts in - wait for it - pink. There's an iPod in her hand and a water bottle under her arm. She's here to use the gym herself, not to hound me. Probably could have figured that out from the way she looks. The boobs might be God-given, but the rest of her has been well earned.

She moves toward me, and although her ponytail is as perky as ever, she has shadows under her eyes and her expression is more guarded than it was yesterday.

She's put walls between us, keeping me at a distance.

I feel a flash of regret, even as I mentally congratulate her. And myself.

Mission accomplished, asshole.

'You're going to be disproportionate,' she repeats. 'All bulky and ridiculous on top, and scrawny on the bottom.'

'I'm not scrawny,' I say immediately. Why are we talking about this instead of last night?

She comes closer, reaching out a hand and plucking at the fabric of my pants. She raises an eyebrow. 'Yeah? When was the last time you wore shorts?'

I lift my eyebrows right back. 'You saw me in boxers last night. Did you see scrawny?'

She snatches her hand back. 'We're not talking about last night.'

'I thought you'd be back in New York by now. Or at least all up my face demanding an apology.'

Her expression never changes. 'I thought about it. But I need some distance from New York, and I know better than to expect an apology, so -' She holds out her arms as though to say, here we are, deal with it.

Her matter-of-fact reaction to last night pisses me off. She should be demanding an apology- what the hell is wrong with her that she isn't? Even more annoying - why do I want to give one?

'When was the last time you did any sort of lower-body workout?' she asks, oblivious to my inner turmoil.

I snatch her water bottle and take a long drink as I study her. 'Not your business.'

She pretends to think about this. 'Oh, wait for a second, actually it is my business. If you want, I can get you my job description. It specifically says-'

'I'm sure it does,' I interrupt. 'But you can go ahead and scratch that physical portion off because I'm not doing it.'

'Ten leg lifts,' she says calmly, ignoring me.

'What?' I ask, annoyed, as I get into a standing position. 'No way.'

'We can start them easy. No weight at all.'

'I'm going back to the house,' I mutter, leaning down to grab my towel.

She moves in front of me. 'Five. Leg lifts.'

I roll my eyes. 'You're a terrible negotiator. You lower your price too quickly even before you've offered an enticing reward.'

‘I’m not haggling with you for the thrill of it. I’m just trying to do my job.’ She puts her hands on her hips. It reminds me that my hands were in that very spot not so long ago. And that I want them to be there again.

I tear my eyes away from the enticing points of her hip bone.

‘Why is this your job?’ I ask.

She jerks her shoulders back a little, defensively. Interesting. ‘What?’

‘Why is coaxing me to work my sh*t leg your job of choice? My little recon exercise says you were a marketing major. Didn’t Daddy want you in the lucrative family business?’

Her eyes flit away from mine. ‘Sure. That was the original plan.’

‘What changed?’ I ask, surprised to realize that I’m genuinely interested.

‘Life,’ she snaps. ‘And we’re not talking about me.’

‘Obviously, we are,’ I counter, taking another gulp of her water.

She opens her mouth, probably to tell me to f*ck off, but then she seems to reconsider. She tilts her head, and just then I realize exactly what I’ve set myself up for.

‘I’ll trade you one question for ten leg lifts.’

‘Nope,’ I reply, already turning around. ‘No way.’

‘Come on,’ she says, scooting around to get in front of me. ‘Don’t you want to know why a hot twenty-two-year-old with everything going for her is hiding out here in Maine?’

I give her a glance over my shoulder. ‘Did you just call yourself hot?’

Olivia smiles a gotcha smile. ‘Aren’t I?’

I flick my eyes over her. Yes. ‘Maybe.’

‘So, you’re in? Ten leg lifts for one question?’

I hesitate, even though my brain is demanding I walk away now. ‘Will I get the real story?’ I ask. ‘Or some bullsh*t evasion?’

‘I’ll give you a true statement, but no guarantees that it’s the whole story. Final offer.’

‘Not good enough.’

She sighs. ‘How about I’ll give you a true statement, and I’ll let you give me running pointers tomorrow?’

I put a hand on my chest. ‘I can’t believe this is happening. All my dreams are coming true.’

‘You in or out, Langdon?’

Walk away. Walk the hell away.

Her green eyes are practically bursting with a challenge. And, even more intriguing, secrets.

‘Freak it. I’m in.’

Olivia-

Yeah, okay. So, agreeing to answer Paul Langdon’s questions isn’t going to go into my Good Choices Hall of Fame. But to be fair, I’ve been pretty short on good choices lately, so this feels about par for the course.

However, that doesn’t make it any easier to think about the possibility of spilling my guts, even though I fully intend to censor the heck out of whatever truth I have to give him.

For a second I’m about to back out and tell him there’s no way I’m going to spill my guts just to bribe him to do something he should have started a long time ago.

But then I see the tension on his face when he looks at the waiting leg-press machine. He’s nervous. I mean, he’s pissed too, because I’m guessing I’m not the only one who’s furious about getting back into a corner.

But it’s not Paul’s anger that has me swallowing my pride and pushing on with our agreement, even at the expense of my privacy. It’s his unease.

He’s afraid of failing.

As he starts to head toward the leg-press machine like it’s the guillotine, I mentally throw away the bubblegum pep talk that I figure is written in the Caretaker 101 textbook for this type of situation. We’re supposed to be our client’s cheerleaders, but this guy needs something entirely different. Acting entirely on instinct, my hand reaches out and gives him a sharp smack on the ass.

He halts, throwing me an incredulous look over his shoulder. His very nice, very sculpted shoulder, by the way.

‘What was that?’ He snaps.

I shrug as though touching his firm and, um, perfect ass cheek is no big deal.

‘Thought you needed a little encouragement.’

He lifts his eyebrows. ‘Oh, I could use some encouragement.’

Why don’t I show you what sort of encouragement would rev my engines?’ His eyes drop to my chest, and my nipples tighten in response.

Well - crap. That backfired.

I shoo- him forward. ‘Chop- chop, Langdon. I don’t have all day. Women need to exercise too.’

He gives me an understanding nod. ‘Kegels. I get it.’

I make a face and jab a finger at the bench. ‘Sit.’

There’s no fear on his face anymore. It’s perfectly blank, as though he’s preparing himself for failure.

‘Okay,’ I say, moving over to the machine, grateful that my mom- had me going to a personal trainer since I was sixteen. Sort of psycho, now that I think about it, but at least I know my way around weight machines.

His right leg immediately falls into place, but he hesitates before moving his left leg into position. He’s wearing blue sweatpants, so I can’t see his injured leg, and although I hate to admit it, I’m kind of glad.

Granted, I could have looked at it- last night when I barged in on him in his boxers, but I had more important things to worry about. Like the fact that the guy had some seriously messed-up dreams. And that he knew his way all too well around my body in way too short a time.

‘Olivia -’

‘Don’t apologize,’ she says quietly. ‘I shouldn’t have tried. I’m sorry.’

She reaches down to pick up the purse that she dropped and scoops her keys off the counter. ‘Mick said I could borrow one of the cars. I won’t be late, but I have my cell if you need anything.’ She heads toward the door.

‘Wait,’ I say, moving toward her.

Olivia pauses, giving me a look over her shoulder. ‘What?’

‘I -I...’

I have no freaking idea what I’m trying to say. I don’t know if I want to tell her to stay or have fun, or something even more godawful and unimaginable, like beg her to take me with her.

Take me with you on a Friday night where there are people and beers and laughter and sh*tty music, and my old friend Kali.

But I say none of those things, especially not the last one.

I don’t go out. Not anymore.

‘Thanks for making me dinner,’ I say gruffly.

This time she doesn’t even turn around. ‘Just doing my job, Langdon.’

Olivia-

I’ve never been to a bar by myself.

And I can’t say I’ve ever imagined my first foray into solo drinking being at a tiny local bar on the outskirts of Bar Harbor, Maine. But tonight, I force myself.

Lately, I’ve been terrified that Paul’s reclusiveness will be contagious. Like if I don’t get some outside human interaction, I’ll turn into a hostile turd like him, and become this wretched beast who doesn’t have to be accountable to anyone for my pissed moods.

That’s only part of the reason I left the house tonight. Truthfully? I hoped he’d come with me. Not that I asked. I intentionally didn’t ask, being stupid enough to imagine that the thought of being left all alone might be enough to spur Paul into leaving the house of his own volition.

I planned to make it look very much like I wanted him to stay. I made what Google claimed to be the Ultimate World-Famous Chili, avoided him all day (actually, he avoided me first, but whatever,) and I dressed carefully in an outfit intended to be sexy but understated. You know, a girl going out on the town for her amusement, but if she happened to meet a cute guy, then hey, why not?

But Paul didn't take the bait. I guess I should count it as progress that he even came out of his lair in search of food, but the truth is, I'm disappointed. It's just not right for a twentysomething guy to be cooped up in the house for years. How long until all of that isolation turns him into one of those weird hermits who can't function in normal society even if he wanted to?

I'm parked outside of Frenchy's. I want to turn right back around and go home, but Lindy's lecture from earlier that afternoon is still rattling around in my brain. Just because he wants to pretend, he's dead doesn't mean you have to. We may not be New York City, but we have good people here. Work your thing, sister.

Okay, so the talk had been half sweet, half awkward, but Lindy made a good point. I don't want to end up like Paul: socially stunted and on a one-way street toward freakdom.

I get out of the car.

From the outside, Frenchy's- I assume the name comes from its location on Frenchman Bay- looks like a combination of a ski lodge and roadside dive. The wood beams give it a homey, welcoming feeling, while the smattering of neon beer signs in the windows lends just the right amount of bar vibe. On the right side of the building is a covered deck, which I imagine is the place to be on a clear summer's day, but in late September it's deserted. However, the faint thump of music shows that inside, at least, there's some activity.

I take a deep breath and open the door.

My worst-case scenario is that the entire place falls silent as everyone turns to stare at the newcomer. The best case is nobody notices me and I can find a bar stool, preferably on the end, where I can sit and get my bearings.

The reality is somewhere in between. The old-school rock music rocks on as I step inside, and although the majority of the clientele is far enough along in whiskey and beer to be oblivious to my arrival, people at the handful of tables nearest the door turn to glance at me. And then glance a second time.

Lindy assured me that this was a local hangout, a place where I'd fit right in, but I think she may have been forgetting the not-so-tiny detail that I'm not exactly a local. I don't fit right in. Not even a tiny bit.

Even if my clothes don't scream city girl (which they do,) I stand out just under being a girl at all. I count maybe five women, sure, but the majority of the clientele is men. Fishermen, judging from the attire.

Still, it's not quite the painful scene I was fearing. It's uncomfortable, sure, but most of the looks are curious, not lecherous or leering. I give a tentative smile to a middle-aged couple, and the woman gives me a half-smile back as her companion turns back to his phone and beer, totally disinterested.

Although there are plenty of available tables, sitting alone at a table somehow seems a little too lonely considering I'm after human companionship, so I make my way to a cluster of empty bar stools.

Almost immediately a glass of water is in front of me, followed by a white paper coaster with Frenchy's scribbled across the middle in a no-nonsense font.

'What can I get yah?' Asks a friendly voice.

The bartender is a cute brunette with freckles and warm honey-brown eyes.

Her hair pulled up in one of those messy buns that some girls make look adorable. She's one of those girls.

'Um, white wine?' I ask, hoping it's not a terrible faux pas in a place like this.

'I've got a chardonnay or a pinot grigio. The chard's way better.'

'I'll have that, then,' I say, returning her friendly smile.

She plunks a glass in front of me before heading to the fridge and pulling out the wine bottle.

'Not a lot of wine drinkers?' I ask, noticing that the bottle is unopened.

She shrugs. 'Beer's the drink of choice, but more people are getting wine now that I got rid of the sugary swill they used to serve here.'

'Oh, wow,' I say as she fills my glass way beyond the typical pour.

'You look like you need it,' she says with a wink before sliding back down the bar to check on the other patrons.

She's right on two fronts- the chardonnay is delicious, and I do need it.

I watch the bartender out of the corner of my eye she chats up an old guy at the end of the bar, she laughs long and genuine as he tells her some story about his grandson's antics.

Lindy didn't describe the mysterious Kali to me beyond saying that she's a 'good sort,' but the age is about right, and I wonder if this is Paul's childhood summer friend.

When she makes her way toward me again to refill my water, I get up the nerve to ask.

'Yeah, I'm Kali,' she says, looking a little surprised by the question. 'Have we met?'

'Nope, I'm new to the area.'

'Yeah, I guessed that by the silk shirt,' she says in a confidential whisper.

'I'm betting it costs more than a car payment for most of us in here. Tourist?'

'Sort of,' I hedged. 'I'm working over at the Langdon house.'

Her smile slips. 'Paul's place?'

'Yeah.'

She stands up straighter, her palms flat against the bar as she studies me, almost protective. 'You don't look like Langdon employee material.'

Her tone isn't unkind, but it's clear I'm being evaluated. 'What do I look like?'

She shrugs. 'A few years ago- I would have pegged you as girlfriend material for Paul. But now...?'

We make eye contact and have one of those weird moments of female understanding. We both know he doesn't do girlfriends anymore. 'I'm the new caregiver,' I say quietly. 'Although that word never quite feels right.'

‘Yeah, Paul’s never really been one to be taken care of. At least, not as I remember him.’

I lean forward a little, desperate to keep her talking, but not wanting to come off as prying. ‘You haven’t seen him since he came back?’

She shakes her head and needlessly tops off my wine glass- a good sign that she’s not trying to get rid of me. ‘Nah. My folks’ place isn’t too far from his house. The Langdon used to rent that place where they live, you know. Paul’s father only bought it a couple of years ago when he needed a full-time, um, retreat for Paul. I live closer to town now, but back when we were kids, I lived for the day when Paul would show up for those couple of weeks in the summer.’

I quickly stamp down the surge of jealousy. They were just kids, for God’s sake. Friends. At least I think they were just friends. And not that it’s any of my business if they were more.

‘He knows you’re here tonight?’ she asks, her tone casual. Too casual. I know what she’s asking: Why hasn’t he come to see me?

‘He, um - he’s not so much the social type,’ I say.

‘Yeah,’ she mutters. ‘I gathered that after getting turned away at the door every day for a month after he moved in.’

My heart twists a little at the sadness in her voice.

What the hell, Paul? It’s clear to me now that he’s friendless and alone because he wants to be. Not because everybody shunned him.

‘How’s he doing?’ she asks. ‘I mean, we all hear things, but you know small towns and their rumors. It’s hard to pull out the facts.’

‘He’s probably about like you’ve heard,’ I say, maintaining eye contact.

‘Rude, angry, and generally unpleasant.’

‘Well now,’ a low voice says from behind me. ‘There’s something to make a guy’s heart skip a beat.’

I freeze at the familiar voice. Too late I realize that the place has grown mostly quiet, save for the music. I turn around and realize that the awkward staring I've been expecting has finally commenced.

Only they're not staring at me.

They're staring at Paul.

His eyes hold mine for several seconds, his thumb doing that slow stroking over the head of his cane before his eyes move over my shoulder and lock on the girl behind the bar. 'Hey, Kali.'

Please don't reject him, I silently beg of her. Please understand how big a moment this is for him.

I don't know if she hears my unspoken plea or if she's just a good sort of person because she doesn't throw a beer in his face or make any kind of snotty remark. Instead, she launches herself across the bar and winds her arms around his neck. It's a hug. The stunning look of pleasure on his face almost breaks my heart.

When Kali releases him, Paul gives an almost shy smile and starts to sit on the stool to my right, but then inexplicably moves around to sit on the other side of me.

The pressure in my chest tightens as I realize what he's just done. He's intentionally sat with the scarred side of his face toward me, his good side facing everyone else.

He trusts me.

The realization makes me ridiculously warm.

'What can I get you?' Kali asks. 'Last time we drank together; it was sneaking citrus vodka out of your dad's liquor cabinet.'

Paul laughs. 'I've graduated. How about whiskey and Coke?'

Kali plops the drink down in front of him before reluctantly moving back down the bar to attend to a gesturing patron.

Several people are still looking our way and whispering, but Paul seems determined to ignore them, and I follow suit.

‘So, my chili was that bad?’ I ask, taking a sip of my wine.

He stabs at his ice with the stir stick. ‘I had some. It wasn’t awful.’

‘It was amazing, and you know it. Take back what you said about me not being able to cook.’

The corner of his mouth turns up slightly. ‘I found a sandwich in the fridge. I’m guessing you made it for lunch and then took it away because I was hiding like a little b*tch?’

I tap my nose. Bingo.

He smirks. ‘Well, I had a bite of the sandwich. Completely pedestrian.’

‘It was turkey and cheddar on wheat. What the hell were you expecting for lunch, some sort of asiago soufflé and escarole salad?’

Paul snorts. ‘Your New York is showing.’

He has a point. I’ve long been part of the high-priced wine bar and frou-frou café set. Asiago soufflés used to be part of an average Wednesday. Even though

I’ve been holed up here in Maine for all of a few weeks, those days feel like they were forever ago. It somehow feels exactly right to be perched on this worn leather stool at a wooden bar that looks older than I am, sitting next to a guy who’s a one-part beautiful mystery and one-part unpredictable beast.

‘You can relax,’ I say quietly. ‘Everyone’s gone back to their business.’

‘Only because they can’t see the scars from this angle. If they could, they’d be heading toward the door or puking up their onion rings.’

‘I see them, and I’m not running toward the door.’

His eyes flick to mine then, and for a second there’s this moment between us.

She comes back and the moment’s gone. I don’t resent her. Not really. She represents a normal side of Paul that I haven’t been able to access- his pre- Afghanistan self. And her response to his new appearance couldn’t have been more perfect.

It’s official: I don’t get women.

Olivia should be pissed at me. Just a few hours ago, I would have sworn that she was. But now she's changing it up, and I don't like it at all. I don't trust forgiveness I didn't earn.

The weird thing is, I never used to be so clueless with girls. I won't pretend that I'm a mind reader or anything, but of course, I know that fine never means fine, and if you ask a girl if you can skip a date to go to a Red Sox game with your friends, she will probably say, 'Go ahead,' which means you're a dead man.

I've had a few girlfriends. Only one was serious. Serious enough that we did the long-distance thing when I went to Afghanistan. When I got back, a well-meaning nurse told me that Ashley had come by to see me, once.

Honestly, I don't blame her for not sticking around after she saw my mangled face. My scars are ugly now, but early on when the wounds were fresh, I was downright grotesque.

My dad mentioned that Ashley got married to the son of one of his vice presidents and had twins. I don't know if he meant it to be a wake-up call or what, but the truth is I didn't feel much of anything when he told me.

The point is, I used to know girls. But this thing with Olivia is a whole other ball game.

Sometime in the past hour, she's gone from acting like I'm a ticking bomb to being, well, friendly. Which is not to say that she's been unfriendly. In a couple of weeks since I basically called her a useless hooker and then threw her ex-boyfriend in her face, leaving her to cry alone at night (is there a gold medal for assholes? I've earned it,) Olivia hasn't done the prissy silent treatment thing, and I give her props for that.

But even though she's been perfectly civil, things have been different.

The conversation is shallower. She never touches me anymore, not even accidentally.

More often than not she avoids prolonged eye contact, and she's taken to 'reading alone' in the afternoons so she can concentrate.

I should be thrilled. I accomplished my goal of distance quite easily. It's supposed to feel like a reward. Instead, it feels an awful lot like punishment.

I miss her...

But that's not to say that there aren't alarm bells going off in my head right now. Because without warning, the old Olivia is back. And I'm way too relieved for comfort.

Her long, slim fingers appear in front of my face and she snaps rapidly three times. 'Yo... Langdon. A toddler can do more squats than you. Focus.'

See what I mean? Old Olivia... The sassy version who doesn't treat me like an invalid. We're in the gym, and she's doing her tough-love physical trainer thing, which is both annoying and cute as hell.

Her hair is pulled into a high, perky fountain, reminding me a little of a cheerleader, and she's wearing purple instead of the usual pink. Except for the shoes. The shoes are still pink. She insists on wearing the old pink ones on days when she doesn't run because she has a limit on how many days per week, she's willing to look like, and I quote, 'a freaking hobo.'

What she's wearing doesn't matter, though. Because she's got me right where she wants me.

I'm doing squats.

With weight. Not much weight, and nothing even close to what I was managing before the ambush. But the steady, repetitive bend-and-straighten motion isn't something I imagined doing ever again in any capacity. My leg doesn't even hurt. Much.

I refocus my efforts, and with Olivia looking on, I finish the last set of reps.

She grins, making it all worth it. 'How'd it feels...?'

'Sh*tty,' I say, doing my best to resist her good mood.

She takes a step closer. I step back, but I'm pinned in by the weight machine. The little minx has me cornered. She scoots up nice and close. In other words, torment.

'Liar,' she says. 'It feels good, and you know it.'

Christ. Is she talking about the exercise or her nearness? Because one felt great, but the other is bittersweet agony.

Her eyes flick to my lips just briefly before she takes a step back.

My eyes narrow. She's up to something.

‘I don’t suppose- I could talk you into doing my yoga routine with me?’ she asks, rolling her shoulders as though to loosen them.

‘Hell, no,’ I mutter. ‘I’ve got nothing against yoga. It’s just that watching you do yoga is a good deal more interesting than participating.’

Her eyes go dark, and I smile in satisfaction. Two can play this game.

But by the time she unrolls her yoga mat- pink- and starts with the now-familiar poses, it’s clear that she’s winning. Watching Olivia do yoga is, in fact, interesting, but it’s also torment. Is it just my imagination, or is she holding that downward-facing dog position just a second longer than necessary? And I’m pretty sure I don’t remember that position where she arches her back quite like that from previous days.

Those damned tight yoga pants girls like to wear are tempting enough when they’re not doing yoga. But when her butt’s in the air all tight and cute?

Sh*t. By the time she contorts herself into something that’s her grabbing her ankles, I’m f*cking sweating.

Is there a yoga position that involves her beneath me, hands pinned above her head, clothing-optional? Because then I might rethink her yoga offer. By the time she’s finished, I’m hard, even though I’ve been pretending to be adjusting the weights on one of the machines. She carefully ignores me. I ignore her right back as I move to refill my water bottle.

She tucks her yoga mat under her arm and we move toward the door together.

So, she says, her voice easy and sweet. Too sweet. I instantly go on guard as I hold the gym door open for her. Here it comes. Whatever she’s been working up to is finally coming to light.

‘Any nightmares lately?’ She asks.

I tense even further. ‘Nope.’

That’s a lie, and I can tell immediately that she knows it. Her lips flatten a little in disappointment that I don’t confide further, but what the hell does she expect? That she just has to wiggle her butt around and badger me into exercising and I’ll suddenly go all ‘Dear Diary’ on her?

She recovers quickly. ‘Okay. Next question. Why’d you say that thing about Ethan when your dad was here?’

I almost choke on my water. Talk about a subject change.

‘I’m an ass,’ I say, glancing briefly at her profile.

‘Finally, a true statement,’ she says as we get closer to the house.

She’s probably waiting for an apology, but I’m not really in the mood.

Olivia doesn’t ask anything more, but I’m still tense, certain that I’m missing something. Two unrelated questions delivered back to back, but with no push for a real answer? It’s all very un-female- very un- Olivia. What the hell is she up to this time?

Once inside the main house, she immediately starts up the stairs. Still lost in thought, I start to follow her up, my eyes still sort of checking out her ass, because, you know, yoga pants. That and more than two years of celibacy. My dad knew exactly what he was doing, sending a twentysomething in here for my ‘recovery.’

Olivia turns around abruptly, and I’m caught staring, but I don’t care.

She’s a step-in front of me, so I’m looking up at her, and I lift my eyebrows in question, bracing.

Here it comes. Her trump cards.

‘Hey, I just realized something,’ she says.

I roll my eyes. Sure, you did. ‘Okay?’

Her eyes sparkle in triumph. ‘Your cane. You left it in the gym.’

Her casual observation has me taking a full step backward on the stairs.

She’s right... What... The... Hell.

I stand there long after she’s skipped up the steps. I’m unable to move. Almost unable to breathe.

She’s right. I walked the entire way, not only without my cane but without even realizing I didn’t have my cane.

The thought should elate me, but I can't shake the dark sense of foreboding. No matter where I look, my walls are crumbling, and this damned girl keeps presenting me the most dangerous element of all.

Hope...

Olivia...

On some level, I guess I must be bracing for his nightmares. My bedroom is on the same floor as Paul's but not exactly next door, so I'm not sure I'd hear his shouts through two closed doors if I wasn't listening to them.

But I am listening to them.

I've heard them the past couple of nights too, but things have been so weird between us that I knew my presence was the last thing that would be of comfort to him.

Tonight, however, instinct leads me in a different direction. It leads me straight to Paul.

My feet are on the floor the second I hear his first cry. Knowing that he sleeps almost naked, this time I grab my robe and pull it over my boxers and tank top, knotting the belt as I move down the hall.

I hesitate outside his door, torn between wanting to allow him privacy and give him comfort. God knows that the last time I went barging in there in the middle of the night, it didn't exactly end well for my pride.

I hear a low moan.

Then 'Alex. Alex, no...'

Screw it.

He needs me.

The sheets are down around his waist, and there's just enough light to make out that he's shirtless.

Oh boy.

I take a deep breath and move toward the bed. One arm is flung up over his head, the other fisted at his side as his fingers flex against the bedding.

Moving slowly, I reach for his hand, taking it in mine as I sit beside the bed. I feel a little silly. The whole thing is very Florence Nightingale, but the need to comfort is almost overwhelming.

He makes another moaning noise.

Do I wake him? I did that last time, and he flipped his sh*t. But let him stay in whatever hell his sleeping mind's taken him seems cruel.

'Paul.'

He twitches.

'Paul.' Louder this time.

He stills, but his body's still rigid.

Gently I put a hand on his shoulder, trying to shut out the shock waves that go through me at the contact of skin on skin. It's just a shoulder, Olivia.

'Wake up,' I say softly.

He's stopped crying out, but his breathing is harsh and ragged.

'Paul!' I shake him now.

His eyes fly open, and he lies perfectly still.

I stay still too, letting him get his bearings. I wait for the tension to ease and his breathing to become more regular, but it's almost as though the air becomes electric as he realizes my presence.

His eyes meet mine, and the mood goes from tense to intoxicating.

'This better still be part of my dream,' he says, his voice raspy.

I shake my head, afraid that if I talk, I'll break the moment. That he'll go ballistic like he did last time, drinking booze like it's going out of style and doling out bruising kisses like they're punishments.

If he kisses me tonight, I don't want it to be about pushing me away. I want it to be about bringing me closer.

I don't know who moves first. One second, I'm trying so hard not to look at his mouth, working up the courage to ask him about his dream, and the next second, I'm beneath him.

I should be shocked, but I'm not. I think I knew as soon as I left the safety of my bedroom that I would somehow end up here, on Paul Langdon's rumpled bed with him braced above me.

His weight on his left arm, he uses his right hand to trace a line from my temple down around my ear. His finger continues its slow downward movement, skimming across my collarbone. He pauses when he reaches the edge of my robe.

'You shouldn't have come,' he whispers, his eyes following the slow-motion of his finger.

I swallow... 'I heard from you. You sounded -' Like you need me.

He shakes his head once, as though to tell both of us that he doesn't need anyone, but we both know better.

I lie there, silent, wondering whether I dare to ask outright. Ever since that conversation with Lindy about how nobody had ever asked him point-blank about what happened overseas, I've known that the time will come when I have to be the one to ask. He needs to talk about it; he's just never been given the chance. Not really.

But I have to move slowly. It's been buried inside him for so long that prying will only result in him pushing me away. Just like he has with his father and anyone else who's ever cared about him.

Maybe now isn't the time.

Because tonight - tonight he doesn't look like he wants to talk. And when he's staring at me with hot, burning eyes, I don't want to talk either.

Blue eyes ask the words that he won't voice out loud. Do you want me?

My answer is also wordless.

But I make sure I'm very, very clear about what I want.

I slip my hand around the back of his neck, relishing the crispness of his ruthlessly short haircut against my palm.

I tug his face downward. He's already in motion.

There's no teasing this time as his lips quickly nudge mine open, his tongue sliding in to claim mine. I let out a tiny moan, wrapping both arms around his neck as he rolls more firmly on top of me, pressing me against the softness of the mattress.

Our mouths move frantically, restlessly, as we struggle to get closer. One or both of us kick the tangled sheet out of the way, and we both groan as his hips settle between my thighs.

My stomach drops even before I see the regretful twist of my father's mouth. This is like one of those wretched movie scenes come to life. You know, the one where the d*ick-head guy says something cruel about the girl who's standing behind him? It's on the tip of my tongue to say that I don't need anyone to take care of me. But I want Olivia to tell him that. I want her to tell him that she's here with me because she wants to be, not because he's paying her. I want her to tell him the truth about breakfast, and last night.

I put on a quick swipe of mascara and pink lip gloss. I try to tell myself that it's out of habit (my mom believes that ladies should always be groomed,) but I'm pretty sure it's because I'm trying to make up for the fact that the last time Paul saw me, I had major boob sweat and a greasy ponytail and was short on oxygen.

My dark jeans and cream sweater aren't exactly sexy, but they're a big improvement from my running gear. As is the fact that I'm showered.

You're an employee, my brain reminds me. So not the time to cultivate your inner tramp.

At the library door, I start to knock, only to realize that'll give him a chance to throw himself out the window or sneak out some secret passageway that I'm only half kidding about. Instead, I go right in, and the scene in front of me is- um- a well, it's ridiculously appealing.

The roaring fireplace in the corner, the sexy guy in the big wingback chair by the fireplace with a book and another of those amber-liquid filled tumblers. It's all very après-ski chic.

For the first time since arriving in this hellish place, I feel a true pang of regret for intruding on him. He doesn't seem like a victim who needs a keeper so much as a guy trying to read a book in peace by the fire on a blustery afternoon.

I'm thinking about backing away and leaving him to the quiet when he opens his fat mouth.

'That liquor you tossed earlier came from a five-hundred-dollar bottle.'

Ah... Back to normal... I use my foot to close the door behind me. 'I'm sure that made a dent in the family coffers. You know, right, that all of the artwork in your halls is original?'

'Come on,' he says, still not looking up from his book 'You're a rich girl.

Surely you know how stereotypical comments like that can be.'

'Yeah, you look torn up about it,' I mutter, moving closer to him. 'And how do you know I'm rich?'

'Google. Your family's a big deal.'

I ignore this. We'll both be better off not talking about me.

'So, what is it?' I ask, tentatively sitting in the chair across from him even though I'm uninvited and unwelcome. I study him. Paul has just a bit more stubble than he did yesterday. Normally I prefer a clean-cut guy, but this slightly rough look suits his golden-boy-meets-jaded-war-hero vibe. I wait for him to look at me, mentally bracing myself for the shock of it.

As though he's sensed my thoughts, his gray eyes flicked to mine, and I'm not sure why I thought bracing for it would make a damned bit of difference. It still sends ripples of want from my eyelashes right down to my toes.

'What is what?' He asks.

It takes me a moment to realize, that I asked him a question. 'The precious liquor I threw out. What is it?'

His eyes flicker in irritation and I think he's going to tell me to get the hell out, but something seems to stop him, and he very slowly lifts the crystal glass from the table and hands it to me.

I sniff... 'Scotch...'

He nods. 'A thirty-year-old Highland Park. Not the best we have, but not something to be tossed down the drain, either.'

'Very alpha.'

He rolls his eyes, and I take a tiny sip, knowing from experience that I don't like Scotch. Turns out I don't like the $500 one either, and I hand it back to him with a little shrug.

'Want anything?' He asks. 'Wine?'

'I'm good.'

Water would be great right about now. Between the hot look in his eyes and the heat of the fire, I'm a bit, um, parched.

'What are you reading?' I ask.

He groans. 'Not this again. I know we're stuck with each other, but do we have to do the get-to-know-each-other chat? Can't we just sit in silence?'

The way he says stuck with each other gives me pause. I know why I'm sticking this out, but why is he? From what I've heard from Lindy and what I inferred from his father; Paul has no qualms about driving people away.

Is he treating me differently? Or just biding his time until he figures out how to add me to his list of banished caretakers?

I want it to be the first one.

'Fine,' I say, sitting back in the chair and settling in. 'I'll give you twenty minutes of silence in exchange for a shared dinner.'

'Hell no,' he says calmly, his attention already returned to his book as he turns a page.

'Thirty minutes of silence.'

'I don't share meals with anyone.'

'Come on,' I cajole. 'I promise not to try to feed you your soup airplane-style like a child.'

'No.'

‘Paul.’

His eyes flick up again, and for the briefest of moments, the look on his face is almost one of longing. I realize it’s the first time I’ve spoken his name out loud.

I’m pretty sure I’m not just another caretaker. Thing is, I don’t know what I am.

‘I can keep a one-sided conversation going for a long time,’ I press on, quickly trying to move us away from the charged moment. ‘Let’s see, I was born on August thirtieth, which means that my birthstone is peridot, which is a fancy word for ugly green. And speaking of color, this hair color? So not natural. I mean, I was one of those adorable blond toddlers, but it all went mouse-brown right about the time I started third grade, and I’ve been adjusting it ever since. I got my first period when I was... um- 10.’

~*~

What Karly said- ‘I first made cummie when I was 13. -About the time I fall to loving boys and also me...’

~*~

‘Okay!’ he interrupts. ‘I cave. You give me an hour and a half of silence now, and I’ll eat dinner with you later, but we can’t talk during that either.’

‘No deal. I’ll give you one hour of quiet time now, but we talk at dinner.’

He takes a small sip of Scotch and studies me. ‘You’re annoying.’

I start to argue that annoying has never been one of my personality traits. I’ve always been more in the polite, mellow, and shy category. I always say the right thing at parties, I respect other people’s boundaries, and I dodge controversial topics like they’re landmines. But there’s something about him that’s brought out this other version of myself. I kind of like it.

I shrug, refusing to apologize. Besides, the old, sweet Olivia would get stomped on by this guy.

‘So, do you know who Andrew Jackson is?’ I ask, pulling my legs beneath me and curling into the soft black leather of the chair.

‘Yes, I know who Andrew Jackson is. Old Hickory.’

Old what? ‘Whatever,’ I say. ‘Have you heard of this book? It’s called American Lion,’ and- ‘Olivia,’ says mildly, turning the page of his book, ‘that hour of silence is effective immediately.’

I sigh... Guess I’ll have to read this book intend to talk about it. So disappointing.

‘Okay,’ I say as I open to the foreword. ‘But you should know that I plan to eat very, very slowly at dinner.’

I ignore his groan as I settle in to read about this Old Hickory guy. And maybe sneak a few glances at the hottest guy I’ve ever seen.

It’s hot. So, freaking hot, but I’m not even aware of it. None of us are because it’s always hot, and not worth complaining about because there are bigger things to worry about, like the helicopter, that went down last week or the Humvee that didn’t return to the base last night.

The best you can do is ignore the heat, play football with your friends when you can, and pray to any god, spirit, or deity you can think of that you’ll be one of the lucky ones.

Then Williams breaks the code.

We’re out on standard patrol, and he breaks the damn code.

‘I freaking hate it here.’

I’m in the process of mentally thinking about what the hell I’m supposed to write to Ashley, my girlfriend back home, but my brain skids to a halt at Williams’s outburst. Garcia and Miller stop bastardizing whatever outdated Jay-Z song they were attempting to sing and stare at Williams with a mixture of dismay and disgust.

Alex Skinner, my best friend since boot camp, just looks pissed. ‘Goddamn it, Williams.’

Greg Williams merely shrugs. Of all of us, he’s the smallest, but he’s damned fast. And smart. At least I thought so until he broke the freaking code.

‘Don’t start that,’ I say, trying to lighten the mood. ‘You know the second we start acknowledging that we are, living the sh*t life, that’s the second our luck runs out.’

‘I’m just saying. This freaking- blows. The sand, the heat, the constant fear of being sent home in a box. You all know it.’

Skinner leans forward to get in Williams's face. 'We all knew that getting into it. This isn't some glorified World War I bullsh*t where we didn't know what to expect.'

Williams shoves at Skinner's shoulder, and I place an arm between them before the two hotheads make a sh*tty situation sh*ttier.

'I'm allowed to say what I think,' Williams grumbles, shaking both of us off and staring down at his hands. 'I'm allowed to say what we're all thinking. There ain't no freaking curse that's going to come because I spoke the truth.'

Less than ten minutes later, we find out he's wrong.

Williams gets sent home in a box.

So, do the rest of them.

Suddenly time both speeds up and slows down, and a second later I'm on the ground holding on to Alex, and he's trying to talk but the only thing that comes out of his mouth is blood.

There's too much blood. Mine. His. It's all one bitter, metallic mess.

I try to understand what Alex is telling me. I try to understand his dying wish, try to comprehend his last word, but there's too much blood.

There's always too much-damned blood.

It's not the first time I've woken up in a pool of sweat.

But it's the first time since those early days in the hospital that someone's been there when I wake up.

I don't remember the nurses well, but I'm pretty sure none of them looked like Olivia Middleton, kneeling on my bed, wearing only a tiny white T-shirt and pink boxer shorts. What is it with her and pink?

And then I comprehend that she's here. In my bedroom.

I comprehend why she's here.

Part: 2

The dream.

I was yelling, and she came to find out why.

‘Get the freakout,’ I say, pushing myself into a sitting position and rolling out of bed on the other side before she can touch me. ‘Get the freak-out!’

‘You were screaming,’ she says calmly as she climbs off the bed and turns to face me, the king-size bed separating her from my sweaty, amped-up self.

‘Of course, I’m yelling. It’s a goddamned war.

My chin dips down and rests on my chest in defeat. I can’t turn around. I can’t make myself look at her face. But the little hurt noise she makes tears at me anyway.

But that doesn’t mean I have to like the way he keeps laughing at every other thing she says, or the way they’re both dropping names of mutual friends I’ve never heard of. Five minutes ago, I thought Kali was just about the cutest, nicest thing on the planet- definite Maine BFF material. Now I hate that she’s the cutest, nicest thing on the planet. I also hate the way Paul is smiling so easily around her.

He never smiles like that around me.

She studies me for a moment, and I’m pretty sure she wants to call my bluff.

Instead, the door closes behind her, and I stand for several moments staring at bobbing sailboats, wishing I could be on one of them sailing to anywhere that’s not here.

It’s a testament to just how cushy my life has been up until the past couple of months that I’ve truly never given much thought to being unhappy. I mean, I never really thought about being happy either. I guess you could say I’ve floated but in a harmless, life-is-good kind of way.

And now?

Now I can’t bear the thought of returning to my life with all of its glossy easiness, and yet staying in Maine is almost as unfathomable. Not just because it’s foreign, and not just because Paul is a complete ass-plug who may or may not turn me on. But because I don’t know what I’m supposed to do.

Tomorrow morning is right around the corner, and I’ll be expected to do the job that they’re paying me for: being a companion to a guy who can’t take care of himself. Except, beyond that limp and the sneer, he seems to be managing just fine.

I can't imagine he'll want me to read the classics aloud to him while he dabbles in watercolors. I'll be lucky if he even lets me in the same room.

The futility of it all threatens to choke me, and I go through the motions of unpacking the suitcase that Mick carried upstairs for me. With each bra I drop into the dresser, I keep hoping it'll help my brain accept that I'm staying.

Instead, my mind is going down a ridiculous path - wondering which bra Paul would most like to see. Wondering what it would feel like to have him take it off me. Wondering - Oh, my God, Middleton. You are half a dirty thought away from being a revolting perv.

By the time I brush my teeth and wash my face in the small but modern bathroom, I'm surprised to realize that I'm exhausted even though the sun's barely set. I wonder if I'm supposed to check on 'Mr. Paul,' but from the way he glared at me as I stormed out of his cave earlier, I don't think another encounter today will do either of us any good.

Changing into my pajamas, I curl up on my side on the large bed, resting my cheek on my hands as I stare out at the dark sky. When I finally drift off to sleep, it's not picturesque water and boats I see. It's an angry mouth and gorgeous blue eyes.

For the first time in months, my dreams aren't about Ethan. Or Michael.

Tonight, my dreams are about someone far more dangerous to me than either of the guys from my past.

Back when I was in high school, I and football were kind of a big deal. And I always liked it well enough, but football was never really my true passion, cheesy as that sounds.

I was semi-disappointed when my coach marked me for QB early in my freshman year. The quarterback doesn't get to run much.

That's my passion. Running. Tossing a football to a bunch of other guys is nothing compared to the rush I got from running.

I ran every day leading up to Afghanistan. I ran as often as I could around the base after I got there. And since getting back - Well, let's just say that my future holds as much hope for running as it does flying.

But I have a secret.

Not a big one. It's pathetic. But one that nobody knows. Well, I suspect Mick and Lindy might, but they won't dare mention it.

The truth is, running is the one area of my life where I let the tiniest ray of hope shine in. Not hope. Because I can't let myself think that it's going to happen. But I dream of running again.

It's that dream that has me getting up at the ass crack of dawn every morning. Before Lindy or Mick or whatever godforsaken caretaker is lurking about is awake - hell, before the sun's even up.

I go outside and pretend I'm running. Not physically pretending, of course. My leg's not even remotely able to sustain that kind of fantasy. But mentally? I run.

It's the only time I'll use my cane. Partially because nobody's watching, but also because the cane allows me to go longer, farther, faster. Just a mile or so on a trail that winds around the bay. I walk/hobble in the predawn silence and let myself pretend just for an hour that I'm running. That I'm normal. It's my time. Of course, being the hermit that I am, all time is my time. But this is different.

I'd almost say- sacred if that didn't sound so ridiculous. But save for the fishermen, because this is Maine, after all, I'm alone. And this solitude is different from the rest of my day because it's intentional.

This time of the day is the only time I feel alive.

And I never dreamed that it could be ripped away from me in the most debilitating way possible.

Olivia- the very person who kept me up the entire night- is a runner. Worse, she's running on my path during my time.

She's running toward me, and although she's still a good ways' off, I know it's her. That blond ponytail and that tall, slim frame are all I've been able to think about since that kiss.

Turning around would be futile. Her jog would easily overtake my walk, so there's nothing to do but wait. And brace...

I slow to a standstill. It's bad enough that she has to see me with the cane; I'll be damned before I give her the spectacle of watching me hobble along with it.

Part: 3

She's got hot pink running shoes, which are ridiculous, especially since they perfectly match the long-sleeved pink running shirt. The hairband is also pink.

Come to think of it, wasn't she wearing a pink sweater yesterday? Just what I need. A bubblegum explosion in my life.

Even if her fashion-forward running gear didn't clue me in (real runners don't care about matching their hairband to their shoes,) it's obvious from her slow pace, her pink cheeks, and the gait that's just slightly off that she's new at this.

Already my brain is racing with pointers. Breathe in through your nose, out through your mouth. Don't move your arms so much. You overpronate, do your girly shoes compensate for that?

At first, I think she doesn't see me. There's no change in her gait or expression as she closes the gap between us. But then she's almost upon me. Then in front of me. She stops.

My fingers clench on the handle of my cane- a black python affair I ordered on the Internet mostly because it was so ridiculously gaudy- and I resist the urge to turn my head and give her my profile. My good side.

But if the two are going to be stuck together for three months, she'd better get used to seeing me. I'd better get used to her seeing me.

She doesn't look at the cane at all, and other than the briefest flick of her green eyes over my scars, she doesn't seem to care about those either. Then again, it's still dark, with the barest hint of the early morning sun illuminating us, so perhaps she can't see their ugliness. Which reminds me-

'You shouldn't go running alone in the dark,' I growl.

She frowns almost imperceptibly, just the finest line between her dark blond eyebrows. 'Why not?'

'You go running through the streets of New York City at the crack of dawn?'

'How do you know I'm from New York City?'

I remain silent, not wanting to have to explain that I spent most of the night studying the limited information my dad had sent over on Olivia. Nothing interesting. NYU drop-out. Manhattan resident. Short of a crash course in CPR, no experience in taking care of anyone. She turned twenty-two just days before arriving in Maine.

‘What the hell is she wearing?’ Sarah asks cattily.

It’s no secret that my friends fall into the snob category, Bella excepted most of the time. Sarah’s the worst of the lot, and not for the first time in my life I wonder why I continue to let her pretend we’re friends.

Knowing that they’ll continue to hover around me like a pack of glamorous guard dogs until I’ve dealt with the newcomers, I sneak a tiny peek over my shoulder at where Ethan and Stephanie stand to talk to a mutual family friend.

My heart twists the tiniest bit at the sight of Ethan. In his gray slacks, perfectly tailored white shirt, and Burberry tie, he looks as well-groomed and gorgeous as ever. He has the dark blond hair and broad shoulders better suited to Hollywood than the Manhattan business world, but luckily, he’s got the brains and the charm to keep his head above water amid the Manhattan sharks.

Then- I look at her.

From the sneer on my friends’ faces, I was expecting Stephanie to be wearing torn jeans, a leopard-print catsuit, or something else ridiculous, but the truth is she looks kind of cute. Her dark eye makeup is the perfect complement to her wide blue eyes, and the strapless gray dress would be downright demure if not for the bright orange belt around her tiny waist. She’s paired the whole thing with these beat-up-looking riding boots, which, while not exactly an Upper East Side standard, gives the whole effect of a girl comfortable with herself.

Of course, she’s comfortable. She’s perched on the arm of the boy you thought you were going to marry.

I push the b*tchy thought away. I’ve had months to accept that Ethan isn’t coming back. Hell, I was even the one who insisted that he and his new girlfriend be invited to the party. Ethan’s parents and mine have been best friends since long before we were even in the womb. I’m not about to let a little thing like betrayal throw a wrench in that.

‘You okay, Liv?’ Bella asks softly.

I tear my eyes away from Ethan and Stephanie. ‘Yeah. Give me a minute, though, ’kay?’ I hand her my champagne glass. ‘And don’t let them attack Stephanie,’ I murmur to my best friend.

But escaping is no easy task. I’m stopped at least five times by well-wishers who want to tell me that they always knew I had such a good heart.

Ha.

Finally- I’m able to pour myself a glass of my raspberry iced tea to stave off an impending headache and head toward the stairs to escape to my bedroom, just for a couple of minutes.

My mother grabs my arm. ‘Where are you going?’

I point down at my six-hundred-dollar Jimmy Choo pumps. ‘Blister. I just want to grab a Band-Aid.’

Mom’s green eyes- the ones everyone is always saying are identical to my own- narrow slightly, but her grip eases on my arm. ‘Everyone is so proud of you,’ she says, looking both relieved and delighted. ‘Holly Scherwitz said she wouldn’t be surprised to see you win a Nobel Peace Prize someday.’

Inside, I’m cracking up in bitter amusement, but years of training in social appropriateness have me merely lifting my eyebrows. ‘I hope you told her that was absurd.’

Mom’s smile slips. ‘It’s not absurd. It’s admirable, what you’re doing.

Moving to the middle of nowhere to help out one of our injured veterans?’

‘Except it’s not the middle of nowhere, is it? It’s a one-hour plane ride, thanks to your and Dad’s interference.’

Mom doesn’t bother to look guilty. ‘Olivia, honey. You wouldn’t have lasted a day in El Salvador or wherever it was you were going to go build houses.

There are plenty of people right here at home that needs help. And we’re so proud of you for doing this.’

I give her a look. ‘Uh-huh. Is that why you guys didn’t speak to me for a week when I first told you about it?’

‘We were in shock,’ Mom says, unruffled. ‘Your father and I had no idea you weren’t happy in business school, and of course, we’d always envisioned you taking over the company-’

It’s times like these that I wish my parents were really old money instead of second-generation money. Each of my friends is richer than the next, but most of their families’ wealth goes back to some 1800s railroad or some industry whose income is pretty much self-generating by now. Not in my case.

My grandfather had the whole American-dream syndrome going on and changed his midwestern middle-class destiny, building a highly respected advertising firm instead. Dad’s only built on his father’s success, and it’s fully expected to remain a family affair.

And I’m an only child. No pressure.

‘I might still take over the company, Mom. I just need to get away from all this, you know? The only time I leave Manhattan is to go to the Hamptons in the summer or Saint-Tropez in January. I mean, you’ve always said you don’t want me to be one of those girls.’

Mom shakes her head to interrupt me. ‘I know. Believe me, as much as I play the New York society game, I do want you to know that there’s a big world out there, Olivia. But are you sure you don’t want to stay a little closer to home? There’s a facility out in Queens, and...’

‘I’m already committed, Mom,’ I say gently. ‘Mr. Langdon’s already sent a check to cover my travel expenses and I’m expected next Friday.’

Mom sighs. ‘Can’t a grown man arrange for his care? Something’s weird about his father having to do all the planning.’

‘You’re the one who connected me with the Langdon’s in the first place. They’re legit. Plus, Paul’s invalid. If he could arrange for his care, he probably wouldn’t need care.’ I say this as patiently as possible. It’s a clear indication of just how small my mom’s world is, despite her good intentions.

She doesn’t know anyone who’s gone to war, much less been injured.

Not that I do, for that matter. Park Avenue isn't exactly swarming with members of the U.S. armed forces.

'Well,' Mom says, taking a deep breath and pushing my long hair over my shoulder affectionately, 'it's lucky he has a pretty girl like you to take care of him.'

I smile wanly. I've been hearing this refrain all evening, and it makes me slightly ill. Not only because it's condescending to the poor guy I'll be caring for, but because it makes me into some sort of sweet, saintly figure.

Only two other people in this house know the truth about me. My mother isn't one of them.

'Hurry back down,' Mom says. 'The Austen's said they hadn't had a chance to talk to you yet.'

Part: 4

Probably because I've been dodging them. Annamarie Austen is the catty kind of gossip I've avoided like the plague in recent months, and Jeff Austen stares too long at my boobs.

'I'll be fast,' I say before fleeing up the winding staircase to fetch my imaginary Band-Aid. My feet are far too used to being pinched in high heels to be plagued by blisters. I just won't- need- five minutes to myself. A chance to be away from everyone's misplaced fawning and the crushing pressure in my chest every time I look at Ethan.

But my bedroom isn't quite the solitary sanctuary I imagined. Far from it.

I jump in surprise, but a part of me isn't surprised at all to see him in here.

Him being the iceberg that destroyed my life. It's only appropriate that he also be around to watch me sink.

Now three people in the house know the truth about me.

'Michael,' I say, keeping my voice calm. Polite. I'm always polite.

'Liv.'

Michael St. Claire is one of those amiable, good-looking guys who attract friends- and girls- like a magnet. He gets his dark brown hair perfectly styled at a salon that costs just about as much as my own, and his light golden skin is the gift of great Italian genes on his mother's side. He's been one of my best friends for as long as I can remember.

When he was seven, they'd spent a summer exploring their neighborhood in Dawson, Minnesota, looking for treasure and wound up with a garden shed full of weird sh*t: an old top hat, a busted radio, two tire spokes, and the rusted frame of a bicycle. They'd found adventure in whatever sh*tty-ass town their mom had happened to dump them. Now they would never have another adventure. She would never climb, or bike, or bet him five bucks she could still beat him in a footrace. She would always need help to bathe, to get on and off the toilet.

And it was all Luke Hanrahan's fault. He'd messed with Dayna's car, freaked with the steering in advance of the showdown, forcing her off the road.

Marcel knew it.

'Mom went on a date last night,' Dayna said, obviously trying to change the subject.

'So...?' Marcel said. He was still vaguely annoyed. Besides, everywhere they went, his mom found some new loser to date.

Dayna shrugged. 'She seemed into it. And she wouldn't tell me who.'

'She was probably embarrassed,' Marcel said. In the silence, he heard banging from outside-someone was going through the Dumpsters. Dayna leaned forward to look out the window.

'Sh*t,' she said.

'Little Kelly?' he said, and Dayna nodded. Little Bill Kelly had to be thirty and at least six foot five, but his dad, Bill Kelly, had been police chief for twenty years before his retirement, and everyone knew him as Big Kelly. Marcel had only ever seen Big Kelly once, and even then, only for a second, when he'd accidentally biked out in front of Bill's car. Bill had leaned on the horn and shouted for Marcel to be careful.

Marcel sighed, eased Dayna's legs off his lap, and stood up. Through the window, he could see Little Kelly balancing on the steel drum full of old grease, methodically sorting through one of the Dumpsters sandwiched up against the back of Dot's Diner, just next to the kitchen door. It was the third time in a month he'd been picking garbage.

Marcel didn't bother putting on a shirt. He crossed the short concrete alley that divided their apartment from the diner, careful to avoid the broken glass. The kitchen boys drank beers during their shift sometimes.

'Hey, man,' Marcel said, deliberately loud, deliberately cheerful. Little Kelly straightened up like he'd been electrocuted. He climbed down unsteadily from the steel drum.

'I 'm not doing anything,' he said, avoiding Marcel's gaze. Other than the stubble on his chin, Little Kelly had the face of an overgrown baby. He had once been a star athlete, a good student, too, but had gotten screwed in the head over in Afghanistan... Or Iraq... like- one of those. Now he rode the buses all day and forgot to come home. Once Marcel had passed Little Kelly sitting cross-legged at the corner of the road, crying loudly.

'You are looking for something?' Marcel noticed that Little Kelly had made a small trash pile at the foot of the Dumpster, of tinfoil wrappers, metal coils, bottle caps, and a broken plate. Little Kelly looked at him for a minute, jaw working like he was trying to chew through the leather. Then, abruptly, he pushed past Marcel and disappeared around the corner. Marcel squatted and started to gather up all the crap Little Kelly had removed from the Dumpster. It was already hot, and the alley smelled.

Just then he sensed movement behind him. Thinking Little Kelly had returned, he straightened and spun around, saying, 'You really shouldn't be back here-' The words dried up in his throat. Natalie Velez was standing behind him, leaning her weight onto her good foot, looking clean and showered and pretty and like she belonged anywhere else but here.

'Hi,' she said, smiling. His first, instinctive response was to walk past her, go into the house, slam the door, and suffocate himself. But of course, he couldn't. Holy sh*t... Nat Velez was standing in front of him, and he was shirtless. And hadn't brushed his teeth. Or showered. And he was holding tinfoil from the trash.

'I was just cleaning up...' He trailed off helplessly.

Nat's eyes ticked down to his bare chest, then up to his hair, which was in all probability sticking straight up.

‘Oh my God.’ Her face began to turn pink. ‘I should have called. I’m so sorry. Did you just get up or something?’

‘No. No, not at all. I was just -’ Marcel tried not to talk too forcefully, or breathe too hard, in case his breath was rank. ‘Look, can you give me a minute? Just wait here?’

‘Of course.’ Nat was even cuter when she blushed. She looked like a cookie that had been iced for Christmas.

‘One minute,’ Marcel repeated. Inside, Marcel sucked in a deep breath. Holy sh*t. Nat Velez. He didn’t even have time to worry about the fact that she was seeing his house, his crappy little apartment, and had probably had to walk past the grease traps being emptied, had gone in her little sandals past the sodden bits of spinach that got trekked out of the diner by the cooks, past the Dumpsters and their smell. In the bathroom, he brushed his teeth and gargled with mouthwash. He smelled his underarms-not bad-and put on deodorant just in case.

He ran water through his hair and pulled on a clean white T-shirt, one that showed just a bit of the tattoo that covered most of his chest and wrapped around his right shoulder and forearm. His hair was already sticking up again. He rammed on a baseball hat.

Part: 5

Good... decent, at least. He sprayed on a bit of this man’s body-spray thing his mom had gotten for free at Walmart, feeling like a douche, but thinking it was better to feel like a douche than to smell like an asshole.

Outside, Nat was doing a good job of pretending not to notice that Marcel lived in a falling-down apartment behind a diner.

‘Hey.’ She smiled again, big and bright, and he felt his insides do a weird turnover. He hoped Dayna wasn’t watching out the window. ‘Sorry about, like, barging upon you.’ ‘That’s okay.’

‘I was going to call,’ she said. ‘I texted Maggie for your number. Sorry.’

But then I thought it might be better to talk in person.’ ‘It’s totally fine.’ Marcel’s voice came out more harshly than he’d intended. Sh*t. He was screwing this up already. He coughed and crossed his arms, trying to look casual. It was because, his hands suddenly felt like meat hooks at the end of his arms, and he had forgotten what to do with them.

‘How’s your ankle?’ An Ace bandage was wrapped thickly around her ankle and foot, which made a funny contrast to her bare legs.

‘Sprained.’ Nat made a face. ‘I’ll live, but-’ For a brief second, her face spasmed, like she was in pain.

‘Look, Marcel, is there someplace we can go? Like, to talk?’

There was no way he was taking her inside. Not an icicle’s chance in hell. He didn’t want Nat gaping at Dayna or, worse, trying too hard to be nice.

‘How did you get here?’ he asked, thinking she might have a car.

Again, she blushed. ‘I had my dad drop me,’ she said.

He didn’t ask how she’d figured out where he lived. Like all things in Carp, it was usually just a question of asking around. The problem was where to take her.

He couldn’t go into the diner. His mom was working. That left Meth Row. Nat walked slowly, still limping, although she seemed to be in less pain than she had been last night. But she took the first opportunity to sit down: on the rusted fender of an abandoned, wheel-less- Buick. All its windows were shattered, and the seats were speckled with bird sh*t, the leather torn up by tiny animals.

‘I wanted to thank you again,’ Nat said. ‘You were so - You were great.

For helping me last night.’ Marcel felt vaguely disappointed, as he often felt when interacting with other people when the reality failed to meet his expectations. Or in this case, his fantasies. Some part of him had been hoping she’d come over to confess that she’d fallen madly in love with him. Or maybe she’d skip the words altogether, and strain onto her tiptoes and open her mouth and let him kiss her. Except she probably couldn’t stand on her toes with her ankle the way it was, which is one of the 2,037 ways his fantasy was unrealistic. He said, ‘It’s not a problem.’

She twisted her mouth like she’d swallowed something sour. For a second, she didn’t say anything. Then she blurted, ‘Did you hear Cory Walsh and Felix Harte was arrested?’ He shook his head, and she clarified, 'Drunk and disorderly conduct. And trespassing.' She shifted her weight. 'You think Panic is over?' 'No way,' he said. 'The cops are too stupid to stop it, anyway.' She nodded but didn't look convinced. 'So, what do you think will happen next?'

'No idea,' he said. He knew that Nat was asking him for a hint. He swallowed back a bad taste in his mouth. She knew he liked her, and she was trying to use him.

'I think we can use each other,' she said abruptly, and it was this fact-the fact of her acknowledgment, her honesty -that made him want to keep listening.

'Use each other how?' he asked. She picked at the hem of her skirt. It looked like it was made of terry cloth, which made him think of towels, which made him think of Nat in a towel. The sun was so bright, he was dizzy.

'We make a deal,' she said, looking up at him. Her eyes were dark, eager, and sweet, like the eyes of a puppy. 'If either of us wins, we split the cash fifty-fifty.'

Marcel was so startled; he couldn't say anything for a minute.

'Why?'

Why- he asked finally. 'Why me? You don't even -I mean; we hardly even know each other.' What about Maggie? he almost said.

'It's just a feeling I have,' she said, and once again he found her honesty appealing. 'You're good at this game.'

You know things.' It seemed somehow surprising that Nat Velez, with her thick, perfect hair and slicked lip-gloss lips, would speak so frankly about a subject most people avoided. It was like hearing a supermodel fart: surprising and kind of thrilling. She plowed on: 'We can help each other. Share information. Team up against the others. We have more of a chance of getting to Joust that way. And then-' She gestured with her hands.

'Then we'll have to face off...'

Part: 6

Marcel said.

‘But if one wins, we both win,’ Nat said, smiling up at him. He had no intention of letting anyone else win. Then again, he didn’t care about the money, either. He had a different goal in mind. Maybe she knew that or sensed it somehow.

So, he said, ‘Yeah, okay. Partners.’

‘Allies,’ Nat said, and stuck out her hand, formally. It felt soft, and also slightly sweaty.

She stood up, laughing. ‘It’s settled, then.’ She couldn’t crane onto her tiptoes to kiss him, so she just grabbed his shoulders and planted a kiss on the side of his neck. She giggled.

‘Now I have to do the other side, so you’re even.’

And he knew then that he was going to fall head over heels for her this summer.

Afterward, no one knew who had posted the video online; it appeared on so many pages simultaneously, and spread to everybody else so quickly, it was impossible to determine its point of origin, although many people suspected it was Joey Addison or Jack Wong, just because they were both d*icks and two years ago had secretly filmed, and posted, videos of the girls’ locker rooms.

It wasn’t even that interesting-just a couple of jerky shots of Ray and Zev swinging at each other, shoulders butting up into the frame as a crowd formed; and then flashing lights, people screaming, a moment when the feed went dead. Then more images: sweeping lights and cops’ distorted voices, tiny and harmless-sounding in the recording, and one close-up of Nat, mouth wide, with one arm around Maggie and the other around Marcel.

Then darkness... Marcel still kept a copy on his hard drive, so he could freeze-frame on that final moment when Nat looked so scared and he was helping support her. Just a few hours later an email made the rounds as well.

Subject line: blank. From: judgmentfallingtooyou@gmail.com

The message was simple, only 3 or 4 lines.

Loose lips sink ships.

Nobody tells. Or else.

TUESDAY, JUNE

Date of the 28th

Maggie-

‘YOU’RE SURE THIS IS LEGIT, RIGHT?’ JOH JOH WAS SITTING forward in the driver’s seat, both hands on the wheel, maneuvering the car over a pitted one-lane dirt track. His hair looked even more exuberant than usual, as though he’d tried to style it with a vacuum cleaner. He was wearing his dad’s old Virginia Tech sweatshirt, loose flannel pajama bottoms, and flip-flops. When he came to Maggie he had announced, with a certain pride, that he had not yet showered. ‘You’re not going to get axed to death by some psychopath, right?’

‘Shut up, Joh Joh.’ Maggie reached out to shove him, and he jerked the wheel, nearly sending them into one of the ditches that ran along both sides of the road.

‘That’s no way to treat your driver,’ he said, pretending to be offended.

‘Fine. Shut up, driver.’ There was an anxious feeling in Maggie’s stomach. The trees here were so thick, they almost completely blocked out the sun.

‘Just looking out for you, malady,’ Joh Joh said, smiling, showing off the overlap in his teeth. ‘I don’t want my best girl to be turned into a lampshade.’ ‘I thought Avery was your best girl,’ Maggie said. She’d meant it as a joke, but the words came out sounding bitter. Like a bitter, heartbroken, lonely spinster. Which she kind of was. Maybe not a spinster-you couldn’t be a spinster at eighteen, she didn’t think. But close...’

Come on, Maggie,’ Joh Joh said. He looked hurt. ‘You’ve always been my best girl.’ Maggie kept her face to the window. They would arrive any second. But she felt a little better now.

Joh Joh had that effect on her-like a human anti-anxiety pill. The day after the challenge at the water towers, Maggie had overslept, waking only when an anonymous text pinged on her phone: Quit now, before you get hurt. She was so shaken, she’d spent fifteen minutes searching for her car keys before remembering she’d stashed them on the hook by the door, then got fired from Walmart when she showed up twenty minutes late for her shift.

And suddenly she had found herself blubbering in the parking lot. A week and a half earlier, she’d had a boyfriend and a job-not a good job, but still a job. A little money in her pocket. Now she had nothing. No boyfriend, no job, no money. And someone wanted to make sure she didn't play Fright.

Then, out of nowhere, she'd been attacked by a dog with the biggest tongue she'd ever seen. Maybe attacked was the wrong word, since the dog was just licking her-but still, she'd never been much of an animal person, and it had seemed like an attack. And some crazy old lady carrying a sh*t ton of grocery bags had offered her a job on the spot, even though Maggie had snot dripping from her nose and was wearing a tank top streaked with salad dressing, which she hadn't noticed in her rush to get out of the house.

The woman's name was Anne.

'Muppet's taken a shine to you,' she'd said. Muppet was the name of the dog with the long tongue. 'He doesn't usually get on with strangers. You seem like you're a natural with animals.' Maggie had stayed quiet. She didn't want to admit that for the most part, she thought animals, like pimples, were best to ignore. If you fuss too much with them, it would backfire. The only time she'd tried to keep a pet, an anemic-looking gold fish she'd called Star, it had been dead within thirty-two hours. But she said yes when Anne asked if she'd be into doing some pet sitting and light chores. It was $150 a week, cash in the hand, which was roughly the same as she would have made working part-time for Walmart.

Suddenly the trees opened up and they arrived. Maggie immediately felt relieved. She didn't know what she'd been expecting-maybe, after what Joh Joh said, a dingy barn full of rusting farm tools and machetes-but instead she saw a sprawling red farmhouse and a large circular parking area, neatly trimmed of grass. She could see a barn, too, but it wasn't dingy-and next to it, a series of whitewashed sheds.

As soon as she opened the door, several roosters came trotting toward her, and a dog more than one dog? ...Began furiously barking. Anne emerged from the house and waved.

'Holy sh*t,' Joh Joh said. He looked impressed. 'It's a zoo.' 'See? Not a human lampshade insight.' Maggie slid out of the car, then ducked so she could say good-bye.

'Thanks, Joh Joh.' He saluted. 'Text when you need a pickup, ma'am.' Maggie closed the door. Anne crossed the yard toward her.

‘Is that your boyfriend?’ Anne said, shielding her eyes with one hand, as Joh Joh began to turn around.

This was so unexpected, Maggie’s face got hot. ‘No, no,’ she said quickly, angling her body away from the car, as though Joh Joh, in case he was still watching, would be able to read the conversation in her body language.

‘He’s cute,’ Anne said matter-of-factly. She waved, and Joh Joh tapped the horn before pulling away. The blush grew into an all-over body inferno. Maggie crossed her arms and then dropped them again. Fortunately, Anne didn’t seem to notice.

‘I’m glad you came.’ Anne smiled, as though Maggie had just dropped by for a social visit. ‘Let me show you around.’

Maggie was glad that Anne seemed to approve of her choice of outfit: clean jeans, sneakers, and a soft, nubby henley shirt, which had belonged to Joh- John before he accidentally shrank it. She hadn’t wanted to look sloppy, but then again, Anne had told her to wear clothes she could muck up, and she hadn’t wanted to look like she hadn’t listened.

They started toward the house. The roosters were still running around like crazy, and Maggie noticed a chicken pen on the other side of the yard, in which a dozen yellow-feathered chicks were strutting and pecking and preening in the sun. The dogs kept up their racket. There were three of them, including Muppet, pacing around a small enclosure, barking lustily.

‘You have a lot of animals,’ Maggie pointed out, and then immediately felt like an idiot. She tucked her hands into her sleeves.

But Anne laughed. ‘It’s awful, isn’t it? I just can’t stop.’ ‘So-o, is this, like, a farm?’ Maggie didn’t see any farming equipment, but she didn’t know anyone who kept chickens for fun.

Again, Anne laughed. ‘Hardly. I give the eggs away to the pantry sometimes. But I don’t pull up a damn thing besides bird poop, dog poop, poop of all kinds.’ She held the door to the house open for Maggie. Maggie thought that she would probably spend the whole summer shoveling sh*t. ‘My husband, Larry, loved animals,’ Anne continued as she followed Maggie into the house. They entered the prettiest kitchen Maggie had ever seen.

Even Nat's kitchen didn't compare. The walls were cream and yellow; the cupboards tawny wood, bleached nearly white from the sun, which poured through two large windows. The counters were spotless. No ants here. Against one wall were shelves arranged with blue-and-white pottery and small porcelain figurines: miniature horses, cats, donkeys, and pigs. Maggie was almost afraid to move, as one step in the wrong direction might cause everything to shatter.

'Tea?' Anne asked. Maggie shook her head. She didn't know anyone who drank tea in real life-only British people in TV miniseries. Anne filled a kettle and plunked it on the stove. 'We moved here from Chicago.'

'Really?' Maggie burst out. The farthest she had ever been from Carp was Albany. Once on a school trip, and once when her mom had a court date because she'd been driving with a suspended license. 'What's Chicago like?'

'Cold,' Anne said. 'Freeze your balls off ten months out of the year. But the other two are pure joy.' Maggie didn't respond. Anne didn't seem like the type who would say balls, and Maggie liked her a little better for it.

'Larry and I worked in ad sales. We swore we'd make a change someday.' Anne shrugged. 'Then he died, and I did.'

Once again, Maggie didn't say anything. She wanted to ask how Larry had died, and when, but didn't know if it was appropriate. She didn't want Anne to think she was obsessed with death or something. When the water had boiled, Anne filled her mug and then directed Maggie back through the door they had come. It was funny, walking across the yard with Anne, while the steam rose from her tea and mingled with the soft mist of morning. Maggie felt like she was in a movie about a farm somewhere far away. They rounded the corner of the house, and the dogs began to bark again.

'Shut it!' Anne said, but good-naturedly.

They didn't listen. She kept up a nonstop stream of conversation as they walked. 'This one's the feed shed'- this, as she unlocked one of the small, whitewashed sheds, pushing it open with one hand- I try to keep everything organized so I don't end up throwing grain to the dogs and trying to force kibble on a chick. Remember to turn off the lights before you lock up. I don't even want to tell you what my electricity bills are like.'

‘This is where the shovels and rakes go’-they were at another shed - ‘buckets, horseshoes, any kind of crap you find lying around that doesn’t seem to fit anywhere else. Got it? Am I going too fast?’

Maggie shook her head, and then, realizing Anne wasn’t looking at her, said, ‘No.’

She realized she wasn’t nervous anymore. She liked the feel of the sun on her shoulders and the smell of dark, wet ground everywhere. Probably some of what she was smelling was animal sh*t, but it didn’t smell that bad-just like growth and newness. Anne showed her the stables, where two horses stood quietly in the half-dark, like sentinels guarding something precious.

Maggie had never been so close to a horse before, and she laughed out loud when Anne gave her a carrot and instructed her to feed it to the black one, Lady Belle, and Maggie felt its soft, leathery muzzle and the gentle pressure of its teeth.

‘They were racehorses. Both injured. Saved ’em from being shot,’ Anne said as they left the stables.

‘Shot?’ Maggie repeated. Anne nodded. For the first time, she looked angry. ‘That’s what happens when they’re no good for running anymore. The owner takes a shotgun to their head.’ Anne had saved all the animals from one gruesome fate or another: the dogs and horses from death, the chickens, and roosters from various diseases when no one else had cared enough to spend the money to nurse them. There were turkeys she had saved from slaughter, cats she had rescued from the street in Hudson, and even an enormous potbellied pig named Tinkerbelle, which had once been an unwanted runt. Maggie couldn’t imagine that it had ever been the brunt of anything.

‘All she wanted was a little love,’

Anne said as they passed the pen where Tinkerbelle was lolling in the mud. ‘That, and about a pound of feed a day.’ She laughed.

Finally, they came to a tall, fenced-in enclosure. The sun had finally broken free of the trees and refracted through the rising mist; it was practically blinding. The fence encircled an area of at least a few acres-mostly open lands, patches of dirt, and high grass, but some trees, too. Maggie couldn’t see any animals.

For the first time all morning, Anne grew quiet. She sipped her tea, squinting in the sun, staring off through the chain-link fence. After a few minutes, Maggie couldn't stand it anymore.

'What are we waiting for?' She asked me.

'Sh-h-h,' Anne said. 'Look... they'll come.'

Maggie crossed her arms, biting back a sigh. The dew had soaked through her sneakers. Her feet were too cold, and her neck was too hot. There. There was a movement by a small cluster of trees. She squinted. A large, dark mass, which she had taken for a rock, shook itself. Then it stood. And as it stood, another form emerged from the shadow of the trees, and the two animals circled each other briefly, and then loped gracefully into the sun.

Maggie's mouth went dry.

Tigers...

She blinked. Impossible. But they were still there, and coming closer: two tigers, tigers, like you would find at a circus. Massive square heads and huge jaws, bodies muscled and rippling, coats glossy in the sun. Anne whistled sharply. Maggie jumped. Both tigers swung their heads toward the sound, and Maggie lost her breath. Their eyes were flat, incurious, and old - impossibly old, as though instead of looking forward, their eyes saw back to a distant past. They ambled up to the fence, so close that Maggie stepped backward, quickly, terrified. So, close she could smell them, feel the heat of their bodies.

'How?' she finally managed to ask, which was not quite what she meant, but good enough. A thousand thoughts were colliding in her head.

'More rescues,' Anne said calmly.

'They get sold on the black market. Sold, then abandoned when they're too big, or put down when there's no one to care for them.' As she spoke, she reached her hand through a gap in the fence and petted one of the tigers-like it was an overgrown house cat.

When she saw Maggie gaping, she laughed. 'They're all right once they've been fed,' she said. 'Just don't try and cuddle up when they're hungry.' 'I don't-I won't have to go in there, will I?' Maggie was rooted to the ground, paralyzed with fear and wonder.

They were so big, so close. One of the tigers yawned, and she could make out the sharp curve of its teeth, white as bone.

Part: 7

‘No, no,’ Anne said. ‘Most of the time, I just chuck the food in through the gate. Here, I’ll show you.’ Anne walked her to the padlocked gate, which to Maggie looked alarmingly flimsy. On the other side of the fence, the Tigers followed - languidly, as though by coincidence.

Maggie wasn’t fooled, though. That’s how predators where. They sat back and waited, lured you into feeling safe, and then they pounced. She wished Joh Joh were here. She did not wish Nat where here. Nat would flip. She hated big animals of any kind.

Even poodles made her jumpy. When they turned their backs on the Tigers’ pen and returned to the house, Maggie’s stomach started to unknot, although she still had the impression the Tigers were watching her and kept picturing their sharp claws slotting into her back. Anne showed her where she kept all the keys to the sheds, hanging from neatly labeled hooks in the ‘mudroom,’ as she called it, where Maggie could also find spare rubber boots like the kind Anne wore, mosquito repellent, gardening shears, and suntan and calamine lotions.

After that, Maggie went to work. She fed the chickens while Anne instructed her how to scatter the feed, and laughed out loud when the birds piled together, pecking frantically, like one enormous, feathered, many-headed creature.

Anne showed her how to chase the roosters back in the pen before letting out the dogs to run around, and Maggie was surprised that Muppet seemed to remember her, and immediately ran several times around her ankles, as though in greeting.

Then there was mucking the stables (as Maggie had suspected, this involved horse poop, but it wasn’t as bad as she’d thought,) and brushing the horses’ coats with special, stiff-bristled brushes. Then helping Anne prune the wisteria, which had begun to colonize the north side of the house. By this time, Maggie was sweating freely, even with her sleeves rolled up. The sun was high and hot, and her back ached from bending over and straightening up again.

But she was happy, too-happier than she’d been in forever. She could almost forget that the rest of the world existed, that she’d ever been dumped by Matt Hepley or made the Jump in the first place. Panic. She could forget Panic. She was surprised when Anne called an end to the day, saying it was almost one o'clock. While Maggie waited for Joh Joh to return for her, Anne made her a tuna sandwich with mayonnaise she'd made herself and tomatoes she'd grown in her garden. Maggie was afraid to sit down at the table since she was so dirty, but Anne set a place for her, so she did. She thought it was the best thing she'd ever eaten.'

Hey there, cowgirl,' Joh Joh said when Maggie slid into the car. He still hadn't changed out of his pajama pants. He made a big show of sniffing. 'What's that smell?'

'Shut up,' she said and punched him in the arm. He pretended to wince. As Maggie rolled down her window, she caught a glimpse of herself in the side mirror. Her face was red, and her hair was a mess and her chest was still wet with sweat, but she was surprised to find that she looked kind of - pretty.

'How was it?' Joh Joh asked as they began thumping down the drive again. He'd gotten her an iced coffee from 7-Eleven: lots of sugar, lots of creams, just how she liked it. She told him about the runt pig that had ballooned to a huge size, the horses, the chickens, and roosters. She saved the Tigers for last. Joh Joh was taking a sip of her coffee and nearly choked.

'You know that's illegal, right?' he said. She rolled her eyes. 'So are the pants you're wearing. If you don't tell, I won't.'

'These pants?' Joh Joh pretended to be offended. 'I wore these just for you.'

'You can take them off just for me,' Maggie said, and then blushed, realizing how it sounded.

'Anytime,' Joh Joh said, and grinned at her. She punched him again.

She was still fizzy with happiness. It was a twenty-minute ride back to downtown Carp, if the Motel 6, the post office, and the short string of greasy shops and bars could be counted as downtown, but Joh Joh claimed to have figured out a shortcut.

Maggie went quiet when they turned onto Coral Lake, which couldn't have been more inaccurately named: there was no water in sight, nothing but fallen logs and patchy, burnt-bare stubs of trees, because of a fire that had raged there several years ago. The road ran parallel to Jack Donahue's property, and it was bad luck. Maggie had been on Coral Lake only a few times.

Trigger-Happy Jack was known for being constantly drunk, and half-insane, and for owning an arsenal of weapons. His property was fenced in and guarded by dogs and who knew what else. When his fence came into view, pushing right up to the road, she half expected him to come banging out of his house and start taking potshots at the car. But he didn't. Several dogs came running across the yard, though, barking madly. These dogs were nothing like Anne's. They were skinny, snarling, and mean-looking. They had almost passed the limits of Trigger-Happy Jack's property when something caught Maggie's eye.

Part: 8

Sh*t-

I, NO!

Then Jack Donahue-paunchy, shirtless, wearing only a pair of saggy boxers-lifted his rifle and began to fire.

Pop...

Pop...

Pop...

Shots exploded- louder, sharper, than Marcel had expected, the first thing that had truly thrown him off guard. He'd never been so close to gunfire.

In the front yard, Trigger-Happy Jack was still screaming.

'You-cock-suckers-dead-as-a-doornail-I'll-bury-you-all-you-freakers!!!!'

Tick.

It wouldn't be long now. Donahue would call the cops at some point. He'd have to.

Marcel sprinted around the house. His breath was caught somewhere in his throat, like each time he inhaled he was taking in the glass. He didn't know what had happened to the other players, where Ray was, whether anyone had made it inside yet. He thought he heard a whisper in the dark-he assumed Maggie and Nat had taken up their positions, as planned. At the back of the house was a half-rotten porch, cluttered with dark shapes - Marcel vaguely registered a refrigerator before he saw the distended screen door, barely hanging on its hinges. The shots were still cracking through the air. One two three four.

Tick...

He didn't stop to think. He flung open the door.

He was in.

Part: 9

'Stop!' she nearly screamed.

'Stop.'

Joh Joh slammed on the brakes.

'What? Jesus, Maggie. What the hell?'

But she was already out of the car, jogging back toward a sagging scarecrow-at least, it looked like a scarecrow-slumped on the ground, leaning back against Donahue's fence. Her stomach was tight with fear, and she had the weirdest sense of being watched. There was something wrong with the dummy.

It was too crudely made, too useless. There were no farms on this side of Carroll Lake, no reason for a scarecrow, especially one that looked like it had been dumped from the trunk of a car.

When she reached the scarecrow, she hesitated for a second, as it might suddenly come to life and bite her. Then she lifted its head, which was slumped forward on a spindly stuffed neck.

In place of features, the scarecrow had words written neatly, in marker, on its blank canvas face.

FRIDAY, MIDNIGHT.

THE GAME MUST GO ON.

FRIDAY, JULY 1

Marcel THE CROWD WAS SMALLER ON FRIDAY NIGHT; THE atmosphere- tense, unhappy. Nervous. There was no beer, no music, no bursts of laughter. Just a few dozen people huddled silently fifty feet down the road from Trigger-Happy Jack's fence, massed together, lit up white-faced in the glare of the bouncing headlights.

When Joh- John cut the engine, Marcel could hear the sound of Nat's ragged breathing. Marcel had spent the ride over trying to distract her by doing easy magic tricks, like making a joker appear in her jacket pocket and a penny vanish from her palm. Now he said, 'Just follow the plan, okay? Follow the plan and everything will be okay.'

Nat nodded, but she looked sick- like she might puke. She was deathly afraid of dogs; she had told him. Also: ladders, heights, darkness, and the feeling you get in the middle of the night when you check your phone and see no one has texted. As far as he could tell, she was pretty much afraid of everything. And yet, she had decided to play. This made him like her even more. And she had chosen him, Marcel, as her ally.

Joh- John said nothing. Marcel wondered what he was thinking. He'd always thought Joh John was nice enough, and book smart for sure, but just like a big dumb sheepdog of a person who followed Maggie everywhere. But- Marcel was starting to change his mind.

During the drive, Joh Joh's eyes had clicked to his for a second in the rearview, and Marcel had detected some kind of warning there. The night was clear and still.

The moon was high and halfway to full, and turning everything to the silhouette, drawing angles around the fence. Still, it was dark. A flashlight went on and off several times, a silent signal. Maggie, Joh Joh, Nat, and Marcel walked toward it. Marcel had the urge to take Nat's hand, but Nat was hugging herself tightly.

At least Marcel had had time to plan, to prepare. If Nat hadn't told him about the dummy Maggie had spotted on Tuesday, he might not have known about the newest challenge until this morning. The email had come to all the players simultaneously from an encrypted address, judgmentfallingtooyou@gmail.com

Location: Coral Lake Road

Time: Midnight-

Goal: Take a prize from the house. Bonus: Find the desk in the gun room and take what's hidden there.

‘All right.’ Diggin was speaking quietly as they drew up close to the group. They were late. ‘Players, step forward.’

They did, detaching themselves from the people who had come to watch. Fewer players, fewer spectators. After the bust, everyone was jumpy.

Part: 10

-And-

Carroll Lake Road was bad luck. Trigger- Happy Jack was bad-all bad. A psycho and a drunk and worse.

Marcel knew he wouldn’t think twice about shooting them. The beam of a flashlight swept over each of the players in turn. It felt like the minutes were swelling into hours. The counting took forever.

Marcel could see Ray Hanrahan, chewing gum loudly, standing on the outer edge of the circle of players. His face was concealed in shadow. Marcel felt a familiar clutch of anger. Strange how it didn’t go away; over the past two years, it just seemed to be growing, like cancer in his stomach.

‘Walsh is missing,’ -Digging said finally. ‘So is Merl.’

‘They’re out, then,’ someone said.

‘It’s midnight.’ -Digging was still practically whispering. The wind lifted the trees, hissed at them, as though it knew they were trespassing. The dogs were still quiet, though. Sleeping, or waiting. ‘The second challenge-’

‘Second challenge?’ Zev broke in.

‘What about the water towers?’ ‘Invalidated,’ -Digging said. ‘Not everyone got to go.’ Zev spat on the ground, and Maggie made a noise of protest. -Digging ignored them.

‘When I say go,’ he said. He paused. For a moment, it seemed that everything went still. Marcel could feel the slow drum of his heart, beating in the hollow of his chest. And as they stood there in the dark, waiting, it occurred to him that here, somewhere in this crowd, where the judges-hiding behind familiar faces, maybe enjoying it.

‘Go,’ -Digging said.

‘Go!’ Marcel said to Maggie and Nat, at the same time. Maggie nodded and took Nat’s hand; they vanished together into the dark, Nat moving stiff-legged, still limping slightly, like a broken doll.

Marcel made straight for the fence like they’d agreed like he’d scoped the place out and knew what he was doing. And as he predicted, a half-dozen people ran after him in silence, doubled over as though, even now, they were being watched.

Nevertheless, much of the group didn’t move right away. They floated aimlessly to the fence, pacing it, watching, too scared to try to climb. They’d all be disqualified for doing nothing. Still, they stood there, pacing, watching the dark house, watching the shadow-people climb the fence, everything silent except for the occasional creak of metal, a muttered curse, and the wind. Marcel was one of the first up the fence. There were other players around him-people grunting and breathing hard, bodies knocking into, his-but he ignored them, focused on the bite of chain link on his palms and his breathing and the seconds running forward like water.

It was all about timing. Just like magic tricks: planning, mastery, staying calm under pressure. You could anticipate another person’s response; you could know what people would do, or say, or how they would react, even before they did.

Marcel knew it wouldn’t be long until Donahue came out with a rifle. At the top of the fence, he hung back, even though his adrenaline was pumping, telling him to go. Several other people-it was too dark to make out faces-dropped and hit the ground first, and even though they barely made a sound, the explosion of barking came right away. Four dogs-no, five-tore out from the back of the house, barking like mad.

Marcel felt every second like it had a different taste, a different texture from the second before it, like individual moments were ticking off in his head.

Tick. Someone was screaming. There’d be points taken off for that. Tick. Only a few more seconds until the shooting would begin. Tick. Maggie and Nat should have reached the hole in the fence by now.

Tick...

He was airborne, and then he felt the impact of the ground and he was up and fumbling for the Mace in his pocket.

He didn't head for the front of the house directly but instead made a loop, circumnavigating the small crowd of players, the dogs going crazy, snarling and snapping. Some of the players were already climbing the fence again, trying to reach the safety of the other side. But- Marcel kept going...

Tick...

A dog came at him. He almost didn't see it; it had its jaws practically around his arm before he pivoted and sprayed it, full-on, in the face. The dog dropped back, whimpering. Marcel kept going.

Tick.

Right on time, a light in the house clicked on. There was a roar-a sound that echoed out even over the chaos and the frantic sounds of barking and something crashed to the ground. A black shape rocketed out the front door, into the night. Even from a distance of one hundred yards, Marcel could make out the stream of individual courses.

#- Hashtag: (God damn mother freaking's on and off b*tches get the hell off my yard you- pieces- of sh*t craping d*ick wipe of as ass sucking pie hole puss-ie liker.)

Maggie-

MAGGIE AND NAT REACHED THE PLACE WHERE THE fence veered north, away from the road, just as the dogs began barking. Their timing was already all wrong. And Marcel was counting on them.

'You got to move faster,' Maggie said.

'I'm trying,' Nat said. Maggie could hear the strain in her voice. There was a volley of shouting from the yard-a cry of pain and the snarling of an enraged animal. Maggie felt her pulse beating frantically in her neck.

Focus.

Focus.

Stay calm.

They had reached the portion of the fence they'd prepped yesterday. And no one had followed them. Good. Marcel had cut a makeshift door in the fence. Maggie gave it a solid push and it groaned open, giving her just enough room to squeeze through. Nat followed.

Suddenly Nat froze, her eyes wide, horrified.

'I'm stuck,' she whispered.

Maggie whirled around, impatient.

Nat's left sleeve was snagged on the fence. She reached out and tugged it free.

'You're unstuck,' she said. 'Come on.'

But Nat didn't move. 'I-I can't.' Her face was drawn, terrified. 'I'm not even.'

'You're not what?' Maggie was losing it. Marcel would be going in any minute; he expected them to stand guard.

They'd made a pact. He was helping them; Maggie didn't know why, but she didn't care, either.

'I'm not even.' Nat's voice was high-pitched, hysterical. She was still standing, frozen, as though both legs had been rooted to the ground.

That's when Jack Donahue came blasting from the front door.

'God damn mother freaking sons of b*tches get the hell off my yard you piece's- of sh*t.'

'Come on.' Maggie grabbed Nat's arm and pulled, hard, dragging her across the lawn toward the house, ignoring the sound of Nat's whimpering, the words she was muttering under her breath. Counting. She was counting up to ten, then down again. Maggie dug her nails harder into Nat's arm, almost wanting to hurt her. Jesus. They were running out of time, and Nat was losing it. She didn't care about Nat's ankle, or that Nat was shaking, choking back sobs.

Pop...

Pop...

Pop...

Maggie jerked Nat down and into the shadows as Donahue thundered off the porch, gun up, firing. The light on the porch was white, half-blinding, and made him look like a character from a movie. Maggie's thighs were shaking.

She didn't see Marcel. She couldn't see anyone-just shapes, blurring together in the darkness, and the small cone of light illuminating Donahue's back, the curl of hair on his shoulders, his flab, the awful butt of his rifle.

Where was Marcel? Maggie could hardly breathe. She pressed up against the side of the house, rocking her weight back onto her heels, trying to think. There was too much noise. And she didn't know if Marcel had made it into the house already. What if he hadn't? What if he'd screwed up?

'Stay here,' Maggie whispered. 'I'm going in.' 'Don't.' Nat turned to her; eyes wide, frantic. 'Don't leave me here.' Maggie gripped her shoulders. 'In exactly one minute, if I'm not out yet, I want you to run back to the car. Okay? In exactly one minute.'

She didn't even know if Nat heard her-and almost didn't care, at this point. She straightened up. Her body felt bloated and clumsy. And suddenly she registered several things at once: that the shots had happened, and were no longer happening; that the front door had just opened and closed with a firm click.

Someone had gone in. Immediately, her body turned to ice. What if Marcel was inside? She, Maggie, was supposed to have been watching. She was supposed to have whistled if Donahue approached. But the front door had opened and closed. And she had not whistled.

She was no longer thinking. Instinctively, she pulled herself onto the porch and opened the front door and slipped inside, into the hall. It stank of BO and old beer, and it was pitch-dark. Donahue had turned on a light earlier- that she had noticed, a bad omen, just as her left arm was snagged by the toothy bite of the fence-so why had he turned it off? Her heart surged into her throat and she reached out with both hands, grazed both walls lightly with her fingertips, centering herself in the hallway. She swallowed. She took several steps forward and heard a rustling, the creak of a footstep. She froze, expecting at any second for the lights to click on, for the barrel of a gun to shine directly at her heart. Nothing happened.

'Marcel?' she risked whispering into the dark.

Footsteps crossed quickly toward her. She fumbled along the wall and hit a doorknob. The door opened easily, and she slipped out of the hall, closing the door as quietly as possible, holding her breath. But the footsteps kept going. She heard the front door creak open and closed. Was- it Donahue? Marcel? Another player?

Here, moonlight filtered in through a large, curtainless window, and Maggie suddenly sucked in a breath. The walls were covered with metal, glinting dully in the milky light. Guns... Guns mounted on the walls, hanging from upended deer hooves, crisscrossing the ceiling. The gun room... She thought it even smelled faintly like gunpowder, but she might have been imagining it.

The room was cluttered with workbenches and overstuffed chairs, bleeding stuffing onto the floor. Underneath the window was a large desk. Maggie felt as if the air in the room were suddenly too thin; she felt breathless and dizzy, remembering the email she'd received that morning. Bonus: Find the desk in the gun room and take what's hidden there.

Maggie moved across the room to the desk, navigating the clutter of objects. She began with the drawers on the sides-right and then left. Nothing. The shallow central drawer was loose, as though from frequent use. The gun was curled there, like an enormous black beetle, shiny, hard-backed.

The bonus. She reached in, hesitated-then seized it quickly as it might bite her. Maggie felt nausea rising in her throat.

She hated guns.

'What are you doing?' Maggie spun around. She could just see Marcel silhouetted in the doorway, although it was too dark to make out his face.

'Sh-h-h,' Maggie whispered. 'Keep your voice down.'

'What the hell are you doing?'

Marcel took two steps across the room.

'You were supposed to keep watch.'

'I was.' Before Maggie could explain further, Marcel cut her off.

'Where's Natalie?'

‘Outside,’ Maggie said. ‘I thought

I heard-’

‘Was this some kind of a trick?’

I’ll have to find out...

Nevaeh

Book: 19

Maggie

Chapter: 126

Part: 1

Marcel spoke quietly, but Maggie could hear the edge in his voice. ‘You get me to do the dirty work, then sneak in and grab the bonus? So, you could get ahead?’

Maggie stared at him. ‘What?’

‘Don’t screw with me, Maggie.’ Two more steps and Marcel- was- um like- there, directly in front of her. ‘Don’t lie to me.’

Maggie fought for breath. Tears were pushing at the back of her eyes. She knew they were being too loud. Too loud. Everything was all wrong. The gun in her hand felt awful, cold but also alive, like some alien creature that might suddenly roar to life.

‘What are you doing here?’ She finally said. ‘You were supposed to get proof for us and get out.’

‘I heard something,’ Marcel fired back. ‘I thought it might be one of the other players...’

The lights came on. Jack Donahue was standing in the doorway, eyes wild, chest slick with sweat. Then he was shouting, and the barrel of the gun was swinging toward them and there was an explosion of glass, and Maggie realized Marcel had just hurled a chair straight through the window. Everything was a fracture, roar, blur.

‘Go, go, go!’ Marcel was shouting, pushing Maggie toward the window. Maggie threw herself shoulder-first into the night. She heard the second explosion and felt a spray of softwood- as she went through the window, felt pain slice through her arm and an immediate dampness pooling in her armpit.

Marcel hauled her to her feet, and they were running, fleeing into the night, toward the fence, while Jack shouted after them and sent two more shots off into the dark. Through the fence-gasping, panting-to the road, mostly empty of cars. There was the dazzle, the wide sweep of headlights. Maggie recognized Joh Joh’s car. Nathaniel suddenly materialized in front of her, backlit, like an evil angel.

‘Are you okay?’ Her voice was wild, urgent. ‘Are you okay?’ ‘We’re okay,’ Maggie answered for both.

‘Let’s go.’

Then they were in the car and moving quickly, bumping over the country roads. For several minutes they were quiet, listening to the distant sound of police sirens. Maggie gritted her teeth every time they hit a rut. She was bleeding.

A piece of glass had sliced the soft skin of her inner arm. She still had the gun. Somehow, it had ended up in her lap. She kept staring at it, bewildered, half in shock.

‘Jesus Christ,’ Joh Joh finally said when they had put several miles behind them, and the noise of the sirens was lost beneath the quiet shushing of the wind through the trees. ‘Holy sh*t. That was crazy.’

Suddenly, the tension broke. Marcel started whooping and Nathaniel began to cry, and Maggie rolled the windows down and laughed like a maniac. She was relieved, grateful, alive sitting in the warm backseat of Joh Joh's car, which smelled like soda cans and old gum.

Joh- John told them about nearly pissing himself when Trigger-Happy Jack came barreling out of the house; he told them that Ray had cracked one of the dogs with a huge rock and sent it whimpering off into the dark. But half the kids never even made it over the fence, and he thought Byron Welcker might have been mauled. It was hard to tell in the dark, with all the chaos. Marcel told them about getting so close to Donahue; he thought for sure he'd be shot in the skull. But Donahue was enraged, and drunk.

He wasn't aiming well. 'Thank God,' Marcel said, laughing. Marcel had stolen three items from the kitchen-a butter knife, a saltshaker, and a shot glass shaped like a cowboy boot-to prove they'd all been in the house. He gave Nathaniel the shot glass and Maggie the butter knife and kept the saltshaker for himself.

He made Joh Joh pull over and placed the saltshaker on the dashboard, so he could get a good picture of it.

'What are you doing?' Maggie, she asked. Her brain still felt like it was wrapped in a wet blanket. Marcel passed over the phone wordlessly. Maggie saw that Marcel had emailed the photo to judgmentfallingtooyou@gmail.com, subject line: PROOF. Maggie shivered. She didn't like thinking of the mysterious judges- invisible, watching, judging them.

'What about the gun?' Marcel said.

'The gun?' Nathaniel repeated.

'Maggie found it,' Marcel said neutrally.

'Marcel and I found it at the same time,' she said automatically. She didn't know why. She could feel Marcel staring at her.

'You should both get credit, then,' Nathaniel said.

'You take the picture, Maggie,' Marcel said. His voice was slightly gentler. 'You send it.' Maggie arranged the shot glass and the gun on her lap, clumsily, with one arm. Her stomach tightened. She wondered if the gun was loaded. Probably. So, weird to have a weapon so close. So-o, weird to see it sitting there.

She'd been a year old when her dad shot himself-with a gun just like this one. She had a paranoid fear that it might go off on its own, exploring the night into noise and pain. Once the picture was sent, Joh Joh asked, 'What are you going to do with the gun?'

'Keep it, I guess.' But she didn't like the idea of having a gun in her house, waiting, smiling its metal smile.

And what if Lily found it?

'You can't keep it,' he said.

'You stole it.'

'Well, what should I do with it?'

Maggie felt Fear welling inside her.

She had broken into Donahue's house. She had stolen something worth a lot of money. People went to jail for sh*t like that.

Joh Joh sighed. 'Give it to me, Maggie,' he said. 'I'll get rid of it for you.'

She could have hugged him. She could have kissed him. Joh Joh shut the gun in the glove box. Now everyone was quiet. The dashboard clocks glowed green 1:42.

The roads were all dark except for the adhesive cone that was made by the headlights. The land was dark too, on either side of the- houses, trailers, whole streets swallowed up by blackness like they were traveling through an endless tunnel, a place with no boundaries. It started to rain.

Maggie leaned her head against the window. At some point, she must have fallen asleep. She dreamed of falling into the dark, slick throat of an animal, and of trying to cut herself out of its belly with a butter knife, which turned into a gun in her hands and went off.

Part: 2

SATURDAY,

JULY 2

THE NEXT DAY, THE NOTICES WERE EVERYWHERE of us not being round: skip a day it was- were somewhere in Pa- between the wire fences that orange belt that is so deadly, by Clit. Where you'll find quite a suburban street some building down the way, that you would call nicer than home, where we are from, they appeared, half-sodden, sunk in the mud in Meth Row, where Jenny would meet up with boys for her needs and a quickie.

She comes down here more and more- The betting slips blew to the Pines Mobile Park, accepted on the soles of muddy boots, snatched up by the metal underbelly of passing trucks before absconding on the wind, printed on large, glossy sheets of paper, inscribed with the crest of the Pitt-County Police Department, I see jenny doing and running for it with a bag...

Our school had an annulment over the intercom the day before- ANY INDIVIDUALS FOUND TO BE IN WILL BE SUBJECT TO CRIMINAL PROSECUTION as an adult.

Part: 3

MONDAY, JULY 4

Marcel,

THE WEATHER STAYED BEAUTIFUL-FINE AND SUNNY, just hot enough for a whole week after the challenge at Ray's house.

The Fourth of July was no different, and Marcel woke to sunlight washing over his navy-blue blanket, like a slow surf of white. He was happy. He was more than happy. He was psyched. He was hanging out with Nathaniel today. His mom was home, awake, and making breakfast. He leaned in the doorframe and watched her crack eggs into a pan, break the yolks up with the edge of a wooden spatula.

'What's the occasion?' He said. He was still tired and his neck and back were sore; he'd worked two shifts stocking shelves after closing time at the Home Depot in Leeds, where his mom's ex-boyfriend Danny was a manager. Dumb work, but it paid okay. He had a hundred dollars in his pocket and would be able to buy Nathaniel something at the mall. Her birthday was still a few weeks away- July 29-but still. Might as well get her something small a little early.

‘I could ask you the same thing.’ She let the eggs sizzle away and came over to him and gave him a big smack on the cheek before he could pull away.

‘Why are you up so early?’

He could see traces of makeup. So...?

She’d been on a date last night. No wonder she was in a good mood.

‘Didn’t feel like sleeping anymore,’ he said cautiously. He wondered whether his mom would admit to going out. Sometimes she did if a date had gone well.

‘Just in time for eggs. Do you want eggs? Are you hungry? I’m making some eggs for Dayna.’ She shook the scrambled eggs onto a plate. They were perfectly scrambled, trembling with butter. Before he could answer, she lowered her voice and said, ‘You know all that therapy Dayna’s been doing?’

Well, Bill says-’

‘Bill?’ Marcel cut in. His mom blushed. Busted. ‘He’s just a friend, Marcel.’

Marcel doubted it, but he said nothing.

His mom went on, in a rush: ‘He took me out to Lea’s in Judson last night. Nice tablecloths and everything. He drinks wine, Marcel. Do you believe that?’ She shook her head, amazed.

‘And he knows someone, some doctor at Columbia Memorial who works with people like Day. Bill says Dayna’s got to go more regularly, like every day.’

‘We can’t-,’ Marcel started to say, but his mom understood and finished for him.

‘I told him we couldn’t afford it. But he said he could get us in, even with no insurance. Can you believe it? At the hospital.’

Marcel said nothing. They'd gotten their hopes up the before-new doctor, new treatment, someone who could help. And something always went wrong. A pipe burst and the emergency fund would dry up replacing it, or the doctor would be a quack. The one time they'd managed to see someone in a real hospital, he'd looked at Dayna for five minutes, done nerve tests, banged on her knee and squeezed her toes, and straightened up.

'Impossible,' he'd said, sounding angry, like he was mad at them for wasting his time. 'Car accident, right?

My advice is: to apply for a better chair. No reason she should be wheeling around in this piece of junk.' And he'd toed the wheelchair, the five-hundred-dollar wheelchair Marcel had busted his ass for whole autumn trying to purchase, while his mom cried, while Dayna lay curled up every night on her bed, fetal, vacant.

'So, you want eggs or not?' His mom said.

Marcel shook his head. 'Not hungry.' He picked up Dayna's plate, grabbed a fork, and carried both into the living room. She had her head sticking out of the open window, and as he entered, he heard her shout, 'In your dreams!' and then a burst of laughter from below.

'What's that about?' He asked her.

She snapped around to face him.

Her face went red. 'Just Ricky, talking stupid,' she said and took the plate from him. Ricky worked in the kitchen at Dot's, and he was always sending gifts up to Dayna-cheap flowers, purchased at the gas station, little teddy bear figurines. Ricky was all right.

'Why are you staring at me?' Dayna demanded.

'Not starring,' Marcel said. He sat next to her and pulled her feet into his lap, began working her calves with his knuckles, as he always did. So, she could walk again. So, she would keep believing it. Dayna ate quickly, eyes on her plate. She was avoiding him. Finally, her mouth crooked into a smile. 'Ricky said he wants to marry me.'

'Maybe you should,' Marcel said.

Dayna shook her head. 'Freak.'

She reached out and punched Marcel's shoulder, and he pretended it had hurt.

He was overwhelmed, momentarily, with happiness.

It was going to be a good day.

He showered and dressed carefully -he'd even remembered to put his jeans in the wash, so they looked good, crisp, and clean and took the bus to Nathaniel's neighborhood.

It was only ten thirty, but the sun was already high, hovering in the sky like a single eye. As soon as Marcel turned onto Nathaniel's street, he felt like he was stepping onto a TV set like he was in one of those shows from the 1950s where someone was always washing a car in the driveway and the women wore aprons and said hello to the mailmen. Except there was no movement here, no voices, no people hauling trash or banging doors. It was too quiet. That was one thing about living in the back of Dot's: someone was always yelling about something. It was kind of comforting, in a way, like a reminder that you weren't all alone in having problems.

Nathaniel was waiting on her front stoop.

Marcel's stomach bottomed out as soon as he saw her. Her hair was fixed low, in a side ponytail, and she was wearing a ruffled yellow jumper-type thing, with the shirt and shorts attached, that would have looked stupid on anyone else. But on her, it looked amazing like she was life-size, exotic Popsicle.

He couldn't help but think that whenever she had to use the bathroom, she'd have to get undressed. She stood up, waving at him, as though he could miss her, wobbling slightly on large wedge heels.

She wasn't wearing her ankle brace anymore, even though he knew she'd screwed her ankle up again running away from Donahue's house. But she winced slightly when she walked.

'Joh- John, and Maggie went to get iced coffees,' she said as he approached her, doing his best not to walk too quickly. 'I told them to get us some too. Do you drink coffee?'

'I'd shoot coffee if I could,' he said, and she laughed. The sound made him warm all over, even though he still felt a weird, prickling discomfort standing on her property like he was in a One-of-These-Things-Doesn't-Belong drawing. A curtain twitched in a ground-floor window, and a face appeared and disappeared too rapidly for Marcel to make out.

'Someone's spying on us,' he said. 'Probably my dad.' Nathaniel waved dismissively. 'Don't worry. He's harmless.'

Marcel wondered what it would be like to have a dad like that in the house, around, so taken-for-granted you could dismiss him with a wave of the hand. Dayna's dad, Tom, had been married to Marcel's mom-only for eighteen months, and only because Marcel's mom got pregnant, but still. Her dad sent emails to her regularly, and money every month, and sometimes even came for a visit. Marcel had never heard a word from his father, not a single peep. All he knew was his dad worked construction and came from the Dominican Republic. He wondered, for just a split second, what his father was doing now. He was alive and well, back in Florida.

He'd finally settled down and had a whole host of little kids running around, with dark eyes like Marcel's, with the same high cheekbones.

Or even better, he'd taken a big-ass tumble from a tall scaffold and split open his head.

When Joh Joh and Maggie returned in another one of Joh- John's Junkers- which rattled and shook so badly, Marcel was sure it would quit on them before they reached the mall- Marcel helped Nathaniel to the back and opened the door for her.

'You're so sweet, Marcel,' she said, and kissed his cheek, looking almost regretful.

The ride to Kingston was good. Marcel tried to pay Joh Joh back for the iced coffee, but Joh- John waved him off. Maggie managed to coax a decent station out of the patchy radio, and they listened to Johnny Cash until Nathaniel begged for something that had been recorded in this century. Nathaniel made Marcel do magic tricks again, and this time she laughed when he made a straw materialize from her hair.

The car smelled like old tobacco and mint, like an old man's underwear drawer, and the sun came through the windows, and the whole state of New York seemed lit up by a special, interior glow. Marcel felt, for the first time since moving to Carp, for the first time in his life, as he belonged somewhere. He wondered how different the past few years would have been if he had been hanging out with Joh- John, and Maggie if he'd been dating Nathaniel, picking her up to drive her to the movies on Fridays, dancing with her in the gym at homecoming.

He fought down a wave of sadness.

None of it would last. It couldn't.

Marcel had driven past the Hudson Valley Mall in Kingston but had never gone inside it. The ceiling was fitted with big skylights, which made the spotless linoleum floors seem to glow. The air smelled like body spray and the little bags of potpourri his mom put in her underwear drawer.

But mostly, it smelled like bleach. Everything was white, like a hospital, like the whole building had been dunked in Clorox. It was still early, and the crowds were thin. Marcel's cowboy boots echoed loudly on the ground when he walked, and he hoped Nathaniel wouldn't find it annoying.

Once inside, Nathaniel consulted a small flyer she had pulled from her bag and announced that she would meet up with the group in an hour or so, outside the Taco Bell in the food court.

'You're leaving?' Marcel blurted out.

Nathaniel looked at Maggie for help.

Maggie jumped in: 'Nathaniel has an audition.'

'An audition for what?' Marcel asked. He wished he didn't sound so upset. Immediately, Nathaniel began to blush.

'You're going to make fun of me,' she said. His heart practically ripped open. Like he, Marcel Mason, would ever dream of making fun of Natalie Dalcas.

'I won't,' he said quietly. Joh- John and Maggie were already wandering off. Joh- John pretended to shove Maggie into the fountain. She yelped and walloped him with a fist. Wordlessly, Nathaniel passed him the flyer. It was badly designed. The font was illegible.

WANTED: MODELS AND ACTRESSES TO SHOWCASE THE BEST AND THE BRIGHTEST AT DAZZLING GEMS!

COMMERCIAL AUDITIONS: 11:30 A.M. SATURDAY AT THE HUDSON VALLEY MALL.

MUST BE EIGHTEEN OR OLDER.

‘Your birthday is on the twenty-ninth, right?’ Marcel said, hoping he might get extra points for remembering.

‘So? That’s only three weeks away,’ Nathaniel said, and he remembered she was one of the youngest in their graduating class. He passed her the flyer, and she shoved it back into her bag as though she was embarrassed to have shown him. ‘I thought I’d try, anyway.’

You’re beautiful, Natalie, he wanted to say to her. But all he could say was, ‘They’d be morons to take anyone else.’

She smiled so widely, he could see all her perfect teeth, nestled in her perfect mouth, like small white candies. He was hoping she might kiss his cheek again, but she didn’t. ‘It won’t take more than an hour or two,’ she said. ‘Probably less.’ Then she was gone.

Marcel was left in a foul mood. He wandered behind Joh- John, and Maggie for a while, but even though both were perfectly nice, it was clear they wanted to be alone. They had their language, their jokes. They were constantly touching each other too- pushing and shoving, pinching, and hugging, like kids flirting on a playground. Jesus. Marcel didn’t know why they just didn’t get it on already.

They were crazy about each other.

He made an excuse about wanting to get something for his sister-Joh- John looked vaguely surprised he even had a sister-and wandered outside, smoking three cigarettes in a row in the parking lot, which was beginning to fill up. He checked his phone a few times, hoping Nathaniel had already texted. She hadn’t. He began to feel like an idiot. He had all this money on him. He’d been planning to buy her something. But this wasn’t a date.

Was it?

What did she want from him? He couldn't tell. Inside, he wandered around aimlessly. The mall wasn't that big-only one floor-and there was no carousel, which disappointed him. One time he'd taken a carousel ride with Dayna at a mall in Columbus-or was it- Chicago?

They'd raced around, trying to ride every single horse before the music stopped playing, yelling like cowboys. The memory made him happy and sad at the same time. It took him a moment to realize he'd accidentally stepped in front of a Victoria's Secret.

A mom and her daughter were giving him weird looks. He looked like a perv. He turned away quickly, resolving to go to Dazzling Gems and see whether Nathaniel was done yet. It had been an hour, anyway.

Dazzling Gems was on the other side of the building. He was surprised to see a long line snaking out of the boutique-girls waiting to audition, all of them tanned and wearing next to nothing and perching like antelope on towering heels, and none of them close to as pretty as Nathaniel. They were all cheesy looking, he thought. Then he saw her.

She was standing just outside the boutique doors, talking to an old person with a face that reminded Marcel of a ferret. His hair was greasy and thinning on top; Marcel could see patchy bits of his scalp. He was wearing a cheap suit, and even this, somehow, managed to look greasy and threadbare. At that second, Nathaniel turned and spotted Marcel. She smiled big, waving, and pushed toward him. Ferret melted into the crowd.

'How was it?' Marcel asked.

'Stupid,' she said. 'I didn't even make it through the doors. I waited in line for, like, an hour and barely moved three places. And then some woman came around and checked IDs.' She said it cheerfully, though.

'So, who was that?' Marcel asked carefully. He didn't want her to think he was jealous of Ferret, even though he sort of was...

'Who?' Nathaniel blinked.

'That guy you were just talking to,' he said. Marcel noticed Nathaniel was holding something... a business card.

‘Oh, that.’ Nathaniel rolled her eyes. ‘Some modeling scouts. He said he liked my look.’ She said it casually like it was no big deal, but he could tell she was thrilled.

‘So-o he just, like, goes around handing out cards?’ Marcel said.

He could tell right away he’d offended her. ‘He doesn’t just hand them out to anyone,’ she said stiffly. ‘He handed one to me. Because he liked my face. Gisele got discovered in a mall.’

Marcel didn’t think Ferret looked anything like a modeling agent-and why would an agent be scouting at the mall in Kingston, New York, anyway? -But he didn’t know how to say so without offending her further. He didn’t want her to think he thought she wasn’t pretty enough to be a model because he did. Except for models where tall and she was short. But otherwise.

‘Be careful,’ he said because he could think of nothing else to say.

To his relief, she laughed. ‘I know what I’m doing,’ she said.

‘Come on. Let’s go get something to eat. I’m starving.’ Nathaniel didn’t like to hold hands because it made her feel ‘imbalanced,’ but she walked so close to him, their arms were almost touching. It occurred to him that anyone looking would assume they were together, like boyfriend-girlfriend, and he had a sudden rush of insane happiness. He had no idea how this had happened that he was walking next to Nathaniel Dalcas as he belonged there like she was his girl. He thought, vaguely, it had something to do with Terror. They found Joh- John, and Maggie arguing about whether to go to Sbarro or East Wok. While they hashed it out,

Marcel and Nathaniel agreed easily on Subway. He bought her lunch-a chicken sub, which she changed at the last second to a salad (‘Just in case,’ she said cryptically)-and a Diet Coke. They found an empty table and sat down while Maggie and Joh- John stood in line at Taco Bell, which they had at last agreed on.

‘So, what’s up with them?’ Marcel said.

‘With Joh- John and Maggie?’ Nathaniel shrugged. ‘Best friends, I guess.’ She slurped her soda loudly. He liked the way she ate unselfconsciously, unlike some girls. ‘I think Joh- John has a crush on her, though.’

‘Seems like it,’ Marcel said.

Nathaniel tilted her head, watching him.

‘What about you?’ ‘What about me what?’

‘Do you have a crush on anyone?’ He had just taken a big bite of his sandwich; the question was so unexpected he nearly choked. He couldn’t think of a single thing to say that wasn’t lame.

‘I’m not -’ He coughed and took a sip of his Coke. Jesus. His face was burning.

‘I mean, I don’t-’ ‘Marcel.’ She cut him off. Her voice was suddenly stern. ‘I’d like you to kiss me now.’ He had just been scarfing a meatball sub. But he kissed her anyway. What else could he do?

He felt the noise in his head, the noise around them, swelling into a clamor; he loved the way she kissed like she was still hungry like she wanted to eat him. Heat roared through his whole body, and for one second, he experienced a crazy shock of anxiety: he must be dreaming. He put one hand on the back of her head, and she pulled away just long enough to say, ‘Both hands, please.’

After that, the noise in his head quieted. He felt relaxed, and he kissed her again, more slowly this time. On the way home, he barely said anything. He was happier than he’d ever been, and he feared to say or doing anything that would ruin it.

Joh- John dropped Marcel off first. Marcel had promised to watch fireworks on TV with Dayna tonight. He wondered whether he should kiss Nathaniel again-he was stressing about it, it-but she solved the problem by hugging him, which would have been disappointing except she was pressed up next to him in the car and he could feel her boobs against his chest.

‘Thanks a lot, man,’ he said to Joh- John. Joh- John gave him a fist bump.

Like they were friends.

They were. He watched the car drive off, even after he could no longer make out Nathaniel’s silhouette in the backseat until the car disappeared beyond a hill and he could hear only the distant, guttural growl of the engine. Still, he stood there on the sidewalk, reluctant to head inside, back to Dayna and his mom and the narrow space of his room, piled with clothes and empty cigarette packs, smelling vaguely like garbage.

He just wanted to be happy for a little longer.

His phone buzzed. An email. His heart picked up. He recognized the sender.

Luke Hanrahan.

The message was short.

Leave us alone. I'll go to the police.

Marcel read the message several times, enjoying it, reading desperation between the lines. He'd been wondering whether Luke had received his message; he had. Marcel scrolled down and reread the email he had sent a week earlier.

The bets are in.

The game is on.

Part: 4

I'll make you a trade:

A sister's legs for a brother's life.

Standing in the fading sun, Marcel allowed himself to smile.

Maggie,

IT HAD BEEN A GOOD DAY-ONE OF THE BEST OF THE whole summer so far. For once, Maggie wouldn't let herself think about the future, and what would happen in the fall, when John went to college at SUNY Binghamton and Nathaniel headed to Los Angeles to be an actress. Maggie thought, she could just stay on at Anne's house, as a kind of helper. She could even move in. Lily could come too; they could share a room in one of the sheds.

Of course, that meant she'd still be stuck in Carp, but at least she'd be out of Fresh Pines Mobile Park. She liked Anne, and she especially liked the animals. She'd been out to Mansfield Road three times a week, and she was already looking forward to heading back. She liked the smell of wet straw and old leather and grass that hung over everything; she liked the way the dog Muppet recognized her, and the excited chattering of the chickens. She decided she liked the white Bengal's, too-from a distance, anyway.

She was mesmerized by the way they moved, muscles rippling like the surface of the water, and by their eyes, which looked so wise-so bleak, too, as though they had stared into the center of the universe and found it disappointing, a feeling Maggie completely understood. But she was happy to let Anne do the feeding. She couldn't believe the balls on the woman. It was a good thing Anne was too old for Fear. She would have nailed it.

Anne went inside the pen, got within three feet of the white Bengal's as they circled her, eyeing the bucket of meat hungrily-although Maggie was sure they'd be just as happy to take a chomp of Anne's head.

Anne insisted they wouldn't harm her, though. 'As long as I'm doing the feeding,' she said, 'they won't use me for feed.' Maybe-just maybe-things would be okay. The only bad part of the day was the fact that Joh- John was constantly checking his phone, Maggie assumed for texts from Avery. This reminded her that Matt hadn't texted her once since their breakup. Meanwhile, Joh- John had Avery (Maggie wouldn't think of her as a girlfriend,) and Nathaniel had Marcel hanging on her every word and was also still seeing a bartender over in Kingston, some sleazy guy who rode a Vespa, which Nathaniel insisted was just as cool as a motorcycle.

Right...?

But after they dropped off Marcel, Nathaniel asked, 'Is Avery coming tonight, Joh- John?' and when Joh- John said no, too quickly, Maggie felt at peace with the world. Nathaniel made them detour so she could get a six-pack; then they headed to 7- Eleven and bought junky Fourth of July food: Doritos and dip, powdered doughnuts, and even a bag of pork cracklings, because it was funny and Joh- John had bravely volunteered to eat some.

They headed to the gully: a steep, barren slope of gravel and broken-up concrete that bottomed out in the old train tracks, now red with rust and littered with trash. The sun was just starting to set. They picked their way carefully down the slope and across the tracks, and Joh- John scouted the best place to light off the sparklers.

This was a tradition. Two years ago, Joh- John had even surprised Maggie by buying two fifty-pound bags of mixed sand from Home Depot and making a beach. He'd even bought loopy straws and those paper umbrellas to put in their drinks, so she would feel they were somewhere tropical.

Today, Maggie wouldn't have chosen to be anywhere else in the entire world. Not even the Caribbean. Nathaniel was already on her second beer, and she was getting wobbly. Maggie had a beer too, and even though she didn't usually like to drink, she felt warm and happy. She stumbled over a loose slat in the tracks and Joh- John caught her, looped an arm around her waist. She was surprised that he felt so solid, so strong. So warm, too.

'You okay there, Heath-bar?' When he smiled, both of his dimples appeared, and Maggie had the craziest thought: she wanted to kiss them. She banished the idea quickly. That was why she didn't drink.'

I'm fine.' She tried to pull away. He moved his arm to her shoulders. She could smell beer on his breath. She wondered if he, too, was a little drunk.

'Come on, get off me.' She said it jokingly, but she didn't feel like joking. Nathaniel was wandering up ahead of them, kicking at stones. Darkness was falling, and her heart was beating hard in her chest and for a moment, she felt like she and Joh- John were alone. He was staring at her with an expression she couldn't identify. She felt heat spreading through her stomach-she was nervous for no reason.

'Take a picture. It'll last longer,' she said and gave him a push. The moment passed. Joh- John laughed and charged; she Marcel him.

'Children, children. Stop fighting!' Nathaniel called back to them. They found a place to set off the sparklers. Nathaniel's fizzled and sputtered out before they could get properly lit. Maggie tried next. When she stepped forward with the lighter, there was a series of cracking sounds, and Maggie jumped back, thinking confusedly she'd messed up. But then she realized that she hadn't even gotten the sparkler lit.

'Look, look!' Nathaniel was bouncing up and down excitedly. Maggie turned just as a series of fireworks-green, red, a shower of golden sparks-exploded in the east, just above the tree line. Nathaniel was laughing like a maniac.

‘What the hell?’ Maggie felt dizzy with happiness and confusion. It wasn’t even all-the-way dark yet, and there were never any fireworks in Carp. The nearest fireworks wherein Poughkeepsie, fifty minutes away, at Wary as Park- where Lily would be with their mom and Bo right now.

Only Joh- John didn’t seem excited. His arms were a-crossed, and he was shaking his head as they kept going: more gold, and now blue and red again, blooming and fading, sucked back into the sky, leaving tentacle-traces of smoke. And just as Nathaniel started running, half limping but still laughing, calling, ‘Come on, come on!’ like they could race straight through to the source, it hit Maggie too: this wasn’t a celebration.

It was a sign. In the distance, sirens began to wail. The show-stopped abruptly: ghostly fingers of smoke crept silently across the sky. At last, Nathaniel stopped running. Whipping around to face Maggie and Joh- John, she said, ‘What?’

What is it?’ Maggie shivered, even though it wasn’t cold. The air smelled like smoke, and the wail of the fire trucks cut through her head, sharp and hot.

‘It’s the next challenge,’ she said.

‘It’s Fright.’

It was just after eleven p.m. by the time Joh- John dropped Maggie off in front of the trailer. Now she wished she hadn’t had the beer-she felt exhausted. Joh- John had been quiet since Natalie got out of the car.

Now he turned to her and said, abruptly, ‘I still think you should quit; you know.’

Maggie pretended not to know what he was talking about. ‘Quit what?’

‘Don’t play dumb.’ Joh- John rubbed his forehead. The light shining into the car from the porch lit up his profile: the straight slope of his nose, the set of his jaw. Maggie realized that he wasn’t a boy anymore. Somehow, when she wasn’t looking, he had become a guy -tall and strong, with a stubborn chin and a girlfriend and opinions she didn’t share. She felt an ache in her stomach, a sense of loss and a sense of wanting.

‘The game’s just going to get more dangerous, Maggie. I don’t want you to get hurt. I’d never forgiven myself if -’ He trailed off, shaking his head. Maggie thought of that awful text message she’d received. Quit now, before you get hurt. Anger sparked in her chest. Why was the hell everyone trying to make sure she didn’t compete?

‘I thought you were rooting for me.’

‘I am.’ Joh- John turned to face her. They were very close together in the dark. ‘Just not like that.’ For a second, they continued staring at each other. His eyes were dark moons. His lips were a few inches away from hers. Maggie realized that she was still thinking about kissing him.

‘Good night, Joh- John,’ she said and got out of the car.

Inside, the TV was on. Krista and Bo were lying on the couch, watching an old black-and-white movie. Bo was shirtless, and Krista was smoking. The coffee table was packed with empty beer bottles-Maggie counted ten of them.

‘Hey’ a Maggie Lynn.’ Krista stubbed out her cigarette. She missed the ashtray on her first try. She was glassy-eyed.

Maggie could barely look at her. She better not has been messed up and driving with Lily in the car; Maggie would kill her. ‘Where you been?’ ‘Nowhere,’ Maggie said. She knew her mom didn’t care. ‘Where’s Lily?’

‘Sleeping.’ Krista stuck a hand down her shirt, scratching. She kept her eyes on the TV. ‘Big day. We saw fireworks.’

‘Piss-packed with people,’ Bo put in. ‘There was a line for the goddamn porta-potties.’

‘I’m going to sleep,’ Maggie said.

She didn’t bother trying to be nice.

Krista was too drunk to lecture her.

‘Keep the TV down, okay?’

She had trouble getting the door to the bedroom open; she realized that Lily had balled up one of her sweatshirts and shoved it in the crack between the door and the warped floorboards, to help keep out the noise and the smoke. Maggie had taught her that trick. It was hot in the room, even though the window was open, and a small portable fan was whirring rhythmically on the dresser.

She didn't turn on the light. There was a little moonlight coming through the window, and she could have navigated the room by touch, anyway. She undressed, piling her clothes on the floor, and climbed into bed, pushing her blankets to the footboard, using only the sheet as a cover. She had assumed Lily was sleeping, but suddenly she heard rustling from the other twin bed.

'Maggie?' She whispered. 'Uh-huh?'

'Can you tell me a story?'

'What kind of story?'

'A happy kind.' It had been a long time since Lily had asked for a story. Now Maggie told a version of one of her favorites, 'The Twelve Dancing Princesses,' except instead of princesses, she made the girls normal sisters, who lived in a falling-down castle with a queen and king too vain and stupid to look after them. But then they found a trapdoor that led down to a secret world, where they were princesses, and where everyone fawned over them.

By the time she was done, Lily was breathing slowly, deeply. Maggie rolled over and closed her eyes.

Part: 5

'Maggie?'

Lily's voice was thick with sleep. Maggie opened her eyes again, surprised.

'You should be sleeping, Billy.'

'Are you going to die?'

The question was so unexpected, Maggie didn't answer for a few seconds. 'Of course not, Lily,' she said sharply.

Lily's face was half-mashed into her pillow. 'Kyla Anderson says you're going to die. Because of Terror.'

Maggie felt a current of fear go through her fear, and something else, something deeper and more painful.

'How did you hear about Terror?' She asked. Lily mumbled something. Maggie prompted her again.

'Who told you about Fear, Lily?' she asked.

But Lily was asleep.

The Graybill house was haunted.

Everyone in Carp knew it, had been saying it for half a century, since the last of the Graybill's had hanged himself from its rafters, just like his father and grandfather before him.

The Graybill curse. No one had lived in the house officially for more than forty years, although infrequently some squatters and runaways risked it.

No one would live there. At night, lights flickered on and off in the windows.

Vocal sounds whispered in the mouse-infested walls, and ghosts of children ran down dust-covered hallways. Sometimes, locals claimed they heard a woman earsplitting screaming in the attic.

Those were the rumors, at least. And now, the fireworks: some of the old-timers, the ones who claimed they could still recollect the day the last Graybill was found swinging by the neck, swore that the fireworks weren't set off by kids at all.

They might not even be fireworks. Who knew what sort of forces leached out of that tumbledown house, what kind of bad juju, sizzling the night into fire and flame?

The police officers thought it was just the usual Fourth of July prank. But Maggie, Nathaniel, and Marcel knew better. So, did Kim Hollister and Ray Hanrahan and all the other players. Two days after the Fourth of July, their suspicions were confirmed.

Maggie had just gotten out of the shower when she booted on the ancient laptop and checked her email. Her throat went dry; her mouth turned itchy.

Judmentfallingtooyou@gmail.com

Subject: Enjoy fireworks? The show will be even better this Friday at ten p.m.

See how long you can stand it.

Remember no calling for help.

FRIDAY, JULY 8

Maggie,

‘IT’S TOO EASY,’ MAGGIE SAID AGAIN. SHE SQUEEZED the steering wheel. She didn’t like to drive.

But Joh- John had been insistent. He wasn’t going to make it to the challenge today, wasn’t going to sit around and wait for hours while the players tried to outlast one another in a haunted house.

And for once, she’d been able to use the car. Her mom and Bo were getting smashed with some friends in Lot 62, an abandoned trailer mostly used for partying. They’d crawl home around four, or not until sunrise.

‘They’ll probably try and screw with us,’ Nathaniel said. ‘They’ve probably rigged the whole house with sound effects and lights.’

‘It’s still too easy.’ Maggie shook her head. ‘This is Fright, not Halloween.’ Her palms were sweating.

‘Reminisces about the time we were kids, and Joh- John dared you to stand on the porch for three minutes?’

‘Only because you flaked,’ Nathaniel said.

‘You flaked too,’ Maggie reminded her, sorry now that she had brought it up. ‘You didn’t make it for thirty seconds.’ ‘Joh- John did, though,’ Nathaniel said, turning her face to the window. ‘He went inside, remember? He stayed inside for five whole minutes.’

‘I forgot about that,’ Maggie said.

‘When was that?’ Marcel spoke up unexpectedly.

‘Years ago. We must have been ten, eleven. Right, Maggie?’

‘Younger, Nine,’ Maggie wished that Joh- John had come.

This was their first challenge without him, and her chest ached. Being with Joh- John made her feel safe.

They turned the bend and the house became visible: the sharp peak of its roof silhouetted against the clouds knotted on the horizon, like something out of a horror movie. It rose crookedly out of the ground, and Maggie imagined even from a distance she could hear the wind howling through the holes in the roof, the mice nibbling at the rotten wood floors.

The only thing missing was a flock of bats. There were a dozen cars parked on the road. Most people felt the same way Joh- John did, and most of the spectators had stayed home. Not all of them, though.

Maggie spotted Vivian Trevin, sitting on the hood of her car, smoking a cigarette. A group of juniors huddled not far off, passing around a shared bottle of wine, looking solemn, as if they were attending a wake. For a second, before Maggie turned the engine off, the rain misting through the headlights reminded her of thin slivers of glass.

Marcel climbed out of the car and opened the door for Nathaniel. Maggie reached for the bag she’d packed for the night: food, water, a big blanket. She would be here for as long as it took to win. Nathaniel and Marcel, too.

Suddenly there was a muffled shout from outside. Maggie looked up in time to see a dark shape rocket past the car. Nathaniel screamed. And people were suddenly rushing into the road. Maggie threw herself out of the car and ran around to the passenger side, in time to see Ray Hanrahan catch Marcel in the stomach with a shoulder. Marcel stumbled backward, bumping against the remains of a fence. A shower of wood collapsed behind him.

‘I know what you’re doing, you little freak,’ he spat out. ‘You think you can-’

He was cut off and grunted sharply.

Marcel had stepped forward and grabbed Ray by the throat. There was a collective gasp. Nathaniel cried out. Marcel leaned in and spoke quietly into Ray’s ear.

Maggie couldn’t hear what he said. Just as quickly, he stepped backward, releasing Ray, who stood, coughing, and gagging in the rain.

Marcel’s face was calm. Nathaniel moved as though to hug him and then, at the last second, obviously thought better of it.

‘Stay the hell away from me, Mason,’ Ray said when he had regained his breath. ‘I’m warning you. You better watch it.’ ‘Come on, guys,’ Sarah Wilson, another contestant, spoke up. ‘It’s pouring. Can we get started?’ Ray was still glowering at Marcel.

But he said nothing.

‘All right.’ That was -Digging.

Maggie hadn’t seen him in the crowd.

I love the old Chevy looking at the photos 3 on the tree, yet with newer parts... I find that cool.

His voice was suctioned away by the darkness and the rain. ‘Rules are simple. The longer you make it in the house, the higher your score.’ Maggie shivered. The night of the jump, when -Digging was crowing into the megaphone, seemed like it had happened years ago: the radio, the beer, the celebration.

She suddenly couldn’t remember how she had ended up the here-in front of the Graybill house, all its angles and planes wrong. A deformed place. Listing to one side as though it was in danger of collapse.

‘No calling for help,’ -Digging said, and his voice cracked a little. Maggie wondered whether he knew something they didn’t. ‘That’s it. Challenge is on.’

Everyone broke apart. Beams of light-flashlights and the occasional blue glow of a cell phone-swept across the road illuminated the crooked fence, the tall grass, the remains of a front path, now choked with weeds. Marcel was pulling his backpack out of the trunk. Nathaniel was standing next to him. Maggie pushed her way over to them.

‘What was that about?’ Maggie asked. Marcel slammed the trunk closed.

‘No idea,’ he said. In the dark, it was hard to decipher his expression. Maggie wondered whether he knew more than he was telling.

‘The guy’s a psychopath.’ Maggie shivered again as moisture seeped under the collar of her jacket, dampening her sweatshirt.

She knew, like everyone did, that Marcel’s older sister had gone up against Ray’s older brother two years ago in Joust and been paralyzed. Maggie hadn’t been watching -she’d been babysitting Lily that night with Joh- John.

But Nat had said the car folded up like an accordion. Maggie wondered if Marcel blamed the Hanrahan’s. ‘Let’s stay away from Ray inside, okay?’ She said.

‘Let’s stay away from all of them.’ She didn’t put it past Ray Hanrahan to sabotage them- jump out at them, grab them, or take a swing. Marcel turned to her and smiled. His teeth were very white, even in the dark.

‘Deal.’ They trudged across the road and into the yard with the others. Maggie’s chest was heavy with something that wasn’t fear, exactly-more like dread. It was too easy.

The rain made the mud suck at her shoes. It would be a sh*t night. She wished she’d thought to try and sneak a beer. She didn’t even like the taste, but that would take the edge off, make the night go quicker.

She wondered whether the judges were here-maybe sitting in the front seat of one of the darkened cars, legs on the dash; or even standing in the road, jogging up and down, pretending to be normal spectators.

That was the part of Fear she hated most of all: the fact that they were always being watched. They were on the front porch too quickly. Even Seller had just disappeared inside, and the door swung shut with a bang.

Nathaniel jumped...

‘You okay?’

Marcel asked her, in a deep voice.

‘Fine,’ Nat spoke too loudly. Once again, Maggie wished Joh- John had come along. She wished he were next to her, making stupid jokes, teasing her about being afraid.

‘Here goes nothing.’ Nathaniel took a step forward and heaved open the door, which was hanging at a weird angle. She hesitated... ‘It smells,’ she said. ‘As long as it doesn’t shoot or bark, I’m fine with it,’ Marcel said.

He didn’t seem afraid at all. He moved forward, in front of Nat, and stepped into the house. Nathaniel followed. Maggie was the last to enter.

Immediately, Maggie smelled it too: mouse sh*t and mildew, rot, like the smell of a mouth closed for years. Jagged beams of light zigzagged across the halls and through dark rooms, as the other players slowly spread out, trying to stake out their corners, their hiding spots.

Floorboards creaked, and doors moaned open and closed; voices whispered in the dark. The blackness was as thick and heavy as soup. Maggie felt her stomach pooling, open with fear.

She fumbled in her pocket for her phone. Nathaniel had the same idea. Nathaniel’s face was suddenly visible, lit up from underneath, her eyes deep hollows, her skin blue-tinged. Maggie used the feeble light from her phone to cast a small circle on the faded wallpaper, the termite-eaten molding.

Suddenly a bright light flashed on.

‘Flashlight app,’ Marcel said, as Maggie brought a hand to her eyes.

‘Sorry. I didn’t know it would be so strong.’

He directed the beam upward, to the ceiling, where the remains of a chandelier were swinging, creaking, in a faint wind. That was where three Graybill men had hanged themselves if the rumors were true.

‘Come on,’ Maggie said, trying to keep her voice steady. The judges might be anywhere. ‘Let’s move away from the door.’ They advanced farther into the house. Marcel took the lead. Footsteps rang out above them, on the second floor.

Marcel’s flashlight cut a small, sharp blade through the blackness, and Maggie was reminded of a documentary about the wreck of the Titanic she’d watched once with Lily-the way the recovery submarines had looked, floating through all that dark space, crawling over the ruined wood and the old china plates, which were covered with mossy growth and underwater things. That was how she felt.

As if they were at the bottom of the ocean. The pressure on her chest was squeezing, squeezing. She could hear Nathaniel breathing hard. From upstairs came muffled sounds of shouting: a fight.

‘Kitchen,’ Marcel announced. He swept the beam of light across rust pitted stove, a tile floor half ripped up.

All the images were disjointed, bleached white, like in a bad horror film. Maggie pictured insects everywhere, spider webs, horrible things dropping on her from above. Marcel aimed his beam in the corner and Maggie almost screamed: for a second, she saw a face-black, pitted eyes, mouth leering.

‘Can you stop pointing that thing at me?’

The girl raised her hand in front of her eyes, squinting, and Maggie’s heartbeat slowed. It was just Sarah Wilson, huddled in the corner. As Marcel angled the light down, Maggie saw that Sarah had brought a pillow and a sleeping bag. It would be easier, far easier, if all the players could huddle together in one room, passing Cheetos and a bottle of cheap vodka someone had stolen from a parent’s liquor cabinet.

But they were beyond that. They passed out of the kitchen and down a short set of stairs, littered with trash, all of it lit up in starts and jerks: cigarette butts, brittle leaves, blackened Styrofoam coffee cups. Squatters. Maggie heard footsteps: in the walls, overhead, behind her. She couldn't tell.

'Maggie'-Nathaniel turned around, grabbed Maggie's sweatshirt.

'Sh-h-h-h,' Marcel hushed them sharply. He shut off the flashlight. They stood in darkness so heavy, Maggie could taste it every time she inhaled: things moldering, rotting slowly; slippery, sliding, slithery things. Behind her. The footsteps stopped, hesitated. Floorboards creaked.

Someone was following them.

'Move,' Maggie whispered. She knew she was losing it-that it was probably just another player exploring the house-but she couldn't stop a terrible fantasy that seized her: it was one of the judges, pacing slowly through the dark, ready to grab her.

And not a human, either-a supernatural being with a thousand eyes and long, slick fingers, a jaw that would come unhinged, a mouth big enough to swallow you. The footsteps advanced. One more step, and then another.

'Move,' she said again. Her voice sounded strangled, desperate in the dark.

'In here,' Marcel said. It was so dark, she couldn't even see him, though he must have been standing only a few feet away. He grunted; she heard the groaning of old wood, the whine of rusted hinges. She felt Nathaniel move away from her and she followed blindly, quickly, nearly tripping over an irregularity in the floor, which marked the beginning of a new room.

Marcel swung the door closed behind her, leaning into it until it popped into place. Maggie stood, panting.

The footsteps kept coming. They paused outside the door. Her breath was shallow, as though she'd been underwater. Then the footsteps withdrew.

Marcel turned on the flashlight app again. In its glow, his face looked like a weird modern painting: all angles.

'What was that?' Maggie whispered. She was almost afraid neither Marcel nor Nat had heard.

But Marcel said, ‘Nothing. Someone trying to freak us out. That’s all.’

He placed his phone on the floor, so the beam of light was directed straight up. Marcel had a sleeping bag stuffed in his backpack; Maggie shook out the blanket she’d brought. Nathaniel sat down next to the cone of light, drawing the blanket around her shoulders.

Suddenly, relief broke in Maggie’s chest. They were safe, together, around their makeshift version of a campfire. It would be easy.

Marcel squatted next to Nathaniel. ‘Might as well get comfortable, I guess.’ Maggie paced the small room. It must have once been a storage area, or a pantry, except that it was a little way from the kitchen.

It was no more than twenty feet square. High up against one wall was the room’s single window, but the cloud cover was so thick, barely any light penetrated.

On one wall where warped wooden shelves, which now contained nothing but a layer of dust and yet more trash: empty chip bags, a crushed soda can, an old wrench. She used the light of her cell phone to perform a quick exploration.

‘Spiders,’ she commented, as her phone lit up a web, perfectly symmetrical, glistening and silver, which extended between two shelves. Marcel rocketed to his feet as though he’d been bitten on the ass.

‘Where?’

Maggie and Nathaniel exchanged a look.

Nathaniel cracked a small smile.

‘You’re afraid of spiders?’

Maggie blurted out. She couldn’t help it. Marcel had shown no fear, ever. She would never have expected it.

‘Keep your voice down,’ he said roughly.

‘Don’t worry,’ Maggie said. She turned off her phone. ‘It was just the web, anyway.’ She didn’t mention the small blurred lumps within it: insects, spun into the threads, waiting to be consumed and digested.

Marcel nodded and looked embarrassed. He turned away, shoving his hands in the pockets of his jacket.

‘Now what?’ Nathaniel said.

‘We wait,’ Marcel replied, without turning around. Nathaniel reached over and popped open a bag of chips. A second later, she was crunching loudly. Maggie looked at her.

‘What?’ Nathaniel said with her mouth full. ‘We’re going to be here all night. Except it came out, ‘we’re going to be crazy and sh*t all night.’

She was right... Maggie went and sat down next to her. The floor was uneven.

‘So, wave do you think it’s right too?’ Nathaniel said, which this time Maggie had no trouble translating.

‘What do I think about what?’ She hugged her knees to her chest. She wished the cone of light were bigger, more powerful. Everything outside its limited beam was rough shadow, shape, and darkness. Even Marcel, standing with his face turned away from the light.

In the dark, he could have been anyone.

‘I don’t know. Everything. The judges. Who plans all this?’

Maggie reached out and took two chips. She fed them into her mouth, one from each hand. It was an unstated rule that no one spoke about the identity of the judges. ‘I want to know how it got started,’ she said.

‘And why we’ve all been crazy enough to play.’ It was meant to be a joke, but her voice came out shrill. Marcel shifted and came to squat next to Natalie again.

‘What about you, Marcel?’ Maggie said. ‘Why did you agree to play?’ Marcel looked up. His face was a mask of hollows, and Maggie was suddenly reminded of one summer when she'd gone camping with some other Girl Scouts, the way the counselors had gathered them around the fire to tell ghost stories.

They had used flashlights to turn their faces gruesome, and all the campers were afraid. For a second, she thought he smiled.

'Revenge.'

Nathaniel started to laugh. 'Revenge?' She repeated.

Maggie realized she hadn't misheard. 'Nat,' she said sharply. Nathaniel must have remembered, then, about Marcel's sister: her smile faded quickly.

Marcel's eyes clicked to Maggie's. She quickly looked away.

So-o, he did blame Luke Hanrahan for what had happened. She felt suddenly cold. The word revenge was so awful: straight and sharp, like a knife. As if he could tell what she was thinking, Marcel smiled. 'I just want to cream Ray, that's all,' he said lightly, and reached out to grab the bag of chips.

Maggie felt instantly better. They tried to play cards for a while, but it was too dark, even for a slow-moving game; they had to keep passing the flashlight around. Nathaniel wanted to learn how to do a magic trick, but Marcel resisted it.

Occasionally- they heard voices from the hall or footsteps, and Maggie would tense up, certain that this was the beginning of the real challenge-spooky ghost holograms or people in masks who would jump out at them. But nothing happened. No one came barging in the door to say boo.

After a while, Maggie got tired. She balled up the duffel bag she'd brought under her head. She listened to the low rhythm of Marcel and Nathaniel's conversation they were talking about whether a shark or a bear would win in a fight, and Marcel was arguing that they had to specify a medium.

...???

Then they were talking about dogs, and Maggie saw two large eyes (a white Bengal's eyes?) the size of headlights, staring at her from the darkness. She wanted to scream; there was a monster here, in the dark, about to pounce. And she opened her mouth, but instead of a scream coming out, the darkness poured in, and she slept.

Part: 6

Marcel,

Marcel WAS DREAMING OF THE TIME THAT HE AND Dayna had - ridden the carousel together in Chicago. Or Columbus. But in his dream, there were palm trees, and a man selling grilled meats from a brightly colored cart. Dayna was in front of him, and her hair was so long it kept whipping him in the face.

A crowd was gathered: people shouting, leering, calling things he couldn't understand. He knew he was supposed to be happy he was supposed to be having fun, but he wasn't. It was too hot.

Plus, there was Dayna's hair, getting tangled in his mouth, making it hard to swallow. Making it hard to breathe. There was the stench from the meat cart, too. The smell of burning. The thick clouds of smoke.

Smoke...

Marcel woke up suddenly, jerking upright. He'd fallen asleep straight on the floor, with his face pressed against the cold wood. He had no idea what time it was. He could just make out

Maggie's and Nathaniel's entangled forms, the pattern of their breathing. For a second, still half-asleep, he thought they looked like baby dragons. Then he realized why: the room was filling with smoke. It was seeping underneath the crack below the door, snaking its way into the room.

He stood up, then thought better of it, remembering that smoke rises, and dropped to his knees. There was shouting: screams and footsteps sounded from other parts of the house.

Too easy. He remembered what Maggie had said earlier.

Of course...?

Firecrackers exploded here on the Fourth of July; there would be a prize for the players who stayed in the house the longest.

Fire... The house was on fire. He reached over and shook the girls not bothering to distinguish between them, to locate their elbows from their shoulders. 'Wake up. Wake up.'

Natalie sat up, rubbing her eyes, and then immediately began coughing.

'What-?'

'Fire,' he said shortly. 'Stay low.'

Smoke rises.' Maggie was stirring now too. He crawled back to the door. No doubt about it: the rats were leaving a project. There was a confusion of voices outside, the sound of slamming doors.

That meant the fire must have already spread far. No one would have wanted to bail right away. He put his hand on the metal door handle. It was warm to the touch, but not scalding.

'Nathaniel? Marcel? What's going on?' Maggie was fully awake now. Her voice was shrill, hysterical. 'Why is it so smoky?'

'Fire!!' It was Natalie who answered. Her voice was, amazingly, calm.

Time to get the hell out. Before the fire spread further. He had a sudden memory of some gym class in DC-or was it Richmond?

-When all the kids had to stop, drop, and roll onto the foot smelling linoleum. Even then, he'd known it was stupid. Like rolling would do anything but turn you into a fireball.

He grabbed the handle and pulled, but nothing happened. Tried again. Nothing. For a second, he thought maybe he was still asleep in one of his nightmares, where he tried and tried to run but couldn't, or swung at some assailant's face and didn't even make a mark. On his third try, the handle popped off in his hand. And for the first time in the whole game, he felt it: horror, building in his chest, crawling into his throat.

'What's happening?' Maggie was practically screaming now. 'Open the door, Marcel.'

‘I can’t.’ His hands and feet felt numb. The Fear was squeezing his lungs, making it hard to breathe. No. That was the smoke. Thicker now. He unfroze. He fumbled his fingers into the hole where the door handle had been, tugging frantically, and felt a sharp bite of metal. He jammed his shoulder against the door, feeling increasingly desperate. ‘It’s stuck.’

‘What do you mean, stuck?’ Maggie started to say something else and instead started coughing.

Marcel spun around, dropped into a crouch. ‘Hold on.’ He brought his sleeve to his mouth. ‘Let me think.’ He could no longer hear any footsteps and shouting. Had everyone else got out? He could hear, though, the progress of the fire: the muffled snapping and popping of old wood, decades of rot and ruin slurped into flame. Maggie was fumbling with her phone.

‘What are you doing?’ Nathaniel tried to swat at it.

‘The rules said no calling for.’

‘The rules?’

Maggie cut her off.

‘Are you crazy?’ She punched furiously at the keyboard. Her face was wild, contorted, like a wax mask that had started to melt. She let out a sound that was a cross between a scream and a sob. ‘It’s not working. There’s no service.’

Think, think. Through the dread, Marcel carved a clear path in his mind. A goal: he needed a goal. He knew instinctively that it was his job to get the girls out safely, just like it was his job to make sure nothing bad ever happened to Dayna, his Dayna, his only sister, and best friend.

He couldn’t fail again. No matter what. The window was too high-he’d never reach it. And it was so narrow... But he could give Natalie a boost... She might be able to fit. Then what? It didn’t matter. Maggie might be able to squeeze through too, although he doubted it.

‘Nathaniel,’ he stood up. The air tasted gritty and thick. It was hot. ‘Come on. You have to go through the window.’ Nathaniel started. ‘I can’t leave you.’

‘You have to, go... take your phone. Find help.’ Marcel steadied himself with one hand on the wall. He was losing it. ‘It’s the only way.’ Marcel barely saw her nod in the dark. When she stood up, he could smell her sweat. For a crazy second, he wished he could hug her, and tell her it would be okay.

But there was no time. An image of Dayna popped into his head, the mangled ruin of her car, her legs shriveling slowly to pale-white stalks, his fault.

Marcel bent down, gripped Nathaniel by the waist, helped her climb onto his shoulders. She drove a foot into his chest by accident, and he nearly lost it and fell. He was weak. It was the goddamn smoke. But he managed to steady himself and straighten up.

‘The window!’ Nathaniel gasped.

And Maggie, somehow, understood. She fumbled for the wrench she’d spotted earlier and passed it upward.

Nathaniel swung...

There was a tinkling. A rush of air blew into the room, and after just a second a whooshing sound, as the fire- beyond the door, edging closer-sensed that air, felt it, and surged toward it, like an ocean thundering toward the beach. Black smoke poured underneath the door.

‘Go!’ Marcel shouted.

He felt Nathaniel kick his head, his ear; then she was outside.

He dropped to his knees again. He could barely see. ‘You next,’ he said to Maggie.

‘I’ll never fit.’ She said it in a whisper, but somehow, he heard. He was relieved. He didn’t think he had the strength left to lift her.

His head was spinning. ‘Lie down,’ he said, in a voice that didn’t sound like his own. She did, pressing flat against the ground. He was glad to lie down too. Lifting Nathaniel that small distance had exhausted him. It was as though the smoke was a blanket - as though it was covering him, and telling him to sleep...

He was back on the carousel again. But this time the spectators were screaming. And it had started to rain. He wanted to get off - the ride was whirling faster and faster - lights where spinning overhead- lights, spinning, voices shouting.

Sirens screaming.

Sky.

Air.

Someone-Mom? -saying,

‘You’re okay, son. You’re going to be okay.’

Part: 7

SATURDAY,

JULY 9

Maggie,

WHEN MAGGIE WOKE UP, SHE IMMEDIATELY KNEW SHE was in a hospital, which was disappointing. In movies, people were always groggy and confused and asking where they were and what had happened. But there was no mistaking the smell of disinfectant, the clean white sheets, the beep-beep-beep of medical equipment. It was pleasant-the sheets were clean and crisp; her mom and Bo weren’t shouting; the air didn’t reek of old alcohol. She’d slept better than she had in a long time, and for several minutes she kept her eyes closed, breathing deeply.

Then Joh- John was speaking, quietly.

‘Come on, Maggie. We know you’re faking. I can tell your eyelid is twitching.’

Maggie opened her eyes.

Joy surged in her chest. Joh- John was sitting in a chair drawn up to the bed, leaning forward, as close as he could get without crawling into the cot with her.

Nathaniel was there too, eyes were swollen from crying, and she rocketed straight at Maggie.

‘Maggie.’ She started sobbing again. ‘Oh my God, Maggie. I was so scared.’

‘Hi, Nathaniel.’ Maggie had to speak through a mouthful of Nathaniel’s hair, which tasted like soap. She must have showered.

‘Don’t suffocate her, Nathaniel,’ Joh- John said. Nathaniel drew back, still sniffing, but she kept a grip on Maggie’s hand, as though she were worried Maggie might float away.

Joh- John was smiling, but his face was sheet white and there were dark circles under his eyes. Maggie thought, he had been sitting by her bed all night, worried she might be dying. The idea pleased her.

Maggie didn’t bother asking what had happened. It was obvious. Nathaniel had gotten help, somehow, and Maggie must have been carted off to the hospital when she was passed out. So, she asked, ‘Is Marcel okay? Where is he?’

‘Gone. He got up a few hours ago and walked out. He’s okay,’ Nathaniel said all in a rush. ‘The doctor said you’d be okay too.’

‘You won the challenge,’ Joh- John said, his face expressionless. Nathaniel shot him a look. Maggie inhaled again. When she did, she felt a sharp pain between her ribs. ‘Does my mom know?’ she asked. Nathaniel and Joh- John exchanged a glance.

‘She was here,’ Joh- John said. Maggie felt her chest seize again. She was here meant she’d left.

Of course...?

‘Lily, too,’ he rushed on. ‘She wanted to stay. She was hysterical-’ ‘It’s all right,’ Maggie said. Joh- John was still looking at her weirdly like someone had just forced a handful of Sour Patch Kids into his mouth. It occurred to her that she must look like crap, smelled like crap too. She felt her face heat up. Great. Now she’d look like crap warmed over.

‘What?’ she said, trying to sound annoyed without breathing too hard.

‘What is it?’

‘Listen, Maggie. Something happened last night, and your’ The door swung open, and Mrs. Dalcas came into the room, balancing two cups of coffee and a sandwich filmed in plastic, obviously from the cafeteria.

Mr. Dalcas was right behind her, carrying a duffel bag Maggie recognized as belonging to Nathaniel.

‘Maggie!’ Ms. Dalcas beamed at her. ‘You’re awake.’

‘I told my parents,’ Nathaniel said unnecessarily, under her breath.

‘It’s all right,’ Maggie said again. And secretly, she was pleased that Ms. and Mr. Dalcas had come. She was suddenly worried she might cry. Mr. Dalcas’ hair was sticking straight up, and he had a grass stain on one of the knees of his khakis; Mrs. Dalcas was wearing one of her pastel cardigans, and both of them were looking at Maggie as though she had come back from the dead. She had. For the first time, she realized, really realized, how close she had come. She swallowed rapidly, willing back the urge to cry.

‘How are you feeling, sweetheart?’ Ms. Dalcas set the coffees and sandwich on the counter and sat down on Maggie’s bed. She reached out and smoothed back Maggie’s hair; Maggie imagined, just for a second, that Ms. Dalcas was her real mother.

‘You know.’ Maggie tried and failed, to smile.

‘I had my dad bring some stuff,’ Nathaniel said. Mr. Dalcas hitched the duffel bag a little higher, and it occurred to Maggie that she had lost her bag- left it in the Graybill house. It was ashes by now. ‘Magazines. And that fuzzy blanket from my basement.’ The way Nathaniel was talking made it seem as if Maggie was going to be staying here.

‘I’m really fine.’ She sat up a little higher in bed, as though to prove it. ‘I can go home.’ ‘The doctors need to make sure there’s no damage inside,’ Ms. Dalcas said. ‘It might be a little while.’

‘Don’t worry, Maggie,’ Joh- John said quietly. He reached out and took her hand; she was startled by the softness of his touch, by the slow warmth that radiated from his fingertips through her body. ‘I’ll stay with you.’ I love you. She thought the words suddenly; this urge, like the earlier urge to cry, she had to will down.

‘Me too,’ Nathaniel said loyally.

‘Maggie needs to rest,’ Ms. Dalcas said. She was still smiling, but the corners of her eyes were creased with worry. ‘Do you remember what happened last night, honey?’

Maggie tensed. She wasn’t sure how much she should say. She looked to Nathaniel and Joh- John for cues, but both avoided her eyes. ‘Most of it,’ she said cautiously. Ms. Dalcas was still watching her extra carefully as if she were worried Maggie might suddenly crack apart or begin bleeding from the eyeballs. ‘And do you feel up to talking about it, or would you rather wait?’

Maggie’s stomach began to twist.

Why wouldn’t Joh- John, and Nathaniel look at her? ‘What do you mean, talking about it?’

Part: 8

‘The police are here,’ Joh- John blurted out. ‘We tried to tell you.’ ‘I don’t get it,’ Maggie said. ‘They think that the fire wasn’t an accident,’ Joh- John said. Maggie felt like he was trying to communicate a message to her with his eyes, and she was too stupid to get it. ‘Someone burned the house down on purpose.’

‘But it was an accident,’ Nathaniel insisted.

‘For God’s sake, both of you.’

Ms. Dalcas rarely lost her temper; Maggie was surprised to even hear her say ‘God.’ ‘Stop it. You’re not doing anybody any good by lying. This is because of that game-Fright, or whatever you call it. Don’t try to pretend it isn’t. The police know. It’s all over.

Honestly, I would have expected better.

Especially from you, Joh- John.’ Joh- John opened his mouth, then closed it again. Maggie wondered whether he’d been about to defend himself. But that would mean selling out Maggie and Nathaniel. She felt ashamed. Fear. The word seemed horrible spoken out-loud, here, in this clean white place.

Ms. Dalcas' voice turned gentle again. 'You'll have to tell them the truth, Maggie,' she said. 'Tell them everything you know.'

Maggie was starting to freak. 'But I don't know anything,' she said. She pulled her hand away from Joh- John's; her palm was starting to sweat. 'Why do they need to talk to me? I didn't do anything.'

'Someone is dead, Maggie,' Ms. Dalcas said. 'It's very serious.' For a second, Maggie was sure she'd misheard. 'What?' Ms. Dalcas looked stricken. 'I thought you knew.' She turned to Nathaniel. 'I was sure you would have told her.' Nathaniel said nothing.

Maggie turned to Joh- John. Her head took a very long time to move on her neck. 'Who?' She said.

'Little Bill Kelly,' Joh- John said. He tried to find her hand again, but she pulled away.

Maggie couldn't speak for a moment. The last time she'd seen Little Bill Kelly, he was sitting at a bus stop, feeding pigeons from the cup of his hands. When she'd smiled at him, he waved cheerfully and said, 'Hiya, Christy.' Maggie had no idea who Christy was. She'd barely known Little Kelly-he was older than she was and had been away for years in the army.

'I don't-' Maggie swallowed. Mr. and Ms. Dalcas were listening closely. 'But he wasn't -' 'He was in the basement,' Joh- John said. His voice broke.

'Nobody knew. You couldn't have known.' Maggie closed her eyes. Color bloomed behind her eyelids. Fireworks. Fire... smoke in the darkness. She opened her eyes again.

Mr. Dalcas had gone into the hall. The door was partly open. She heard murmured voices, the squeak of someone's shoes on the tile floor. He poked his head back in the room. He looked almost apologetic.

'The police are here, Maggie,' he said.

'It's time.'

Part: 9

MONDAY, JULY

Marcel,

‘CAN I HAVE SOME WATER, PLEASE?’

Marcel wasn’t thirsty, but he wanted a second to sit, catch his breath, and look around.

‘Sure thing.’ The police officer who had greeted Marcel and ushered him into a small, windowless office- OFFICER-SADOWSKI, read his name tag-hadn’t stopped smiling like he was a teacher and Marcel was his favorite student.

‘You just sit tight. I’ll be right back.’

Marcel sat very still while he waited, just in case someone was watching.

He didn’t have to turn his head to take in nearly everything: the desk, piled high with manila file folders; the shelves stacked with more papers; a prehistoric telephone, unplugged; photographs of several- fat, smiling babies; a desk fan. It was a good thing, he thought, that Sadowski hadn’t brought him into an interrogation room.

Sadowski was back in only a minute, carrying a Styrofoam cup full of water. He was on a mission to seem approachable. ‘You relaxed? Happy with the water? You don’t want a beverage or anything?’

‘I’m fine.’ Marcel took a sip of the water and nearly choked.

‘It was piss-warm.’

Sadowski either didn’t notice or pretended not to. ‘Glad you decided to come down and talk to us.

Dan, right?’

‘Marcel,’ Mason said, who was just their sucking air and taking up space. ‘Marcel.’ He said again, then Sadowski had taken a seat behind his desk. He made a big show of shuffling around some papers, grinning like an idiot, twirling a pen and leaning back in his chair. All casual. But Marcel noticed that he had Marcel’s name written down on a piece of white paper.

‘Right. Right. Marcel. Hard to forget. So- what can I do you for, Marcel?’

Marcel wasn't buying the village idiot act, not for a second. Officer Sadowski's eyes were narrow and smart. His jaw was like a right triangle.

He'd be a mean old bastard when he felt like it.

'I'm here to talk about the fire,' Marcel said. 'I figured you'd want to talk to me eventually.' It had been two days since Marcel had woken up in the hospital. Two days of waiting for the knock on the door, for the police officers to show up and start grilling him. The waiting, the tickling feeling of anxiety, was worse than anything.

So earlier that morning he'd woken with a resolution: he wouldn't wait anymore.

'You're the young man who left the hospital on Saturday morning, aren't you?' Right. As though he'd forgotten. 'We just missed talking to you. Why'd you run off in such a hurry?' 'My sister - needs help.' He realized, belatedly, he shouldn't have mentioned his sister. It would only lead to bad places.

But Sadowski seized on it. 'What kind of help?'

'She's in a wheelchair,' Marcel said, with some effort. He hated saying the words out loud. It made them seem more real, and final.

Sadowski nodded sympathetically.

'That's right. She was in a car accident a few years ago, wasn't she?'

D*ick... So, the village idiot thing was a trick. He'd done his homework.

'Yup,' Marcel said. He thought Sadowski would ask him more about it, but he just shook his head and muttered, 'Shame.' Marcel started to relax. He took a sip of water. He was glad he'd come. It made him look confident. He was confident.

Then Sadowski said, abruptly, 'You ever heard of a game called Fear, Marcel?'

Marcel was glad he'd already finished swallowing, so he couldn't choke. He shrugged. 'I don't know. I never had too many friends around here.'

‘You have a few friends,’ Sadowski said. Marcel didn’t know what he was getting at. He consulted his page of notes again. ‘Maggie Nill. Natalie Dalcas. Someone must have invited you to that party.’ That was the story that had gone around: a party in the Graybill House.

A bunch of kids getting together to smoke weed, drink alcohol, freak one another out. Then: a stray spark. An accident. The blame was spread around that way, couldn’t be pinned to anyone specific. Of course, Marcel knew it was all bullsh*t. Someone had lit the place up, deliberately. It was part of the challenge.

‘Well, yes. Them. But they’re not a friend- friends.’ Marcel felt himself blushing. He wasn’t sure whether he’d been caught in a lie.

Sadowski made a noise in the back of his throat Marcel didn’t know how to interpret. ‘Why don’t you tell me all about it? In your own words, at your own pace.’

Marcel told him, speaking slowly, so he wouldn’t screw it up, but not too slowly, so he wouldn’t seem nervous.

He told Sadowski he’d been invited by Maggie; there’d been rumors of a keg party, but when he got there, he found out it was pretty lame, and there was hardly any booze at all. He hadn’t been drinking.

(He congratulated himself on thinking of this-he wouldn’t get in trouble for anything, period.) Sadowski interrupted him only once. ‘So why the closed room?’

Marcel was startled. ‘What?’ Sadowski only pretended to glance down at the report. ‘The fire chiefs had to break down the door to get to you and the girl-Maggie. Why’d you go off with her if the party was raging somewhere else?’

Marcel kept his hands on his thighs.

He didn’t even blink. ‘I told you, the party was lame. Besides, I was hoping -’ He trailed off suggestively, raising his eyebrows.

Sadowski got it. ‘Ah. I see. Go on.’

There wasn't much else to tell; Marcel told him he must have fallen asleep next to Maggie. The next thing he knew, they heard people running and smelled smoke. He didn't mention Nathaniel.

No need to explain how she'd known to direct the firefighters to the back of the house unless he was asked. For a while, after Marcel finished talking, they sat in silence. Sadowski appeared to be doodling, but Marcel knew this, too, was an act. He'd heard everything. Finally- Officer Sadowski sighed, set down his pen, and rubbed his eyes.

'It's tough sh*t, Marcel. Tough sh*t.' Marcel said nothing.

Sadowski went on. 'Bill Kelly was -is-a friend. He was on the force. Little Kelly went to Iraq. Do you know what I'm saying?'

'Not really,' Marcel said. Sadowski stared at him. 'I'm saying we're going to figure out exactly what happened that night. And if we find out the fire was started on purpose.'

He shook his head. 'That's a homicide, Marcel.'

Marcel's throat was dry. But he forced himself not to look away. 'It was an accident,' he said. 'Wrong place, wrong time.' Sadowski smiled. But there was no humor in it. 'I hope so.' Marcel decided to walk home. He was out of cigarettes and in a bad mood.

Now he wasn't so sure that going to the police officers had been a clever idea. The way Sadowski looked at him made him feel like the police officers thought he'd started the damn fire. It was the judges had to be, whomever they were.

Anyone of the players could squeal about the game, and that would be the end of that. If Fear ended - Marcel had no plans beyond winning Fear-beating Ray in the final round of Joust and making sure it was a hard, bloody win. He hadn't thought of his life beyond that moment at all.

He'd be arrested. He'd go out in ablaze. He didn't care either way. Dayna, his Dayna, had been destroyed, ruined forever, and someone had to pay.

But for the first time, he was seized with the fear that the game would end, and he would never get his chance. And then he would just have to live with the new Dayna on her plant-stalk legs, live with the knowledge that he'd been unable to save her. Live with knowing Ray and Luke were fine, going through the world, breathing, and grinning and sh*tting and crapping on other people's lives too.

And that was impossible.

Unimaginable.

The sun was bright and high. Everything was still, gripped in the hard light. There was a bad taste in Marcel's mouth; he hadn't eaten yet today. He checked his phone, hoping Nathaniel might have called: nothing. They'd spoken the day before, a halting conversation, full of pauses. When Nathaniel said her dad needed her downstairs and she had to get off the phone, he was sure she'd been lying.

Marcel circumnavigated Dot's Diner, checking instinctively to see whether he could spot his mom behind the smudgy glass windows. But the sun was too bright and turned everyone into shadow.

He heard a burst of laughter from inside the house. He paused with his hand on the door. If his mom was home, he wasn't sure he could deal. She'd been practically hysterical when he came home with a hospital bracelet, and since then she'd been giving him the fish-eye and grilling him every .5 seconds about how he was feeling like she couldn't trust him even to pee without risking death. Plus, the news about Little Kelly was all over Dot's Diner, and when she wasn't demanding whether Marcel thought he had a fever, she was gossiping about the tragedy.

But then the laughter sounded again, and he realized it wasn't his mom laughing-it was Dayna. She was sitting on the couch, a blanket draped over her legs. Ricky was sitting in a folding chair across from her; the chessboard was positioned on the coffee table. When Marcel entered, there were only a few inches between them.

'No, no,' she was saying, between fits of giggling. 'The knight moves diagonally.'

'Diag-on-ally,' Ricky repeated, in his heavily accented English, and knocked over one of Dayna's pawns.

'It's not your turn!' She sched her pawn back and let out another burst of laughter. Marcel cleared his throat. Dayna looked up.

‘Marcel!’ she cried. Both she and Ricky jerked backward several inches.

‘Hey.’ He didn’t know why they both looked so guilty. He didn’t know why he felt so awkward, either-like he’d interrupted them in the middle of something far more intense than a game of chess.

‘I was just teaching Ricky how to play,’ Dayna blurted. Her cheeks were flushed, and her eyes were bright. She looked better, prettier than she had in a while. Marcel thought she might even be wearing makeup.

He suddenly felt angry. He was out busting his ass for Dayna, almost dying, and she was at home playing chess with Ricky on the old marble board his mom had bought on- Marcel’s eleventh birthday, and that- Marcel had schlepped everywhere they’d moved since then. Like she didn’t even care. Like he wasn’t playing Fear just for her.

‘Want to play, Marcel?’ She asked.

But he could tell she didn’t mean it. For the first time- Marcel looked, really looked, at Ricky. Could he be serious about marrying Dayna? He was twenty-one, twenty-two, tops. Dayna would never do it. The guy barely spoke any English, for Christ’s sake. And she would have told- Marcel if she liked him. She’d always told- Marcel everything.

‘I just came in to get a drink,’

Marcel said. ‘I’m going out again.’ In the kitchen, he filled a glass with water and kept the sink running while he drank, to drown out the sound of muffled conversation from the next room. What the hell were they talking about? What did they have in common? When he shut off the sink, the voices fell abruptly into silence again.

Jesus...

Marcel felt like he was trespassing in his own house. He left without saying goodbye. As soon as he shut the door, he heard laughter again. He checked his phone. He had a response from Maggie, finally. He’d texted her earlier: Heard anything? Her text reads simply: Game over.

Marcel felt a surge of nausea riding up from his stomach to his throat. And he knew, then, what he had to do.

Marcel had been to the Hanrahan's' house only once before, two years earlier, when Dayna was still in the hospital- when, briefly, it had seemed like she might not wake up. Marcel hadn't budged from the chair next to her bed except to pee and smoke cigarettes in the parking lot and get coffee from the cafeteria.

Finally, Marcel's mom had convinced him to go home and get some rest. He had gone home, but not to rest. He had stopped in only long enough to remove the butcher's knife from the kitchen and the baseball bat from the closet, along with a pair of old ski gloves that had never, as far as he knew, been used by anyone in his family.

It took him a while to find Ray and- Luke's house on his bike, in the dark, half-delirious from the heat and no sleep and the rage that was strangling him, coiled like a snake around his gut and throat. But he did, finally: a two-story structure, all dark, that might have been nice one hundred years ago. Now it looked like a person whose soul had been sucked out through his asshole: collapsed and desperate, wild, and wide-eyed, sagging in the middle. Marcel felt a flash of pity.

He thought of the tiny apartment behind Dot's, how his mom put daffodils in old pickle jars on the windowsills and scrubbed the walls with bleach every Sunday. Then he remembered what he had come to do. He left his bike on the side of the road, slipped on his gloves, removed the baseball bat and knife from his duffel bag.

He stood there, willing his feet to move. A swift kick to the door, the sound of screaming. The knife flashing in the dark, the whistle of the bat cutting through the air. He was after Luke and Luke alone...

It would be easy...

Quick...

But he hadn't managed it. He'd stood there with his legs numb, heavy, useless, for what felt like hours, until he began to fear that he'd never move again- he'd be frozen in this position, in the darkness, forever.

At some point, the porch light had clicked on, and Marcel had seen a heavy woman, with a face like a pulpy fruit, wearing a tent-like a nightgown and no shoes, maneuver her bulk out onto the porch and light up a cigarette. Luke's mother. All at once, Marcel could move again. He had stumbled toward his bike.

It wasn't until he was four blocks away that he realized he was still holding the knife and he had dropped the baseball bat, on the lawn. It had been two whole years, to the day.

Ray's house looked even more run-down in the daylight. The paint was shedding like gray dandruff. On the porch where two tires, a few smelly armchairs, and an old porch swing hanging on rusty chains, which looked like it would collapse under the slightest pressure. There was a doorbell, but it was disconnected. Instead Marcel banged loudly on the frame of the screen door.

In response, the TV inside was abruptly muted. For the first time, it occurred to Marcel that it might not be Ray who answered the door, but that pulpy woman from two years ago-or a father or someone else entirely. But it was Ray. He was wearing only basketball shorts. For a split second, he hesitated, obviously startled, just behind the screen.

Before Marcel could say anything, Ray kicked open the screen door. Marcel had to jump back to avoid it. He lost his footing.

'What the fuck are you doing here?' The sudden motion had screwed Marcel up. He was already off-balance when Ray grabbed him by the shirt and then shoved him.

Marcel stumbled down the porch stairs and landed in the dirt on his elbows. He bit down on his tongue. And Ray was above him, in a rage, ready to pounce.

'You must be out of your mind,' he spat out. Marcel rolled away from him and scrambled to his feet. 'I'm not here to fight.'

Ray let out a bark of laughter. 'You don't have a choice.' He took a step forward, swinging; but Marcel had regained his balance and sidestepped him.

'Look.' Marcel held up a hand.

‘Just listen to me, okay? I came to talk.’ ‘Why the hell would I want to talk to you?’ Ray said. His hands were still balled into fists, but he didn’t try and swing again.

‘We both want the same thing,’ Marcel said.

Part: 10

For a second, Ray said nothing. His hands uncurled. ‘What’s that?’ ‘Fear.’ Marcel wet his lips. His throat was dry. ‘Both of us need them.’ There was an electric tension in the air, hot and dangerous. Ray took another quick step forward.

‘Luke told me about your little threats,’ Ray said. ‘What kind of game do you think you’re playing?’ Ray was so close; Marcel could smell cornflakes and sour milk on his breath. But he didn’t step back.

‘There’s only one game that matters,’ he said. ‘You know it. Luke knew it too. That’s why he did what he did, isn’t it?’ For the first time, Ray looked afraid. ‘It was an accident,’ he said.

‘He never meant-’

‘Don’t...!’ Ray shook his head. ‘I didn’t know,’ he said. Marcel knew he was lying.

‘Are you going to help me, or not?’ Marcel asked. Ray laughed again: an explosive, humorless sound. ‘Why should I help you?’ he asked. ‘You want me dead.’ Marcel smiled. ‘Not like this,’ he said. And he meant it, 100 percent. ‘Not yet.’

Sometime around midnight, when Carp was quiet, dazzling in a light sheen of rain, Even Seller woke in the dark to rough hands grabbing him. Before he could scream, he was gagging on the taste of cotton in his mouth. A sock, and then he was lifted, carried out of bed and into the night.

His first, confused, thought was that the police officers had come to take him away. If he’d been thinking clearly, he would have realized that his assailants were wearing ski masks.

He would have noticed that the trunk they forced him into belonged to a navy-blue Taurus, like the kind his brother drove. That it was his brother’s car, parked in its usual spot.

But he wasn't thinking clearly. He was Feared. Kicking out, watching the sky narrow to a sliver as the trunk closed over him, Even felt something wet and realized that, for the first time since he was five years old, he'd peed himself.

At last, he realized too that despite everything, the game was ongoing. And that he had just lost.

WEDNESDAY,

JULY 13

Maggie,

THE WAR MEETING TOOK PLACE AT JOH- JOHN'S HOUSE. IT had to. Maggie's trailer was too small, Marcel wouldn't have invited them to his place, and Nathaniel's parents were home all day doing a garage clean. Maggie had to bring Lily.

Lily had nothing to do now that school was over, and most days took the bus by herself a half-hour to Hudson, where the library was. But the library was understaffed and closed for a week while the director was on vacation. For once, Lily was in a good mood, even though she was dirty and sweaty and stank like horses; in the morning, she'd helped Maggie at Anne's.

She sang a song about white Bengal's to Joh- John's house and made waves with her arm out the window. Joh- John lived in the woods. His father had once owned an antique store and pawnshop, and Joh- John liked to say his dad 'collected' things.

Maggie always threatened to sign them up for that TV show about hoarders. The house and the yard around it was littered with stuff, from junky to bizarre: at least two to three old cars at all times, in various states of repair; crates of spray paint; rusted slides; stacks of timber; old furniture, half-embedded in the soil. Lily ran off, yelling, weaving through the old piles.

Maggie found Nathaniel and Joh- John behind the house, sitting on an old merry-go-round, which no longer turned.

Joh- John looked as though he hadn't slept in days. He pulled Maggie into a hug as soon as he saw her, which was weird. She tensed up; she smelled like stables.

‘What’s up with you?’ Maggie said when he pulled away. The circles under his eyes were as dark as a bruise.

‘Just glad to see you,’ he said.

‘You look like crap.’ She reached out to smooth down his hair, an old habit. But he caught her wrist. He was staring at her intensely like he wanted to memorize her face.

‘Maggie-,’ he started to say.

‘Maggie!’ Nathaniel called out at the same time. She, at least, seemed unaffected by Bill Kelly’s death. ‘I mean, it’s not like we knew him,’ she’d said days earlier when Maggie had told her how guilty she felt.

Maggie didn’t wait for Nathaniel to speak, although Nathaniel had called the meeting. ‘I’m out,’ she said. ‘I’m not playing anymore.’

‘We have to wait for Marcel,’ Nathaniel said.

‘I don’t have to wait for anyone,’

Maggie said. She was annoyed by Nathaniel’s calm. She was blinking happily, sleepily, in the sun-as though nothing had happened. ‘I’m not playing anymore.

It’s as simple as that.’

‘It’s sick,’ Joh- John said fiercely.

‘Sick. Anyone in their right minds-’ ‘The judges aren’t in their right minds, though, are they?’ Nathaniel said, turning to him. ‘I mean, they can’t be. You heard about Even?’

‘That wasn’t-’ Joh- John abruptly stopped speaking, shaking his head.

‘I, for one, don’t plan on losing my chance at sixty-seven thousand dollars,’ Nathaniel said, still with that infuriating calm. Then she shook her head. ‘It isn’t right to start without Marcel.’

‘Why?’ Maggie fired back. ‘Why are you so worried about- Marcel? I made the deal with you, remember?’ Nathaniel looked away, and then Maggie knew. A bitter taste rushed into her throat. ‘You made a deal with him, too,’ she said. ‘You lied to me.’

‘No.’ Nathaniel looked at her, eyes wide, pleading. ‘No. Maggie. I never planned on cutting him in.’

‘What are you talking about?’

Joh- John asked. ‘What do you mean,

‘cutting him in?’

‘Stay out of it, Joh- John,’ Maggie said.

‘I’m in it,’ he said. He dragged a hand through his hair, and in that instant, Maggie felt they would never get back to normal: to making fun of Joh- John’s hair, to loading it with gel and twisting to make it stick straight up. ‘You’re at my house, remember?’

‘This isn’t a game anymore,’ Maggie said. Everything was spiraling out of control. ‘Don’t you get it? Someone’s dead.’

‘Jesus.’ Joh- John sat down heavily, rubbing his eyes, as though Maggie saying the words had made them real.

‘Why did you play, Maggie?’ Nathaniel stood up when Joh- John sat down. Her arms were crossed, and she made little clicking noises with her tongue.

Rhythmic... A pattern. ‘If you didn’t want the risk if you couldn’t handle it, why did you play? Because Matt stupid Hefley dumped you? Because he was sick of getting blue-balled by his girlfriend?’ Maggie lost her breath. She was conscious of the air going out of her at once, escaping in a short hiss. Joh- John looked up and spoke sharply: ‘Nathaniel.’

Even Natalie looked surprised and immediately guilty. ‘I’m sorry,’ she said quickly, avoiding Maggie’s eyes. ‘I didn’t mean-’

‘What did I miss?’ Maggie turned. Marcel had just appeared, emerging from the glittering maze of junk and scrap metal. She wondered what they looked like to him: Nathaniel flushed and guilty, Joh- John awful white, wild-eyed; and Maggie blinking back tears, still sweaty from the stables. And all of them angry: you could feel it in the air, a physical force among them.

Suddenly Maggie realized that this, too, because of the game. That it was part of it.

Only Marcel seemed unaware of the tension. 'Mind if I smoke?' He asked Joh- John. Joh- John shook his head.

Maggie broke in. 'I'm out. I said I was out, and I meant it. The game should have ended...'

'The game never ends,' Marcel said. Nathaniel turned away from him and for a moment, just a moment, he looked uncertain. Maggie was relieved. Marcel had changed this summer. He wasn't the slope-shouldered weirdo, the outsider, who had sat for three years in silence. It was as though the game was feeding him somehow-like he was growing on it.

'You heard about Even?' He exhaled a straight stream of smoke. 'That was me.'

Nathaniel had turned back to him. 'You?'

'Me, and Ray Hanrahan.'

There was a moment of silence.

Maggie finally managed to speak.

'What?'

'We did it.' Marcel took a final drag and ground out the cigarette butt underneath the heel of his cowboy boot.

'That's against the rules,' Maggie said. 'The judges set the challenges.' Marcel shook his head. 'It's Fear,' he said. 'There are no rules.' 'Why?' Joh- John tugged at his left ear. He was furious and trying not to show it; that was his tell.

'To send a message to the judges. The players, too. The game will go on, one way or another. It has to.'

‘You don’t have the right,’ Joh- John said.

Marcel shrugged. ‘What’s right?’ he said. ‘What’s wrong?’

‘What about the cops? And the fire? What about Bill?’ No one said anything. Maggie realized she was shaking.

‘I’m done,’ she said. She spun around and nearly collided with a rusty-spotted furnace, which, along with an overturned bike, marked the beginning of the narrow path that wound through the landscape of litter and junk to the house, and around to the front yard. Joh- John called out to her, but she ignored him. She found Lily crouching in a bit of yard uncluttered by junk, marking the bare grass with bright-blue spray paint she had unearthed somewhere.

‘Lily...’ Maggie spoke sharply. Lily dropped the paint and stood up, looking guilty.

‘We’re going,’ Maggie said.

Lily’s frown reappeared, as did the small pucker between her eyebrows. Immediately, she seemed to shrink and age.

Maggie thought of the night she had whispered, ‘Are you going to die?’ and felt a fist of guilt hit her hard in the stomach. She didn’t know whether she was doing the right thing. She felt like nothing she did was right.

But what had happened to Bill Kelly was wrong. And pretending it hadn’t happened was wrong too. That, she knew.

‘What’s the matter with you?’ Lily said, sticking out her lower lip.

‘Nothing.’ Maggie seized her wrist. ‘Come on.’

‘I didn’t get to say hi to Joh- John,’

Lily whined...

‘Next time,’ Maggie said. She practically dragged Lily to the car. She couldn’t hear Nathaniel or Joh- John or Marcel anymore; she wondered whether they were talking about her. She couldn’t get out of there fast enough. She drove in silence, gripping the wheel as though it was in danger of slipping suddenly from her hands.

WEDNESDAY,

JULY 20

Maggie,

THE WEATHER TURNED FOUL, COLD AND WET, AND THE ground turned to sludge. For two days, Maggie heard nothing from Nathaniel. She refused to be the one to call first. She texted back and forth with Joh- John but avoided seeing him, which meant that to go to work she had to bus it to the 7-Eleven and walk three-quarters of a mile in the driving rain, arriving wet and miserable just to stand for more hours in the rain, chucking the chickens soggy feed and hauling equipment into the sheds so it wouldn't rust.

Only the white Bengal's seemed more miserable than she was; she wondered, as they huddled underneath a canopy of maple trees, watching her work, whether they dreamed of other places as much as she did. Africa, burnt grasses, a vast round sun. For the first time, it struck her as selfish that Anne kept them here, in this ceroplastic climate of blistering heat, followed by rain, followed by snow and sleet and ice.

There were rumors that the police had turned up evidence of arson at the Graybill House. For an entire day, Maggie waited in agony, certain that the evidence had to do with her duffel bag, positive that the police would haul her off to jail. What would happen to her, if she were accused of murder? She was eighteen. That meant she would go to real jail, not juvenile.

But when several more days passed, and no one came looking for her, she relaxed again. She hadn't been the one to light the stupid match. When you thought about it, this was all Matt Hefley's fault. He should be arrested.

And Delaney, too. About Fear, there was not a single whisper. Marcel's move had failed to rouse the judges to act. Maggie wondered whether he would try again, then reminded herself it was no longer her business. Still, it rained: this was mid-July in upstate New York, lush and green and wet as a rain forest.

Krista got sick from the humidity and the wet in the air, saying it made her lungs feel clotty. Maggie refrained from pointing out that her lungs might feel better if she stopped smoking a pack of menthol cigarettes a day. Krista called in sick to work and instead lay on the couch in a daze of cold medicine like something dead and bloated dragged up by the ocean.

At least Maggie could use the car. The library had reopened. She dropped - Lily there...

‘Want me to pick you up later?’ She asked.

Lily was back to being snotty. ‘I’m not a baby,’ she said as she slid out of the car, not even bothering with the umbrella Maggie had brought for her.

‘I’ll buy it.’

‘What about-?’ Before Maggie could remind her to take the umbrella, Lily had slammed the door and was dashing for the library entrance through a slow ooze of dark puddles. Despite the rain, Maggie was in a decent mood. Lily was twelve. It was normal for her to be a brat. It was even a good thing.

It showed she was growing up okay, the way that everyone else did-that maybe she wouldn’t be messed up just because she’d grown up in Fresh Pines with ants parading all over the spoons and Krista fumigating the house. And there were still no police knocking on her door, still not a single, solitary breath about- Fright.

Work was hard: Anne wanted her to muck the stables, and afterward, they had to re-caulk a portion of the basement, where the rain was coming in and the walls were speckled with mold.

Maggie was shocked when Anne stopped her for the day. It was five p.m., but Maggie hadn’t noticed time passing, had barely looked up. The rain was worse than ever. It came down in whole sheets, like the quivering blades of a giant guillotine.

While Anne was preparing her a cup of tea, Maggie checked her phone for the first time in hours, and her stomach went to liquid and pooled straight down to her feet. She had missed twelve calls from Lily. Her throat squeezed up so tight she could hardly breathe. She punched Lily’s number at once. Her cell phone went straight to voicemail.

‘What is the matter, Maggie?’ Anne was standing at the oven, her gray hair frizzing around her face, like a strange halo.

Maggie said, ‘I have to go.’

Afterward, she did not remember getting into the car or backing it down the driveway; she did not remember the drive to the library, but suddenly she was there. She parked the car but left the door open. Some of the puddles were ankle-deep, but she hardly noticed. She sprinted to the entrance; the library had been closed for an hour.

She called Lily’s name, circled the parking lot, searching for her. She scanned the streets as she drove, imagining all the terrible things that might have happened to Lily- like- she had been hurt, sched, killed-and trying to stop herself from losing it, throwing up or breaking down.

Finally, she had no choice but to go home. She’d have to call the police. Maggie fought back another wave of- Terror. This was it, the real thing. The road leading to ‘Fresh Pines’ was full of ruts, sucking black mud, deep water.

Maggie bumped through it, tires spinning and grinding. The place looked sadder than usual: the rain was beating fists on the trailers, pulling down wind chimes and overflowing outdoor fire pits.

Maggie hadn’t even stopped the car when she spotted Lily: huddled underneath a skinny birch tree missing most of its leaves, only fifteen feet away from the trailer steps, arms wrapped around her legs, shivering.

Maggie must have parked because suddenly, she was rocketing out of the car, splashing through the water, taking Lily in her arms.

‘Lily!’ Maggie could not hug her sister tight enough. Here, here, here.

Safe. ‘Are you okay? Are you, all right? What happened?’

‘I’m cold.’ Lily’s voice was muffled. She spoke into Maggie’s left shoulder. Maggie’s heart seized up; she would have spun the world in reverse for a blanket.

‘Come on,’ she said, pulling away.

‘Let’s get you inside.’ Lily reared back, like a bucking horse. Her eyes went huge, wild. ‘I won’t go in there,’ she said. ‘I don’t want to go in there!’

‘Lily.’ Maggie blinked rain out of her eyes, crouching down so she was eye level with her sister. Lily’s lips were ringed with blue. God. How long had she been out here? ‘What’s going on?’

‘Mom told me to go away,’ Lily said. Her voice had turned small, broken. ‘She-she told me to play outside.’

Something inside Maggie cracked, and at that moment- she was conscious that all her life she had been building up walls and defenses in preparation for something like this; behind them, the pressure had been mounting, mounting. Now the dam broke, and she was flooded, drowning in rage and hate.

‘Come on,’ she said. She was surprised she still sounded the same when inside of her was a sucking blackness, a furious noise. She took Lily’s hand. ‘You can sit in the car, okay? I will turn on the heat. You’ll be nice and dry.’

She brought Lily to the car. There was an old T-shirt in the back- Krista’s, reeking of smoke-but it was dry, at least. She helped Lily wriggle out of her wet shirt.

She untied Lily’s shoes for her, and peeled off her wet socks, then made Lily press her feet up to the vents where the heat had begun to blow. The whole time Lily was limp, obedient as if all the life had been washed out of her. Maggie moved mechanically.

‘I’ll be right back,’ she told Lily. She felt detached from the words, as though she wasn’t the one speaking. The anger was drumming out the knowledge of everything else.

Boom, boom, and boom.

There was music coming from the trailer, practically shaking the walls.

The lights were on too, although the blinds were down; she could see a figure swaying in silhouette, dancing. She had not noticed before because she had been too worried about Lily. She kept seeing the little figure huddled underneath the pathetic birch- the single tree that Fresh Pines boasted. Mom told me to go away. She told me to play outside.

Boom, boom, boom.

She was at the door. Locked. From inside, she heard a shriek of laughter. Somehow, she fit the key in the lock; that must mean she wasn't shaking. Strange, she thought, and: Maybe I could have won Fear. She pushed the door open and stepped inside.

There were three of them: Krista, Bo, and Maureen, from Lot 99. They froze, and Maggie froze too. She was seized momentarily by the sense that she'd entered a play and had forgotten all her lines-she couldn't breathe, didn't know what to do. The lights were high, bright. They looked like actors, all three of them-actors you see too close.

They were too made up. But the makeup was horrible. It looked as though it was beginning to melt, slowly deforming their faces. Their eyes were bright, glittering: doll eyes. Maggie took in everything at once: the blue haze of smoke. The empty beer bottles, the overflowing cups used as ashtrays, the single bottle of Georgi vodka, half empty.

And the small blue plastic plate on the table, still faintly outlined with the imprint of the Sesame Street characters -Lily's old plate-now covered with thin lines of fine white powder. All of it hit Maggie like a physical blow, a quick sock to the stomach. Her world went black for a second. The plate. Lily's plate.

Then the moment passed. Krista brought a cigarette unsteadily to her lips, missing. 'Maggie Lynn,' she slurred. She patted her shirt, her breasts, as though expecting to find a lighter there. 'What are you doing, baby? Why are you staring at me like I'm a-' Maggie lunged...?

Before her mother finished speaking before, she could think about what she was doing, all of the rages traveled down into her arms and legs and she picked up the blue plate, crisscrossed with powder like it had been scarred by something, and threw.

Maureen screamed, and Bo shouted. Krista barely managed to duck. She tried to right herself and, staggering backward, managed to land on Maureen's lap, in the armchair. This made Maureen scream even louder. The plate collided with the wall with a thud, and the air was momentarily full of white powder, like indoor snow. It would have been funny if it were not so horrible.

‘What the hell?’ Bo took two steps toward Maggie and for a moment, she thought he might hit her. But he just stood there, fists clenched, red-faced and enraged. ‘What the hell?’ Krista fought to her feet. ‘Who in the goddamn do you think you are?’

Maggie was glad that they were separated by the coffee table. Otherwise, she wasn’t sure what she would do. She wanted to kill Krista. Kill her.

‘You’re disgusting.’ Her voice sounded mangled like something had wrapped around her vocal cords.

‘Get out.’ The color was rising in Krista’s face. Her voice, too, was rising, and she was shaking as though something awful was going to detonate inside her.

‘Get out! Do you hear me? Get out!’ She reached for the vodka bottle and threw it. Fortunately, she was slow. Maggie sidestepped it easily. She heard shattering glass and felt the splash of liquid.

Bo got his arms around Krista. He managed to restrain her. She was still shrieking, writhing like an animal, face red and twisted and awful. And suddenly all the anger, the writhing snake in Maggie’s stomach, released. She felt absolutely nothing. No pain. No anger. No fear. Nothing but disgust. She felt, weirdly, as if she were floating above the scene, hovering in her own body. She turned and went to her bedroom. She checked her top drawer first, in the plastic jewelry box where she kept her earnings. Everything was gone but forty dollars. Of course. Her mom had stolen it.

This didn’t bring a fresh wave of anger, only a new kind of disgust.

Animals. They were animals, and Krista was the worst of them. She pocketed the twenties and moved quickly through the room, stuffing things in Lily’s backpack: shoes, pants, shirts, underwear. When the backpack was full, she bundled things up in one of the comforters.

They would need a blanket, anyway. And toothbrushes. She remembered reading in a magazine once that toothbrushes were the number one item travelers forgot to pack. But she wouldn’t forget.

She was calm, thinking straight. She had it all together. She slid the backpack onto one of her shoulders it was so small; she couldn't fit it correctly.

Poor Lily...

She wanted to get food from the kitchen, but that would mean walking past her mom and Bo and Maureen. She'd have to skip it. There probably wasn't much she could use, anyway. At the last second, she took the rose off her dresser, the one John had made her from metal and wire. It would be good luck.

She hefted the blanket in her arms, now heavy with all the clothing and shoes it contained and shuffled sideways out of the bedroom door.

She'd been worried her mom would try and stop her, but she shouldn't have been. Krista was sitting on the couch, crying, with Maureen's arms around her. Her hair was a stringy mess. Maggie heard her say, '...???... did everything - on my own.' Only half the words were audible. She was too messed up to speak clearly.

Bo was gone...

He'd split since the drugs were nothing but carpet crumbs now. He'd left to get more. Maggie pushed out the door. It didn't matter. She'd never see Bo again.

She'd never see her mother or Maureen, or the inside of that trailer again. For one second, she could have sobbed, going down the porch steps. Never again -the idea filled her with relief so strong, it almost turned her knees to water and made her trip.

But she couldn't cry, not yet. She had to be strong for Lily. Lily had fallen asleep in the front seat, her mouth open, her hair feathering slightly in the heat. Finally, her lips weren't blue anymore, and she was no longer shivering.

She didn't open her eyes until they were just bouncing out of the entrance to the Pines and onto Route 51- like its- so-o deadly.

'Maggie?' She said in a small voice.

'What's up, Billy?' Maggie tried to smile and couldn't.

‘I don’t want to go back there.’ Lily turned and rested her forehead against the window. In the glass’s reflection, her face was narrow and pale, like a tapered flame. Maggie tightened her fingers on the wheel. ‘We’re not going back there,’ she said. Weirdly, the words made the taste of sick come up. ‘We’re never going back, okay? I promise.’

‘Where will we go?’ Lily asked.

Maggie reached over and squeezed Lily’s knee. Her jeans had finally dried.

‘We’ll figure something out. Okay?’

‘We’re going to be just fine.’ The rain was still coming down in sheets; the car carved waves in the road, sending liquid rivers sloshing toward the gutters. ‘You trust me, right?’ Maggie asked. Lily nodded without turning her face away from the window.

‘We’re going to be fine,’ Maggie repeated, and returned both hands to the wheel, gripping tightly.

They couldn’t, she realized, go to Joh- John’s or Nathaniel’s. She’d taken her mom’s car and had no intention of returning it, which counted as stealing.

And her friends’ houses would be the first place her mom would think of looking when she sobered up and realized what had happened. Would she call the police? Would they track Maggie down? Her mom would convince them that Maggie was a delinquent, and they would try to pin the fire on her. But there was no point in worrying about that yet.

No one could know. It came down to that. She and Lily would have to be very, very careful about the next few weeks. As soon as they had enough money to leave Carp, they would. And until then, they had to hide. They’d have to hide the car, too, and use it only at night.

The idea came to her suddenly: Meth Row. The whole road was cluttered with old cars and abandoned houses. No one would notice one sh*ttier car parked there.

Lily had fallen asleep again and was snoring quietly. Meth Row looked even bleaker than usual. The rain had turned the pitted road to sludge, and Maggie had trouble just keeping the wheel from jerking under her hands. It was hard to tell which houses were occupied and which weren't, but she finally found a spot next to a storage shed and an old Buick, stripped nearly to its metal frame, where she could angle the car, so it was mostly unseen from the road.

She turned off the engine. No point in wasting gas. They'd have to be careful about wasting anything now.

They'd be more comfortable in the backseat, but since Lily was already asleep and Maggie doubted, she would sleep at all it wasn't even six o'clock -she reached into the back and shook out all the things from the comforter. Stuff that had only an hour ago been littering their beds, the floor of their bedroom.

Their home...

Homeless...

It was the first time the word occurred to her, and she pushed it out of her mind. It was an ugly word, a word that smelled. Runaways were better, a little more glam.

She spread the comforter over Lily, careful not to wake her. She found a hoodie in the back and put it on over her shirt, pulled up the hood, cinched the drawstrings tight.

Thankfully it was summer and wouldn't get too cold. It occurred to her that she should turn her cell phone off too, to conserve battery power. But before she did, she typed out a text to Nathaniel and Marcel. She included Joh- John too. Like he'd said, he was in it, one way or another.

Changed my mind, she wrote. I'm back in.

She was playing for keeps now.

For Lily. Forget the promise she'd made to Nathaniel. The money would be hers, and hers alone.

That night, long after Maggie had finally drifted off, head back in the front seat of the Taurus-when Nathaniel was curled up in bed with her computer, searching for funny videos-when even the bars were shutting down and the people who wanted to drink were forced to do it outside, or in the parking lot of 7-Eleven -Ellie Hayes was woken up by two masked figures.

They hauled her to her feet and handcuffed her wrists in front of her body as if she were a convict. Her parents were gone for the weekend-the players knew what they were doing.

Her older brother, Roger, heard the noise and the scuffling and burst into the hall, holding a baseball bat. But Ellie managed to cry out to him.

‘It’s Terror!’ she said. Roger lowered the baseball bat, shook his head, returned to his room. He, too, had played.

Ellie’s biggest fear, other than floods, was an enclosure, and she was relieved when instead of being packed in the trunk, she was guided into the backseat of a car she didn’t recognize.

They drove for what seemed like forever-long enough that she began to get bored and fell asleep. Then the car stopped, and she saw a vast, empty parking lot, and a fence enclosed by barbed wire. Before the headlights cut, she saw a weathered sign tacked to a sad, saggy-looking building.

WELCOME TO THE DENNY SWIMMING POOL.

HOURS 9 A.M.–DUSK, MEMORIAL DAY TO LABOR DAY.

The padlock on the gates had been left undone. Ellie remembered, as they passed through it, that Ray Hanrahan had done maintenance at the Swimming Pool last summer.

Could he be in on this? Across the wet grass, the squelching mud, to the edge of the pool, which sat glimmering slickly in the moonlight, faintly lit up from below, electric, and improbable. The fear came rushing back all at once. ‘You have to be kidding me.’

She was at the edge of the deep end, trying to backpedal. But she couldn’t move. They had her tightly. Something metal bit into the palm of her hands, and she curled her fingers instinctively around it, too frightened to think or wonder what it was. ‘How do you expect me to-?’

She didn’t get to finish before she was pushed headfirst into the water. Flood. A flood of water everywhere: mouth, eyes, nose. She was underwater for a little more than a minute before she was hauled to the surface, but she would afterward swear it was at least five, or seven.

Endless seconds of her heartbeat thudding in her ears, her lungs screaming for air, her legs kicking for purchase. So many seconds of Fear-so complete, so all-consuming, it wasn't until she was once again in the open air, taking deep, grateful breaths, she realized that all along she had been clutching tightly to the small metal key that fitted her handcuffs.

Marcel's gamble, at last, paid off. In the morning, the story of Ellie spread, and by noon the betting slips had once again appeared. This time, they were passed from hand to hand, secretively, cautiously. Even Seller and Ellie Hayes had both failed their challenges. They were out of the game.

Colin Atkinson, too. He'd been the first to flee the Graybill house-rumor was he hadn't stopped running until he was to Massachusetts. Marcel, Ray, Maggie, and Nathaniel were still in. So- where Harold Lee, Kim Hollister, and Derek Klieg.

Only seven players left.

WEDNESDAY,

JULY 27

Marcel,

THERE WAS NO JOY LEFT IN THE GAME-NO LIGHTNESS or humor at all. Terror, as far as Marcel knew, had never been this serious. It had never been played with so much secretiveness, either. This was about more than getting in trouble for continuing a game. The police officers were still trying to pin the fire at the Graybill house, and Little Bill's death, on someone. Even the judges had lost their sense of humor. The next email that arrived, several days after Ellie had been eliminated from the game, was bleakly to-the-point.

Malden Plaza, 1-85. 9:00 p.m.

Wednesday.

Joh- John drove. It felt almost routine: Maggie sat shotgun, Nathaniel and Marcel were in the back. Nathaniel spent the whole drive tapping the window with a knuckle, unconsciously beating out her private rhythm. Marcel could almost believe they were just heading on late-night adventure to the mall. Except that Maggie looked exhausted and kept yawning, and Joh- John hardly said a word except to ask her, in a deep voice, what was wrong.

‘What do you think is wrong?’ Maggie replied. Marcel didn’t want to eavesdrop, but he couldn’t help it. ‘Your mom called,’ Joh- John said after a pause. ‘She said you haven’t been home.’

‘I’m just staying at Anne’s for a few days. I’m fine.’

‘She said you took the car.’

‘So now you’re on her side?’

Joh- John must have gone to Little Bill’s funeral. Marcel recognized the folded memorial pamphlet, featuring a winged angel, now hanging on a ribbon from his rearview mirror. Like a charm, or a talisman. Weird that he’d felt the need to hang it. Joh- John didn’t strike

Marcel as superstitious. Then again, Marcel didn’t get Joh- John. He didn’t, for example, understand why he felt he was part of the game, why he felt guilty for Bill Kelly’s death.

When they passed the Columbia County water towers, Marcel looked out and remembered the night of the first raid, when he, Nathaniel, and Maggie had hidden from the police officers. He felt a sudden wrench of grief, for the way time, always goes forward, relentlessly. It was like floodwater: it left only clutter in its wake. The sky was choked with masses of dark clouds, but it had stopped raining at last.

Impossible to tell where the sun was coming from.

A thick beam of light, singular and strange when the rest of the sky was still so dark, cut across the road. But the drive to Malden Plaza was long they had to loop around to get to the northbound side- and before they’d arrived, the sun had set.

There were a few dozen cars in the lot, most of them hugging up as close to the McDonald’s as possible, plus a couple of eighteen-wheelers, trucks that must have been on a run from Albany to Canada. From the opposite side of the lot, Marcel watched a family emerging from the big swinging doors, carrying paper bags of fast food and large soda cups. He wondered where they were off to. Somewhere better than here.

The players had parked as far from the building as possible, at the edge of the lot, where the trees were creeping close to the pavement and it was much darker. Seven players left and only two dozen spectators. Marcel was surprised that -Digging had bothered to show up. Standing under the tall, stiff-necked streetlamps, he looked green, as if he was in danger of vomiting.

‘Rules are simple.’ -Digging practically had to shout over the roar of traffic behind him. I-87, separated from the parking lot by only a flimsy, shin-high divider, was a six-lane mega highway.

‘Each of you has to cross. The five who cross the fastest move on. The other two don’t.’

‘I’ll go first.’ Ray stepped forward. He had avoided even glancing at Marcel. There was something like a truce between them, at least temporarily. It was fun. Ray was the guy - Marcel hated most in the world, besides Luke. And yet Ray was the guy who knew more of Marcel’s secrets than anyone. ‘I want to get this over with.’

‘Wait.’ -Digging extracted a strip of black fabric from his pocket and shook it out. He truly looked miserable. ‘You have to wear this.’

‘What is that?’ Ray asked, even though it was a blindfold.

Nathaniel and Maggie exchanged a look.

~*~

Marcel knew what they were thinking without having to ask. There was always a twist. The game was never easy. -Digging hesitated. For a second, it looked as though he was going to attempt to tie the blindfold on Ray himself.

Ray scowled at him. ‘Give me that,’ he said and snatched the blindfold from -Digging. -Digging backed off quickly, obviously relieved. Ray put the fabric over his eyes and knotted it behind his head.

‘Happy now?’ he said, to no one in particular.

Marcel stepped forward, so he was standing directly in front of Ray. He threw a punch, stopping a few inches short of Ray’s nose. Nathaniel gasped and -Digging shouted. But Ray didn’t even flinch.

‘It’s all right,’ Marcel said. ‘He can’t see sh*t.’

‘Don’t trust me, Mason?’ Ray’s mouth curled into a smile.

‘Not even a little,’ Marcel said. -Digging had to help guide Ray to the divider that separated the parking lot from the narrow patch of grass and gravel that ran along the highway. Trucks were thundering past, spitting exhaust and roaring heat. A car blew its horn as Ray fumbled over the divider, and Marcel imagined a sudden swerve, the headlights swollen, freezing Ray in place, the shudder of the impact.

But that would come later.

‘Time,’ -Digging shouted. He had his phone out. For the first time, he noticed that John- John was standing some ways apart, his lips moving as though in silent prayer. His face was incredible: anguished, twisted. And at that moment, Marcel had a suspicion. More like an intuition. But he dismissed the thought quickly. Impossible.

‘Ten seconds down,’ -Digging announced. Marcel turned his eyes back to the highway. Ray was still hesitating, swaying like a drunk, like he was hoping momentum would unglue his feet. A truck blasted a horn, and he jerked backward. The sound rolled and echoed through the night air, distorted by the distance to an alien cry. The motion was noise: Marcel closed his eyes and heard the fizz of the tires on the road, the thud of bass and music, engines grinding and spitting, the rush of air when a car blew by. He opened his eyes again.

‘Twenty seconds!’ -Digging’s voice had gone shrill. There was a sudden break in the traffic. Four, five seconds-in all six lanes, the road was clear. Ray sensed it and ran. He barreled straight into the divider on the other side of the road and face planted. But it didn’t matter.

He’d done it. He whipped off the blindfold and waved it above his head, victorious. The whole thing had taken him twenty-seven seconds. He had to wait for another break in the traffic to cross, but this time he did so at a jog. He was showing off.

~*~

‘Who’s next?’ -Digging said.

‘Let’s get this over with before-’ Another truck blasted by, whipping away the rest of his words.

‘I’ll go.’ Marcel stepped forward. Ray dangled the blindfold from one hand. For a second, their eyes met. They were joined now, more than ever.

‘Don’t choke,’ Ray said in a deep voice. Marcel snatched the blindfold from him.

‘Don’t worry about me,’ he said. The cloth was thick and opaque, like something you’d fashion a tarp out of. Once- Marcel put it over his eyes, he was completely blind, and for a moment he felt a tightness in his chest, the overwhelming sense of disorientation and dizziness, like when you wake up from a nightmare in an unfamiliar place.

He focused on the sounds: trucks, music, the fizz of the tires, and gradually he could map out space in his mind. Funny how just being without sight could leave him feeling so exposed, raw. Anyone could rush at him and he’d never know. He felt two soft hands slip around his wrist.

‘Be careful,’ Nathaniel whispered. He didn’t answer, just fumbled to touch her face, hoping he wouldn’t accidentally get her boob instead. Hoping he would, too.

‘All right,’ he announced in what he hoped was -Digging’s direction. ‘I’m ready.’

As he had done with Ray, -Digging took his arm and guided him to the low metal divider and instructed him to climb it. Then- Marcel was standing blind on the side of the road, while cars and semis roared past him. The wind blew hot and stinking with exhaust, and the ground trembled from the motion of the crushing wheels. Horns screamed out and faded.

Marcel’s heart was going hard and his mouth was dry. He hadn’t expected to be so afraid. His ears where full of a pounding rhythm-he couldn’t tell if it was noise from the highway or the echo of his heart. He barely heard -Digging call time.

Sh*t!

He couldn't hear-like how- is- he going to know when to cross? What if he tripped? His legs felt liquid and unstable-if he tried to walk, they would collapse, get tangled up. He pictured Nathaniel's hands, the way she'd tilted her face to his when he kissed her.

He imagined Dayna's stalk-legs, imagined her chair pushed next to the window, the sun flooding the room, her legs growing, thickening, sprouting again into strong, muscled calves.

The pounding in his ears receded. He could breathe again. And suddenly he realized it was quiet. No fizz of tires, no honking, no roar of an engine bearing down on him. A break.

He ran...

Pavement, and then a narrow strip of grass, which marked the space that divided the different sides of the highway. He should have stopped and listened again, just to be sure, but he couldn't-if he stopped, he'd never go again. He had to keep moving. The wind was rushing in his ears and his blood was on fire. Suddenly he felt a searing pain in his shins, and he jerked forward.

He'd reached the divider on the other side.

He'd passed. He ripped off the blindfold and turned around. He thought Nathaniel and Maggie were cheering, but he wasn't sure-two cars went by him, a twin blur, and although he could tell they were shouting, he couldn't hear what they said.

Underneath the streetlamp, they looked like actors on a stage, or tiny figurines, set up for display and the cars, shining as they passed through the light, like toy models of the real thing.

He still felt dizzy. He waited for another break in the traffic, then crossed back at a slow jog. He wanted to move faster, but his legs resisted.

He could barely lift them to climb over the divider. -Digging patted him on the shoulder and Maggie grabbed his arm. He was glad. Otherwise, he might have collapsed.

'Nineteen seconds!' -Digging said.

And Maggie kept saying,

'Awesome. Awesome.'

Maggie volunteered to go next. Something had happened to her in the past few days- something had changed.

She'd always been pretty, Marcel thought -sturdy-looking and dependable, like someone in an advertisement about deodorant. A little awkward, too- always holding herself carefully, like she was worried if she didn't pay attention, she'd knock someone or something over.

He hadn't gone to prom, but he'd seen pictures on Facebook, and Maggie had stood out; slouching a little so she wouldn't be too much taller than Matt, wearing some ruffled pink thing that didn't suit her at all, and trying to smile through her discomfort. But there was nothing awkward about her now. She was serious, straight-backed, focused. She barely hesitated at the edge of the road. As soon as there was a break, she ran. Nathaniel gasped.

'There's a car-,' she said. Her fingers tightened on Marcel's arm.

There was car-northbound traffic, speeding toward her. It must have caught her in its headlights just as she crossed into the lane, because the driver sounded his horn, three quick blasts.

'Jesus.' Joh- John was frozen, white-faced.'

Maggie!' Nathaniel screamed. But Maggie kept moving, and she reached safety just as the car blew over the spot where she'd been standing only a few seconds earlier. The driver gave four more furious blasts on the horn. Maggie whipped off the blindfold and stood, chest heaving, at the side of the road. For a while, she was lost to view in a surge of sudden traffic: two trucks passing simultaneously from opposite directions, a stream of cars.

When Maggie crossed back, -Digging through an arm around her shoulders.

'Seventeen seconds!' he crowed.

'Fastest one yet. You're safe.'

'Thanks,' she said. She was out of breath. As she passed under the streetlamp, she looked truly beautiful: hair long and tangled down her back, high cheekbones, and glittering eyes.

'Good job,' Marcel said.

Maggie nodded at him.

‘Heath bar! I was so scared for you!

That car.’ Nathaniel threw her arms around

Maggie’s neck. She had to stand on her tiptoes.

‘It’s not that bad, Nathaniel,’ Maggie said. For a second, she kept her eyes on Marcel. Something passed between them.

He thought it was a warning. Kim Hollister went next, and she was unlucky. As soon as she took her place blindfolded at the side of the road, there was a blast of traffic from both directions. But even after it cleared, she stayed where she was, hesitating, obviously afraid.

‘Go!’ -Digging shouted. ‘You’re fine! Go.’

‘No fair,’ Ray said. ‘No fair.

That’s freaking cheating.’ They started to argue, but it didn’t matter anyway; Kim still hadn’t moved.

Finally, she screeched, ‘Be quiet!

Please. I can’t hear anything. Please.’ It took a few more seconds before she shuffled onto the road, and almost immediately she backed up again.

‘Did you hear that?’ Her voice was shrill in the quiet. ‘Is that a car?’

By the time she made it across, fifty-two seconds had elapsed. The longest time by almost double.

It was Natalie’s turn next. Suddenly she turned to him, eyes shining. He realized she was on the verge of tears.

‘Do you think he’s watching?’ Nathaniel whispered. Marcel thought she must be talking about God.

‘Who?’ He said.

‘Bill Kelly...’ A spasm passed over her face.

‘There’s no one watching us,’ Marcel said. ‘No one but the judges, anyway.’

His eyes met Joh- John’s across the lot. And again, just for a minute, he wondered.

FRIDAY, JULY 29

Marcel,

Marcel HAD BEEN HOPING NATHANIEL’S BIRTHDAY PARTY would be small, and he was disappointed when he pulled his bike up to Joh- John’s house and saw a dozen cars fitted together like Tetris pieces in the only part of the yard not dominated by junk. There was music playing from somewhere, and lanterns had been placed all around the yard, perched on various objects like metallic fireflies settling down to rest.

‘You came!’ Nathaniel weaved toward him, holding a paper cup. Beer sloshed on his shoe, and he realized she was already drunk. She was wearing lots of makeup and a tiny dress, and she looked frighteningly beautiful, like someone much older. Her eyes were bright, like she was on something. He was aware that she had just been talking to a group of guys he didn’t know they, too, looked older and were now staring at him-and felt suddenly uncomfortable. She saw him looking and waved a hand. ‘Don’t worry about them,’ she said. Her words were slurring together.

‘Some guys I know from a bar in Kingston. I only invited them because they brought the alcohol. I’m so glad you’re here.’

Marcel had Nathaniel’s present wrapped in tissue paper in his pocket. He wanted to give it to her but not here, while people were watching. He wanted to tell her, too, that he was sorry about Terror.

Nathaniel had frozen up at the side of the highway and taken more than a minute to cross. Just like that, the game was over for her.

Everyone else would move on to the next challenge. On the way home from the highway challenge, Nathaniel had barely said a word, just sat stiffly next to him with tears running down her face. No one had spoken. Marcel had been annoyed at Joh- John, and Maggie.

They were her best friends. They were supposed to know what to say to make her feel better. He had felt helpless, as frightened as he had while standing on that highway with the blindfold. But Nathaniel was already hauling him off toward the back of the house. 'Come get a drink, okay? And say hi to everyone.'

At the back of the house, a large grill was letting off thick clouds of smoke that smelled like meat and charcoal. An old man was pushing around some burgers on it, holding a beer in one hand. Marcel thought it might have been Joh- John's dad-they had the same nose, the same floppy hair, although the men were gray-and was surprised. In school, he'd always thought of Joh- John as kind of a dork, well-meaning but just too nice to be interesting. He'd imagined Joh- John's family would be of the mom-dad-sister older- brother-picket-fence variety.

Not some guy with a beer grilling in the middle of towers of rusting junk. But that was another thing you learned when playing Fear: people would surprise you.

They would knock you on your ass. It was the only thing you could count on. Kids from the school were standing around in little groups or using some of the old furniture and gutted car frames as makeshift chairs. They were all staring at Marcel, some with curiosity and some with open hostility, and it was not until then that he realized none of the other Fear players had been invited, except for Maggie. That's when it hit him that there weren't many Fear players left.

Just five...

And he was one of them.

The two things-Nathaniel's hand, and the fact that he was getting so close- sent a thrill up his spine.

'The keg's over there, behind the old motorcycle.' Nathaniel giggled. She gestured with her cup, sending another bit of beer sloshing over the rim, and he remembered suddenly the time she'd called him Dave at homecoming last year. His stomach tightened. He hated parties, never felt comfortable with them.

'I'll be back, okay? I must circulate.'

It's kinda my party, after all.' She kissed him on the cheek, he noticed, and of course then again on the other cheek-and quickly disappeared, blending into a knot of people standing around the keg. Without Nathaniel next to him, he felt like he was back in the halls at school, except this time, instead of everyone ignoring him, everyone was staring. When he spotted Maggie, he could have run up and kissed her.

She saw him at the same time and waved him over. She was sitting on the hood of what Marcel could only imagine was one of John's projects: A Pinto junk-er, wheel-less and propped up on cinder blocks. He could count a half-dozen cars, in various states of construction and deconstruction, just from where he was standing.

'Hey...' Maggie was drinking a Coke. She looked tired. 'I didn't know you would be here.'

Marcel shrugged. He wasn't sure what that meant. Nathaniel had only invited him at the last minute. 'Didn't want to miss the big birthday,' was all he said.

'Nathaniel's trashed already,' Maggie said with a short laugh. She looked away, squinting.

Again, he was struck by the change that had come over her this summer. She was thinning out, sharpening, and her beauty was becoming more pronounced. Like she'd been wearing an invisibility cloak her whole life, and now it was coming off. Marcel leaned against the hood and fumbled in his pocket for his cigarettes.

He didn't even feel like smoking-he just wanted something to do with his hands. 'How's Lily?' he asked. She looked at him sharply. 'She's fine,' she said slowly. Then: 'She's inside, watching TV.' Marcel nodded. The day before he'd been smoking a cigarette in Meth Row when he'd heard someone singing behind the shed where he usually kept his bike. Curious, he circled to the back.

And there was Maggie.

Butt-naked.

She'd shouted, and he'd turned quickly away, but not before he noticed she was washing with the hose from Dot's Diner, the one the kitchen boys used to spray down the alley in the evenings. He saw a car, her car, with clothes drying on its hood; and a girl who must have been Maggie's sister, sitting in the grass, reading.

'Don't tell,' Maggie had said.

Marcel had kept his back to her. One of the pairs of underwear had blown off the hood and onto the ground; he kept his eyes fixed on it. It was full-butt underwear, patterned with strawberries, faded. Next, to it, he'd seen two toothbrushes and a curled-up tube of toothpaste sitting on an overturned bucket, and several pairs of shoes lined up neatly in the dirt. He wondered how long they'd been camping out there.

'I won't,' he had said without turning around.

And he wouldn't. That was another thing Marcel liked about secrets: they bonded people together. 'How long you think you can keep it up?' he asked now.

'As long as it takes to win,' she replied.

He looked at her face so serious, so dead set-and felt a sudden surge of something like joy. Understanding. That's what it was; he and Maggie understood each other.

'I like you, Maggie,' he said.

'You're all right.' She briefly scanned his face, as if to verify that he wasn't laughing at her.

Then she smiled. 'Right back at you, Marcel.'

~*~

Nathaniel reappeared, carrying a bottle of tequila. 'Take a shot with me, Maggie.' Maggie made a face. 'Tequila?'

'Come on,' Nathaniel said, pouting. Her words were more blurred than ever, but her eyes kept their strange, unnatural brightness- like something not human. 'It's my birthday.' Maggie shook her head. Nathaniel laughed.

'I don't believe it.' Her voice was getting louder. 'You'll play Fear, but you're afraid of taking a shot.'

‘Sh-h-h-h.’ Maggie’s face turned red. ‘She wasn’t even supposed to play,’ Nathaniel said, pointing the bottle at Maggie, as though addressing an audience. And people were listening. Marcel saw that they were turning in Maggie’s direction, smirking, whispering.

‘Come on, Nathaniel. You’re not supposed to talk about the game, remember?’ he said, but Nathaniel ignored him.

-Then-

‘I was going to play,’ Nathaniel announced. ‘I did play. Not anymore. She-you-sabotaged me. You sabotaged me.’ She turned to Maggie.

Maggie stared at her for a second.

‘You’re drunk,’ she said matter-of-factly, then slid off the hood of the car.

Nathaniel tried to grab her. ‘I was just kidding,’ she said. But Maggie kept walking. ‘Come on, Heath. I was just freaking around.’

‘I’m going to find Joh- John,’ Maggie said without turning. Nathaniel leaned up against the car, next to- Marcel. She uncapped the bottle of tequila, took a sip, and made a face.

‘Some birthday,’ she grumbled. Marcel could scent her skin, the alcohol on her breathing and strawberry shampoo in her hair. He was aching to touch her. Alternatively, he shoved his hands into his pocket and felt for the present. He knew he had to give it to her now before he chickened out or she got even more wasted.

‘Look, Nathaniel. Is there somewhere we could go? I mean, to be alone for a minute?’ Realizing she might think he was going to try to feel her up or something, he rushed on: ‘I have something for you.’ And he showed her the little tissue-paper-wrapped box, hoping she wouldn’t care that it had gotten squashed in his pocket. Her face changed. She smiled hugely, showing off her perfect little white teeth, and set the bottle of tequila down.

‘Marcel, you didn’t have to,’ she said.

And then: ‘Come on, I know somewhere we can go.’ Just beyond the back porch was an area dedicated to what looked like lawn decorations: towering limestone statues of various mythical figures- Marcel should probably know but didn’t; limestone benches and birdbaths full of standing water, moss, and leaves. Because of the statues and the porch, it was concealed from view, and as he entered the semicircular enclosure, Marcel's stomach started going crazy. The music was muffled, and he and Nathaniel were alone.

'Go ahead,' he said, passing her the box. 'Open it.' He thought he might vomit. What if she hated it? Finally, she got the wrapping off, and she opened the little box and stood there staring at it: a dark cord of velvet and a small, crystal butterfly charm, light dazzling from its wings, resting neatly on a bunch of pieces of cotton.

She stared at it for so long, he thought she must hate it, and then he thought he really would be sick. The necklace had cost him three full days of the cash he got stocking shelves.

'If you want to return it,' he started to say. But then she looked up and he saw that she was crying.

'It's beautiful,' she said. 'I love it.' And before he knew what was happening, she reached for him and drew him down to her and kissed him.

Her lips tasted like salt and tequila.

When she pulled back, he felt dizzy.

He'd kissed girls before but not like that. Usually, he was too stressed about what their tongue was doing or whether he was using too much pressure or too little. But with Nathaniel, he forgot to think, or even breathe, and now his vision was clouded with black spots. 'Listen,' he blurted out. 'I want you to know I'll still honor the split. If I win, I mean. You can still take your share of the money.' She stiffened suddenly, as if he'd slapped her. For a second, she stood there, rigid. Then she shoved the jewelry box back at him. 'I can't take this,' she said. 'I can't accept it.'

Marcel felt like he'd just inhaled a bowling ball. 'What do you mean?' 'I mean I don't want it,' she said and forced the box into his hand. 'We're not together, okay? I mean, I like you and all but - I'm seeing someone else. It isn't right.' Cold, cold: washing his whole body.

He was freezing, confused and furious. He didn't feel like himself, didn't sound like himself either, as he heard himself say, 'Who is it?' She had turned away from him. 'It doesn't matter,' she said. 'No one you know.'

‘You kissed me,’ he said. ‘You kissed me, you made me think-’ She shook her head. She still wouldn’t look at him. ‘It was for the game. Okay? I wanted you to help me win. That’s all.’ That voice he didn’t recognize came out of his mouth again. ‘I don’t believe you.’ The words sounded thin and flimsy.

She kept speaking, as if he wasn’t there. ‘But I don’t need Fear. I don’t need you. I don’t need Maggie.’

Kevin says I’ve got potential in front of the camera. He says-’ ‘Kevin?’ Something clicked in Marcel’s brain, and his stomach opened. ‘That scumbag you met at the mall?’

‘He’s not a scumbag.’ Now she whirled around to face him. She was shaking. Her fists were balled, and her eyes were bright and there was wetness on her cheeks, and it broke his heart. He still wanted to kiss her. He hated her...!

‘He’s legit. He believes in me. He said he would help me....’ The cold in Marcel’s chest had turned into a hard fist. He could feel it beating against his ribs, threatening to explode out through his skin. ‘I’m sure he did,’ he said, practically spitting.

‘Let me guess. All you had to do was show him your tits-’ ‘Shut up,’ she whispered.

‘Maybe let him feel you up for a while. Or did you have to spread your legs, too?’ As soon as he said it, he wished the words back into his mouth. Nathaniel stiffened as though a shock had run through her. And he could tell from her face-the guilt and the sadness and the sorrow that she did, she had.

‘Nathaniel.’ He could barely say her name. He wanted to say he was sorry, and he was sorry for her too, for what she’d done. He wanted to tell her that he believed in her and thought she was beautiful.

‘Go away,’ she whispered.

‘Please.’ He started to reach for her.

She stumbled backward, nearly tripping on the grass. ‘Go,’ she said.

Her eyes locked on his for a minute. He saw two dark holes, like wounds; then she whirled around and was gone. Maggie JOH- JOHN HAD A TRAMPOLINE; OR AT LEAST,

HE HAD A trampoline frame. The nylon had long ago disintegrated and been replaced with a heavy canvas tarp, stretched tautly.

Maggie wasn't surprised to find him there, hiding out from the rest of the guests. He'd never been super social.

She wasn't either. It was one of the things that bonded them.

'Having an appropriate time?' she asked as she maneuvered onto the canvas next to him. Joh- John smelled like cinnamon and a little like butter.

He shrugged. When he smiled, his nose crinkled. 'So-so. You?' 'So-so,' she admitted. 'How's Lily doing?' Maggie had had no choice but to bring her. They'd installed her in the den, and Joh- John had volunteered to check in on her when he went inside for more plastic cups.

'She's fine... Watching a marathon of some celebrity show. I made her popcorn.' He leaned back, so he was staring at the sky, and motioned for Maggie to do the same. When they were little, they had sometimes slept out here, side by side in sleeping bags, surrounded by empty packages of chips and cookies.

One time, she had woken up and found a raccoon sitting on her chest. Joh- John had yelled to startle it away-but not before getting a picture. It was one of her favorite memories from childhood.

She could still remember what it felt like to wake up next to him, with dew covering their sleeping bags and soaking the canvas, their breath steaming in the air-they were so warm next to each other. Like they were in the only safe, good place in the world.

Now she unconsciously moved her head onto the hollow space between his chest and shoulder, and he wrapped one arm around her. His fingers grazed her bare arms, and her body felt suddenly fizzy and warm. She wondered how they must look from above: like two pieces of a puzzle fitted neatly together.

'Are you going to miss me?' Joh- John asked suddenly.

Maggie's heart gave a huge, awful thump like it wanted to leap out of her throat. She'd been trying all summer to ignore the fact that Joh- John was going away to college. Now they had less than a month left. 'Don't be an idiot,' she said, nudging him.

'I'm serious.' He shifted, withdrawing his arm from under her head, rolling over onto one elbow to face her. Casually, he slung his other arm over her waist. Her shirt was riding up and his hand was on her stomach- his tan skin against her pale, freckled belly-and her lungs were having trouble working properly.

It's Joh- John, she reminded herself.

It's just Joh- John. 'I'm going to miss you so bad, Maggie,' he said. They were so close; she could see a bit of fuzz clinging to one of his eyelashes; she could see individual spirals of color in his eyes. And his lips. Soft-looking. The perfect imperfectness of his teeth.

'What about Avery?' Maggie blurted. She didn't know where the words came from. 'Are you going to miss her, too?'

He drew back an inch, frowning. Then he sighed and shoved a hand through his hair. As soon as he wasn't touching Maggie anymore, she would have given anything to have his touch-back. 'I'm not with Avery anymore,' he said carefully. 'We broke up.'

Maggie stared. 'Since when?' 'Does it matter?' Joh- John looked annoyed. 'Look, it was never a real thing, okay?' 'You just liked hooking up with her,' Maggie said. She suddenly felt angry, and cold, and exposed. She sat up, tugging down her shirt. Joh- John was leaving her behind. He would find new girls-pretty, tiny girls like Avery-and he would forget all about her. It happened all the time.

'Hey.' Joh- John sat up too. Maggie wouldn't look at him, so he reached out and forced her chin in his direction. 'I'm trying to talk to you, okay? I - I had to break up with Avery. I like - someone else. There's someone else. That's what I'm trying to tell you. But it's complicated....'

He was staring at her so intensely; Maggie could feel the warmth between them.

She didn't think. She just leaned in and closed her eyes and kissed him. It was like taking a bite of ice cream that's been sitting out just long enough: sweet, easy, perfect. She wasn't worried about whether she was doing it right, as she had been all those years ago, in the movie theater, when she could only think of the popcorn in her teeth.

She was simply there, inhaling the smell of him, of his lips, while the music thudded softly in the background and the cicadas swelled an accompaniment.

Maggie felt little bursts of happiness in her chest, as though someone had set off sparklers there.

Then, abruptly, he pulled away.

'Wait,' he said. 'Wait.' And instantly, the sparklers in her chest were extinguished, leaving only a smoking black place. Just that one word and she knew: she'd made a mistake.

'I can't-' Suddenly he looked different-older, full of regret, like someone she barely knew. 'I don't want to lie to you, Maggie.'

She felt like she'd swallowed something spoiled: there was a bad taste in her mouth, and her stomach was lashing. She felt her face begin to burn. It wasn't her. He was in love with someone else. And she'd just shoved her tongue down his throat like a lunatic. She had to crab-walk backward, away from him, to the edge of the trampoline.

'Stupid,' she said. 'It was stupid. Just forget it, okay? I don't know what I was thinking.' For a second, he looked hurt. But she was too embarrassed to care. And then he frowned, and he just looked tired and a little irritated, like she was an unruly child and he was a patient father. She realized suddenly that that was how John saw her: as a kid. A kid sister.

'Will you just sit down?' he said in his tired-dad voice. His hair was sticking straight up-the hair equivalent of a scream.

'It's getting late,' Maggie said, which it wasn't. 'I have to take Lily home. Mom will get worried.' Lie on top of a lie. She didn't know why she said it. Maybe because at that moment she wished for it-wished that she was heading back to a real home with a normal mom who cared, instead of back to the car and the parking spot on Meth Row. She wished that she was small and delicate, like a special Christmas ornament that needed to be handled correctly. I wished that she was someone else.

‘Maggie, please,’ he said. The world was breaking up, shattering into colors-and she knew if she didn’t get out of there, she would start to cry. ‘Forget about it,’ she said. ‘Seriously. Would you? Just forget it ever happened.’ She only made it a few steps away before the tears started. She swiped them away quickly with the heel of a hand; she had to pass through a dozen old classmates to get to the house, including Matt’s best friend, and she would rather die than be the girl crying at her best friend’s birthday party.

Everyone would think she was wasted. Funny how people could be around you for so many years and be so off the mark. She went in through the back door, taking a second inside to stand, inhaling, trying to get control of herself. Weirdly, although Joh- John’s whole property was a junkyard, the house was clean, sparsely furnished, and always smelled like carpet cleaner. Maggie knew that Mr. Marks’s longtime girlfriend, Carol, considered the yard a lost cause. But the home was her place, and she was always scrubbing and straightening, and yelling at Joh- John to take his dirty feet off the coffee table, for God’s sake.

Even though the house hadn’t been remodeled since the seventies, and still sported shag carpet and weird orange-and-white- checkered linoleum in the kitchen, it looked spotless.

Maggie’s throat tightened again.

Everything was so familiar here: the Formica dining room table; the crack running along with the kitchen countertop; the curled photographs stuck to the fridge with magnets advertising dentists’ offices and hardware stores. They were as familiar to her as any she had ever called her own. They were hers, and Joh- John had been hers, once.

But no more.

She could hear running water and muffled TV sounds from the den, where Lily was watching. She stepped into the darkened hall and noticed the bathroom door was partly open. A wedge of light lay thickly on the carpet. Now she could hear crying, over the sound of the water. She saw a curtain of dark hair appear and disappear quickly.

‘Nathaniel?’ Maggie swung the door open carefully. Water gushed from the faucet, and steam was drumming up from the porcelain bowl. The water must have been scalding, but Nathaniel was still scrubbing her hands and sniffing. Her skin was raw and red and shiny like it had been burned.

‘Hey.’ Maggie forgot, for the moment, about her problems. She took a step into the bathroom. Instinctively, she reached out and shut off the faucet. Even the taps were hot.

‘Hey- are you okay?’

It was a stupid thing to say. Nathaniel was not okay. She turned to Maggie. Her eyes were puffy, and her whole face looked weird and swollen, like bread that was rising wrong. ‘It’s not working anymore,’ she said in a whisper.

‘What isn’t?’ Maggie asked. She felt suddenly on hyper-alert. She noticed the drip-drip of the faucet, and Nathaniel’s monstrously red hands, hanging like deflated balloons by her side. She thought of the way that Nathaniel always liked things even, straight down the middle.

How sometimes she showered more than once a day. The taps and tongue clicks.

The stuff she’d mostly ignored because she was so used to it. Another blind spot between people.

‘That’s why I froze on the highway, you know,’ Nathaniel went on. ‘I just - glitched.’ Her eyes were watery again. ‘Nothing’s working.’ Her voice wavered. ‘I don’t feel safe, you know?’

‘Come here,’ Maggie said. She drew Nathaniel into a hug and Nathaniel continued crying, drunk, against her chest. She gripped Maggie tightly as if she worried, she might fall. ‘Sh-hh,’ Maggie murmured, repeatedly. ‘Sh-hh. It’s your birthday.’

But she didn’t say it would be okay. How could she? She knew that Nathaniel was right.

None of them was safe.

No more. Never again.

Marcel-

Marcel HEARD VOICES IN THE LIVING ROOM AS SOON as he opened the door and immediately regretted coming home directly. It was just after eleven, and his first thought was that Ricky was over again.

He wasn't in the mood to deal with Ricky grinning like an idiot and Dayna blushing and trying to make things not awkward and all the time shooting Marcel dagger eyes like he was the one intruding. But then his mom called, 'Come in here, Marcel!' A man was sitting on the couch. His hair was graying, and he was wearing a rumpled suit, which matched his rumpled face.

'What?' Marcel said, barely looking at his mom. He didn't even try to be polite. He wasn't going to play nice with one of his mom's dates.

His mom frowned.

'Marcel,' she said, drawing out his name, like a warning bell. 'You know Bill Kelly, don't you? Bill came over for a little bit of company.' She was watching Marcel closely, and he read a dozen messages in her eyes at once: Bill Kelly just lost his son, so if you're rude to him, I swear you'll be sleeping on the streets...

Marcel felt suddenly like his whole body was made of angles and spikes, and he couldn't remember how to move it correctly. He turned jerkily to the man on the couch: Big Bill Kelly. Now he could see the resemblance to his son. The straw-colored hair running, in the father's case, to gray; the piercing blue eyes and the heavy jaw.

'Hi,' Marcel said. His voice was a croak. He cleared his throat. 'I was -am- I mean, we're all sorry to hear-'

'Thank you, son.' Mr. Kelly's voice was surprisingly clear. Marcel was glad he'd been interrupted because he didn't know what else he would have said. He was so hot he felt like his face was about to explode. He had a sudden, hysterical impulse to shout out: I was there. I was there when your son died. I could have saved him.

He took a deep breath. The game was wearing on him. He was starting to crack. After what seemed like forever, Mr. Kelly's eyes passed away from Marcel, back to his mother. 'I should go, Sheila.' He stood up slowly. He was so tall he nearly grazed the ceiling with his head.

‘I’m going to Albany tomorrow. Autopsies were done. I don’t expect any surprises, but -’ He made a helpless gesture with his hands. ‘I want to know everything. I will know everything.’

Sweat was picking up underneath Marcel’s collar. It might have been his imagination, but he was sure Mr. Kelly’s words were directed at him. He thought of all the Fear betting slips he’d been collecting this summer. Where were they? Had he put them in his underwear drawer? Or left them out on his bedside table? Jesus. He had to get rid of them.

‘Of course.’

Marcel’s mom stood too. Now all three of them were standing, awkwardly, like they were in a play and had forgotten their lines. ‘Say goodnight to Mr. Kelly, Marcel.’

Marcel coughed. ‘Yeah. Sure. Look,

I’m sorry again-’

Mr. Kelly stuck out his hand.

‘God’s works,’ he said quietly. But Marcel felt that when Mr. Kelly shook his hand, he squeezed just a little too hard.

That was the night -Digging went to a party down at the gully and ended up with a cracked rib, two black eyes, and one of his teeth knocked out. Derek Klieg was drunk; that was the excuse he gave afterward, but everyone knew it was deeper than that, and once the swelling in -Digging’s face went down, he told anyone who would listen how Derek had jumped him, threatened him, tried to get him to cough up the names and identities of the judges, and wouldn’t listen when -Digging insisted he didn’t know. It was an obvious violation of one of Fear’s many unspoken rules. The announcer was off-limits. So were the judges.

Derek Klieg was immediately disqualified. He had forfeited his spot in the game, and his name was struck from the betting slips by morning. And Natalie, the last player eliminated, was back on.

SATURDAY,

JULY 30

Maggie,

MAGGIE WAS WOKEN BY SOMEONE RAPPING ON THE window. She sat up, rubbing her eyes, startled and momentarily disoriented. Sun was streaming through the windows of the Taurus.

Marcel was watching her through the windshield. Now that she was awake, everything came into sudden focus: the kiss with Joh- John and its botched end; Natalie crying in the bathroom; and now Marcel watching her, taking in the rumpled sheet and beaten-up cups from Dairy Queen in the passenger seat, the chip bags, and the flip-flops and the scattered clothing in the backseat.

Outside, Lily was barefoot and dressed in a bathing suit. Maggie opened the door and got out of the car. 'What are you doing here?' She was furious with him. He had violated an unspoken agreement.

When she had said, don't tell, she had also meant Don't come back. 'I tried calling you. Your phone was off.' If he could tell she was angry, he didn't seem to care. Her phone. She'd been powering down her phone as much as she could since she could only charge it when she worked at Anne's house.

Besides, she didn't need to see the texts from her mom. But she realized she'd brought it into Joh- John's kitchen last night to charge, and never retrieved it. Sh*t. That meant going back for it.

Maggie had slept in her clothes- the same clothes she'd worn to Nathaniel's party, including a tank top with sequins.

She crossed her arms over her chest.

'What's up?' He passed her a folded piece of paper. The newest betting slips. 'Nathaniel's back on. Derek was disqualified.' 'Disqualified?' Maggie repeated.

She'd only heard of someone being disqualified from Terror once before, years earlier-one of the players was sleeping with a judge. It later turned out that the guy, Mickey Barnes, wasn't a judge, just pretending to be one so he could get laid. But it was too late. The player was replaced. Marcel shrugged. Behind him, Lily had overturned their bucket of water and was making rivers out of the dirt.

Maggie was glad she wasn't listening.

'Are you going to tell her?' He asked.

'You can,' she said. He looked at her again. Something shifted in his eyes. 'No, I can't.' They stood there for a second. Maggie wanted to ask him what had happened, but she felt too weird. She and Marcel weren't exactly close-not like that, anyway. She didn't know what they were. She wasn't close to anyone.

'The deal's off,' he said after a minute. 'No splits.'

'What?' Maggie was shocked to hear Marcel say it. That meant he knew she knew about his deal with Nathaniel. Did he know about the deal she and Nathaniel had made? His eyes were almost gray, like a stormy sky.

'We play the game how it was meant,' he said, and for the first time, she was almost afraid of him. 'Winner takes the pot.'

'Why can't I come in and see Joh- John?' Lily was in a bad mood. She'd been whining since she got up. She was too hot. She was dirty. The food that Maggie had for her-more tinned stuff, and a sandwich she'd bought at the 7- Eleven-was gross. Maggie guessed that the adventure of being without a home (she couldn't bring herself to think the word homeless,) the newness of it, was wearing off. Maggie gripped the wheel, squeezing out her frustration through her palms. 'I'm just running in for a second, Lily-belle,' she said, forcing herself to sound cheerful. She wouldn't snap, she wouldn't scream. She would keep it together-all for Lily. 'And Joh- John's busy.' She didn't know if this was true- she hadn't been able to call and see whether Joh- John was even home, and part of her was hoping he wasn't.

She kept flashing back to the kiss, the moment of warmth and rightness - and then the way he had pulled away as the kiss had physically hurt him. I don't want to lie to you, Maggie.

Never had she been so humiliated in her life. What on earth had possessed her? Thinking about it made her stomach hurt, made her want to drive to the ocean and keep running straight into it.

But she needed her phone. She was going to have to suck it up and risk seeing him. She could even do damage control, explain that she hadn't meant to kiss him so he wouldn't think she was in love with him or something. Her stomach gave another lurch into her throat. She wasn't in love with Joh- John.

Was she...?

'I'll be back in ten,' she said. She'd parked a little way- down the driveway, so if Joh- John was outside, he wouldn't see her car and all the evidence that she was living inside it. The last thing she wanted was more pity for him. There was still evidence of the party in the yard: a few plastic cups, cigarette butts, a pair of cheap sunglasses swimming in a birdbath filled with mossy water. But everything was quiet. He wasn't home.

But before she could even make it to the front door, Joh- John appeared, carrying a trash bag. He froze when he saw her, and Maggie felt the last flicker of hope that things would be normal, that they could pretend last night had never happened fizzle out.

'What are you doing here?' he blurted out.

'I just came to get my phone.' Her voice sounded weird like it was being replayed on a bad sound system. 'Don't worry, I'm not staying.' She started to move past him, into the house.

He caught her arm. 'Wait.' There was something desperate about the way he was looking at her. He licked his lips.

'Wait-you don't-I have to explain.'

'Forget about it,' Maggie said.

'No. I can't-you have to trust me-' Joh- John pushed a hand through his hair, so it stood up straight. Maggie felt like she could cry. His clown-hair; his faded Rangers T-shirt and sweatpants spotted with paint; his smell. She had thought it was hers-she'd thought he was hers-but all this time he'd been growing up and hooking up and having secret crushes and becoming someone, she didn't know. And she knew, looking at him holding a stupid bag of trash, that she was in love with him and always had been. Since the kiss the first year. Even before that...

‘You don’t have to explain,’ she said and pushed past him into the house. It had been bright outside, and she was temporarily disoriented by the dark, and she took two unsteady steps toward the living room, where she could hear the fan going, as Joh- John flung open the door behind her.

‘Maggie,’ he said. Before she could respond, another voice called out. A girl’s voice.

‘Joh- John?’

Time stopped. Maggie froze, and Joh- John froze, and nothing moved except the black spots across Maggie’s eyes as her vision slowly adjusted; as she saw a girl float up out of the shadow, emerging from the darkness of the living room.

Weirdly, although they’d gone to school together forever, Maggie didn’t immediately recognize Vivian Trevin. It was the shock of seeing her there, in Joh- John’s house, barefooted, holding a mug from Joh- John’s kitchen. As though she belonged.

‘Hey, Maggie,’ Vivian said, taking a sip from her mug. Over the rim, her eyes connected with Joh- John’s, and Maggie saw a warning there. Maggie turned to Joh- John. All she saw was guilt: guilt all over him, like a physical force, like something sticky.

‘What are you doing here?’ Vivian asked, still casual.

‘Leaving,’ Maggie said. She threw herself forward, down the hall and into the kitchen. She was fighting the feeling that she was going to be sick, fighting the memories threatening to drown her: the times she’d drunk cocoa from that mug, her lips where Vivian’s now where her lips on Joh- John’s-Vivian’s Joh- John. Her phone was still plugged into an outlet near the microwave. Her fingers felt swollen and useless. It took her several tries before she could unplug it.

She couldn’t face passing Joh- John and Vivian again, so she just hurtled out the back door, across the porch, and down into the yard. Idiot. She was such an idiot. She tasted tears before she knew she was crying.

Why would Joh- John go for her, Maggie? He was smart. He was leaving for college. Maggie was a nobody.

Nill...

As in zero. That's why Matt had dumped her too.

No one had ever told her this basic fact: not everyone got to be loved. It was like those stupid bell curves they'd had to study in math class. There was the big, swollen, happy middle, a whale hump full of blissful couples and families eating around a big dining room table and laughing. And then, at the tapered ends, there where the abnormal people, the weirdos and freaks and zeros like her.

She wiped away the tears with her forearm and took a few seconds to breathe and calm down before she returned to the car. Lily was picking at a mosquito bite on her big toe. She stared at Maggie suspiciously when Maggie got in the car.

'Did you see Joh- John?' Lily asked.

'No,' Maggie said and put the car in drive.

Contented: 1

WEDNESDAY,

AUGUST 3

Marcel,

Marcel HAD LOST THE RECEIPT

FOR NATALIE'S NECKLACE, and instead had to pawn it for half of what he had paid. He needed the money. It was August 3; he was running out of time. He needed a car for the Joust.

A junkier would do-he was even thinking of buying one off Joh- John. So long as it drove.

He had just finished a shift at Lowe's when he got a text.

He hoped for a wild second it was Natalie; instead, it was from his mom.

'Meet us @ Cambria Memorial as soon as posable!! Dayna...'

Something bad had happened to Dayna.

He tried calling his mom's cell phone, and then Dayna's, and got no response. He barely registered the twenty-minute bus ride to Hudson.

He couldn't sit still. His legs were full of itching, and his heart was lodged underneath his tongue. His phone buzzed in his pocket.

Another text. This time, it was from an unknown number.

Time to go solo. Tomorrow night we'll see what you're made of. He shut his phone, shoved it in his pocket. When he reached Cambria Memorial, he practically sprinted from the bus.

'Marcel! Marcel!' Dayna and his mom were standing outside, by the handicapped ramp. Dayna was waving frantically, sitting up as tall as she could in her chair. And she was grinning. They both where-smiling so big, he could see all their teeth, even from a distance.

Still, his heart wouldn't stop going as he jogged across the parking lot.

'What?' He was breathless by the time he reached them. 'What is it? What happened?'

'You tell him, Day,' Marcel's mom said, still smiling. Her mascara was smudged. She'd been crying.

Dayna sucked in a deep breath. Her eyes were shining; he hadn't seen her look so happy since before the accident.

'I moved, Marcel. I moved my toes.' He stared at Dayna, then his mom, then Dayna again. 'Jesus Christ,' he finally burst out. 'I thought something happened. I thought you were dead or something.' Dayna shook her head. She looked hurt.

'Something did happen.' Marcel took off his hat and ran a hand through his hair. He was sweating. He jammed on the hat again. Dayna was watching him expectantly. He knew he was being a d*ick.

He exhaled. 'That's amazing, Day,' he said. He tried to sound like he meant it. He was happy; he was just still wound up from the trip over, from being so afraid. 'I'm proud of you.'

He leaned down and hugged her. And he felt the tiniest convulsion in her body like she was holding in a sob.

Marcel's mom insisted they go out to eat to celebrate, even though they couldn't afford it, especially now with all the bills.

They ended up at an Applebee's outside Carp. Marcel's mom ordered a margarita with extra salt and nachos for the table to start. Nachos were Marcel's favorite, but he couldn't bring himself to eat. His mom kept prattling on about Bill Kelly: how Bill Kelly was so nice, so thoughtful, even though he was grieving; how Bill Kelly had set them up with the appointment and made a phone call on their behalf and blah, blah, blah.

Her cell phone rang in the middle of dinner. Marcel's mom stood up.

'Speak of the devil,' she said. 'It's Bill.'

He might have news...'

'What kind of news?' Marcel asked when she had stepped outside. He could see her pacing the parking lot. Under the glow of the lights, she looked old. Tired, saggy... more mom-like than normal.

Dayna shrugged.

'Are they screwing or something?' Marcel pressed. Dayna sighed and wiped her fingers carefully on her napkin. She'd been picking apart her burger, layer by layer.

This was something she'd always done: deconstruct her food, put it back together in a way that pleased her. With burgers it was lettuce and tomato on the bottom, then ketchup, then the burger, then bun.

'They're friends, Marcel,' she said, and he felt a flicker of irritation. She was speaking to him in her grown-up voice, a voice that had always grated on him.

'Why do you care, anyway?'

'Mom doesn't have friends,' he said, even though he knew it was kind of mean. Dayna set down her napkin-hard, in her fist, so that the water cups jumped.

‘What is up with you?’ Marcel stared at her. ‘What’s up with me?’ ‘Why do you have to give Mom such a tough time? That doctor isn’t cheap. She’s trying.’ Dayna shook her head. ‘Ricky had to leave, like, his whole family to come here-’

‘Please don’t bring Ricky into this.’

‘I’m just saying, we should feel lucky.’

‘Lucky?’ Marcel barked a laugh. ‘Since when did you become such a guru?’

‘Since when did you become such a brat?’ Dayna fired back.

Marcel suddenly felt lost. He didn’t know where the feeling came from, and he struggled to get out from underneath it. ‘Mom’s clueless. That’s all I’m saying.’ He stabbed at his mac ’n’ cheese to avoid meeting Dayna’s eyes. ‘Besides, I just don’t want you to get your hopes up....’

Now it was Dayna’s turn to stare.

‘You’re unbelievable.’ She spoke in a deep voice, and somehow that was worse than if she’d been screaming. ‘All this time you’ve been telling me to keep trying, keep believing. And then I make progress-’ ‘And what about what I’ve been doing?’

Marcel knew he was being a brat, but he couldn’t help it. Dayna had been on his side- she was the only one on his side and now, suddenly, she wasn’t.

‘You mean the game?’ Dayna shook her head. ‘Look, Marcel. I’ve been thinking. I don’t want you to play anymore.’

‘You what...?’ Marcel exploded; several people at a neighboring table turned to stare.

‘Keep your voice down.’ Dayna was looking at him the way she used to when he was a little kid and didn’t understand the rules of a game, she wanted to play disappointed, a little impatient. ‘After what happened to Bill Kelly - it’s not worth it. It’s not right.’ Marcel took a sip of his water and found he could barely work it down his throat. ‘You wanted me to play,’ he said. ‘You asked me to.’

‘I changed my mind,’ she said. ‘Well, that’s not how the game works,’ he said. His voice was rising again. He couldn’t help it. ‘Or did you forget?’

Her mouth got thin: a straight pink scar on the face. ‘Listen to me, Marcel. This is for you for your good.’

‘I played for you.’ Marcel no longer cared about being overheard. The anger, the sense of loss, ate away the rest of the world, made him careless.

Whom did he have? He had no friends.

He’d never stayed in a place long enough to make them or trust them.

With Maggie, he’d thought he’d gotten close, with Natalie, too. He’d been wrong, and now even Dayna was turning on him.

‘Did you forget that, too? This is all for you. So that things can go back.’ He hadn’t intended to say the last part-hadn’t even though- the words until they were out of his mouth. For a second there was silence. Dayna was staring at him, openmouthed, and the words sat between them like something detonated: everything had been blown wide open.

‘Marcel,’ she said. He was horrified to see that she looked like she felt sorry for him. ‘Things can never go back. You know that, right? That’s not how it works. Nothing you do will change what happened.’ Marcel pushed his plate away. He stood up from the table. ‘I’m going home,’ he said. He couldn’t even think.

Dayna’s words were making a storm inside his head. Things can never go back.

What the hell had he been playing for, all this time?

‘Come on, Marcel,’ Dayna said.

‘Sit down.’ ‘I’m not hungry,’ he said. He couldn’t bring himself to look at her: those patient eyes, the thin, dissatisfied set of her mouth. Like he was a little kid. A dumb kid. ‘Tell mom I said- goodbye.’

‘We’re miles from home,’ Dayna said.

‘I could use the walk,’ Marcel said. He shoved a cigarette in his mouth, even though he didn’t feel like smoking, and hoped it wouldn’t rain.

Maggie,

MAGGIE DIDN’T RETURN TO METH ROW. IT WAS CONVENIENT, in some ways, but there was no privacy in it, now that Marcel knew where she was.

She didn’t want him to be spying on her, seeing how she was living, running his mouth about it. Maggie had been careful, thus far, to move the car only in the middle of the night, from the parking lot to empty road to the parking lot, when there was less danger of being spotted. She’d developed a routine: on workdays, she set her alarm for four a.m., and, while Lily was still sleeping, headed through the ink-black to Anne’s house...

She had found a break in the trees just off the driveway where she could park. Sometimes she slept again. Sometimes she waited, watching the black begin to blur and change, turning first to smudgy dark, then sharpening and splitting, peeling off into vivid purple shadows and triangles of light. She tried very hard not to think about the past, or what was going to happen in the future, or anything at all.

Later, when it was nine, she’d walk up to the house, telling Anne that Joh- John had dropped her off. Sometimes Lily came with her. Sometimes she stayed in the car or played in the woods.

Twice, Maggie had arrived early and chosen to bathe, sneaking through the woods to the outdoor shower. Then she’d stripped, shivering in the cool air, and stepped gratefully under the stream of hot water, letting it run into her mouth and eyes and over her body. Otherwise, she’d been making do with a hose. Maggie had to stop herself from fantasizing about running water, microwaves, air conditioners, and refrigerators and toilets.

Toilets...

It had been two weeks since she’d left her mom’s, and she’d gotten two mosquito bites on her butt while peeing at six a.m. and eaten colder canned ravioli than she could stomach.

What she wanted to do was make it to Malden Plaza, where they'd crossed the highway-to that vast, impersonal parking lot with only a few streetlamps. Truckers came on and off the highway all the time, and cars stayed in the lot overnight. There was a McDonald's, and public restrooms, with showers for the truckers who passed through.

First, they needed gas. It wasn't yet dark, and she didn't want to stop in Carp.

But she'd been running on fumes for twenty-four hours, and she didn't want to break down, either.

So, she pulled into the Citgo on Main Street, which was the least popular of the three gas stations in town because it was the most expensive and didn't sell beer.

'Stay in the car,' she told Lily.

'Yeah, yes,' Lily mumbled.

'I'm serious, Billy.' Maggie wasn't sure how long she could take this: the sniping, the back-and-forth. She was losing it. Cracking up. Grief had its hands around her neck; she was being choked. She kept seeing Vivian sipping from John's mug, her black hair hanging in wisps around a pretty, moon-white face. 'And don't talk to anybody, okay?'

She scanned the parking lot: no police cars, no cars she recognized. That was a good sign. Inside, she put down twenty dollars for gas and took the opportunity to stock up on whatever she could: packages of ramen soup, which they would eat dissolved in cold water; chips and salsa; beef jerky; and two fresh-ish sandwiches.

The man behind the counter, with a dark, flat face and thinning hair slicked to one side, like weeds strapped to his forehead, made her wait for change. While he counted singles into the register, she went to the bathroom.

She didn't like standing under the bright lights of the store, and she didn't like the way the man was looking at her either- like he could see through to all her secrets.

While she was washing her hands, she dimly registered the jangle of the bell above the door, the low murmur of conversation. Another customer. When she left the bathroom, he was blocked from view by a big display of cheap sunglasses, and she was at the counter before she noticed his uniform, the gun strapped to his hip.

A police officer...

‘How’s that Kelly business going?’ the man behind the counter was saying. The police officer with a big belly pushing out over his belt shrugged. ‘Autopsy came in. Turns out Little Kelly didn’t die in that fire.’

Maggie felt like something had hit her in the chest. She tugged her hood up and pretended to be looking for chips. She picked up a package of pretzels, squinted at it hard.

‘That right?’

‘Sad story. It looks like OD. He’d been taking pills since he came back from the war. Probably just went to that Graybill house for a nice warm place to get high.’

Maggie exhaled. She felt an insane, immediate sense of relief. She hadn’t realized, until now, that she had held herself accountable, at least a little bit, for his murder.

But it wasn’t murder. It hadn’t been.

‘Still, someone started that fire,’ the police officer said, and Maggie realized she’d been staring at the same package of pretzels for several seconds too long, and now the police officer was staring at her. She shoved the pretzels back on their rack, ducked her head, and headed for the door.

‘Hey! Hey, miss!’

She froze.

‘You forgot your groceries. I got change for you too.’

If she bolted, it would look suspicious. Then the police officer might wonder why she’d freaked. She turned slowly back to the counter, keeping her eyes trained on the ground. She could feel both men staring at her as she collected the bag of food. Her cheeks were hot, and her mouth felt dry as sand. She was at the door again, in the clear, when the police officer called out to her.

‘Hey.’ He was watching her closely. ‘Look at me.’ She forced her eyes up to his. He had a pudgy, doughy like face. But his eyes were big and round, like a small kid’s, or an animal’s.

‘What’s your name?’ He said. She said the first name that came to her: ‘Vivian.’

He moved gum around in his mouth.

‘How old are you, Vivian? You in high school?’

‘Graduated,’ she said. Her palms were itching. She wanted to turn and run. His eyes were traveling her face quickly like he was memorizing it.

The police officer took a step closer to her.

‘You ever heard of a game called Terror,

‘Vivian?’

She looked away. ‘No,’ she said in a whisper. It was a stupid lie, and immediately she wished she’d said yes.

‘I thought everybody played Fear,’ the police officer said.

‘Not everyone,’ she said, turning back to him. She saw a spark of triumph in his eyes, as though she’d admitted to something. God. She was messing this up. The back of her neck was sweating. The police officer stared at her for a few more beats. ‘Go on, get out of here,’ was all he said. Outside, she took a few deep breaths. The air was thick with moisture. A storm was coming-a bad one too, judging from the sky. It was green like the universe was about to get sick. She shoved her hood back, letting the sweat cool off her forehead. She jogged across the parking lot to the pump.

And stopped.

Lily was gone. There was a resonant boom, a sound so loud she jumped. The sky opened, and rain hissed angrily against the pavement. She reached the car just as the first fork of lightning tore across the sky. She jiggled the door handle. Locked. Where the hell was Lily?

‘Maggie!’ Lily’s voice rang out over the rain.

Maggie turned. A police officer was standing next to a blue-and-white patrol car. He had his hand on her sister's arm. 'Lily!' Maggie ran over, forgetting to be worried about police officers or being careful. 'Let go of her,' she said.

'Calm down, calm down.' The police officer was tall and skinny, with a face like a mule. 'Everyone be calm, okay?'

'Let go of her,' Maggie repeated. The police officer obeyed, and Lily barreled over to Maggie, wrapping her arms around Maggie's waist like she was a little kid.

'Hold on now,' the police officer said. Lightning flashed again. His teeth were lit up, gray and crooked. 'I just wanted to make sure the little lady was okay.' 'She's fine,' Maggie said. 'We're fine.' She started to turn away, but the police officer reached out and stopped her.

'Not so fast,' he said. 'We still got a slight problem.'

'We didn't do anything,' Lily piped up.

The police officer squinted at Lily. 'I believe you,' he said, his voice a little softer. 'But that right there'-and he pointed to the beat-up Taurus-' is a stolen car.'

The rain was coming down so hard, Maggie couldn't think. Lily looked sad and extra skinny with her T-shirt stick to her ribs.

The police officer opened the back door of the squad car. 'Go on and get in,' he said to Lily. 'Dry off.' Maggie didn't like it she didn't want Lily anywhere near the police car. That's how they got you: they were- were nice, and they lured you into thinking you were- were safe, and then they flipped the tables without warning. She thought of Joh- John and felt her throat squeeze. That was how everyone got you.

But Lily had scooted inside before

Maggie could say, Don't.

'How about we go somewhere and talk?' The police officer said. At least he didn't sound mad.

Maggie crossed her arms. 'I'm fine,' she said, hoping he wouldn't see her shiver. 'And I didn't steal that car,' she said. 'It's my mom's car.' He shook his head. 'Your mom said you stole it.' She could barely hear him over the rain. 'You got quite the setup in the back seat. Food. Blankets.

Clothes.' A bead of rain rolled off the tip of his nose, and Maggie thought he looked as pathetic as Lily had. She looked away. She felt the need to tell, to spill, to explain, swelling like a balloon inside her chest, pressing painfully against her ribs. But she just said, 'I'm not going home. You can't make me.'

'Sure, I can.'

'I'm eighteen,' she said. 'With no job, no money, no home,' he said.

'I have a job.' She knew she was being stupid, stubborn, but she didn't care. She'd promised Lily they wouldn't go back, and they wouldn't. Probably if she told her mom, told about the partying and the drugs, she wouldn't have to go back. But they'd stick her mom in jail and put Lily in some home with strangers who didn't care about her. 'I have an excellent job.'

And suddenly it occurred to her:

Anne. She looked at the police officer. 'Don't I get one phone call or something?' For the first time, he smiled. But his eyes were still sad. 'You're not under arrest.'

'I know,' she said. She was suddenly so nervous, she felt like she would vomit. What if Anne didn't care? Or worse, sided with the police? 'But I want my phone call, just the same.' Marcel HAD ONLY MADE IT HALFWAY HOME WHEN THE sky split open and it began to pour. Just his freaking luck. Within a few minutes, he was soaked.

A car passed, blaring its horn, sending a fierce spray of water across his jeans. He was still two miles from home. He was hoping the storm would let up, but it got worse.

Lightning ripped across the sky, quick flashes that gripped the world in the weird green glow. Water accumulated fast in the ditches, driving leaves and paper cups onto his shoes.

He was blind; he couldn't see the oncoming traffic until it was on top of him. He realized, suddenly, that he was only a few minutes away from Joh- John's. He turned off the road and started jogging. With any luck, Joh- John would be home, and he could wait it out or bum a ride.

But when he came up the driveway, he saw the whole house was dark. Still, he went up to the porch and knocked on the front door, praying that Joh- John would answer. Nothing. He remembered the back porch was screened in and circled the house through the slog of mud. He banged his shin against an old lawnmower and went stumbling forward, faceplanting, cursing.

The screen door was, of course, locked. He was wet and so miserable he briefly considered punching a hole through it-but then lightning bit through the sky again, and in that half-second of unnatural brightness, he saw a kind of gardening shed, some little ways back and half-obsured by the trees. The door to the shed was protected by a padlock, but Marcel had his first bit of luck: the lock wasn't in place. He pushed into the shed and stood to shiver in the sudden dryness and coolness, inhaling the smell of wet blankets and old wood, waiting for his eyes to adjust. He couldn't see sh*t. Just outlines, dark objects, more junk.

He pulled out his cell phone for light and saw the battery was out.

He couldn't even call Joh- John and ask where he was and when he would be home. Great. But at least in the glow of the screen, he could make a better scan of the shed, and he was surprised to see that it was wired: a plain bulb was screwed into the ceiling, and there was a switch on the wall, too.

The bulb was dim, but it was better than nothing. Immediately he saw that the shed was better organized than he'd thought.

Certainly, cleaner than the junkyard. There were a stool and a desk and a bunch of shelves. A bunch of betting slips, water-warped and weighted down with a metal turtle, where piled on the desk.

Next to the betting slips was a pile of old A/V and recording equipment, and one of those cheap pay-per-use cell phones, the kind that required no subscription. His second piece of luck: the cell phone powered on and didn't requires a password.

He looked in his contacts for Joh- John's cell phone number and managed to retrieve it just before his cell went dead. He thumbed it into the keypad of the cell phone he'd found and listened to it ring. Five times, then Joh- John's voice mail. He hung up without leaving a message. Instead, he flipped over to the texts, planning to shoot off a 911 to Joh- John. He had to come home sometime.

Where could he be in this weather, anyway?

And then: he froze. The driving of the rain on the roof, even the weight of the cell phone-all of it receded, and he saw only the words of the last outgoing text.

Time to go unaccompanied...

Tomorrow night we'll see what you're made of.

He read it again, and a third time.

The feeling returned in a rush. He scrolled down. More texts: instructions for the game. Messages to other players. And at the very bottom, a text to Maggie's number.

Quit now, before you get hurt. Marcel replaced the phone carefully, exactly where it had been.

Now everything looked different: recording equipment. Cameras... Spray paint stacked in the corner, and plywood leaning against the shed walls. All the stuff Joh- John had needed for the challenges.

A half-dozen mason jars were lined up on one shelf; he bent down to examine them and then cried out, stumbling away, nearly upsetting a stack of plywood.

Spiders... The jars were full of them -crawling up the glass, deep brown bodies blurring together. Meant for him.

'What are you doing here?' Marcel spun around. His heart was still beating hard; he was imagining the feel of a hundred spiders on his skin. Joh- John was standing in the doorway, totally- immobile.

The storm was still raging behind him, sending down sheets of water. He was wearing a hooded rain poncho, and his face was in shadow. For a second, Marcel was truly afraid of him; he looked like a serial killer in some bad horror movie.

Marcel had a sudden flash of clarity: this was what the game was about. This was what true fear was that you could never know other people, not completely. That you were always just guessing blind. Then Joh- John took another step into the shed, shoving off his hood, and the impression passed. It was just Joh- John.

Some of Marcel's fear eased too, although his skin was still prickling, and he was uncomfortably aware of the spiders in their thin glass jars, only a few feet away.

'What the hell, Marcel?' Joh- John burst out. His fists were balled up.

'I was looking for you,' Marcel said, raising both hands, just in case Joh- John was thinking of swinging at him.

'I just wanted to get out of the rain.' 'You're not supposed to be in here,' Joh- John insisted. 'It's all right,' Marcel said. 'I know, okay? I already know.' There was a minute of electric silence. Joh- John stared at him. 'Know what?' he said at last.

'Come on, man. Don't bullsh*t,' Marcel said quietly. 'Just tell me one thing: why?

Why?

I thought you hated- Fear.' Marcel thought Joh- John might not answer, might still try to deny the whole thing. Then his body seemed to collapse like someone had pulled the drain in his center. He tugged the door closed behind him, then sagged into the chair. For a moment, he sat with his head in his hands. Finally- he looked up.

'Why did you play?' he asked.

Revenge, Marcel thought, and Because I have nothing else. But out loud he said, 'Money. Why else?' Joh- John gestured wide with his hands.

'Same...'

'Really...?'

Marcel watched him closely. There was a look on Joh- John's face he couldn't identify. Joh- John nodded, but Marcel could tell he was lying. It was more than that. He chose to let it go.

Everyone needed secrets...

‘So-o what now?’ Joh- John asked. He sounded exhausted. He looked exhausted too. Marcel realized how much it must have weighed on him this summer-all the planning, all the lies.

‘You tell me,’ Marcel said. He leaned back against the desk. He was feeling slightly more relaxed, and grateful that Joh- John was positioned so that he could no longer see the spiders.

‘You can’t tell Maggie,’ Joh- John said, sitting forward, suddenly wild.

‘She can’t know about this all.’

‘Calm down,’ Marcel said. His mind was ticking forward, already adjusting to the added information, thinking of how he could use it. ‘I’m not going to tell Maggie. But I’m not going to do the solo challenge either. You’re just going to say I did.’ Joh- John stared at him. ‘That’s not fair.’

Marcel shrugged. ‘Maybe not. But that’s how it’s going to go.’ He wiped his palms on his jeans. ‘What were you planning to do with those spiders?’ ‘What do you think?’ Joh- John sounded annoyed. ‘All right. Fine.’

You’ll go straight to Joust. Okay?’ Marcel nodded. Abruptly, Joh- John stood up, kicking the chair so it scooted forward a few inches. ‘Jesus.’

Do you know, I’m glad you found out? I was almost hoping you would. It’s been awful. Freaking awful.’ Marcel didn’t say anything stupid, like that Joh- John could have said no when he was approached about being a judge.

So, he just said, ‘It’ll be over soon.’ Joh- John was pacing. Now he whirled around to face Marcel. Suddenly he filled the whole space. ‘I killed him, Marcel,’ he said, choking a little. ‘I’m responsible.’

A muscle flexed in Joh- John’s jaw; it occurred to Marcel that he was trying not to cry. ‘It was part of the game.’ He shook his head. ‘I never meant to hurt anyone. It was a stupid trick. I lit some papers in a trash can. But the fire got out of control so quickly. It just - exploded.’

I didn’t know what to do.’

Marcel felt a moment of guilt.

Earlier tonight, when he'd gone off on Dayna about Bill Kelly, he hadn't been thinking of Little Kelly at all. And about how awful his father must feel. 'It was an accident,' he said softly.

'Does it matter?' Joh- John asked. His voice was strangled. 'I should go to jail. I probably will.'

'You won't. Nobody knows.' It occurred to Marcel, though, that Joh- John must have a partner. There were always at least two judges. He knew that Joh- John wouldn't tell him if he asked, though. 'And I won't say anything. You can trust me.'

Joh- John nodded. 'Thanks,' he whispered. Again, the energy left him at once. He sat down again and put his head in his hands. They stayed like that for a long time, while the rain drummed on the roof, like fists beating to get in.

They stayed until Marcel's leg started to get numb where he was leaning on it, and the noise of the rain receded slightly and became the light scratching of nails.

'I have a favor to ask you,' Joh- John said, looking up. Marcel nodded.

Joh- John's eyes flashed: an expression gone too quickly to interpret.

'It's about Maggie,' he said.

SATURDAY,

AUGUST 6

Maggie,

ANNE HAD DECIDED THAT MAGGIE WAS READY TO FEED the white Bengal's. She had shown Maggie how to unlock the pen and where to place the bucket of meat. Anne took her time doing it-sometimes, she even wound up and threw a steak, like player hurling a Frisbee, and occasionally one of the white Bengal's would snap it up in midair.

Maggie always waited until the White Bengal's were on the other side of the pen or lying underneath the trees, where they liked to spend the sunniest afternoons. She worked as quickly as possible, never taking her eyes off them. The whole time she could practically feel the heat of their breath, the sharp rip of their teeth in her neck.

‘Do you think they miss home?’ Maggie turned around. Lily. Earlier that morning, Lily had helped Anne wrestle Muppet into a bath, and her legs were spotted with muddy water. But she looked cleaner, healthier than she had in weeks. From the other side of the barn, they could hear Anne humming as she pulled daffodils from the garden.

‘I think they’re pretty happy,’ Maggie said, although she’d never really thought about it one way or another. She triple-checked that she’d locked the pen, then turned once again to Lily. Lily’s face was puckered like she was trying to swallow something too big.

‘What about you, Bill?’ she asked, resting a hand briefly on Lily’s head.

‘Do you miss home?’

Lily shook her head so hard her braid whipped her in the face. ‘I want to stay here forever,’ she said, and Maggie knew that the words had been the too-big thing that was choking her.

Maggie had to bend down awkwardly to hug Lily. Still, Lily was growing; she was at Maggie’s chest. It was just one more thing that had changed while Maggie wasn’t paying attention. Like Joh- John.

Like her friendship with Nathaniel.

‘No matter what, we’ll be together. Okay? We’ll be fine.’ Maggie put her thumb on Lily’s nose, and Lily swatted at her. ‘Do you believe me?’ Lily nodded, but Maggie could tell that she didn’t, not entirely.

It had been three days since Maggie had been picked up by the police officers, and for now, Anne had agreed to let Maggie and Lily stay with her. They were sleeping in the ‘blue room:’ wallpaper patterned with blue posies, blue coverlets, ruffled blue curtains.

Maggie thought it was the most beautiful room she’d ever seen. Earlier that morning, she’d woken up and Lily’s bed had been empty. For a moment, she was seized with Fear, until she heard laughter from outside. When she went to the window, she saw Lily was helping Anne feed the chickens and laughing hysterically as one of them chased her, picking up the feed. The day before, Krista had arrived in the Taurus, which the police officers had returned to her. She refused even to acknowledge Anne but made a big show of embracing Lily, who stood rigidly, her face squashed against Krista's sun freckled chest. Maggie had expected her to be angry about the car, and she was, but she was sober, at least, and trying to put on a good show. She reeked of perfume, and she was wearing her work pants and a blue blouse that puckered under her boobs.

She told Maggie she was sorry, and she wasn't partying anymore, and she was going to do a better job of paying attention to Lily. But she recited the words stiffly, like an actor reading lines that bored her.

'So? You going to come home?' She said.

Maggie shook her head. And then she'd seen it: Krista's face had, for just a minute, transformed.

'You can't stay here forever,' Krista said in a deep voice, so Anne couldn't hear. 'She'll get sick of you.'

Maggie felt something open deep in her stomach. 'Good-bye, Krista,' she said.

'And I won't let you take my baby, either. Don't think you're taking Lily from me.' Krista had reached out and grabbed Maggie's elbow, but seeing Anne move toward them, had quickly released it.

'I'll be back soon,' Krista said loudly with her plastic smile. The words were like a threat. And Maggie had walked around for the rest of the day with that pit in her stomach, even after Anne had approached, unexpectedly, unasked, and given Maggie a big hug.

Don't worry, she'd said. I'm here for you. Maggie wished she could truly believe it.

The White Bengal's had moved across the pen now, toward the meat-lazily at first, as though uninterested. They sprang on it in one quick, fluid motion, jaws opening, teeth gleaming momentarily in the sun. Maggie watched them tear into it and felt a little queasy. What had Anne said on her first day of work? She liked taking in broken and damaged things.

Nonetheless, Maggie couldn't imagine the White Bengal's needing help. Her phone buzzed in her back pocket. Natalie... they hadn't spoken since her birthday.

'Maggie?' Natalie's voice sounded distant, as though she were speaking from underwater. 'Did you see the newest?'

'Newest what?' Maggie asked.

Cradling the phone between her ear and shoulder, she shoved open the door to the toolshed and replaced the keys to the white Bengal pen.

'The betting slips,' Natalie said.

-And-

'Marcel beat his solo challenge. Spiders.' She paused. 'One of us is next.'

Maggie's stomach gave another twist. 'Or Ray. Or Harold Lee,' she pointed out.

'But it'll be our turn soon,' Nathaniel said. She paused. 'Have you - have you spoken to him?' Maggie knew right away that Nathaniel was talking about Marcel. 'Not really,' she said. She hadn't told Natalie about what Marcel had said: that their deal was off. She suspected that Nathaniel knew as much. Nathaniel sighed. 'Let me know, okay?'

'Yeah, sure,' Maggie said. There was an awkward pause. She remembered how hysterical Nathaniel had been in the bathroom the other night, with her hands scraped raw from scrubbing. She felt a sudden wave of emotion-love for Natalie, grief for all the things that were never said.

'And Maggie?' Nathaniel said.

'What's up?'

Nathaniel's voice was quiet. 'I couldn't have done this without you. I would never have gotten this far. You know that, right?'

'The game's almost done,' Maggie said, trying to keep her voice light.

‘Don’t turn melty on me now.’ As soon as she hung up, she saw she’d missed a text. She clicked over to her messages and felt her breath stick in her mouth.

-Then-

Tomorrow it’s your turn, the message read.

SUNDAY,

AUGUST 7

Maggie,

‘ARE YOU OKAY?’ NATHANIEL ASKED.

‘I’d be better if you’d stop jerking the wheel,’ Maggie said. Then, immediately: ‘I’m sorry.’

‘It’s all right,’ Nathaniel said. Her knuckles where tiny half-moons on the wheel. As soon as Maggie saw the sign for Fresh Pines Mobile Park, she felt like her stomach might drop out of her butt. They were headed to Lot 62, only a few rows down from Krista’s house.

Even though no one had lived there for ages, it was wired and fitted with a fridge, a table, and a bed.

Maggie knew that people used Lot 62, which had been empty for as long as she could remember, for partying and for other stuff she didn’t want to think about. Once, when she was eight or nine, she and Joh- John had gone on a rampage there, emptying all the beers in the fridge, shaking the cigarette packs and bags of weed they found in the cupboards into the trash cans-like that would stop anyone.

Maggie wondered what Joh- John was doing right now, and whether he’d heard it was her turn for a challenge.

Not... then she found that thinking of him was too painful, so she forced herself to concentrate on Natalie’s awful driving.

‘At least you’re getting it over with,’ Nathaniel said. Maggie knew she was trying to be helpful. ‘I almost wish it was my turn.’

‘No, you don’t,’ Maggie said. Already, they were at Lot 62. The shades were pulled, but she could see light glowing in the windows, and people turned to silhouettes inside.

Great... so- she’d have an audience, too. Natalie cut the engine. ‘You’re going to be great,’ she said. She started to get out of the car.

‘Hey.’ Maggie stopped her. Her mouth was dry. ‘You know what you said earlier? Well, I could never have gotten this far without you, either.’

Part: 11

Nathaniel smiled, she looked so-o sad. ‘May the best girl win,’ she said softly. Inside, the air was hazy with cigarette smoke. -Digging was back, his face still swollen and shiny, patterned all over with bruises. He was showing off his injuries like they were badges of honor. Maggie was annoyed to see that Ray had come-to watch her fail.

There were a few cheap bottles of liquor and some plastic cups on the counter. A group of people was sitting around the table; as Maggie and Nathaniel entered, they turned around as one.

Maggie’s heart stopped. Vivian Trevin had come.

-And-

So, had Matt Hefley.

‘What are you doing here?’ She directed the question to Matt. She didn’t move from the doorway. She kept thinking that this was part of the test- like a setup.

Terror challenge: see how long Maggie can last without crying in a small trailer with her ex-boyfriend and Joh- John’s new girl. Bonus points for not vomiting. Matt stood up from the table so quickly, he nearly overturned his chair.

‘Maggie. Hey.’ He waved awkwardly like they were standing at a distance instead of five feet from each other.

Maggie could feel Vivian watching her, looking slightly amused. B*tch. And Maggie had never been anything but nice to her. ‘Digging asked me to come. For help with -’ He trailed off.

‘With what?’ Maggie felt cold.

~*~

She couldn’t feel her mouth, even as it made words. Matt turned a deep red. Maggie used to like that about him-how he was an easy blush. Now she thought he just looked stupid. ‘With the gun,’ he said finally.

For the first time, Maggie became aware of the object on the table, around which everyone had gathered. Her breath froze in her throat, became a hard block.

She couldn’t swallow, not a pack of cards: a gun. The gun-the one Maggie had stolen from Trigger-Happy Jack’s place. But no, that was impossible. She was losing it. Joh- John had taken the gun and locked it away in his glove box.

Maggie wasn’t sure she could tell the difference between guns, anyway. They all looked the same: like horrible metal fingers, pointing the way to something evil.

She remembered, suddenly, listening as a small child while Krista was drinking with the neighbors in the kitchen. ‘Now Maggie’s father - he was a mess. Offed himself right after the baby came along. Came home and found his brain splattered on the wall.’ Pause. ‘Can’t say I blame him, sometimes.’

‘Please...?’

Just for a minute?’ Matt had come even closer. He was staring at Maggie with his big cow eyes, pleading; she belatedly registered that he had asked her whether they could talk. He lowered his voice. ‘Outside?’

‘No.’ Everything Maggie thought was taking a long time to turn into words, into action.

‘What...?’ Matt looked momentarily confused. He wasn’t used to having Maggie stand up for herself. Delaney always said yes to him too.

‘If you want to talk, you can talk to me here.’ Maggie was aware that Nathaniel was doing her best to pretend she wasn’t listening. Vivian, on the other hand, was still staring at her.

Matt coughed. He blushed again.

‘Look, I just wanted to tell you - I’m sorry. Everything happened between us. The Delaney thing-’ He looked away. He was doing his best to seem apologetic, but Maggie knew that he was gloating, just a little bit, to be in the position of having to apologize. He was in control.

He shrugged...

‘You have to believe, it just kind of - happened.’ She felt a rush of hatred for him. How had she ever believed she was in love with him? He was a dolt, just like Nathaniel said.

At the same time, an image of Joh- John rose in her mind: Joh- John in his stupid sweatpants and flip-flops, grinning at her; sharing an iced coffee, sharing the same straw, mindless of backwash and the fact that Maggie always chewed her straws to bits; lying side by side on the hood of his car, surrounded by crushed cans, which Joh- John said would make the aliens more likely to abduct them. Saying, Please, please, take me away from here, alien friends! And laughing.

‘Why are you telling me this now?’ Maggie said.

Matt looked startled, as though he’d expected her to thank him. ‘I’m telling you now because you don’t have to do this. You don’t have to go through with it. Look, I know you, Maggie. And this isn’t you.’

She felt like she’d been socked in the stomach. ‘You think this is about you? About what happened?’ Matt sighed. She could tell he thought she was being difficult. ‘I’m just saying you don’t have to prove anything.’

A vibration went through Maggie -tiny electrical pulses of anger. ‘Freak off, Matt,’ she said. By now, the people in the room were no longer pretending not to be listening. But she didn’t care.

‘Maggie-’ He reached for her arm as she started to move past him.

She shook him off. ‘This was never about you.’ That wasn’t, she realized, 100 percent true. She had entered at least, she thought she had-out of a sense of desperation, a sense that her life was over when he dumped her.

But she was playing for herself now, for herself and Lily; she was playing because she had made it this far; she was playing because if she won, it would be the first and only time she had ever won something in her life. ‘And you don’t know me. You never did.’ He let her go. She was hoping he would leave, now that he had come to say what he had to say, but he didn’t.

He crossed his arms and leaned against the bathroom door, or the sheet of graffiti printed plywood where the bathroom door should have been the plumbing lines hadn’t been connected. Just for a second, she saw Matt Hefley and Ray Hanrahan exchange a glance. Imperceptibly, Matt gestured to him.

Like, I did what I could. She felt a twin surge of disgust and triumph. So now Ray was enlisting Matt’s help to get Maggie to drop out. It was Ray who’d sent her that text in June telling her to quit Fear. He thought she was a real threat.

And that made her feel powerful.

‘What is this...?’ She said, gesturing with her chin to the gun. Her voice was overloud, and she was aware that everyone was watching her-Matt, Ray, Nathaniel, Vivian, and all the rest of them. It was like a painting; and at the center, framed in light, was the gun.

‘Russian roulette.’ -Digging sounded almost apologetic. He added quickly, ‘You only have to pull the trigger once.

‘Harold had to do it too.’

‘But Harold didn’t do it.’ Vivian spoke up. Her voice was deep and slow and reminded Maggie of warmer places.

Places where it never rained.

She forced herself to meet Vivian’s eyes. ‘So, Harold is out?’

Vivian shrugged. ‘Guess so.’ She had one foot on the chair, knee up to her chest, and she fiddled unconcernedly with the necklace she was wearing.

Maggie could see her collarbones protruding from her tank top. Like baby bird bones. She had an image of Joh- John kissing that spot and looked away. So, Harold was out. That left just four players.

‘All right,’ she said. She could hardly swallow. ‘All right,’ she repeated. She knew she should get it over with, but her hands wouldn’t move from her sides. Nathaniel was staring at her, horrified, as though Maggie was already dead.

‘Is it loaded?’ someone asked. ‘It’s loaded.’ It was Ray who answered. ‘I checked.’ But even he looked queasy, and he wouldn’t meet Maggie’s eyes.

Don’t be afraid, she told herself. But it had the opposite effect. She was rooted, paralyzed with fear. How many chambers were in a gun? What were her chances? She’d always been crap at things like that-probabilities.

She kept hearing her mom’s voice: Came home and found his brain splattered on the wall... She had no choice unless she wanted the game to end here, now. Then what would Lily do? But what would happen to Lily if Maggie blew her brains out? She saw her hand leave her side and reach for the gun. Her hand looked pale and foreign, like some weird creature you’d find living in the ocean.

Behind her, Nathaniel gasped. Suddenly the door flew open behind them, with such force that it banged hard against the wall. Everyone turned simultaneously, as though they were all puppets on the same string.

Marcel,

Maggie felt immediately disappointed; she knew that deep down, she’d been hoping for Joh- John.

‘Hey,’ she said. But Marcel didn’t answer. He just crossed the small space toward her, shoving Matt out of the way.

‘It was you,’ he said. His voice was low and full of spite.

Maggie blinked. ‘What?’ ‘You told someone about the spiders,’ he said. He glared at Natalie next. ‘Or you did.’

Ray snickered. Marcel ignored him.

‘What are you talking about?’ It had not occurred to Maggie to wonder how the judges had known about Marcel’s fear of spiders. But now she did. How did they know about any of them? Her stomach tightened, and she was worried she might throw up.

‘Neither of us said anything,

Marcel, I promise.’ That was Natalie. Marcel stared at each of them in turn. Then, unexpectedly, he reached out and seized the gun. Several people gasped and -Digging ducked like he expected Marcel to start firing.

‘What are you doing?’ Vivian said.

Marcel did something with the gun -opened the chamber, Maggie thought, although his fingers moved so quickly, she couldn’t be sure. Then he replaced it on the table.

‘I wanted to be sure it was loaded,’ he announced. ‘Fair’s fair.’

Now he wouldn’t look at Maggie at all.

He just crossed his arms and waited.

‘Poor Marcel,’ Ray said. He didn’t bother to stifle a laugh. ‘Afraid of itsy-bitsy spiders.’

‘Your turn’s coming, Hanrahan,’ Marcel said calmly. This made Ray stop laughing.

The room got quiet. Maggie knew there would be no more interruptions. No more distractions. She felt as though someone had turned the lights up. It was too hot, too bright. She took the gun. Maggie heard Nathaniel said, ‘Please.’ Maggie knew that everyone was still watching her, but she could make out no individual faces: everyone had been transformed into vague blobs, suggestions of color and angles. Even the table began to blur.

The only real thing was the gun: heavy and cold. She fumbled a little to get her finger on the trigger. She couldn’t feel her body anymore from the waist down. This was what it was like to die: a slow numbing.

She placed the gun to her temple, felt the cool bite of metal on her skin, like a hollow mouth. This was what my father must have felt like, she thought.

She closed her eyes- at once...

Nathaniel screamed, 'Don't do it!' At the same time, a chair clattered to the floor and several voices called out at once.

She squeezed the trigger.

Click...

Nothing. Maggie opened her eyes.

Instantly, the room was a roar of sound. People were on their feet, cheering. Maggie was so weak with joy and relief she found she couldn't hold on to the gun and let it fall to the floor. Then Natalie had rocketed into Maggie's arms.

'Oh, Maggie, oh, Maggie,' she kept saying.

'I'm so sorry.' Maggie was saying, 'It's okay, it's okay,' but she didn't feel the words leave her mouth. Her lips were numb, her tongue was numb, her body was quivering like it was preparing to disintegrate. When Nathaniel released her,

Maggie thudded into a chair.

It was over...

She was alive...

Someone pressed a drink into her hand, and she sipped gratefully before noticing it was warm beer. Then -Digging was in front of her, saying, 'I didn't think you'd do it. Wow. Holy sh*t.' She didn't know whether Matt congratulated her; if he did, she didn't register it.

Vivian smiled at her but said nothing.

Even Marcel came over. 'Look, Maggie,' he said, kneeling so they were at eye level. For a second, his eyes searched hers, and she was sure he was going to tell her something important.

Instead, he just said, ‘Keep this safe, okay?’ and pressed something into her hand. She slipped it mindlessly into her pocket.

Suddenly, Maggie wanted to get out of there more than anything. Away from the too-close smells of beer and old cigarettes and other people’s breath; far away from Fresh Pines, where she had never intended to return in the first place. She wanted to be back at Anne’s house, in the blue room, listening to the wind sing through the trees, listening to Lily’s sleep murmurs. It took her two attempts to get to her feet. She felt like her body had been sewn together backward.

‘Let’s go, okay?’ Nathaniel said. Her breath smelled a little like beer, and normally Maggie would have been annoyed that she was drinking right before they were going to drive. But she didn’t have the strength to argue, or even to care.

‘That was epic,’ Nathaniel said, as soon as they were in the car. ‘Seriously, Maggie. Everyone will be talking about it-for years. I do think it’s unfair, though. I mean, your challenge was, like, a billion times harder than Marcel’s. You could have died.’

Can we not talk about this?’ Maggie said. She unrolled her window a little, inhaling the smell of pine and climber moss. Alive.

‘Sure, yes.’ Nathaniel looked over at her. ‘Are you okay?’

‘I’m okay,’ Maggie said. She was thinking her way into the deepness of the woods, the soft spaces of growth and shadow. She shifted to lean her head against the window and felt something in her pocket. She remembered what

Marcel had given her. She wondered whether he felt guilty about his earlier outburst.

She reached into her pocket. Just then they passed under a streetlamp, and as Maggie uncurled her fingers, time seemed to stop for a second. Everything was perfectly still: Nathaniel with both hands on the wheel, mouth open to speak; the trees outside, frozen in anticipation.

Maggie’s fingers half-uncurled. And the bullet, resting in the fleshy middle of her palm.

SUNDAY,

AUGUST 14

IT WAS ALREADY THE SECOND WEEK OF AUGUST. The game was ending. Four players remained: Marcel, Maggie, Nathaniel, and Ray.

For the first time since the game began, people began to place bets that Maggie would win, although Ray and Marcel were still evenly split for the favorite.

Maggie heard that Ray passed his solo challenge: he'd broken into the county morgue in East Juniper and stayed locked up next to the corpses all night. Creepy, odd, and weird, but not likely to kill him; Maggie was still angry that her challenge had been the worst. But then, of course, there was the fact that Marcel had ensured her challenge would be harmless too.

Marcel, who had palmed a bullet while making a show of checking the gun for ammo. Marcel, who now refused to pick up her phone calls. It was such a joke. Joh- John called Maggie incessantly. Then at that moment she called out the name- Marcel.

Krista called Maggie. No one picked up for anyone else. Like some mixed-up game of telephone. Nathaniel stayed out of it. She had still not been given her solo challenge.

Every day, Nathaniel grew paler and skinnier. For once, she wasn't chattering endlessly about all the guys she was dating. She'd even announced, solemnly, that she thought she might try and stay away from guys for a while.

Maggie didn't know if it was the game or whatever had happened on the night of Nathaniel's birthday, but Nathaniel reminded Maggie of a painting she'd once seen reproduced in a history textbook, of a noblewoman awaiting the guillotine.

A week after Maggie's challenge, the blade fell. Maggie and Nathaniel had taken Lily to the mall to see a movie, mostly to get out of the heat-it had been recorded ninety-five degrees for three straight days, and Maggie felt as if she was moving through soup. The sky was a scorched, pale blue; the trees were motionless in the shimmering heat.

Afterward, they returned in Nathaniel's car to Anne's house. Nathaniel knew, at last, that Maggie wasn't living at home, and had offered to come sleep at Anne's with her, even though she disliked the dogs and wouldn't even get close to the White Bengal's pen. But Anne had left town for the weekend to visit her sister-in-law on the coast, and Maggie hated being in the big, old house without her.

That was one good thing about the trailer: you always knew what was, where the walls where who was home. Anne's house was different: full of wood that creaked and groaned, ghost sounds, mysterious thumps, and scratching noises.

'Get it,' Nathaniel said when her phone dinged between her legs.

'Ewe. I'm not reaching for it,' Maggie said.

Nathaniel giggled and tossed the phone at her, taking her hand off the wheel only briefly. She swerved, and Lily yelped from the backseat.

'Sorry, Bill,' Nathaniel said.

'Don't call me that,' Lily said primly. Nathaniel laughed. But Maggie was sitting with the phone in her lap, ice running through her wrists, into her hands.

'What's the matter?' Nathaniel asked.

Then her face got serious. 'Is it-?' She cut herself off and glanced in the rearview at Lily, who was listening attentively.

Maggie read the text again.

Impossible... 'Did you tell anyone you were sleeping over at Anne's tonight?' she asked, in a muffled voice.

Nathaniel shrugged. 'My parents. And Joh- John. I think I mentioned it to Joey, too.'

Maggie slid Nathaniel's phone shut and chucked it into the glove compartment. Suddenly she wanted it as far from her as possible.

'What...?' Nathaniel asked.

'Someone knows that Anne's gone,' Maggie said. She turned the radio up so Lily couldn't eavesdrop.

‘The judges know.’ Who had Maggie told? Marcel-she’d mentioned it to him in a text. Said he should come over, so they could talk, so she could thank him. And of course, Anne had told some people, probably; it was Carp, and people talked because they had nothing else to do.

The implication of what Maggie had just read-what Nathaniel would have to do sank in. She unrolled her window, but the blast of warm air gave her no relief.

She shouldn’t have drunk so much soda at the movie theater. She was nauseous.

‘What is it?’ Nathaniel said. She looked afraid. Unconsciously, she’d begun tapping out a rhythm on the steering wheel. ‘What do I have to do?’ Maggie looked at her. Her mouth tasted like ash, and she found she could not even speak a complete sentence.

‘The white Bengal’s,’ she said.

Marcel,

THE CHALLENGES were ALWAYS POPULAR, BUT THIS year, many spectators had been staying away. It was too risky. The police had threatened to haul in anyone associated with Fear, and everyone was worried about taking the rap for the fire at the Graybill house.

The rumor was Sadowski wanted someone-anyone-to take the fall. The roads, usually so empty, were infested with police cars, some from other counties.

But the word-white Bengal’s-was too much to resist. It had its lift and momentum: it flitted through the woods, stole its way into houses barred up against the heat, spun into the rhythm of fans that cycled in bedrooms across- Carp.

By afternoon, all the players and ex-players and spectators and bettors and welshes and squealers-everyone who cared even remotely about the game and its outcome-had heard about the white Bengal’s of Mansfield Road. Marcel was lying naked on his bed with two fans going at once when the text came in from Maggie. For a second, he was not sure whether he was sleeping or awake.

His room was dark and as hot as a mouth. He did not want to open the door, though. Ricky was over again, and he had brought food for Dayna, stuff he’d cooked himself at the dinner, rice and beans, and shrimp that smelled like burned garlic. They were watching a movie, and occasionally, despite the noise of the ancient fans and the closed door, he could hear the muffled sound of laughter.

The effort of sitting up made Marcel begin to sweat. He punched in Joh- John's number.

'What the hell?' He said when Joh- John picked up. No preamble. No bullsh*t. 'How could you do it? How could you make her do it?'

Joh- John sighed. 'Rules of the game, Marcel. I'm not the only one in control of this sh*t.' He sounded exhausted. 'If I don't make it hard enough, I'll get replaced. And then I won't be able to help at all.'

Marcel ignored him. 'She'll never go through with it. She shouldn't.'

'She doesn't have to.' Marcel felt like throwing his phone against the wall, even though he knew what Joh- John said was true. For Marcel's plan to succeed, Nathaniel would have to drop out anyway, and soon. Still, it felt unfair. Too hard, too dangerous, like Maggie's challenge. But at least there, Joh- John-and Marcel-had made sure she wouldn't be in any real danger. 'Maggie will find a way to help her,' Joh- John said, as though he could read Marcel's thoughts. 'You don't know that,' Marcel said and hung up. He didn't know why he was so angry.

He'd known the rules of Terror from the start. But somehow everything had gotten out of control. He wondered whether Joh- John would show tonight, whether he could face it. Poor Natalie. He thought about calling her and trying to convince her to drop out, to leave it, but then he thought about how she'd returned the necklace to him, and what he'd said to her that night - about opening her legs. It made him hot with shame. She had a right not to speak to him. She had a right to hate him, even.

But he would go tonight. And even if she did hate him, even if she ignored him completely, he wanted her to know that he was there. That he was sorry, too, for what he had said.

Time, for him, was running out.

Maggie- ONE OF the MAGGIE'S PROBLEMS- OUT OF ABOUT A HUNDRED big problems- was what to do about Lily.

Anne had left them food for the weekend -mac 'n' cheese, not from a box, but made with real cheese and milk and little spiral pasta, and tomato soup. Just heat it - made Maggie feel like a criminal: Anne had invited them into her home, was taking care of them, and Maggie was plotting behind her back. Maggie watched Lily polish off three portions. She didn't know how Lily could eat in this heat. All the fans were going, all the windows were open, but it was still sweltering.

She couldn't have taken even a mouthful. She was sick with weakness and resolutions. Outside, the sky was turning to milk, the adumbrations where dividing long on the soil. It wouldn't be long before sundown, and amusement time.

Maggie wondered what Natalie was doing. She'd been locked in upstairs for the past three hours. Maggie had heard the shuddering of pipes, the gush of water in the shower, three times.

After Lily ate, Maggie brought her into the sanctum: a big, dark room that still bore the sign of Anne's late husband - beat-up leather furniture and mohair blankets and rug that smelled a little like wet dog and old man ass with a hint of harry ball-sack.

Here it was a little cooler, although the leather stuck uncomfortably to Maggie's thighs when she sat down. 'I need you to promise me that you won't come outside,' Maggie said.

'There will be people. And you might hear noises. But you must stay right here, where it's safe. Promise me.'

Lily frowned. 'Does Anne know?' She asked.

That guilty feeling rode a wave up into Maggie's throat. She shook her head. 'And she won't,' she said. Lily picked at a bit of stuffing that had begun to poke out of the couch. She was silent for a second. Maggie wished, suddenly, she could take Lily into her arms and squeeze her, tell her everything -how scared she was, how she didn't know what would happen to either of them.

'This is about Fear, isn't it?' Lily said. She looked up. Her face was expressionless, her eyes flat. They reminded Maggie of the White Bengal's eyes: ancient, all-seeing. Maggie knew there was no point in lying. So, she said, 'It's almost over.'

Lily didn't move when Maggie kissed her head, which smelled like grass and sweat. The leather released Maggie's skin with a sharp sucking sound. She put on a DVD about a zoo, which Lily had requested- another gift from Anne. Anne, Maggie knew, was a good person. The best person Maggie had ever met.

So, what did that make Maggie? She was at the door when Lily spoke up. 'Are you going to win?' Maggie turned around to her. She'd left the lights off, so it would stay cool, and Lily's face was in shadow. Maggie tried to smile. 'I'm already winning,' she lied and closed the door behind her.

The haze of the sky, milk-white and scorched, at last, turned to dark; and the trees impaled the sun, and all the light broke apart. Then they came: quietly, tires moving soundlessly on the dirt, headlights bouncing like overgrown fireflies through the woods. There was no thudding music, no shouting. Everyone was on alert for police officers.

Maggie stood outside, waiting. The dogs were going crazy; she kept feeding them treats, trying to get them to shut up. She knew there were no neighbors around for miles, but she couldn't shake the feeling that someone would hear- that Anne would know, somehow, be summoned back to the house by the barking.

Nathaniel had still not come down. Maggie had fed the white Bengal's more than double their normal amount. Now, as the last light drained from the sky, and the stars began to pulse through the liquid haze of heat, they were lying on their sides, asleep and indifferent to all the cars.

Maggie prayed they would stay that way-that Nathaniel could do whatever she needed to do and get out.

Car after car: -Digging, Ray Hanrahan, even some of the players who'd been Eliminated early, like Cory Walsh and Ellie Hayes; Mindy Crammer and a bunch of her dance team friends, still dressed in bikinis and cutoffs and bare feet, like they'd just come from the beach; Even Sell or, eyes red-rimmed and liquid, obviously drunk, with two friends Maggie didn't recognize; people she hadn't seen since the challenge at the water tower. Matt Hefley, too, and Delaney. He walked right by Maggie, pretending she didn't exist. She found she didn't care.

They drifted across the yard and gathered around the White Bengal's pen, silent, disbelieving. Flashlights clicked on as it got darker; the floodlights on the barn, motion-detected, came on too, illuminating the white Bengal's, sleeping almost side by side, so still they might have been statues, held in a flat palm of the earth.

'I don't believe it,' someone whispered.

'No freaking way.' But there they were: no matter how many times you blinked or looked away. White Bengal's. A bit of a miracle, a circus wonder, right there on the grass under the Carp trees and the Carp sky. Maggie was relieved to see Marcel arrive on his bicycle. She still hadn't had a chance to thank him in person for what he'd done.

Almost immediately, he asked, 'Is Joh- John here?'

She shook her head. He made a face.

'Marcel,' she said. 'I wanted to say...'

'Don't.' He put a hand on her arm and squeezed gently. 'Not yet...'

She didn't know exactly what he meant. She wondered, for the first time, what Marcel was planning to do this fall, and whether he would remain in Carp, or whether he had plans for a job somewhere-or even college. She'd never paid any attention to how he did in school.

Suddenly the thought of Marcel leaving made her sad. They were friends or something like it that was close enough.

It struck her how sad it was that all of them-the kids standing here, her classmates and friends and even the people she'd hated-had grown up on top of one another like small animals in a too-small cage, and now would simply scatter. And that would be the end of that. Everything that had happened- those stupid school dances and basement after-parties, football games, days of rain that lulled them all to sleep in math class, summers swimming at the creek and stealing sodas from the coolers at the back of the 7-Eleven, even now, this, Fear-would be sucked away into memory and vapor, as though it hadn't even happened at all.

‘Where’s Natalie?’ That was -Digging. He was speaking softly, as if afraid to wake the white Bengal’s. Hardly anyone made a sound. They were all still transfixed by the sight of those dreamlike creatures, stretched long on the ground like shadows.

‘I’ll get her,’ Maggie said. She was grateful to have an excuse to go into the house, even for a moment. What she was doing, what she was helping Nathaniel do, was too horrible. She thought of Anne’s face, her smile pulling her eyes into a squint.

She’d never felt so much like a criminal, not even when she’d taken her mom’s car and run away. Another car was arriving, and she knew from the spitting and hissing of its engine that it was Joh- John. She was right. Just as she reached the front door, he climbed out of his car and spotted her.

‘Maggie!’ Even though he wasn’t shouting, his voice seemed to her like a slap in the silence. She ignored him. She stepped into the kitchen and found Natalie sitting at the table, eyes red. There was a shot glass in front of her, and a bottle of whiskey.

‘Where’d you get that?’ Maggie asked.

‘In the pantry.’ Nathaniel didn’t even look up. ‘I’m sorry. I only had a sip, though.’ She made a face. ‘It’s awful.’

‘It’s time,’ Maggie said. Nathaniel nodded and stood up. She was wearing denim shorts and no shoes; her hair was still wet from the shower.

Maggie knew that if Nathaniel weren’t so afraid, she would have insisted on putting on makeup, on doing her hair. Maggie thought Nathaniel had never looked so beautiful. Her fierce and fearful friend- who loved country music and cherry Pop-Tarts and singing in public and pink, who was terrified of germs and dogs and ladders.

‘I love you, Nathaniel,’ Maggie said on impulse.

Nathaniel looked startled, as though she’d already forgotten Maggie was there.

‘You, too, Heath bar,’ she said. She managed a small smile. ‘I’m ready.’ Joh- John was standing some little ways, from the house, pacing, bringing his fingers up to his lips and down again as though he were smoking an invisible cigarette. As Nathaniel moved into the crowd, he caught up with Maggie.

‘Please...’ His voice was hoarse.

‘We need to talk.’

‘This is kind of an inconvenient time.’ Her voice came out harsher, more sarcastic than she’d intended. It occurred to her that she hadn’t seen Vivian, and she wondered whether Joh- John had begged her not to come. Please, babe. Just until I can patch things up with Maggie.

She’s jealous, you know - she always had a thing for me. The thought made her throat knot up, and a part of her just wanted to tell Joh- John to freak off. Then there was the part of her that wanted to put her arms around his neck and feel his laughter humming through his chest, feel the wild tangle of his hair on her face. Instead, she crossed her arms as if she could press the feeling down.

‘I need to tell you something.’

Joh- John licked his lips. He looked awful. His face was sickly, different shades of yellow and green, and he was too skinny. ‘It’s important.’

‘Later, okay?’ Before he could protest, she moved past him. Natalie had reached the fence, closer to the White Bengal’s than she had ever allowed herself to go. Unconsciously, the crowd had backed off a little, so she was surrounded by a halo of negative space-like she was Contaminated with something contagious. Maggie jogged over to her. Now the dogs started up again, shattering the stillness, and Maggie hushed them sharply as she passed the kennel. She pushed easily through the crowd and stepped into Nathaniel’s open circle, feeling as if she were trespassing.

‘It’s okay,’ she whispered. ‘I’m here.’ But Nathaniel didn’t seem to hear her.

‘The rules are simple,’ -Digging said. Even though he was speaking at a normal volume, to Maggie it sounded like he was shouting. She began praying the White Bengal’s wouldn’t wake up. They still hadn’t even lifted their heads. She noticed a bit of the steak she’d given them earlier was still untouched, buzzing with flies, and couldn’t decide if that was a good thing or not. 'You go into the pen, you stand with the White Bengal's for ten seconds, you get out.' He emphasized this last part just slightly.

'How close?' Nathaniel said.

Part: 12

'What?'

'How close do I have to get?' She asked, turning to him.

-Digging shrugged. 'Just inside, I guess.'

Nathaniel pushed out a small breath. Maggie smiled at her encouragingly, even though she felt like her skin was made of clay about to crack. But if the white Bengal's slept, Nathaniel would have no problem. They were a full forty feet away from the gate. Nathaniel wouldn't even have to go near them.

'I'll time you,' -Digging said. Then:

'Who has the key to the gate?'

'I do.' Maggie stepped forward. She heard a slight rustle, as everyone turned to stare at her; she felt the heat of all those eyes on her skin. The air was leaden, totally still.

Maggie fumbled in her pocket for the key to the padlock. Nathaniel's breathing was rapid and shallow, like an injured animal. For a second, Maggie couldn't feel the key and didn't know whether to be relieved; then her fingers closed around the metal.

In the silence and the stillness, the click of the padlock seemed as loud as a rifle report. She un-looped the heavy chain carefully and laid it on the ground, then slid the metal latches back, one by one, desperately trying to stall, trying to give Nathaniel a few more seconds. As the final latch clanged open, both white Bengals' lifted their heads in unison, as though sensing that something was coming.

The whole group inhaled as one.

Nathaniel let out a whimper.

‘It’s okay,’ Maggie told her, gripping Nathaniel by the shoulders. She could feel Nathaniel trembling under her hands. ‘Ten seconds. You just must step inside the gate. It’ll be done before you know it.’

People had started buzzing, giggling- nervously, shifting. Now the stillness was replaced with electric energy. And as Nathaniel took one halting step toward the gate, and then another, the White Bengal’s, too, stood up-twisting onto their feet, stretching, yawning their enormous jaws so their teeth glistened in the floodlight -as though they had decided to perform.

Nathaniel paused with a hand on the gate.

Then her other hand. Then both hands. Her mouth was moving, and Maggie wondered if she was counting or praying, whether for Nathaniel they were the same thing. Dwarfed by the gate, silhouetted against the sharp, unnatural light, she looked unreal, one-dimensional, like a cardboard cutout.

‘You don’t have to do it.’

Marcel’s... the voice was loud and so unexpected that everyone turned to stare. Nathaniel turned too, and Maggie saw her frown. Then she pulled open the gate and stepped inside.

Part: 13

‘Start the timer,’ Maggie cried out.

She saw -Digging fumbling for his phone.

‘Now...’

‘Okay, okay,’ -Digging said. ‘Time!’ It was too late. The White Bengal’s had started to move. Slowly, their massive heads swinging between their shoulder blades like some awful clock pendulum - tick, tick, tick. But still, they were too close, already too close; three strides and they covered five yards, mouths open, grinning.

‘Three seconds!’ -Digging announced.

Impossible. Surely Nathaniel had been in the pen for ten minutes, for half an hour, forever. Maggie's heart was bursting out of her throat. No one spoke. No one moved. Everything was a black sea, dim and featureless: everything but the bright circle of white light, and the cardboard cutout Nathaniel, and the long shadow of the white Bengal's. Nathaniel was shaking now, and whimpering, too. Maggie feared for a second that she would collapse. Then what? Would the white Bengal's pounce? Would she, Maggie, be brave enough to try to stop them?

She knew she wouldn't. Her legs were water, and she could hardly breathe.

'Seven seconds!' -Digging's voice was shrill, like an alarm.

The White Bengal's were less than eight feet from Nathaniel. They would be on top of her in two more paces. Maggie could hear them breathing, see their whiskers twitching, tasting the air. Nathaniel had started to cry. But she still held herself there, rigid. She was too scared to move. Their eyes, like deep black pools, had transfixed her.

'Eight seconds!' Then one of the white Bengal's twitched; a muscle flexed, and Maggie knew it was getting ready to pounce, felt it, knew it would jump on Natalie and tear her apart and they would all stand, watching, helpless. And just as she was trying to scream Run but couldn't, because her throat was too thick with terror, Nathaniel did run. Someone else screamed it.

There was noise suddenly-people shouting-and Nathaniel was out of the gate and slamming it shut, leaning back, crying.

Just as the white Bengal, the one Maggie had been sure was moving to spring, lay down again.

'Nine seconds,' -Digging said above the sudden roar of sound. Maggie registered a small burst of triumph- Nathaniel was out of the game and then a stronger pull of shame. She pushed over to Nathaniel and drew her into a hug.

'You were amazing,' she said into the top of Nathaniel's hair.

'I didn't make it,' Nathaniel said. Her voice was muffled and her face sticky against Maggie's chest.

‘You were still amazing,’ Maggie said.

Nathaniel was the only one who wasn’t celebrating. She returned almost immediately to the house. But everyone else seemed to forget about the threat of cops, forget about what had happened at the Graybill house and about the body of Little Kelly, found charred and blackened in the basement for a short while, it felt almost as it had at the beginning of the summer when the players had first made the jump.

It took more than an hour for Maggie to get everyone out, into their cars and off the property, and the whole time the dogs were going crazy and the White Bengal’s were still again, as though deliberately making a point. By the time the yard was almost empty of cars, exhaustion numbed Maggie’s fingers and toes. But it was over, thank God. It was all over, and Anne would never have to know. There were only three players left.

And Maggie was one of them.

‘Maggie,’ Joh- John tried again when everyone had gone. ‘We need to talk.’

‘Not tonight, Joh- John.’ A few people were lingering, leaning up against their cars, hands down each other’s pants. Strange how just a few months ago she had been one of them, hanging out at parties with Matt, her capital B Boyfriend, flaunting it however she could. Wearing his sweatshirts, his baseball hats, like a badge of something -that she was lovable, that she was fine, and normal and just like everybody else. Already the old Maggie seemed like someone she barely knew.

‘You can’t avoid me forever,’ Joh- John said, deliberately moving in front of her as she stooped to collect a cigarette pack, half trampled into the grass. She straightened up. His hair was poking out from every side of his hat, like something alive trying to get out.

She obtained the urge to reach up and try and fight it into the configuration. The most dangerous was that when she looked at him now, she still saw their kiss: the heat that had roared through her and the mellowness of his lips and the brief instantaneous moment when his tongue had found hers.

‘I’m not avoiding you,’ she said, looking away so she wouldn’t have to remember. ‘I’m just tired.’

‘When, then?’ He looked lost. ‘It’s important, your all right? I need you now. I need you to listen.’

She was intrigued to ask him why Vivian couldn’t listen, but she didn’t. He resembled awful and sorrowful, and she loved him even if he didn’t love her. The feeling that he was upset, in pain, was a worse feeling than her pain.

‘Tomorrow,’ she said. Foolishly, she stretched out and squeezed his hand. He looked startled, and she dropped it immediately, as though it might burn her. ‘I guarantee, tomorrow.’

Part: 14

MONDAY,

AUGUST 15

Maggie IN THE Morning tide, MAGGIE WAS Aroused UP With yelling. Lily was calling her name, pounding up the stairs; then the door flew open, so hard it struck the wall.

Lily said, ‘The White Bengal’s are gone now.’ She was gasping hard, her face red and clammy with sweat. She smelled a little like manure-she must have been out feeding the creatures.

‘What?’ Instantly Maggie was awake and sitting up.

‘The gate is open, and they’re gone,’ Lily said.

‘Unthinkable...’ Maggie was already pulling on clothes, shoving her legs into shorts, wrestling on a T-shirt. She didn’t even bother with a bra. ‘Vain,’ she repeated, but even as she said it, a dull thud of terror began, bringing back images from last night, dismembered memories-hugging Nathaniel, latching the gates. Had she replaced the fastener device?

She couldn’t remember. Mindy Crammer had been talking to her about her job at Anne’s, and then she’d had to yell at Even Zen Seller for trying to get into the pigpen. She must have substituted the fastener.

The White Bengal's weren't missing. They were just hiding out in the trees somewhere, where Lily hadn't spotted them. Underneath, Maggie saw that it was already eleven a.m., that she'd overslept, that Anne would be home soon.

Lily understood her outside. It was another day of thick heat, but this time the sky was overcast, and there was moisture shimmering in the air like a screen. It would rain. She was halfway across the yard when she saw it: the fastener, coiled in the grass like a metal snake, exactly where she had placed it last night when she unlocked the gate for Natalie.

And the gate, now swinging open. The terror turned to stone and dropped straight through her stomach. There was no need to search for the whole enclosure. They were gone. She could manipulate this. Why hadn't the dog's bark? But they had, and she hadn't heard. Or they'd been frightened, bewitched like the crowd last night. Maggie closed her eyes. For a second, she thought she might faint. The White Bengal's were withdrawn, it was her fault, and now Anne would despise her and throw her out. She'd possess every right to. She opened her eyes, fueled by a wild Fear: she had to find them, now, quickly, before Anne came home.

'Stay here,' she told Lily, but she didn't have the force to argue when Lily followed her back into the house.

She hardly apprehended what she was doing. She found a bucket under the sink, dumped out a bunch of shriveled sponges and washing types of equipment, and filled it with some half-thawed steaks. Then she was out of the house again and plunging into the woods. Mayhap they hadn't gone far, and she could lure them back.

'Where are we going?' Lily asked. 'Sh-h-h,' Maggie said sharply. She considered the bite of tears in her eyes. How could she be such a nincompoop, such an absolute moron?

The bucket was heavy, and she had to pull it with both hands, considering from left to right, looking for a flash of color, those luminous black eyes. Come on, come on, come on. Behind Maggie, there was a rustling in the undergrowth, a shift in the air-a presence, animal, watchful. Suddenly it struck Maggie that what she was doing was thick-witted: charging off into the woods with Lily, searching for the White Bengal's like they were lost kittens, hoping to lure them home.

If she did find the white Bengal's, they'd tear her head off for a snack. A stimulating zip of fear went up to her spine. She was over conscious of every rustle, every snapping twig, the diamond patterns of light and shadow that could easily conceal a pair of eyes, a swath of tawny fur.

'Take my hand, Lily,' she said, trying to keep the fear out of her voice.

'Let's go back inside.'

'What about the white Bengal's?' Lily asked. She thought it was an adventure.

'We'll have to call Anne,' Maggie said, and instantly knew it was true. She still had the unmistakable sense of something Other watching her, watching them. 'She'll know what to do.' A raccoon punched its head swiftly from between the fat leaves of a spire-a bush, and Maggie felt a flood of relief that nearly made her pee. She abandoned the bucket in the woodlands. It was too cumbersome, and she wanted to move quickly.

As they were emerging from the woods just next to the outdoor shower, Maggie could hear tires spitting on the driveway and thought that Anne must be homeward. She didn't know whether to feel appreciative or afraid. She was both.

But then she saw the rusted hood of Joh- John's Le Sabre and remembered she'd promised him they could talk today.'

Joh- John! 'Lily was running to him before he had even fully extricated himself from the car. 'The white Bengal's are gone! The White Bengal's are gone!'

'What?' He looked even worse than he had the night ahead, as though he hadn't slept at all. He turned to Maggie. 'Is it correct?'

'It's true,' she said. 'I forgot to padlock the gates.' Suddenly, the truth hit her like a hard punch to the stomach, and she was crying. She'd get kicked out of Anne's house; they'd have to move back to 'Fresh Pines' or go on the run. Furthermore, Anne would be devastated. Anne, who was the only person who gave a sh*t about Maggie.

'Hey, hey.' Joh- John was next to her.

She didn't resist when he hugged her.

‘It’s not your responsibility. It’s going to be okay.’

‘It is my fault.’ She buried her face in the hollow of his joint and yelled until she coughed, while he rubbed her back and her hair, touched her lightly on her cheek, murmured into the top of her head. Only Joh- John could make her feel small. Only Joh- John could make her feel defended.

She didn’t even hear the entrance of Anne’s car until a door was slamming and Anne’s voice, frantic, called, ‘What’s the matter? What’s wrong?’

Maggie stepped away from Joh- John and quickly, Anne took her by the arms. ‘Are you okay? Are you hurt?’

‘It’s not me.’ Maggie swiped an arm across her nose. Her mouth was thick with the taste of phlegm, and she couldn’t look Anne in the eye. ‘I’m fine.’ She tried to say it. The White Bengal’s are gone. The White Bengal’s are gone. Lily was quiet, her mouth moving soundlessly. It was Joh- John who spoke. ‘The white Bengal’s got out,’ he said.

Nevaeh

Book: 20

Flashbacks

Chapter: 127

(Flashback text- video message.) ≈ Past remembers of Karly... ≈

Part: 1

Past memories

I get a new text message- and there a photo attached- and there it is Maggie, spared, showing off her new butt plug in her hole... making it push in and out as she squeezes down hard on it... it's pink! And oh, so sparkly she said! And she is playing with herself- also.

I love this video I have it...

It's on my pc now... with all the porn... and sh*t of here young sex ass!

Something they all new after I passed... I was... um... living a fake and gay life... take that any way you want too... it's all good for me now. Cute for she was born in 2000, and she calls me old for I was born in the late- 1990's... 1998- for a fact.

(Now)

My vision is cloudy. I can barely make out the banisters. I'm tripping, half falling down the stairs, finding the front door by touch. I think Hanna might be calling to me, but everything is lost to a roaring, rushing in my ears, inside my head. Sunshine, brilliant, brilliant white light-cool biting iron under my fingers, the gate-ocean smells, gasoline.

Wailing, growing louder. A punctuated shriek: beep, beep, beep.

My head clears all at once and I jump out of the middle of the street just before I'm squashed by a police car, which barrels past me, horn still blaring, siren whirling, leaving me coughing up dirt and dust. The ache in my throat gets so bad it feels like I'm gagging, and when I finally let the tears come it's a huge relief, like dropping something heavy after you've been carrying it for a long time. Once I start crying, I can't stop, and all the way home I have to keep mashing my palm into my eyes every few seconds, smearing away the tears just so

I can see where I'm going. I comfort myself by thinking that in less than two months this will seem like nothing to me.

All of it will fall away and I'll rise new and free, like a bird winging up into the air.

Part: 2

Lasting images

That's what Hanna doesn't understand, has never understood. For some of us, it's about more than the deliria. Some of us, the lucky ones, will get the chance to be reborn: newer, fresher, better. Healed and whole and perfect again, like a misshapen slab of iron that comes out of the fire glowing, glittering, razor-sharp.

That is all I want all I have ever wanted. That is the promise of the cure.

Lord-

Suspicious minds-

Keep our hearts fixed; as you fixed the planets in their orbits and cooled the chaos of emerging-

As the gravity of your will keeps star and star from Collapsing... Keeps ocean from turning to dust and dust from turning to water... Keeps planets from colliding... And suns from exploding-

So, Lord, keep our hearts fixed in the steady orbit and help them stay the path.

-Psalm 21 plays over in my mind...

That night, even after I'm in bed, Hana's words replay themselves endlessly in my head. You won't end up like her. You don't have it in you. She only said it to comfort me, I know it should be reassuring-but for some reason it isn't. For some reason, it makes me upset; there's a deep aching in my chest, as though something large and cold and sharp is lodged there.

Here's another thing Hana doesn't understand: Thinking about the disease, and worrying about it, and stressing about whether I've inherited some predisposition for it- that's all I have of my mom. The disease is what I know about her. It is the link...

Otherwise, I have nothing.

It's not that I don't have memories of her. I do lots of them, considering how young I was when she died. I remember that when there was fresh snow, she would send me outside to pack pans with handfuls of it. Once inside we would drizzle maple syrup into the snow-filled pans, watching it harden into amber candy almost instantly, all loops and fragile, sugared filigree, like edible lace. I remember how much she loved to sing to us as she bounced me in the water at the beach off Eastern Prom.

I didn't know how strange this was at the time. Other mothers teach their children to swim. Other mothers bounce their babies in the water and apply sunscreen to make sure their babies don't burn, and do all the things that a mother is supposed to do, as outlined in the book of hush-hush- But they don't sing.

I remember that she brought me trays of buttered toast when I was sick and kissed my bruises when I fell, and I remember once when she lifted me to my feet after I fell off my bike and began to rock me in her arms, a woman gasped and said to her, 'You should be ashamed of yourself,' and I didn't understand why which made me cry harder. After that, she comforted me only in private. In public, she would just frown and say,

'You're okay, Lena. Get up.'

We used to have dance parties too. My mother called them 'sock jams,' because we would roll up the carpets in the living room and put on our thickest socks and slip and slide along the wooden hallways.

Part: 3

Always on my mind

Even Rachel joined in, though she always claimed to be too old for baby games.

My mom would draw the curtains and wedge pillows under the front and back doors and turn up the music. We laughed so hard I always went to bed with a stomachache.

Eventually, I understood that on our sock-jam nights she would close the curtains to prevent us from being seen by passing patrols, that she'd stopped up the doors with pillows so that the neighbors would not report us for playing music and laughing too much, both potential warning signs of the deliria.

I understood that she used to tuck my father's military pin-a silver dagger he had inherited from his father, which she wore every day on a chain around her neck-beneath the collar of her shirt whenever we left the house, so no one would see it and become suspicious. I understood that all the happiest moments of my childhood were a lie.

They were wrong and unsafe and illegal.

They were freakish. My mother was freakish, and I'd probably inherited the freakishness from her.

For the first time, I wonder what she must have been feeling, thinking, the night she walked out to the cliffs and kept walking, feet pedaling the air. I wonder whether she was scared. I wonder whether she thought of me or Rachel... I wonder whether she was sorry for leaving us behind.

I start thinking about my father, too. I don't remember him at all, though I have some dim, ancient impression of two warm, rough hands and a large looming face floating above mine, I think that's just because my mother kept a framed portrait in her bedroom of my father and me. I was only a few months old and he was holding me, smiling, looking at the camera. But there's no way I'm remembering for real. I wasn't even a year old when he died.

Cancer...!

(Flashback)

Karly- Maggie just loves wearing my class ring, that has a 1950's look gold with a silver inlay, and the band swatter that I gave up for Jenny and the girls- Just to be popular- as you no band is not cool when you do something more than they can... that is red- white- and blue... yes, it has my name on it- yet they all think it was for she has nothing- ha it for the fact I love her. Little do they all know.

Part: 4

Media

Twitter: @Olivia- 'Showing her puss- puss- nice no? even I am not that slutty!' Ha- love her!!!! You can see all here puss pic on Instagram also... the boys love- for reals. That's what it's all about the boys and popularity- and who hooks up with whom... grade freak that... I want to be laid- not the grade. That is how I thought then.

(Now)

Girl boy girl in- bad- rubbing- licking- kissing sucking- his head.

The heat is horrible, thick, clotting on the walls. Kellie is rolled over on her back, arms and legs flung open on top of her comforter, breathing silently with her mouth gaping open. Hanna is fast asleep, murmuring soundlessly into her pillow. The whole room smells like a wet exhalation, skin and tongues and warm milk.

I ease out of bed, already dressed in black jeans and a T-shirt. I didn't even bother to change into my pajamas. I knew I would never be able to sleep tonight. And earlier in the evening, I'd come to a decision. I was sitting at the dinner table with Carol and Uncle William and Jenny and Grace, while everyone chewed and swallowed in silence, staring blankly at one another, feeling as though the air was weighing down on me, constricting my breath, like two fists squeezing tighter and tighter around a water balloon, when I realized something.

Hanna said I didn't have it in me, but she was wrong.

My heart is beating so loudly I can hear it, and I'm positive that everyone else will too-that it will make my aunt sit bolt upright in her bed, ready to catch me and accuse me of trying to sneak out.

Which is, of course, exactly what I am trying to do. I didn't even know a heart could beat so loudly, and it reminds me of an Edgar Allan Poe story we had to read in one of our social studies classes, about this guy who kills this other guy and then gives himself up to the police because he's convinced he can hear the dead guy's heart beating up from beneath his floorboards. It's supposed to be a story about guilt and the dangers of civil disobedience, but when I first read it I thought it seemed kind of lame and melodramatic. Now I get it, though. Poe must have snuck out a lot when he was young.

I ease open the bedroom door, holding my breath, praying it doesn't squeak. At one-point Jenny lets out a shout and my heart freezes. But then she rolls over, flinging one arm across her pillow, and I exhale slowly, realizing she's just fussing in her sleep.

The hall is dark. The room my aunt and uncle share- like is- dark too, and the only sound comes from the whispering of the trees outside and the low ticks and groans from the walls, the usual old house arthritic noises. I finally work up the courage to slip out into the hall and slide the bedroom door shut behind me. I go so slowly that it almost feels like I'm not moving at all, feeling my way by the bumps and ripples in the wallpaper over to the stairs, then sliding my hand inch by inch over the banister, walking on my very tiptoes. Even so, it seems like the house is fighting me like it's just screaming for me to be caught. Every step seems to creak, or shriek, or moan.

Part: 5

Socializing

Liv on- Instagram- 'You'll- like- be seeing a lot of here in the upcoming slid show! Cute but- OMG!'

I think Jenny to wide and sh*t, and raunchy slutty to show those... you- have seen here photos by now... what did you think... cute...??? Or am I cutest?

Snap-chat me for 1,000 tokens, and you have it for life!

Every single floorboard quivers and shudders under my feet, and I start mentally bargaining with the house: If I make it to the front door without waking up- mom, would- I swear to God I'll never slam another door. I'll never call you 'an old piece of turd' again, not even in my head, and I'll never curse the basement when it floods, and I will never, ever, ever kick the bedroom wall when I'm annoyed at Jenny.

Maybe the house hears me, because, miraculously, I do make it to the front door. I pause for a second longer, listening for the sounds of footsteps upstairs, whispered voices, anything- but other than my heart, which is still going strong and loud, it's silent.

Even the house seems to hesitate and take a breath, because the front door swings open with barely a whisper, and in the last second before I slip out into the night the rooms behind me are as dark and still as a grave.

Outside, I hesitate on the front stoop.

The fireworks stopped an hour ago- I heard the last stuttering explosions, like distant gunfire, just as I was getting ready for bed and now the streets are strangely silent and empty. It's a little after eleven o'clock. Some cursed must be lingering at the Eastern Prom.

Part: 6

Nocturnal

Everyone else is home by now. Not a single light is burning on the street. All the street lamps were disabled years ago, except in the richest parts of Pittsburgh, and they look to me like blinded eyes. Thank God, the moon is so bright.

I strain to detect the sounds of passing patrols or groups of regulators - I almost hope I do, because then I'll have to go back inside, to my bed, to safety, and already the panic is starting to drill through me again. But everything is perfectly still and quiet, almost like it's frozen. Everything rational, right, and good is screaming for me to turn around and go upstairs, but some stubborn inner center keeps me moving forward.

I go down the walk and unchain my bike from the gate.

My bike rattles a little bit, particularly when you first start pedaling, so I walk it some ways down the street. The wheels' tick reassuringly over the pavement.

I've never been out this late on my own in my life. I've never broken curfew. But alongside the fear-which is always there, of course, that constant crushing weight is a small, flickering feeling of excitement that works its way up and underneath the fear, pushing it back some. Like, it's okay, I'm all right, I can do this. I'm just a girl-an in-between girl, five-two, nothing special- but I can do this, and all the curfews and the patrols in the world aren't stopping me.

It's amazing how much comfort this thought gives me. It's amazing how it breaks up the fear, as a tiny candle lit in the middle of the night, lighting up the shapes of things, burning away the dark.

When I reach the end of my street I hop up on my bike, feeling the gears shudder into place. The breeze feels good as I start pedaling, careful not to go too quickly, staying alert in case there are regulators nearby. Fortunately, Stroud water and Roaring Brooke Farms are in the exact opposite direction from the Fourth of July celebrations at Eastern Prom.

Once- I get to the broad swath of farmland that surrounds Pittsburgh like a belt, I should be okay. The farms and slaughterhouses rarely get patrolled. But first I have to make it through the West End, where rich people like Hanna live, through the old town, and over the Fore River at Bridge Street.

Thankfully, each street I turn down is empty.

Stroud-water is a good thirty minutes away, even if I'm biking quickly. As I get off-peninsula- moving away from the buildings and businesses of downtown Pittsburgh and onto the more suburban mainland-the houses get smaller and farther apart, set back on weedy, patchy yards. This isn't rural Pittsburgh yet, but there are signs of the countryside creeping in: plants poking up through half-rotted porches, an owl hooting mournfully in the dark, a black scythe of bats cutting suddenly across the sky. Almost all these houses have cars in front of them just like the richer houses in, Northern End-but these have been salvaged from the junkyards.

They're mounted on cinder blocks and covered in rust. I pass one that has a tree growing straight through its sunroof, like the car has just dropped out of the sky and been impaled there, and another one, hood open, missing its engine. As I go past, a cat startles up out of its black cavity, meowing, blinking at me.

After I cross the Fore River the houses fall away altogether, and it's just field after field and farm after farm, with names like Meadow Lane and Sheep bay and oak's part by the river, which make them sound all homey and nice: places where someone might be baking muffins and skimming fresh cream for butter.

Across the fields I see the low, dark silhouettes of barns and silos, some of them brand-new, some of them barely standing, clinging to the earth like teeth Digging into something. The air smells slightly sweet, like growing things and manure.

But... but... but... but... um...

most of the farms are owned by big corporations, packed with livestock and often staffed by orphans.

I've always liked it out here, but it's kind of freaky in the dark, open and empty, and I can't help but think that if I did come across a patrol there would be no place to hide, no alley to turn down.

Roaring Brooke's Farms is right next to the southwestern border of the town. It's been abandoned for years since half the main building and both grain silos were destroyed in a fire.

About five minutes before I get there, I think I can make out a rhythm drumming almost imperceptibly under the throaty song of the crickets, but for a while, I'm not sure if I'm just imagining it or only hearing my heart, which has started pounding again.

Farther on, though, and I'm sure. Even before I reach the little dirt road that leads down to the barn-or at least, the portion of the barn that's still standing- strains of music spring up, crystallizing in the night air like rain turning suddenly to snow, drifting to earth.

Now I'm scared again. All I can think is wrong, wrong, wrong, a word that drums in my head. Mom would kill me if she knew what I was doing.

~*~

Kill-

me, or have me thrown into the Burial chamber or taken to the labs for an early procedure, willow and oak marks-style.

I hop off my bike when I see the turnoff to Roaring Brooke, and the big metal sign staked in the ground that reads PROPERTY OF Pittsburgh, NO TRESPASSING. I wheel my bike some little ways, into the woods at the side of the road. The actual farmhouse and the old barn are still five or six hundred feet down the road, but I don't want to bring my bike any farther. I don't lock it up, though. I don't even want to think about what would happen if there was a raid, but if there is, I'm not going to want to be fumbling with a lock in the half-dark. I'll need speed.

I step around the NO TRESPASSING sign.

I'm getting to be quite the expert at ignoring them, I realize, remembering how Hana and I hopped the gate at the labs. It's the first time I've thought about that afternoon in a while, and right then a vision of Alex rises in front of me, a memory of seeing him on the observation deck, head tilted back and laughing.

I have to focus on the land around me, the brightness of the moon, the wildflowers on the road. It helps me beat back the feeling that I'm going to be sick at any second. I don't know what compelled me out of the house, why I felt like I had to prove Hana wrong about something, and I'm trying to ignore the idea-way more disturbing than anything else-that my argument with Hana was just an excuse.

That may be, deep down, I was just curious.

Someone is singing: a beautiful voice as thick and heavy as warm honey, spilling up and down a scale so quickly I feel dizzy just listening.

That music was metallic and awful, fuzzy through the speakers. The music that's playing underneath the voice is strange and clashing and wild-but nothing like the wailing and scratching that I heard Hana playing on her computer earlier today, though I recognize certain similarities, certain patterns of melody and rhythm.

This music ebbs and flows, irregular, sad. It reminds me, weirdly, of watching the ocean during a bad storm, the lashing, crashing waves and the spray of sea foam against the docks; the way it takes your breath away, the power and the hugeness of it. I'm not feeling curious now. I'm feeling scared. And very, very stupid.

The farmhouse and the old barn are positioned in a dip of land between two hills, a mini valley, like the constructions, are sitting right in the middle of somebody's pursed lips. For the reason that of the way the land slopes I can't see the farmhouse yet, but as I get closer to the top of the hill the music gets clearer, louder. It's like nothing I've ever heard before. It's not like the authorized music you can download off LAM, prim and harmonious and structured, the kind of music that gets played in the bandshell in Deering Oaks Park during official summer concerts.

That's exactly what happens as I listen to the music, as I come up over the final crest of a hill, and the half-ruined barn and collapsing farmhouse fan out in front of me, just as the music swells, a wave about to break: The breath leaves my body all at once, and I'm struck dumb by the beauty of it. For a second it seems to me like I am looking down at the ocean-a sea of people, writing and dancing in the light spilling down from the barn-like shadows twisting up around a flame.

The barn is completely gutted: split open and blackened by the fire, exposed to the elements. Only half of it is left standing-fragments of three walls, a portion of the roof, part of an elevated platform that must once have been used to store hay. That's where the band is playing. Thin, stalky trees have begun pushing up in the fields. Older trees seared completely white from the fire and bald of branches and leaves, point-like ghostly fingers to the sky.

Fifty feet beyond the barn, I see the low fringe of blackness where the unregulated land begins. The Wilds. I can't make out the border fence from this distance, but I imagine I can feel it, can sense the electricity buzzing through the air. I've only been close to the border fence a few times. Once with my mother years ago, when she made me listen to the zipping of the electricity-a current so strong the air seems to hum with it; you can get a shock just from standing four feet away-and promise never, ever, ever to touch it.

She told me that when the cure was first made mandatory, some people tried to escape over the border. They never put more than a hand on the fence before being fried like bacon - I remember that's exactly what she said, like bacon.

Since then I've run alongside it with Hanna a few times, always careful to stay a good ten feet away.

In the barn, someone has set up speakers and amps and even two enormous, industrial-sized lamps, which make everyone close to the stage look starkly white and hyper-real, and everyone else dark and indistinct, blurry.

A song ends and the crowd roars together an ocean sound. I think, they must be mooching power from a grid on one of the other farms. I think, this is stupid, I'll never find Hana, there are too many people and then a new song starts, this one just as wild and beautiful, and it's like the music reaches across all that black space and pulls at something at the very heart and root of me, plucking me like a string. I head down the hill toward the barn. The weird thing is I don't choose to do it.

My feet just go on their own, as though they've happened on some invisible track and it's all just slide, photograph, print.

For a moment, I forget that I'm supposed to be looking for Hana. I feel as though I'm in a dream, where strange things are happening, but they don't feel strange. Everything is cloudy- everything is wrapped in a fog and I'm filled from head to toe with the single, burning desire to get closer to the music, to hear the music better, for the music to go on and on and on.

'Kellie! Oh my God, Kell!' Hearing my name snaps, me out of my daze, and I'm suddenly aware that I'm standing in a huge crush of people.

No. Not just people. Boys. And girls.

Uncured, all of them, without a hint of a blemish on their necks-at least the ones standing close enough for me to scope out. Boys and girls talking. Boys and girls laughing. Boys and girls sharing sips from the same cup. All of a sudden,

I think I might faint.

Hanna is barreling toward me, elbowing people out of the way, and before I can even open my mouth, she's jumping on top of me as she did at graduation, squeezing me in a hug. I'm so startled I stumble backward, nearly falling over.

'You're here.'

She pulls away and stares at me, keeping her hands on my shoulders. 'You're here.'

Another song ends, and the lead singer -a tiny girl with long black hair- calls out something about a break. As my brain slowly reboots, I have the dumbest thought: She's even shorter than I am, and she's singing in front of five hundred people.

Then I think, five hundred people, five hundred people, what am I doing here with five hundred people?

'I can't stay,' I say quickly. The moment the words are out of my mouth I feel relieved. Whatever I came here to prove has been proven; now I can go. I need to get out of this crowd, the babble of voices, a shifting wall of chests and shoulders all around me. I was too wrapped up in the music earlier to look around, but now I have the sensation of colors and perfumes and hands twisting and turning around us.

‘Lena,’ she says, ‘this is my friend Drew.’ I think she looks guilty for just a second, but then the smile is back on her face, as wide as ever like we’re standing in the middle of St. Paul’s talking about a bio quiz.

Hana opens her mouth- maybe to object-but at that second, we’re interrupted. A boy with dirty blond hair falling into his eyes pushes his way over to us, carrying two big plastic cups. The dirty-blond-hair boy passes a cup to Hana. She takes it, thanks to him, and then turns back to me.

~*~

I open my mouth, but no words come out, which is probably a good thing, considering that there’s a giant fire alarm going off in my head. It may sound stupid and naive, but not once when I was heading to the farms did, I even consider that the party would be coed. It didn’t even occur to me.

Breaking curfew is one thing; listening to unapproved music is even worse. But breaking segregation laws is one of the worst offenses there is. Thus, Willow Marks early procedure and the graffiti scrawled on her house; thus, the fact that Chelsea Brown was kicked out of school after allegedly being found breaking curfew with a boy from Spencer, and her parents were mysteriously fired, and her whole family was forced to vacate their house. And- at least in Chelsea case- there wasn’t even any proof. Just a rumor going around.

Drew gives me a half-wave. ‘Hey, Liv...’

My mouth opens and closes... Still no sound... For a second, we stand there in awkward silence. Then he extends a cup to me, a sudden, jerky gesture.

‘Whiskey...?’

‘Whiskey...?’ I squeak back... I’ve only had alcohol a few times... At Christmas, when mom pours me a quarter glass of wine, and once at Hana’s house when we stole some blackberry liqueur from her parents’ liquor cabinet and drank until the ceiling started spinning overhead.

Hanna was laughing and giggling, but I didn't like it, didn't like the sweet sick taste in my mouth or the way my thoughts seemed to break apart like a mist in the sun. Out of control- that's what it was, that's what I hated.

Drew shrugs. 'It's all they had.'

Vodka always goes first at these things.' At this things-as in, these things happen, as in, more than once.

'No.' I try to shove the cup back at him. 'Take it.'

He waves me away, obviously misunderstanding. 'It's cool. I'll just get another.'

Drew smiles quickly at Hanna before disappearing into the crowd. I like his smile, the way it rises crookedly toward his left ear- but as I realize I'm thinking about liking his smile, I feel the panic winging its way through me, beating through my blood, a lifetime of whispers and accusations.

Control. It's all about control.

'I have to go,' I manage to say to Hanna. Progress.

'Go?' She wrinkles her forehead up.

'You walk out here-'

'I biked.'

I pretend to shiver so she doesn't feel bad, wondering why it feels so awkward to talk to her. This is my best friend, the girl I've known since second grade, the girl who used to split her cookies with me at lunch, and once put her fist in Jillian Dawson's face after Jillian said my family was diseased.

'I'm tired,' I say. 'And I shouldn't be here.' I want to say, you shouldn't be here either, but I stop myself.

'Whatever, you bike out here and then you're just going to go?'

Hanna reaches for my hand, but I cross my arms quickly to avoid her. She looks momentarily hurt.

Part: 7

Gracelessness

‘Did you hear the band? They’re amazing, aren’t they?’ Hanna’s being way too nice, totally un-Hanna, and I feel a deep, sharp pain in my ribs. She’s trying to be polite. She’s acting like we’re strangers. She feels the awkwardness too.

‘I- I wasn’t listening.’ For some reason, I don’t want Hanna to know that yes, I heard, and yes, I thought they were amazing, better than amazing.

It’s too private- embarrassing even, something to be ashamed of, and even though I came to Roaring Brooke Farms, and broke curfew and everything, just to see her and apologize, the feeling- I had earlier today returns to me: I don’t know Hanna anymore, and she doesn’t know me.

I’m used to a feeling of double-ness, of thinking one thing and having to do another, a constant tug-of-war. But somehow Hanna has fallen cleanly away into the double half, the other world, the world of unmentionable thoughts and things and people.

Is it possible that all this time I’ve been living my life, studying for tests, taking long runs with Hana-and this other world has just existed, running alongside and underneath mine, alive, ready to sneak out of the shadows and the alleyways as soon as the sun goes down? Illegal parties, unapproved music, people touching one another with no fear of the disease, with no fear for themselves.

A world without fear. Impossible.

And even though I’m standing in the middle of the biggest crowd I’ve ever seen in my life; I suddenly feel very alone.

‘Stay,’ Hana says quietly. Even though it’s a command, there’s a hesitation in her voice, like she’s asking a question.

‘You can catch the second set.’

I shake my head. I wish I hadn't come.

I wish I hadn't seen this. I wish I didn't know what I know now, could wake up tomorrow and ride over to Hanna's house, could lie out at Eastern Prom with her and complain about how boring summers are like we always do.

I could believe that nothing had changed.

'I'm going to go,' I say, wishing my voice didn't come out shaky. 'It's all right, though. You can stay.'

The second I say it; I realize she never offered to come back with me. She's looking at me with the weirdest mixture of regret and pity.

'I can come back with you if you want,' she says, but I can tell she's only offering now to make me feel better. 'No, no. I'll be fine.' My cheeks are burning, and I take a step back, desperate to get out of there. I bump against someone-a boy who turns and smiles at me. I step quickly away from him.

'Lena, wait.' Hana goes to grab me again. Even though she already has a drink, I shove my cup in her free hand, so she has to pause, momentarily frowning as she tries to juggle both drinks into the crook of an elbow, and in that second, I dance backward out of her reach.

'I'll be fine, I promise. I'll talk to you tomorrow.' Then I'm slipping through a narrow space between two people- that's the only benefit of being five-two, you have a good vantage point on all the in-between spaces-and before I know it, Hana has dropped behind me, swallowed up by the crowd. I weave a path away from the barn, keeping my eyes down, hoping my cheeks cool off fast.

Images swirl by, a blur, making me feel like I'm dreaming again. Boy. Girl.

Boy/Girl. Laughing, shoving each other, touching each other's hair. I've never, not once in my whole life, felt so different and out of place. There's a high, mechanized shriek, and then the band starts playing again, but this time the music does nothing for me. I don't even pause. I just keep walking, heading for the hill, imagining the cool silence of the starlit fields, the familiar dark streets of Pittsburgh, the regular rhythm of the patrols, marching quietly in sync, the feedback from the regulators' walkie-talkies- regular, normal, familiar, mine.

Finally, the crowd starts thinning. It was hot, pressed up against so many people, and the breeze stings my skin, cools my cheeks. I've started to calm down a little, and at the edge of the crowd, I allow myself one look back at the stage. The barn, open to the sky and the night and glowing white with light, reminds me of a palm cupping a small bit of fire.

'Kellie!'

It's strange how I instantly recognize the voice even though I've heard it only once before, for ten minutes, fifteen tops -it's the laughter that runs underneath it, like someone leaning in to let you in on a really good secret in the middle of a boring class.

My vision does its camera- zooming in focus again, and all I see is Ray, shouldering his way out of the crowd toward me.

'Liv! Wait!'

A brief flash of terror zips through me -for a wild second, I think he must be here as part of a patrol, as a raiding group or something- but then I see he's dressed normally, in jeans and his scuffed-up sneakers with the ink-blue laces and a faded T-shirt. Everything freezes...

The blood stops flowing in my veins, my breath stops coming also. For a second even the music falls away and all I hear is something steady and quiet and pretty, like the distant beat of a drum, and I think, I'm hearing my heart, except I know that's impossible because my heart has stopped too.

'What are you doing here?' I stammer out as he catches up with me.

He grins at me- 'Nice to see you too.'

He has left a few feet of distance between us, and I'm glad. In the half-light, I can't make out the color of his eyes and I don't need to be distracted right now, don't need to feel the way I did at the labs when he leaned in to whisper to me- the total awareness of the bare inch that separated his mouth from my ear, terror and guilt and excitement all at once.

'I'm serious.' I do my best to scowl at him.

‘But you can’t...’ I’m struggling to find words, not quite sure how to say what I want to say. ‘But then again this is...’

‘Illegal...?’ He shrugs... His smile falters, though it doesn’t disappear entirely. He blows air out of his lips. ‘I came to hear the music,’ he says. ‘Like everybody else.’

One strand of hair curls down over his left eye, and when he turns to scan the party it catches the light from the stage and winks that crazy golden-brown color. ‘It’s okay,’ he says, quieter so that I have to lean forward to hear him over the music.

‘Nobody’s hurting anybody.’

You don’t know that I start to say, but the way his words are just edged with sadness stops me.

Part: 8

Snaps

Olivia tweets- Tell me how pretty it is, #p*ssy-pic.

Kiss me here Kellie...

Maybe he’s only regretful for the things he lost after the cure. Music doesn’t move people the same way, for example, and while he should have been cured of feelings of regret, too, the procedure works differently for everybody, and it isn’t always perfect. Ray runs a hand through his hair and I make out the small, dark, three-pronged scar behind his left ear, perfectly symmetrical.

That’s why my aunt and uncle sometimes still dream. That’s why my cousin Marcella used to find herself crying hysterically, with no warning or apparent cause.

‘So, what about you?’ He turns back to me and the smile is on again, and the teasing, winking quality of his voice.

‘What’s your excuse?’

‘I didn’t want to come,’ I say quickly.

‘I had to-’ I break off, realizing I’m not sure why I had to come. ‘I had to give something to someone,’ I say finally.

He raises his eyebrows, clearly unimpressed. I rush on, ‘To Hanna. My friend. You met her the other day.’

‘I remember,’ he says.

‘For standing me up.’ One corner of his mouth hitches higher, and again I have the feeling that he’s sharing some delicious secret with me, that he’s trying to tell me something. ‘You were a no-show at Back and Gold Cove that day.’

I’ve never seen anyone maintain a smile for so long. It’s like his face is naturally molded that way. ‘You haven’t said you’re sorry yet, by the way.’

‘For what?’ The crowd has continued to press closer to the stage, so Ray and I are no longer surrounded by people.

Occasionally, someone walks by, swinging a bottle of something or singing along, slightly off-key, but for the most part, we’re alone.

I feel a burst of triumph—he was waiting for me at Back and Gold Cove! He did want me to meet him! At the same time, the anxiety blooms inside of me. He wants something from me. I’m not sure what it is, but I can sense it, and it makes me afraid.

‘So?’ He folds his arms and rocks back on his heels, still smiling. ‘Are you going to apologize, or what?’

His easiness and self-assurance aggravate me; just like they did at the labs. It’s so unfair, so different from how I feel like I’m about to have a heart attack or melt into a puddle.

‘I don’t apologize to liars,’ I say, surprised by how steady my voice sounds.

He winces. ‘What’s that supposed to mean?’

‘Come on.’ I roll my eyes, feeling more and more confident by the second. ‘You lied about seeing me at evaluations. You lied about recognizing me.’ I’m ticking his lies off on my fingers. ‘You lied about even being inside the labs on Evaluation Day.’

‘Okay, okay.’

To keep the process ‘pure’ or something, I don’t know. But I needed a cup of coffee, and there’s this machine on the second floor of the C complex that has the good kind, with real milk and everything, so I used my code to get in. He holds up both hands.

‘I’m sorry, okay? Look, I’m the one who should apologize.’ He stares at me for a second and then sighs. ‘I told you, security isn’t allowed in the labs during evaluations. That’s it.

End of story.

And afterward, I had to lie about it. I could lose my job. And I only work at the stupid labs to subsidize my school -’ He trails off. For once he doesn’t look confident. He looks worried like he’s scared I might tell-on him.

‘So why where you on the observation deck?’ I press on... ‘Why where you are watching me?’

‘I didn’t even make it to the second floor,’ he says. He is staring at me closely, as though judging my reaction.

‘I came inside, and-and- I just heard this crazy noise. That rushing, roaring sound.

And something else, too. Screaming or something.’

I close my eyes briefly, recalling the feeling of the burning white lights, my impression of hearing the ocean pounding outside the labs, of hearing my mother scream across the distance of a decade. When I open them again, Ray is still watching me.

‘Anyway, I had no idea what was going on. I thought- I don’t know, it’s stupid but I thought maybe the labs were under attack or something. And then as I’m standing there, all of a sudden there’s, like, a hundred cows charging me.’ He shrugs. ‘There was a staircase to my left. I freaked out and booked it. Figured cows don’t climb stairs.’ A smile appears again, this time fleeting, tentative. ‘I ended up on the observation deck.’

A perfectly normal, reasonable explanation. I feel relieved, and less frightened of him now. At the same time, something is working under my chest, a dull feeling, a disappointment.

And some stubbornness, a part of me that still doubts him. I remember the way he looked on the observation deck, head tilted back, laughing; the way he winked at me. The way he looked amused, confident, happy. Unafraid. A world without fear-

‘So-o, you don’t know anything about how-how it happened?’ I can’t believe I’m being so bold. I ball up my fists and squeeze, hoping he doesn’t notice the sudden strangled sound of my voice.

‘The mix-up in the deliveries, you mean?’ He says it smoothly, without a pause or a break in his voice, and the last of my doubts vanish. Just like any cured, he doesn’t question the official story. ‘I wasn’t in charge of signing for deliveries that day. The guy who was- Sal-was fired. You’re supposed to check the cargo. I guess he skipped that step.’ He cocks his head to one side, spreads his hands. ‘Satisfied now?’

‘Satisfied,’ I say. But the pressure in my chest is still there. Even though earlier I was desperate to be out of the house, now I just wish I could blink and be home, sit up in bed, pushing the covers off of my legs, realizing that everything-the party, seeing Ray- was a dream.

‘So -?’ He tilts his head back toward the barn. The band is playing something loud and fast-paced. I don’t know why the music appealed to me before. It just seems like noise now-rushing noise. ‘Think we can get closer without getting trampled?’

I ignore the fact that he has just said ‘we,’ a word that for some reason sounds amazingly appealing when pronounced with his lilting, laughing accent. ‘Actually, I was just heading home.’ I realize I’m angry at him without knowing why-for not being what I thought he was, I guess, even though I should be grateful that he’s normal, and cured, and safe.

‘Heading home?’ he repeats disbelievingly. ‘You can’t go home.’ I’ve always been careful not to let myself give in to feelings of anger or irritation. I can’t afford to at Carol’s house. I owe her too much and besides, after the few tantrums I threw as a child, I hated the way she looked at me sideways for days, as though analyzing me, measuring me. I knew she was thinking, Just like her mother. But now I give in, let the anger surge. I’m sick of people acting like this world, this other world, is the normal one, while I’m the freak. It’s not fair: like all the rules have suddenly been changed and somebody forgot to tell me.

‘I can, and I am.’ I turn around and start heading up the hill, figuring he’ll leave me alone. To my surprise, he doesn’t.

‘Wait!’ He comes bounding up the hill after me.

‘What are you doing?’ I whirl around to face him again, surprised by how confident I sound, considering that my heart is rushing, tumbling.

Maybe this is the secret to talking to boys-maybe you just have to be angry all the time.

‘What do you mean?’ We’re both slightly out of breath from hoofing it up the hill, but he still manages a smile. ‘I just want to talk to you.’

‘You’re following me.’ I cross my arms, which helps me feel as though I’m closing off space between us. ‘You’re following me again.’ There it is... He starts backward, and I get a momentary, sick twinge of pleasure, that I’ve surprised him. ‘Again...?’ He repeats... I’m glad that for once, I’m not the one stuttering, or struggling to find words.

The words fly out: ‘I think it’s a little bit strange that I go pretty much my whole life without seeing you, and then all of a sudden I start seeing you everywhere.’ I hadn’t planned on saying this-it hadn’t struck me as strange-but the second the words are out of my mouth I realize they’re true.

I think he’s going to be angry, but to my surprise he tips his head back and laughs, long and loud, moonlight turning the curve of his cheeks and chin and nose silver. I’m so surprised by his reaction I just stand there, staring at him. Finally, he looks at me. Even though I still can’t make out his eyes-the moon draws everything starkly, highlighting it in bright, crystalline silver or leaving it in blackness- I have the impression of heat, and light, the same impression I had that day at the labs.

‘Maybe you just haven’t been paying attention,’ he says quietly, rocking forward slightly on his heels.

I take an unconscious, half-shuffling step backward. I find myself frightened by his closeness; by the fact that even though our bodies are separated by several inches I feel as though we’re touching.

‘What-what do you mean?’

‘I mean that you’re wrong.’ He pauses, watching me, and I struggle to keep my face composed, even though I can feel my left eye-straining and fluttering. Hopefully, in the darkness, he can’t tell. ‘We’ve seen each other plenty.’

Part: 9

Immature

‘I would remember if we’d met before.’

‘I didn’t say that we’d met.’ He doesn’t try to close the new distance between us and I’m grateful, at least, for that. He chews on the corner of a lip-a gesture that makes him look younger.

‘Let me ask you a question,’ he goes on.

‘How come you don’t run past the Governor anymore?’

Without meaning to I gasp a little.

‘How do you know about the Governor?’

‘I take classes at IUP,’ he says.

The University of Pittsburgh-I remembers now, the afternoon we walked up to see the ocean from the back of the lab complex, hearing bits of his conversation floating back to me on the wind. He did say he was a student. ‘I worked at the Grind last semester, in Monument Square. I used to see you all the time.’ My mouth opens and shuts. No words come out; my brain goes on lockdown whenever I need it the most.

Of course, I know the Grind; Hana and I used to run past it two, maybe three times a week, watching the college students float in and out like drifting snowflakes, blowing the steam from the top of their cups. The Grind looks out onto a small square, all cobblestone, called Monument Square: It marked the halfway point of one of the six-mile routes I used to do all the time.

In its center is a statue of a man, half-eroded from snow and weather and scrawled over with a few looping curls of graffiti. He is striding forward, one hand holding his hat on his head so that it looks like he is walking through a horrible storm or a headwind. His other fist is extended in front of him. It's obvious that he was, in the distant past, holding something- probably a torch- but at some point, that portion of the statue was broken or stolen. So now the Governor strides forward with an empty fist, a circular hole cut in his hand, a perfect hiding place for notes and secret stuff.

Hanna and I and she used to check his fist sometimes, to see if there was anything good inside. Nonetheless, there weren't just a few pieces of wadded-up chewing gum and some coins.

Part: 10

Infidelities

(Past- chatting)

I never got this by liv like to cummie- with little almost- no make on- or not fixed up- not like priddieeee- and sh*t- for she said, 'Like kar- if a boy wants to see me cummie- he- we have to love me like this... I am doing this at home in my room- like the way I want too. They'll look regardless.' Not me at all- in my thinking- but okay.

#- Hashtag: (Girlie talk'n)

(Now)

I don't know when Hana and I started calling him the Governor, or why. The wind and rain have rubbed the plaque at the base of the statue indecipherable. No one else calls him that. Everyone else just says, 'The statue at Monument Square.' Ray must have overheard us talking about the Governor one day.

Ray is still looking at me, waiting, and I realize, I never answered his question. ‘I have to switch my routes up,’ I say, I probably haven’t run past the Governor since March or April. ‘It gets boring.’ And then, because I can’t help it,

I squeak out, ‘You remember me?’

He laughs... ‘You were pretty hard to miss. You used to run around the statue and do this jumping, whooping thing.’ Heat creeps up my neck and cheeks. I must be going a deep red again, and I thank God for the fact that we’ve moved away from the stage lights. I completely forgot; I used to jump up and try to high-five the Governor as Hanna and I and she ran past, a way of psyching myself up for the run back to school.

Sometimes we would even scream out, ‘Halena!’ We must have looked completely crazy.

‘I don’t-’ I lick my lips, fumbling for an explanation that won’t sound ridiculous. ‘When you run you sometimes do weird things. Because of the endorphins and stuff. It’s kind of like a drug, you know? Messes with your brain.’

‘I liked it,’ he says. ‘You looked -’ He trails off for a moment. His face contracts slightly, a tiny shift I can barely make out in the dark, but in that second, he looks so still and sad it almost takes my breath away, like he’s a statue or a different person. I’m afraid he won’t finish his sentence, but then he says, ‘You looked happy.’

For a second, we just stand there in silence. Then, suddenly, Ray is back, easy and smiling again. ‘I left a note for you one time. In the Governor’s fist, you know?’

I left a note for you one time. It’s impossible, too crazy to think about, and I hear myself repeating, ‘You left a note for me?’

‘I’m pretty sure it said something stupid. Just hi, and a smiley face, and my name. But then you stopped coming.’ He shrugs. ‘It’s probably still there. The note, I mean. Probably just a bit of paper pulp by now.’

He left me a note. He left me a note. For me. The idea-the fact of it, the fact that he even noticed and thought about me for more than one second is huge and overwhelming, makes my legs go tingly and my hands feel numb.

And then I'm frightened. This is how it starts. Even if he is cured, even if he is the safe-the fact is, I'm not safe, and this is how it starts. Phase One: preoccupation; difficulty focusing; dry mouth; perspiration, sweaty palms; dizziness and disorientation. I feel a rushing blend of sickness and relief, a feeling like finding out that everyone knows your worst secret, has known all along. And the thing, the disease, is inside of me, ready at any moment to start working on my insides, to start poisoning me.

All this time mom was right, my teachers were right, my cousins were right. I'm just like my mother, after all.

'I have to go.' I start up the hill again, nearly sprinting now, but again he comes after me.

'Hey. Not so fast.' At the top of the hill, he reaches out and puts a hand on my wrist to stop me. His touch burns, and I jerk away quickly. 'Lena. Hold on a second.'

Even though I know I shouldn't, I stop.

It's the way he says my name: like music.

'You don't have to be worried, okay? You don't have to be scared.' His voice is twinkling again. 'I'm not flirting with you.' My mind is spinning blindly in a panic, and I realize I don't even know what flirting is. I just know about it from textbooks; I just know that it's bad. Is it possible to flirt without knowing you're flirting? Is he flirting? My left eye goes a full flutter.

'Relax,' he says, holding up both hands, a gesture like, don't be mad at me. 'I was kidding.' He turns just slightly to the left, watching me the whole time.

Part: 11

Like her stupid

Liv's- nip is hanging out- like her stupid!

Awkwardness sweeps through me.

Flirting. A dirty word. He thinks I think he's flirting. 'I'm not- I don't think you were- I would never think that you-' The words collide in my mouth, and now I know there's no amount of darkness that can cover the rush of red to my face.

He cocks his head to the side. 'Are you flirting with me, then?'

'What? No,' I splutter.

The moon lights up his three-pronged scar vividly: a perfect white triangle, a scar that makes you think of order and regularity. 'I'm safe, remember? I can't hurt you.'

He says it quietly, evenly, and I believe him. As well as yet my heart won't stop its frantic winging in my chest, spinning higher and higher, until I'm sure it's going to carry me off. I feel the way I do whenever I get to the top of the Hill and can see back down Legislature Street, with the whole of Pitt. lying behind me, the streets a shimmer of greens and grays-from a distance, both beautiful and unfamiliar-just before I spread my arms and let go, trip and skip and run down the hill, wind whipping in my face, not even trying to move, just letting gravity pull me.

Breathless; excited; waiting for the drop.

I suddenly realize how quiet it is.

The band has stopped playing, and the crowd has gone silent too. The only sound is the wind shushing over the grass. From where we are, fifty feet past the crest of the hill, the barn, and the party are invisible. I have a brief fantasy that we're the only two people out in the darkness that we are the only two people awake and alive in the city, in the world.

Then soft strands of music begin to weave themselves up in the air, gentle, sighing, so quiet at first, I confuse the sounds for the wind. This music is different from the music that was playing earlier-soft, and fragile, as though each note is spun glass, or silken thread, looping up and back into the night air.

Once again, I'm struck by how beautiful it is, as nothing- I've ever heard, and out of nowhere, I'm overwhelmed by the dual desire to laugh and cry.

‘This song is my favorite.’ A cloud skitters across the moon, and shadows dance over Ray's face. He's still staring at me, and I wish I knew what he was thinking. ‘Have you ever danced?’ ‘No,’ I say, a little too forcefully.

He laughs softly. ‘It's okay. I won't tell.’

Images of my mother: the softness of her hands as she spun me down the long-polished wood floors of our house, as though we were ice-skaters; the fluted quality of her voice as she sang along to the songs piping from the speakers, laughing. ‘My mother used to dance,’ I say. The words slip out, and I regret them almost instantly.

But then again, Ray doesn't question me or laugh.

He keeps watching me progressively. For a moment he seems on the edge of saying anything at all. But then he just holds out his hand to me across space, across the dark.

‘Would you like to?’ He says... His voice is hardly audible above the wind so low it's barely a whisper.

‘Would I like to what?’

Part: 12

Interrogations

Impersonal words from Liv-

MFC- Silly boy question: ‘So-o Liv- when did you become a smart ass...?’

She said back- ‘When I became smart and found out I had an ass!’

Kisses... (Do you want to suck on my candy cane?)

My heart is roaring, rushing in my ears, and though there are still several inches between his hand and mine, there's a zipping, humming energy that connects us, and from the heat flooding my body you would think we were pressed together, palm to palm, face to face.

‘Dance,’ he says, at the same time closing those last few inches and finding my hand and pulling me closer, and at that second the song hits a high note and I confuse the two impressions, of his hand and the soaring, the lifting of the music.

We dance...

Most things, even the greatest movements on earth, have their beginnings in something small. An earthquake that shatters a city might begin with a tremor, a tremble, a breath.

Music begins with a vibration. The flood that rushed into Pitt twenty years ago after nearly two months of straight rain, that hurtled up beyond the labs and damaged more than a thousand houses, swept up tires and trash bags and old, smelly shoes and floated them through the streets like prizes, that left a thin film of green mold behind, a stench of rotting and decay that didn’t go away for months, began with a trickle of water, no wider than a finger, lapping up onto the docks. And God created the whole universe from an atom no bigger than thought.

Grace’s life fell apart because of a single word: sympathizer. My world exploded because of a different word: suicide.

Correction: That was the first time my world exploded.

The second time my world exploded, it was also because of a word. A word that worked its way out of my throat and danced onto and out of my lips before I could think about it, or stop it.

The question was: Will you meet me tomorrow?

And the word was: Yes.

Part: 13

Ecstasy

Karly- periods of euphoria; hysterical laughter and heightened energy periods of despair; lethargy changes in appetite; rapid weight loss or weight gain fixation; loss of other interests compromised reasoning skills; distortion of reality disruption of sleep patterns; insomnia or constant fatigue obsessive thoughts and actions paranoia; insecurity difficulty breathing pain in the chest, throat, or stomach difficulty swallowing; refusal to eat complete breakdown of rational faculties; erratic behavior; violent thoughts and fantasies; hallucinations and delusions emotional or physical paralysis (partial or total)

Death-

If you fear that you or someone you know may have contracted deliria, please call the emergency line toll-free at 1-800PRECLUDE to discuss immediate intake and treatment.

I would never have understood how Hana could lie so often and so easily. But just like anything else, lying becomes easier the more you do it. This is why, when I get home from work the next day and Carol asks me whether I don't mind having hot dogs for the fourth straight night in a row... (The result of a shipment surplus at the Save a lot; we once went a whole two weeks having baked beans every day.)

I say that actually, Kellie from St. Paul's invited me, and some other girls over for dinner. I don't even have to think about it. The lie just comes. Besides even though, I still feel sweat pricking up under my palms, my voice stays calm, and I'm pretty sure my face keeps its normal color because Carol just gives me one of her flitting smiles and says that that sounds nice. At six-thirty I get on my bike and head to North End Beach, where Ray and I plus she agreed to meet.

There are plenty of beaches in Pitt. North End Beach is probably one of the least popular-which, of course, made it one of my mother's favorites. The current is stronger there than it is at Moon Shoreline or Sunset Park. I'm not exactly sure why. I don't mind. I've always been a strong swimmer. After that first time when my mother released her arms from around my waist and I felt both the surging panic and the thrill, the enthusiasm- I learned pretty quickly, and by four I was paddling out by myself past the breaks.

There are other reasons why most people avoid North End Coastline, even though it's only a short walk down the hill from Eastern Prom, one of the most popular parks. The beach is nothing more than a short strip of rocky, gravel flecked sand. It backs up against the far side of the lab complex, where the storage and waste sheds are, which doesn't make for particularly pretty scenery. And when you swim out at East End riverside you get a clear view of Yellow Bridge and the wedge of unregulated land between Pittsburgh and Yarmouth... A lot of people don't like being so close to the Wilds. It makes them nervous. It makes me nervous too, except that there's a part of me-a a tiny, a little flick of a part-that likes it. For a while, after my mom died, I used to have these fantasies that she wasn't dead, really, and that my father wasn't dead either- that they had run away to the Wilds to be together.

Part: 14

Unrealities

He had gone five years before her, to prepare everything, to build a little house with a woodstove and furniture hewed from tree branches. At some point, I imagined, they would come back and get me. I even imagined my room down to the smallest detail: a dark red carpet, a little red and green patchwork quilt, a red chair.

I had the fantasy only a few times before I realized how wrong it was. If my parents had escaped to the Wilds it would make them sympathizers, resisters. It was better than they were dead. Besides, I learned pretty quickly that my fantasies about the Wilds were just that-make-believe, little kiddie stuff.

She says that's why the government doesn't bother doing anything about them, doesn't even acknowledge their survival.

They'll die out soon enough, all of them, freeze or starve or just let the disease run its course, turn them against each other, have them raging and belligerent and clawing one another's eyes out.

The Invalids have nothing, no way of trading or getting red patchwork quilts or chairs, or anything else for that matter. She said as far as we know that's already transpired- she said the backwoods might be empty now, dark and dead, full of only the rustle and whispers of animals.

Hanna once told me that they must live like animals, filthy, hungry, desperate.

She's probably right about the other stuff-about the Invalids living like animals-but she's wrong about that. They're alive, and out there, and they don't want us to forget it. That's why they stage the demonstrations.

That's why they let the cows loose in the labs. I'm not jumpy until I get to East End Beach. Even though the sun is sinking behind me, it lights the water white and makes everything sparkle. I shield my eyes from the glare and spot Ray down by the water, a long black brushstroke against all that blue. I flashback to last night, to the fingers of one of his hands just hard-pressed against my lower back, so lightly it was like I was only dreaming them-the other hand cupping mine, dry and encouraging as a piece of wood warmed by the sun.

We danced, too, the kind of dancing that people do at their wedding after the pairing has been formalized, but better somehow, looser and less abnormal.

He has his back toward me, facing the ocean, and I'm glad. I feel self-conscious as I-trudge down the wobbly, salt-warped stairs that lead from the parking lot to the beach, pausing to unlace and kick off my sneakers, which I carry in one hand.

The sand is warm on my bare feet as I set off toward him.

An old man is coming up from the water, carrying a fishing pole. He shoots me a suspicious glance, then turns to stare at Ray, then looks at me again and frowns. I open my mouth to say, 'He's cured,' but the man just grunts at me as he walks past, and I can't imagine he'd bother to call the regulators, so I don't say anything.

Not that we'd get in trouble distress if we were caught- that's what Ray meant when he said, 'I'm safe'-but I don't want to answer a lot of questions and have my ID number run through SVS and all of that. Besides, if the regulators did haul ass out to North End Coastline to check out 'suspicious behavior,' only to discover it was some cured taking pity on a seventeen-year-old nobody, they'd be annoyed-and guaranteed to take it out on someone. Taking pity. I push the words out of my mind quickly, surprised by how difficult it is to even think them.

All-day I tried not to worry about why on earth Ray would be so nice to me. I even imagined-for one brief, stupid second -that maybe after my evaluation I'd get matched with him. I had to shunt that thought aside too.

~*~

Night-

Freak me with her I said,' I said, giving him approval, taking him into my flesh, a soft offer to lunacy. My knees were weak, but he held me with one hand, managerial me with the motion of his hips. I was entirely his to do what he wanted, and he knew it and I was going to give it more than her. I no longer believed in the idea of soul mates, or love at first sight. But then again, I was commencement to believe that a very few times in your life, if you were lucky, you might meet a celebrity who was exactly right for you.

Not because he was perfect, or because you were, but because your combined flaws were arranged in a way that allowed two separate beings to hinge together. Done- I feel- I think you still love me, but we can't escape the fact that I'm not enough for you. I knew this was going to happen.

So-o I'm not accusing you of falling in love with another girl. I'm not angry, either. I should be, but I'm not.

I just feel pain... a- lot of pain. I thought I could envision how much this would hurt, but I was wrong so wrong, what I the one that was wrong or you? I will love you always. When this red hair is white, I will still love you.

When the smooth softness of youth is replaced by the delicate softness of age, I will still want to touch your skin. When your face is full of the lines of every smile you have ever smiled, of every surprise I have seen flash through your eyes when every tear you have ever cried has left its mark upon your face, I will treasure you all the more, because I was there to see it all. I will share your life with you, HANNA not KELLIE, and I will love you until the last breath leaves your body or mine.

My story ended that day- she started.

I was done with the three-way cheating.

~*~

Part: 15

Semi-kaput

He never really loved me or her or anybody- when we're half-finished, we're always searching for somebody to complete us.

When, after a few years or a few months of an association, we find that we're still exasperated, we blame our partners and take up with somebody more promising. This can go on and on- series two-timing- pending we acknowledge that while a partner can add sweet magnitudes to our lives, we, each of us, are responsible for our fulfillment.

An insignificant person can offer it to us, and to have faith in or else delude ourselves treacherously and to database for eventual failure every relationship we enter... it was just sex- no love.

That why I ended it- or did I?

Or did he just want her?

Ernest Hemingway said- 'The most painful thing is losing yourself in the process of loving someone too much and forgetting that you are special too.'

So right on- right? Every couple needs to argue now and then. Just to prove that the relationship is strong enough to survive. Long-term relationships, the ones that matter, are all about weathering the peaks and the valleys. Well I come back I don't know, should I stay, or should I go what do you think I well and should I do?

I smart than her- and her and she too so I think you know what I'll do.

Ray has already received his printed sheet, his recommended matches-he would have gotten it even before his cure, directly after the evaluations. He's not married yet because he's still in school, end of the story. But he will be, as soon as he finishes.

~*~

It was just a fight- but it's me or her... I think he loves me only. We waste time looking for the perfect lover, instead of creating the perfect love. So, I will stay and take the freaking in the ass- like always.

Love- with him is better than none in high school- no?

Love is the answer, but while you are waiting for the answer, sex raises someone's loser feelings...

I went there for a week with the breakup- so yeah you would do me too.

No hug back just the night time buddy- like before I a teen girl- I going to do this is I am not that girl.

I caught myself thinking about falling in love with someone whom I hoped was out there right now unthinking about the possibility of me, but I quickly expatriate the notion. It was that kind of thinking that landed me in this situation, to begin with. Hope can ruin you. And it's not him any longer.

Do you see why?

Part: 16

Panties

Photo of me saying 'MFC girl with my green and white panties'- showing the text that said: 'SEE ME P*SSY!' ≈ Past remembers of Karly ≈

Kellie age 10- I am coming so hard! Like- um- ah-hh-ah- using my hair pink bush with my name on it, you do need one like this for this, mom and dad do get it- and it's on my dresser. I not for my hair anymore, on my back and my knees up and down in and out I go, squirting and thick stuff too. Mum- yah!

You see me soloing for your baby.

My sis did this on cam, so she didn't have to work at some fry- hole only making $2.00 an hour, when playing with her hole she made- sh*t loads- I do it for me... like this.

And so, can you, like- it's safe. If I want, I can take cell vids- and give to my boyfriends... just say. That's up to you but, they love it.

Maybe where gay so we did have to bang a boy three times a day yet still be the popular girls. Bi girls yes- you can call us that. that high school finding yourself and feeling out others.

Of course, then I started wondering about the kind of girl he's been matched with- someone like Hanna, I decided, with bright blond hair and an irritating ability to make even pulling her hair into a ponytail look graceful, like a choreographed dance.

There are four other people on the beach: a mother and a child, one hundred feet away, the mother sitting in a faded fabric folding chair, staring blankly toward the horizon, while the child- who is probably no more than three- toddles in the waves, gets knocked over, lets out a shriek (of pain? pleasure?) and struggles back to her feet. 'Any fool can know. The point is to understand.'

Okay is it okay not to get it in high school then?

For I don't yet I have too.

'Hi,' he says. 'I'm glad you came.'

I feel shy again, stupid holding my ratty shoes in one hand. I can feel my cheeks getting hot, so I look down, drop my shoes, turn them over once in the sand with my toe. 'I said I would, didn't I?'

I don't mean for the words to come out so harshly and I wince, psychologically cursing myself. It's like there's a filter set up in my brain, except instead of making things better, it twists everything around so what comes out of my mouth is wrong, totally different from what, I was thinking.

~*~

Further, then them, a couple is walking, a man and a woman, not touching. They must be married. Both have their hands clasped in front of them, and both look straight ahead, not talking and not smiling, either, but calm, as though they are each surrounded by an invisible protective bubble.

Then I'm coming up behind Ray and he turns and sees me, smiles. The sun catches his hair, turns it momentarily white. Then it smolders back to its normal golden-brown color.

Thankfully, Ray laughs. 'I just meant that you stood me up last time,' he says.

He nods toward the sand. 'Sit?'

‘Sure,’ I say, relieved. I feel much less awkward once we’re both settled in the sand. There’s less chance of falling over or doing something dumb. I draw my legs up to my chest, resting my chin on my knees. Ray leaves a good two or three feet of space between us.

We sit in silence for a few minutes. At first, I’m searching for something to say. Every beat of silence seems to stretch into infinity, and I’m pretty sure Ray must think I’m a mute.

But then he flicks a half-buried seashell out of the sand and hurls it into the ocean, and I realize he’s not uncomfortable at all.

I went back to be the loser girl- then freaking an asshole- I AM DONE!

Looser that is me... hope your happy Ray- you did this to me in the halls.

Nevaeh

Book: 21

Butterfly Kisses

Interval

Chapter: 128

Olivia- story’s

Part: 1

Some photos of Neveah growing up... look through them... ≈ Past remembers ≈

They say you fall in love only once but every time, I see her I fall in love with her all over again and again. He said to me and I feel too that like any girl, even if I was not sure, about boys. Randy Zeirud after that I relax.

I’m even glad for the silence.

Sometimes, I feel like if you just watch things, just sit still and let the world exist in front of you-sometimes I swear that just for a second-time freeze and the world pauses in its tilt. Just for a second. In addition to if you somehow found a way to live in that second, then you would live forever.

I do the unthinkable and start dating a boy- going out,' I say.

Younger than me lovely, but not cool.

Throwing yet another seashell in a high arc movement, and it just hits the disruption.

~*~

We have to countenance ourselves to be treasured by the individuals who love us, the people who matter. Too much of the time, we are blinded by our chases of people to love us, individuals that don't even matter, while all that time we waste and the general public who do darling us have to stand on the footway and watch us beg in the streets! It's time to put an end to this. It's time for us to let ourselves be prized.

~*~

'I know.' The ocean is leaving a litter of pulpy green seaweed, twigs, and scrabbling hermit crabs in its wake, and the air smells tangy with salt and fish. A seagull pecks its way across the beach, blinking, leaving tiny thatched claw prints. 'My mom used to bring me here when I was little. We'd walk out a little bit at low tide-as far as you can go, anyway. Crazy stuff gets stranded on the sand-horseshoe crabs and giant clams and sea anemone. Just gets left behind when the water goes out. She taught me to swim here too.' I'm not sure why the words bubble out of me then, why I have the sudden urge to talk.

'My sister used to stay on the shore and build sandcastles, and we would pretend that they were real cities like we'd swum to the other side of the world, to the uncured places. Except in our games, they weren't diseased at all, or destroyed, or horrible. They were beautiful and peaceful, and built of glass and light and things.'

Randy stays silent, tracing shapes in the sand with a finger. But I can tell he's listening.

The words tumble on: 'I remember my mom would bounce me in the water on her hip. And then one time she just let me go. I mean, not for real -real. I had those little inflatable thingies on my arms. But I was so scared I started bawling my head off. I was only a few years old, but I remember it, I swear I do.

I was so relieved when she scooped me back up. But-but disappointed, too. Like I'd lost the chance at something great, you know?'

'So, what happened?' Randy tips his head to look at me. 'You don't come here anymore? Your mom loses her taste for the ocean?' I look away, toward the horizon. The bay is relatively calm today. Flat, all shades of blue and purple as it draws away from the beach with a low sucking sound. Harmless. 'She died,' I say, surprised by how difficult it is to say.

He is quite next to me and I rush on,

'She killed herself. When I was six.'

'I'm sorry,' he says, so low and quiet

I almost miss it.

'My dad died when I was eight months old. I don't remember him at all. I think -I think it kind of broke her, you know?

My mom, I mean. She wasn't cured. It didn't work. I don't know why. She had the procedure three separate times, but it didn't - it didn't fix her.' I pause, sucking in a breath, afraid to look at him, who is as still and soundless next to me like a statue, like a carved piece of shadow. Still, I can't stop speaking.

I realize, strangely, that I've never told the story of my mother before. I've never had to. Everyone around me, everyone in the school, all my neighbors and my aunts' friends-they all knew about my family already, and my family's disgraceful secrets. That's why they always looked at me pityingly, from the corner of their eyes.

That's why for years I rode a wave of whispering into every room, was slapped with sudden silence when I entered-silence and guilty, startled faces.

Even I knew before she and me were desk partners in second grade.

I remember because she found me in the bathroom stall, crying into a piece of paper towel, stuffing my mouth with it so no one would hear, and she kicked the door right open with a foot and stood there staring. Is it because of your mom? she said the first words she ever spoke to me.

‘I didn’t know there was something wrong with her. I didn’t know she was sick. I was too young to understand.’ I keep my eyes focused on the horizon, a solid thin line, taut as a tightrope. The bay edges farther from us, and as always- I have the same fantasy I did as a child: that maybe it won’t come back, maybe the whole ocean will disappear forever, drawn back across the surface of the earth like lips retracting over teeth, revealing the cool, white hardness underneath, the bleached bone. ‘If I had known, maybe I could have-’

At the last second my voice falters and I can’t say any more, can’t finish the sentence. Maybe I could have stopped it. It’s a sentence I’ve never spoken before, never even allowed myself to think. But the idea is there, looming up solid and unavoidable, a sheer rock face: I could have stopped it. I should have stopped it.

We sit in silence. At some point during my story, the mother and child must have packed up and gone home; Alex and I are all alone on the beach. Now that the words aren’t bubbling, rushing out of me, I can’t believe how much I’ve shared with a next- to- perfect stranger- and a boy, no less. I’m suddenly, itching, squirming- embarrassed. I’m desperate for something else to say- something harmless, about the tide or the weather but, as usual, my mind goes blank now that I need it to function. I’m afraid to look at her now my old lover.

When I finally work up the courage to shoot him a tiny sidelong glance, he’s sitting, staring out at the bay. His face is completely unreadable except for a tiny muscle, which flutters in and out at the base of his jaw. My heart sinks... just like I feared- he's ashamed of me now, disgusted by my family’s history, by the disease that runs in my blood. At any second, he’ll stand up and tell me it’s better if he doesn’t speak to me anymore.

It’s weird... I don’t even really know...

Her or him, and there’s an impassable divide between us, but the idea upsets me anyway.

I'm two seconds away from jumping up and running away, just so I won't have to nod and pretend to understand when he turns to me and says, Listen, Lena. I'm sorry, but - and gives me that all-too-familiar look.

(Last year there was a rabid dog loose on the Hill, biting and snapping at everyone, frothing at the mouth. It was half-starved, mangy, he- and like her missing one leg, but still it took two cops to shoot it down. A crowd gathered to watch, and I was there. I stopped on the way back from my run. For the first time in my life, I understood the look that people had been giving me forever, the same curl of the lip whenever they hear the name Maddie, yes-but disgust, also, and fear of contamination. It was the same way they were looking at the dog while he circled and snapped and spit, and then a mass exhalation of relief when the third bullet finally took him down and he stopped twitching.)

Just when I think I can't take it anymore; he reaches over and barely skims my elbow with one finger.

'I'll race you,' he says, standing up and beating the sand off his shorts. He spreads a hand out to me and helps me up, a smile flickering back on his face.

I'm endlessly grateful to him in that second. He's not going to hold my family's past against me. He doesn't think I'm dirty or damaged. He pulls me to my feet, and I think he squeezes my hand once I'm standing, a quick pulse, and I'm startled and happy, thinking of my secret sign with Hanna.

'Only if you've got a thing for total humiliation,' I say...

He raises his eyebrows... 'So-o, you think you can beat me?'

'I don't think, I know...'

'We'll see about that.' she cocks his head to the side. 'First one to the buoys, then?'

That throws me. The tide doesn't go out too far in the bay; the buoys are still floating on at least four feet of water.

'You want to race into the bay?' 'Scared?' He asks, grinning.

‘I’m not scared, I’m just-’ ‘Good.’ He reaches out and brushes my shoulder with two fingers. ‘Then how about a little less conversation, and a little more-Go!’ He screams out the last word and takes off at full speed. It takes me two whole seconds to launch myself after him, and I’m calling out, ‘No fair! I wasn’t ready!’ and both of us are laughing as we splash through the shallows in our clothes, the little ripples, and dips of the ocean floor now exposed by the tide’s retreat. Shells crunch under my feet.

I get my toe caught in a tangle of red and purple seaweed and nearly do a face plant.

I push myself off the wet sand with a palm and get my balance again, have almost caught up to Randy, when he drops down in a way- and scoops up a handful of wet sand, whirling around to peg me with it.

I shriek and duck out of the way, but a bit of it still catches me on the cheek, dribbling down my neck.

‘You are such a cheater!’ I manage to gasp, out of breath from running and laughing.

‘You can’t cheat if there are no rules,’ Alex shoots back over his shoulder.

‘No rules, hum?’ We’re wallowing shin-deep now and I start palming water at him, making a splatter pattern over his back and shoulders. He turns around, sweeping his arm across the surface of the water, a glittering arc. I twist to avoid it and end up slipping and falling elbow deep, soaking my shorts and the bottom half of my T-shirt, the impulsive cold making me gasp. He’s still slogging forward, his head craned back, his smile dazzling, his laugh rolling off and away so loud I imagine it dipping past Great Diamond Island and over the horizon, reaching to other parts of the world. I scramble up and haul after him.

The buoys are bobbing twenty feet ahead of us and the water is at my knees, and then my thighs, and then to my waist, until both of us are half running and half swimming, frantically paddling forward with our arms. I can’t breathe or think or do anything but laugh and splash and focus on the bright red bobbing buoys, focus on winning, winning, I have to win, and when we’re only a few feet away and he’s still in the lead and my shoes are leaden and filled with water, my clothes dragging me down like my pockets have been weighted with stones, without thinking I leap forward and tackle him, wrestling down into the water, feeling my foot connect with his thigh as I rocket off of him and reach out to slap the nearest buoy, the plastic shooting away from my hand when, I hit it. We must be a quarter-mile off the beach, but the tide's still going out, so I can stand, the water hitting me in my chest.

Part: 2

He reached for her hand. She jerked her head up, eyes wide. 'Stay,' he repeated. 'I could use the company.' She hesitated. A rueful smile pulled at his lips. 'I promise I won't try to kiss you again... tonight. I raise my arms triumphantly as Ray comes up spluttering water, shaking his head so water pinwheels from his hair.

~*~

'Don't stop, please,' You're so fucking beautiful when you come on me,' he said, cupping her face, nuzzling her mouth.

Kissing him longer, unwilling to let him go.

This is what I want; this is what I've wanted since his damn phone interrupted us this morning, his mouth, his body claiming mine. 'Now turn around and bend over. I need to ride you.' His forehead pressed to mine as we gasp together, the cold air barely cooling the heat raging between us. Tate opened her eyes, and let out a wobbly giggle. 'Bend over the bed? It goes in and out of me, and it drips on my back his gift to me. After being on my feet the whole night? I don't think so, buddy.

Now,' he said- as he lifted her left my leg and spared, we wide open showing my slight, hooked his elbow under her knee, and entered her- I'm on fire, every muscle in my body attuned to his, my groin clenching with delicious need. When the voices grow louder his hold loosens.

I beg into his mouth.

Diving into me once more his tongue slays me, erases every thought of the outside world until the passion has left us breathless and we have to break away if only to live. He opens up wide and I squirt, it in... and he loves me for it so hard and fast after, the- comes and comes again.

Maddie- I missed talking to you, and playing with you, and touching you, and seeing you smile. I missed just ... sitting next to you. I've never missed anyone or anything that much.

Yet- I am fucking him hard now with her in my mind doing the same. I still love her, yet not move him.

~*~

(Things we did)

'I won,' I pant- it out.

'You cheated,' he says, pushing forward a few more steps and collapsing with both arms behind him, looped over the rope stringing along the buoys. He arches his back, so his face is tilted up toward the sky. His T-shirt is completely soaked, and water beads off his eyelashes trickle down his cheeks.

'No rules,' I say, 'so no cheating.'

He turns to me, grinning. 'I let you win, then.'

'Yeah, right.'

I splash him a little and he holds up his hands, surrendering.

'You're just a sore loser.'

'I don't have much practice at it.'

There's that confidence again, that semi infuriating easiness of his, the tilt of his head and the smile. But today it's not infuriating. Today I like it, feel like it's somehow rubbing off on me like if I was around him enough, I would never feel awkward or frightened or insecure.

'Whatever.'

I roll my eyes and hook one arm over the buoys next to him, enjoying the feel of the currents swishing around my chest, enjoying the strangeness of being in the bay with my clothes on, the stickiness of my T-shirt and the sucking of my shoes on my feet. Soon the tide will turn, and the water will come in again. Then it will be a slow, exhausting swim back to the beach.

Even if a girl is gay- like I was she still might just love a boy too, it was all for a boy breaking her heart that she turns that ways and turned away.

Part: 3

On the other hand, I don't care. I don't care about anything-I'm not worried about how in a million years I'll explain to Liz why I've come home soaking wet, with seaweed clinging to my back and the smell of salt in my hair, not worried about how long I have until curfew or why Randy is even being nice to me. I'm just happy, a pure, bubbly feeling.

Beyond the buoys the bay is dark purple, the waves brushed over with whitecaps.

It is illegal to go beyond the buoys- beyond the buoys are the islands and the lookout points, and beyond them is open ocean, the ocean that leads to unregulated places, places of disease and fear-but for that moment- I fantasize about ducking underneath the rope and swimming out.

To our left, we can see the bright white silhouette of the lab complex and beyond it, distantly, Old Haven, all the docks like gigantic wooden centipedes. To our right is covered bridge, and the long string of guard huts that runs its length and continues up along the border catches me looking.

'Pretty, isn't it?' he says.

The bridge is mottled gray-green, all coated in backslash and algae, and it looks like it's leaning slightly into the wind. I wrinkle my nose. 'It looks kind of like it's rotting, doesn't it?

Part: 4

My sister always said that someday it would fall into the ocean, just topple right over.' Randy laughs. 'I wasn't talking about the bridge.' He tilts his chin just slightly, gesturing. 'I meant past the bridge.' He pauses for just a fraction of a second. 'I meant the Wilds.'

Beyond the bridge is the northern border, located along the far side of Black and Gold Cove. As we're standing there the lights in the guard huts click on, one after another, shining out against the deepening blue sky- a sign that it's getting late and I should be going home soon. Still,

I can't force myself to leave, even as I feel the water around my chest start to bubble and eddy, the tide turning.

Beyond the bridge, the lush greens of the Wilds move together in the wind like an endlessly re-arranging wall, a thick wedge of green cutting down toward the bay and separating Pitt.

From here we can just make out the barest section of it, an empty place marked with no lights, no boats, no buildings: impenetrable and strange and black. But I know that the wildernesses extend back, go on for miles and miles and miles all through the mainland, all across the country, like a monster reaching its tentacles around the civilized parts of the world.

Maybe it was the race or beating him to the buoys, or the fact that he didn't criticize me or my family when I told him about my mother, but at that moment the giddiness and happiness are still flowing strong and I feel like I could tell Randy anything, ask him anything. So, I say, 'Can I tell you a secret?' I don't wait for him to answer; I don't have to and knowing that makes me feel dizzy and careless. 'I used to think about it a lot. The Wilds, I mean, and what they were like - and the Invalids, whether they existed.' Out of the corner of my eye, I think I see him flinch slightly, so I press on, 'I used to sometimes think - I used to pretend that maybe my mom didn't die, you know? That maybe she'd only run away to the Wilds. Not that that would be any better. I guess I, just didn't want her to be gone for good. It was better to imagine her out there somewhere, singing.' I break off, shaking my head, amazed that I feel so comfortable talking to Randy. Amazed, and grateful. 'What about you?' I say.

'What about me what?' Ray is watching me with an expression I can't read. Like I've hurt him, almost, but that doesn't make any sense.

'Did you used to think about going to the Wilds when you were little? Just for fun, I mean, like a game.'

Alex squints, looks away from me, and grimaces. 'Yeah, sure. A lot.' He reaches out and slaps the buoys. 'None of these. No walls to run into. No eyes.

Freedom and space places to stretch out. I still think about the Wilds.'

I stare at him. Nobody uses words like that anymore: freedom, space. Old words.
'Still? Even after this?'

Liz looks hot in a swimsuit; I see her without the top and I want her not him.

Without meaning to or thinking about it I reach out and brush my fingers, once, against the three-pronged scar on his neck.

He jerks away from my touch as though I've scalded him, and I drop my hand, embarrassed.

'Liz -' he says, in the strangest voice: like my name is a sour thing, a word that tastes bad in his mouth.

I know I shouldn't have touched him like that. I've overstepped my boundaries, and he's going to remind me of it, of what it means to be uncured. I think I will die of humiliation if he starts to lecture me, so to cover the discomfort I start babbling. 'Most curds don't think about that kind of stuff. -She always said it was a waste of time. She always said there was nothing out there but animals and land and bugs, that all the talk of Invalids was make-believe stuff, kid stuff.
She said believing in Invalids is the same thing as believing in necromancers or fallen-angels.

Remember how people used to say there were fallen-angels in the Wilds?' she smiles, but it's more like a wince. 'Liz, I have to tell you something.' Her voice is a little stronger now, but something about his tone makes me afraid to let him speak.

Now I can't stop talking. 'Did it hurt?

The procedure, I mean.

My sister said it was no big deal, not with all the painkillers they give you, but my cousin Marcia used to say it was worse than anything, worse than having a baby, even though her second kid took, like, fifteen hours to deliver-' I break off, blushing, mentally cursing myself for the ridiculous conversational turn.

I wish I could rewind to last night's party when my brain was coming up empty; it's like I've been saving up for a case of verbal vomit. 'I'm not scared, though,' I nearly scream, as she again opens her mouth to speak. I'm desperate to salvage the situation somehow. 'My procedure's coming up. Seventy days. It's dorky, huh?

That I count. But I can't wait.'

I may fall to another girl that day.

'Liz.' Randy's voice is stronger, more forceful now, and it finally stops me. He turns so that we're face-to-face. At that moment my shoes skim off the sand bottom, and I realize, that the water is lapping up to my neck. The tide is coming in fast. 'Listen to me. I'm not who-I'm not whom you think I am.'

I have to fight to stand. All of a sudden, the currents tug and pull at me. It's always seemed this way. The tide goes out a slow drain, comes back in a rush.

'What do you mean?'

His eyes-shifting gold, amber, an animal's eyes-search my face, and without knowing why I'm scared again.

'I was never cured,' he says. For a moment I close my eyes and imagine I've misheard him, imagine I've only confused the shushing of the waves for his voice. But when I open my eyes he's still standing there, staring at me, looking guilty and something else-sad, maybe? ...And I know I heard correctly.

He says, 'I never had the procedure.'

'You mean it didn't work?' I say. My body is tingling, going numb, and I realize then how cold it is. 'You had the procedure and it didn't work? Like what happened to my mom?'

'Nope, Liz. I' He looks away, squinting, says under his breath, 'I don't know how to explain.'

Part: 5

Everything from the tips of my fingers through the roots of my hair now feels as if it's encased in ice. Disconnected images run through my head, a skipping movie reel: Randy standing on the observation deck, his hair like a crown of leaves; turning his head, showing the neat four- split scar just beneath his left ear; reaching out to me and saying, I'm safe. I won't hurt you. The words start rattling out of me again, but I don't feel them, hardly feel anything. 'It didn't work, and you've been lying about it.

Dishonest so you could still go to school, still get a job, still get paired and matched and everything. But you're not-you're still-you might still be-' I can't bring myself to say the word. Diseased. Uncured, sick, I feel like I'll be sick.

~*~

Me- a school day- 'I hope I didn't disturb anything.'

'You didn't.' My cheeks are hot. I wish I could reach out and take my stupid bra-pink, with patterns of daisies on it, like a teen or under- bra-and shove it under the sofa, but that would be even more conspicuous. So instead we both pretend we don't notice.

'Okay...' Maddie draws out the word, super long as if she knows I'm lying. For a second he says nothing. Then, slowly, he comes down the stairs, edging closer, as if I'm an animal who might be rabid.

'Are you, all right? You seem-'

'I seem what?' I look up at him then, experiencing a hot flash of anger.

'Nothing.' He stops again, a good ten feet away from me. 'I don't know.

Upset... angry or something.' His next words he pronounces very carefully as if each one is glass that might shatter in his mouth. 'Is everything okay with you?' I feel stupid sitting on the couch when he's standing, like I'm at a disadvantage somehow, so I stand up, too, crossing my arms. 'We're fine,' I say. 'I'm fine.' I'd been planning on telling Maddie about the breakup- the second I saw his stupid stuff on the stairs, I knew I would tell him, and maybe even tell him why, cry and confess that there's something wrong with me and I don't know how to be happy and I'm an idiot, such an idiot.

But now I can't tell him. I won't.

Then I say, 'her sister not home.' Maddie flinches and turns away, a muscle working in his jaw. Even midwinter, he has the kind of skin that always looks tan. I wish he looked worse. I wish he looked as bad as I feel. 'Well, you're here for her, aren't you?'

Maddie- 'Jesus, Liv.' She turns back to me then. 'We need to - I don't know - fix this. Fix us.'

'I don't know what you mean,' I say, squeezing my ribs, hard. I feel like if I don't, I might just come apart.

'You do know what I mean,' he says. 'You are-where-my best friend.'

With one hand, he gestures to space between us, the long stretch of the basement, where for years we built pillow forts and competed to see who could withstand tickle wars the longest. 'What happened?'

Liv- 'What happened is you started dating one more time- it's on and off...

My sister,' I say. The words come out louder than I intended.

Parker takes a step toward me. 'I didn't mean to hurt you,' he says, his voice quiet, and for a second I want to close the distance between us and bury myself in the soft place between his arm and shoulder blade, and tell her how dumb I've been, and let him cheer me up with bad renditions songs and weird trivia about the world's largest hamburgers or freestanding structures built entirely from toothpicks.

'I didn't mean to hurt either of you. It just - happened.' He's practically whispering now. 'I'm trying to stop it.'

I take a step backward. 'You're not trying very hard,' I say. I know I'm being a bitch, but I don't care. He's the one who ruined everything.

Edward- He's the one who kissed her, who keeps kissing her, and I don't like it she is my girl- mine. Who keeps telling her yes, no matter how many times they break up? 'I'll let her know you came by.'

Maddie's face changes. And at that moment, I know I've hurt him, maybe just as much as he's hurt me. I get a sick rush of triumph that feels virtually like seasickness, like catching an insect between folds of the paper towel and embracing.

Part: 6

Then he just- looks angry- hard, almost, like his skin has suddenly tightened into stone.

'Yeah, all right.' He takes two steps backward before spinning around. 'Tell her I'm looking for her. Tell her I'm worried about her.'

~*~

'Sure...' My voice sounds unacquainted as if it's being piped in from somewhere a thousand miles away. I broke up with Kristy. And for what? Maddie and I aren't even friends anymore, yet we say that all the time- not true. I've screwed up everything. Suddenly I think, I might be sick.

'Oh, and Kristy?' Maddie pauses at the foot of the stairs. Her expression is impossible to read for a second, I think he might try and apologize again. 'Your shirt's on inside out.'

Then he's gone, sprinting up the stairs, leaving me alone.

~*~

'No,' Maddie's voice is so loud it startles me. I take a step back, sneakers slipping on the slick and uneven bottom of the ocean floor, and nearly go under, but when Maddie makes a move to touch me, I jerk backward, out of his reach.

Something hardens in her face like he's made a decision. 'I'm telling you I was never cured. Never paired or matched or anything. I was never even evaluated.'

'Impossible.' The word barely squeezes itself out, a murmur. The sky is whirling above me, all blues and pinks and reds twirling together until it looks like parts of the sky are wringing.

Part: 7

I/we girls should know we beautiful just the way we are... 'We don't need to change a thing; the world could change its heart. No scars to your beautiful, we're stars and we're beautiful, and you don't have to change a thing, the world could change its heart. No scars to your beautiful, we're stars and we're beautiful. She has dreams to be envy, so she's starving. You know, cover girls eat nothing.

She says beauty is pain and there's beauty in everything. What's a little bit of hunger? I could go a little while longer, she fades away- she doesn't see her perfect, she doesn't understand she's worth it... Or that beauty goes deeper than the surface 'Impossible.' -Scars to Your Beautiful by Alessia Cara ...ha the song of a teen girl's life...

'You have the scars.' 'Scars,' he corrects me, a little more gently. 'Just scars. Not the scars.' He looks away then, giving me a view of his neck. 'Three tiny scars, an inverted triangle. Easy to replicate. With a scalpel, a penknife, anything.'

I close my eyes again. The waves swell around me and the motion, the lift, and the drop convince me I really will throw up, right here in the water. I choke down the feeling, trying to hold back the realization that is battering at the back of my mind, threatening to overwhelm me -fighting back the feeling of drowning.

I open my eyes and croak out, 'How-?'

'You have to understand. Lena, I'm trusting you. Do you see that?' He's staring at me so intently I can feel his eyes like touch, and I keep my eyes averted. 'I didn't mean to-I didn't want to lie to you.'

'How?' I repeat, louder now.

Somehow my brain gets stuck on the word lie and makes an endless loop: No way to avoid evaluations unless you lie.

No way to avoid procedure unless you lie. You must lie.

For a moment, Maddie is silent, and I think he's going to chicken out, refuse to tell me anything more. I almost wish he would. I'm desperate to rewind time, go back to the moment before he said my name in that strange tone of voice, go back to the triumphant, surging feeling of beating him to the buoys. We'll race back to the beach. We'll meet up tomorrow, try to wheedle some fresh crabs from the fishermen at the dock.

But then he speaks. 'I'm not from here,' he says. 'I mean, I wasn't born in Pittsburgh. Not exactly.' He's speaking in the tone of voice that everyone uses when they're about to break you apart.

Gentle-kind, even-like they can make the news sound better just by speaking in a lullaby voice. I'm sorry, Liv, but your mother was a troubled girl.

Like you won't somehow hear the violence underneath.

'Where are you from?' I don't have to ask. I know already.

The comprehension has broken, spilled, swarming me. But a slight part of me believes that as long as he doesn't say it, it's not factual.

~*~

Her eyes are steady on mine, but he tilts his head back-back toward the border, beyond the bridge, to that endlessly moving preparation of branches and leaves and vines and tangled, growing things.

'There,' she says, or maybe I just think she says it. His lips barely move. But the meaning is clear.

He comes from the wilderness.

'An Invalid,' I say. The word feels like it's grating against my throat.

'You're an Invalid.' I'm giving him a final chance to deny it.

But he doesn't. He just winces slightly and says, 'I've always hated that word.'

Standing there, I comprehend something else: that it wasn't a coincidence whenever Liv made fun of me for still believing in the Invalids, whenever she would shake her head without bothering to look up from her knitting needlestick, tick, tick, they went together, flashing metal-and say, 'I presume you have faith in fallen and witches, too?' They suck! It's like the movie- love it or love to hate it, that's us.

Fallen-angels and wizards and Invalids: things that will tear into you, tear you to shreds. Deadly things.

I'm suddenly so frightened a desperate pressure starts pushing down in the bottom of my stomach and between my legs, and for one wild and ridiculous second I'm positive that I'm about to pee.

The lighthouse on Little Island clicks on out in the outer parts, not in the city, cuts a wide swath across the water, an enormous, accusatory finger: I'm terrified I'll get caught up in its beam, terrified it will point in my direction and then I'll overhear the whirling of the state helicopters and the megaphone voices of the regulators shouting, 'Illegal activity! Illegal activity!' The beach looks hopelessly and impossibly remote. I can't imagine how we got out so far. My arms feel heavy and useless, and I think of my mother, and her jacket filling slowly with water.

I take deep breaths, trying to keep my mind from spinning, trying to focus.

There's no way for anyone to know that Alex is an Invalid. I didn't know. He looks normal, has the scar in the right place. There's no way anyone could have heard us talking.

A wave lifts- and breaks against my back. I blunder forward. Maddie reaches out and grabs my arm to steady me, but I twist away from him just as the second round of waves surges over us. I get a mouthful of seawater, feel the salt stinging my eyes and am momentarily blinded.

'Don't,' I stutter. 'Don't you dare touch me.'

'Liv, I swear. I didn't mean to hurt you. I didn't want to lie to you.' 'Why are you doing this?' I can't think straight, I can hardly even breathe. 'What do you want from me?'

'Want...?' she shakes his head. She looks honestly confused-and offended, too, as though I'm the one who did something wrong. Aimed at a second I feel flash of sympathy for him. Maybe she sees it on my face, that segment of a second when I let my guard down because at that moment his expression softens, and his eyes go bright as flame and even though I barely see him move, suddenly he has closed the space between us and he's wrapping his warm hands over my shoulders-fingers so warm and strong I almost cry out-and saying, 'Lena. I like you, okay? That's it. That's all... I like you.'

His voice is so low and hypnotic it reminds me of a song. I think of predators dropping silently from trees: I think of enormous cats with glowing amber eyes, just like his.

And then I'm stumbling backward, paddling away from him, my shirt and shoes heavy with water, my heart hammering painfully against my chest and my breath rasping in my throat. I'm kicking off the ground and sweeping forward with my arms, half running, half swimming, as the tide lifts and drags at me so I feel like I can only creep forward an inch at a time, so I feel like I'm moving through molasses. Alex calls my name, but I'm too afraid to turn my head and see if he's coming after me. It's like one of those nightmares where something's chasing you but you're too afraid to look and see what it is. All you hear is its breath, getting closer and closer.

You feel its shadow forthcoming up behind you, but you're paralyzed: You know that any second you'll feel its icy fingers closing on your neck.

I'll never make it, I think. I'll never make it back. Something scrapes across my shin and I begin to imagine that the bay around me is full of horrible underwater things, sharks and jellyfish and poisonous eels, and even though I know I'm panicking I feel like falling backward and giving up. The beach is still so far, and my arms and legs feel so heavy.

Her voice gets whipped away by the wind, sounding fainter and fainter, and when I finally work up the courage to look over my shoulder, I see him bobbing up and down by the buoys. I realize I've gone farther than I thought, and at the very least she isn't following me. My fear eases up, and the knot in my chest loosens.

The next wave is so strong it helps skim me over a steep underwater ridge, drops me to my knees into the soft sand. When I struggle to my feet the water hits me just at the waist, and I slosh the rest of the way to shore, shivering, grateful, exhausted.

My thighs are shaking. I collapse onto the beach, gasping and coughing. From the flames of color licking across the sky over Back and Gold Cove-orange, reds, pinks- I'm guessing it's close to sunset, probably around eight o'clock. Part of me wants to just lie down, spread my arms and stretch out and sleep all through the night. I feel like I've swallowed half my weight in saltwater.

My skin stings and there's sand everywhere, in my bra and underwear and between my toes and under my fingernails. Whatever scraped my shin in the water left its mark: a long trickle of blood snakes around my calf.

I look up, and for one panicked second, I can't find Maddie by the buoys. My heart stops. Then I see him, a dark spot cutting quickly through the water. His arms pinwheel gracefully as he swims. He's fast. I haul myself to my feet, grab my shoes, and limp up to my bike. My legs are so weak it takes me a minute to find my balance, and at first, I weave crazily up and down the road like a toddler just learning to ride.

I don't look back, not once, until I'm at my gate. By then the streets are empty and quiet, night about to fall, curfew about to come down like a giant whole-hearted embrace, keeping us all in our places, keeping us all innocuous.

Part: 8

Olivia- Think of it this way: When it's cold outside and your teeth are chattering, you bundle up in a winter coat, and scarves, and mittens, to keep from catching the flu. Well, the borders are like hats and scarves and winter coats for the whole country! They keep the very worst disease away, so we can all stay healthy!

After the borders went up, the president and the Consortium had one last thing to take care of before we could all be safe and happy.

(Back)

She cried all the time, and once she confessed to me that when I liked to kiss away her tears away. Still, now, when I think of that days-I was only eight at the time I think of the taste of salt.

The disease slowly worked its way deeper and deeper inside of her, an animal chewing her from within. My sister couldn't eat. What little we could convince her to swallow came up just as quickly, and I was afraid for her life. Thomas broke her heart, of course, to nobody's surprise.

~*~

Then my sister did nothing but lie in bed and watch the shadows shift slowly across the walls, her ribs rising under her pale skin like wood rising through water. Even then she refused the procedure and the comfort it would give her, and on the day the cure was to be administered it took four scientists and several needles full of tranquilizer before she would submit, before she would stop scratching with her long, sharp nails, which had gone uncut for weeks, and screaming and cursing and calling for Thomas. I watched them come for her, to bring her to the labs; I sat in a corner, terrified, while she spits, and hissed and kicked, and I thought of my mom and dad.

That afternoon, though I was still more than, a decade away from safety, I began to count the months until my procedure. In the end, my sister was cured. She came back to me gentle and content, her nails spotless and round, her hair pulled back in a long, thick braid.

Several months later she was pledged to an IT tech, roughly her age, and several weeks after she graduated from college they married, their hands linked loosely under the canopy, both of them staring straight ahead as though at a future of days unmarred by worry or discontent or disagreement, a future of identical days, like a series of neatly blown bubbles.

Thomas was cured too. she was married to Ella, once my sister's best friend, and now everybody is happy. Rachel told me a few months ago, that the two couples often see each other at picnics and neighborhood events since they live fairly close to each other in the East End.

The four of them sit, making polite and quiet conversation, with not a sole flicker of the past to disturb the stillness and completeness of the present.

That's the beauty of the cure. No one mentions those lost, hot days in the field when Thomas kissed Rachel's tears away and invented worlds just, so he could promise them to her when she tore the skin off her arms at the thought of living without him. I'm sure she's embarrassed by those days if she remembers them at all.

True, I don't see her that often now-just once every couple of months, when she remembers she is supposed to stop by-and in that way, I guess you could say that even with the procedure I lost a little bit of her. But that's not the point. The point is that she's protected. The point is that she's safe.

I'll tell you another secret, this one for your good. You may think the past has something to tell you. You may think that you should listen, should strain to make out its whispers, should bend over backward, stoop down low to hear its voice breathed up from the ground, from the dead places.

You may think there's something in it for you, something to understand or make sense of. But I know the truth: I know from the nights of Coldness.

I know the past will drag you backward and down, have you snatching at whispers of wind and the gibberish of trees rubbing together, trying to decipher some code, trying to piece together what was broken. It's hopeless. The past is nothing but a weight. It will build inside of you like a stone.

Take it from me: If you hear the past speaking to you, feel it tugging at your back and running its fingers up your spine, the best thing to do the only thing is run. In the days that follow Maddie's confession, I check constantly for symptoms of the disease.

When I'm manning the register at my uncle's store I lean forward on my elbow, keep my hand resting on my cheek so I can crook my fingers back toward my neck and count my pulse, make sure it's normal.

In the mornings I take long, slow breaths, listening for rasping or hitches in my lungs. I wash my hands constantly. I know the deliria isn't like a cold you can't get it from being sneezed on-but still, it's contagious, and when I woke up the day after our meeting at East End with my limbs still heavy and my head as light as a bubble and an ache in my throat that refused to go away, my first thought was that I'd been infected. After a few days, I feel better.

The only weird thing is the way my senses seem to have dulled. Everything looks washed out, like a bad color copy. I have to load my food with salt before I can taste it, and every time my aunt speaks to me it seems like her voice has been muted a few degrees. But I read through 'The Book of Shhh- of life,' and all the recognized symptoms of deliria, and don't see anything that matches up, so in the end, I figure I'm safe. Still, I take precautions, determined not to make one false step, determined to prove to myself that I'm not like my mother-that the thing with Ray was a fluke, a mistake, a horrible, horrible accident.

I can't ignore how close I was to danger. I don't even want to think about what would happen if anyone found out what she was if anyone knew that we had stood together shivering in the water, that we had talked, laughed, touched.

It makes me feel sick. I have to keep repeating to myself that my procedure is less than two months away now.

All I have to do is keep my head down and make it through the next seven weeks and I'll be fine.

I come home every evening a full two hours before curfew. I volunteer to spend extra days at the store, and I don't even ask for my usual eight-dollar-an hour wage.

Maddie doesn't call me. I don't call her, either. I help my aunt cook dinner, and I clean and wash the dishes unprompted.

Maggie is in summer school -she's only in first grade and they're already talking about holding her back- and every night I pull her onto my lap and help her sludge through her work, whispering in her ear, begging her to speak, to focus, to listen, cajoling her, finally, into writing at least half of the answers down in her workbook.

After a week, my aunt stops looking at me suspiciously whenever I walk into the house, stops demanding to know where I've been, and another weight eases off me: She trusts me again. It wasn't easy to explain why on earth she and I would decide on an impromptu swim in the ocean in our clothes, no less-just after a big family dinner, even harder to explain why I came home pale and shaking, and I could tell my aunt didn't buy it. But after a while she relaxes around me again, stops looking at me distrustfully like I'm some caged-up animal she's worried will go feral.

Days pass, time ticks away, seconds click forward like dominoes toppling in a line. Every day the heat gets worse and worse. It creeps through the streets of Pitt., festers in the Dumpsters, makes the city smell like a giant armpit. The walls sweat and the trolleys a cough and shudder, and every day people gather in front of the municipal buildings, praying for a brief blast of cold air whenever the mechanized doors swoosh open because a regulator or politician or guard has to go in and out.

I have to give up my runs. The last time I do a full loop outside I find that my feet carry me down to the Square, past the Governor. The sun is a high white haze, all the buildings cut sharply against the sky like a series of metal teeth. By the time I make it to the statue

I'm panting, exhausted, and my head is spinning. When I grab the Governor's arm and swing myself up onto the statue's base, the metal burns underneath my hand and the world seesaws crazily, light zigzagging everywhere. I'm dimly aware that I should go inside, out of the heat, but my brain is all foggy and so there I go, poking my fingers around the hole in the Governor's cupped fist. I don't know what I'm looking for. She already told me that the note he'd left for me months ago must have turned to a pulp by now. My fingers come out sticky, pieces of melting gum stringing between my thumb and forefinger, but still, I root around. And then I feel it slide between my fingers, cool and crisp, folded in a square: a note.

I'm half-delirious as I open it, but still, I don't expect it to be from her.

My hands begin to shake as I read:

Maddie, I'm so sorry. Please forgive me.

Your lover girl-

I don't remember the run home, and my aunt finds me later half passed out in the hallway, murmuring to myself. She has to put me in a bathtub full of ice to get my temperature down. When I finally come too, I can't find the note anywhere.

I realize I must have dropped it, and feel half-relieved and half-disappointed.

That evening we read that the Time and Temperature Building registered 102 degrees: the hottest day on record for the summer so far.

~*~

My aunt forbids me to run outside for the rest of the summer. I don't put up a fight. I don't trust myself, can't be sure my feet won't lead me back down to the Governor, to East End Beach up the coast, to the labs. I receive a new date for the evaluations and spend my evenings in front of the mirror rehearsing my answers.

My aunt insists on accompanying me to the labs again, but this time I don't see Hana. I don't see anyone I recognize. Even the four evaluators are different: floating oval faces, different shades of brown and pink, two-dimensional, like shaded drawings. I am not afraid of this time. I don't feel anything.

Part: 10

I answer all the questions exactly as I should. When I am asked to give my favorite color, for just the briefest, tiniest of seconds my mind flashes on a sky the color of polished silver, and I think I hear a word-gray-whispered quietly into my ear.

I say, 'Blue,' and everyone smiles. I say, 'I'd like to study psychology and social regulation.' I say, 'I like to listen to music, but not too loudly.' I say, 'The definition of happiness is security.' Smiles, smiles, smiles all around, a room full of teeth.

After I'm done, as I am leaving, I think I see a shifting shadow, a flicker in my peripheral vision. I glance up quickly at the observation deck. Of course, it's empty.

Nevaeh

Book: 22

Lips Together

Chapter: 129

Part: 1

Hanna

Hanna- Two days later we receive the results of my boards-all passes-and my final score: Eight. My aunt hugs me; the first time she has hugged me in years.

My uncle pats me on the shoulder awkwardly and gives me the largest piece of chicken at dinner. Even Jenny looks impressed by this.

Olivia rams the top of her head into my leg, one, two, three times, and I step away from her, tell her to stop fussing. I know she's upset that I'll be leaving her soon. We do a lot all as girlfriends.

But that's life, and the sooner she gets used to it, the better.

I received my 'Approved Matches' too, a list of four names and statistics-age, scores, interests, recommended career path, salary projections-printed neatly on a white sheet of paper with the Pittsburgh city crest at its top.

At least Maddie isn't on it. I recognize only one name: Kellie. she has bright hair now and teeth that stick out like not much yet is cute. I only know him because once when I was playing outside last year with me, he started chanting, 'There goes the retard and the orphan Maggie,' and without really thinking about what I was doing, I scooped up a rock from the ground and turned around and hurled it in his direction. It caught him on the temple. For a second his eyes crossed and uncrossed.

He lifted his fingers to his head, and when he pulled them away, they were dark with blood. For days afterward, I was terrified to go out, terrified I'd be arrested and thrown in the Vaults. Shy- now owned a tech services firm and was a volunteer regulator besides. I was convinced she would come after me for what I'd done to his son doing that thing on his little man as an RN.

~*~

Part: 2

Kellie- (Now)

My arms are aching, and whenever I close my eyes, I see barcodes, and then I'm so sleepy I'm not even embarrassed to be out in public wearing my paint-spotted Save a lot T-shirt, which is about ten sizes too big for me.

Hanna looks away, biting her lip. I haven't spoken to her since that night at the party and I'm searching desperately for something to say, something casual and normal.

It suddenly seems incredible to me that this was my best friend, that we could hang out for days and never run out of things to talk about, that I would come home from her house with my throat sore from laughing. It's like there's a glass wall between us now, invisible but impenetrable.

I finally come up with, 'I got my matches,' at the same time that Hana blurts out, 'Why didn't you call me back?'

Both of us paused, startled, and then again startup at the same time. I say, 'You called?' and Hana says, 'Did you accept yet?'

'You first,' I say.

Hanna seems uncomfortable. She looks at the sky, at a small child standing across the street in a baggy swimsuit, at the two men loading buckets of something into a truck down the street- everywhere but at me. 'I left you, like, three messages.'

'I never got any messages,' I say quickly, my heart speeding up. For weeks I've been pissed that Hana didn't try to reach out to me after the party - pissed and hurt. But I told myself it was better this way.

I told myself Hana had changed, and she probably wouldn't have much to say to me anymore.

Hana is looking at me like she's trying to judge whether I'm telling the truth.

'Carol didn't tell you that I called?'

'No, I swear.' 'um so relieved I laugh.

In that second, it hits me just how much, I've missed Hana. Even when she's mad at me, she's the only person who's ever really looked out for me by choice, not because of family obligation and duty and responsibility and all the other stuff that...

Everyone else in my life- mom and all my cousins, the other girls at St. Anne's, even Rachel- like- have only spent time with me because they had to.

'I had no idea.' Hanna doesn't laugh, though. She frowns. 'No worries. It's no big thing to me.'

'Listen, Hanna-'

She cuts me off. 'As I said, it's no big deal.' She crosses her arms and shrugs. I don't know whether she believes me or not but it's clear that, after all, things are different. This isn't going to be some big, happy reunion.

'So, you got matched?'

Her voice is polite now, and slightly formal, so I take on the same tone.

'Brian Scharff. I accepted. You?' She nods... A muscle flexes at the corner of her mouth, almost imperceptible.

Me- her- them- 'Hargrove?' 'Wow. Congratulations.' I can't help sounding impressed. Hanna must have killed at the evaluations. Not that that's any surprise.

'Yeah. Lucky me.' Hanna's voice is completely toneless. I can't tell if she's being sarcastic. Nevertheless, she is lucky, whether she knows it or not.

And there it is: Even though we're standing in the same patch of sun-drenched pavement, we might as well be a hundred thousand miles apart. You came from different starts and you'll come to different ends: That's an old saying, something she used to repeat a- lot. I never really understood how true it was until now.

This must be why Carol didn't tell me Hana called. Three phone calls are a- lot of phone calls to forget, and Carol's pretty careful about stuff like that. Maybe she was trying to hurry up the inevitable, skip us both to the ending, the part where Hanna and I aren't friends anymore.

She knows that after the procedure-once the past and all our shared history has loosened its grip on us, once we don't feel our memories so much, we won't have anything in common anymore.

Hanna- Kellie was probably trying to protect me, in her way.

There's no point in confronting her about it. Feelings aren't forever. Time waits for no man, but progress waits for the man to enact it. 'You are walking home, right?' Hana is still looking at me like I'm a stranger. 'Yeah,' I say. I gesture to my T-shirt.

'I figured I should probably get inside before I blind someone with this.' A flit over Hana's face. 'I'll walk with you,' she says, which surprises me. For a while, we walk in silence.

We're not that far from my house, and I'm worried we'll go the whole way back without speaking at all. I've never seen Hana so quiet, and it's making me nervous. 'Where are you coming from?' I say, just to say something. Hana starts next to me, as though I've woken her from a dream.

'East End,' she says. 'I'm on a strict tanning schedule.' She presses her arm next to mine. It's at least seven shades darker than mine, which is still pale, maybe a little more freckled than it is in the winter. 'Not you, huh?' This time she smiles for real.

'Um, no. Haven't gotten down to the beach very much.' I will away a blush. Thankfully, Hana doesn't notice, or if she does, she doesn't say anything. 'I know. I was looking for you.'

'You where?' I gave her a look from the corner of my eye.

She rolls her eyes at me. I'm glad to see her attitude is coming back operational. 'I mean, not enthusiastically. But I've been down there a few times, yeah. Haven't seen you-enough.'

'I've been working a lot,' I say. I don't add, to avoid East End.

'You still running?'

‘No. Too hot.’ ‘Yeah, me too. Figured I’d give it a rest until fall.’ We walk a few more paces in silence and then Hana squints at me, tilting her head. ‘So, what else?’ Her question catches me off guard.

‘What do you mean, what else?’

‘That is what I mean. I mean, what else? Come on, Lena. It’s the last summer, remember? The last summer of no responsibilities and all that good stuff. So, what have you been doing?’

Where have you been?’

‘I- nothing... I haven’t done anything.’

This was the whole point-to stay out of trouble, to do as little as possible-but saying the words makes me feel kind of sad. The summer seems to be coming to an end so-o rapidly, shrinking down to a fine point before I’ve even had a chance to enjoy it. It’s already almost August.

We’ll have another five weeks of this weather before the wind starts cutting in at night and the leaves get trimmed with edges of gold. ‘What about you?’ I say... ‘Good summer so far?’

‘Why? It’s not like you’ll even have a budget.’ I don’t mean to sound bitter but there it is, the difference in our futures cutting between us again. We go silent after that. Hanna looks away, squinting slightly against the sunlight.

Part: 3

Perhaps, I’m just feeling depressed about how quickly the summer is cycling by, but memories start coming thick and fast, like a deck of cards being reshuffled in my head: Hana swinging open the bathroom door that first day in second grade, folding her arms as she blurted out, Is it because of your mom?

Staying up past midnight one of the few times we were ever allowed to have a sleepover, giggling and imagining amazing and impossible people for our matches someday, like the president of the United States or the stars of our favorite movies; running side by side, legs beating in tandem on the pavement, like the rhythm of a single heartbeat; bodysurfing at the beach and buying triple cones of ice cream on the way home, arguing about whether vanilla or chocolate was better.

‘The usual.’

Hana shrugs... ‘I’ve been going to the beach a lot as I said. Been babysitting for the Farrels some.’

‘Really?’ I wrinkle my nose. Hana’s always had a thing against children.

She’s always saying they’re too sticky and clingy, like Kellie that has been left too long in a hot pocket.

She makes a face. ‘Yeah, unfortunately. My parents decided I needed to ‘practice managing a household,’ or some crap like that. You know they’re making me work out a budget? Like figuring out how to spend sixty dollars a week is going to teach me about paying bills, or responsibility or something.’

Best friends, for more than ten years and in the end, it all comes down to the edge of a scalpel, to the motion of a laser beam through the brain and a flashing surgical knife. All that history and its importance get detached, floats away like a severed balloon. In two years in two months- Hanna and I will pass each other on the streets with nothing more than a nod-different people, different worlds, two stars revolving silently, separated by thousands of miles of dark space.

Segregation has it all wrong. We should be protected from the people who will leave us in the end, from all the persons who will disappear or forget us.

Maybe Hanna’s feeling nostalgic too because she suddenly comes out with, ‘Remember all our plans for this summer? All the things we said we’d finally do?’

I don’t even skip a beat. ‘Break into the Spencer Prep pool-’

‘-and go swimming in our underwear,’ I- Hanna finishes. I crack a smile. ‘Hop the fence at Cherryville Farms-’ ‘-and eat the maple syrup straight out of the barrels.’

‘Run from the Hill to the old airport.’

‘Ride our bikes down Suicide Point.’

‘Try and find that rope swing Sarah Miller told us about. The one above Fore River.’

‘Sneak into the movie theater and see four movies back to back.’

‘Finish off the Pixey Sundae at Maeie’s.’ I’m fully smiling now, and Hanna is too. I start quoting, “A huge sundae for enormous appetites only, featuring thirteen scoops, whipped cream, hot fudge-” Hanna jumps in, “And all the toppings your little monsters can handle!”

Both of us laugh. We’ve probably read that sign a thousand times. We’ve been debating making a second attack on the Hobgoblin since fourth grade: That’s when we tried the first time. Hanna insisted on going there for her birthday and took me along. Both of us spent the rest of the night rolling around on the floor of her bathroom, and we’d only made it through seven of the thirteen scoops.

Part: 4

Hanna- We’ve reached my street. A few kids are playing in the middle of the road. It’s a makeshift game of soccer: They’re kicking a can around and shouting, bodies brown and shiny with sweat. I see Kellie among them. As I’m watching, a girl tries to elbow her out of the way, and she turns around and pushes her to the ground.

The younger girl starts to wail. No one comes out of any of the houses, even as the girl’s voice crescendos to a high-pitched scream, like a siren going off. A curtain or a dish towel flutters in a window: Other than that, the street is silent, motionless.

Kellie- I’m desperate to keep riding the wave of good feeling, to fix things between Hana and me, even if it’s only for a month. ‘Listen, Hanna’-I feel like I’m working the words past a massive lump in my throat; I’m almost as nervous as I was before the evaluations- ‘they’re playing The Defective Detective in the park tonight. Double feature, with her. We could go if you want.’ The Defective Detective is this film franchise Hanna and I used to love when we were little, about a famous detective who’s incompetent, and his dog sidekick: The dog always ends up solving the crimes.

A lot of actors have played the lead role, but our favorite was she.

Hanna- When we were kids, we used to pray to get matched with him and her.

Kellie- ‘Tonight?’ Hana’s smile falters, and my stomach sinks. Stupid, stupid, I think.

It doesn’t matter anyway.

‘It’s okay if you can’t. No worries.

Just an idea,’ I say quickly, looking away so she won’t see how disappointed I am.

‘No-I mean, I want to, but-’ Hana sucks in a breath. I hate this, hate how awkward we both are. ‘I kind of have this party’-she corrects herself speedily- ‘this thing I’m supposed to go to with her.

My stomach gets that hollowed-out feeling. It’s amazing how words can do that, just shred your insides apart. Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words can never hurt me- such bullshit.

‘Since when do you hang out with her?’

Again, I’m not trying to sound bitter, but I realize I sound like someone’s whiny little sister, complaining about being left out of a game. I bite my lip and turn away, furious with myself.

‘She’s not that bad.’

Part: 5

Kellie- Hanna says mildly. I can hear it in her voice; she feels sorry for me. This is worse than anything. I almost wish we were screaming at each other again like we did the day at her house-even that would be better than her careful tone of voice, the way we’re dancing around each other’s feelings. ‘She’s not stuck-up. Just shy, I guess.’

Angelica Marston was a junior last year. Hana made fun of her for the way she wore her uniform. It was always perfectly pressed and spotless, the collar of her button-down turned down exactly, her skirt hitting exactly at the knee.

Hana said Angelica Marston had a stick up her butt because her father was a big scientist at the labs. And she did kind of walk that way, all constipated and careful.

‘You used to hate her,’ I squeak out.

My words don’t seem to be asking my brain for permission before popping out of my mouth.

‘I didn’t hate her,’ Hana says like she’s trying to explain algebra to a two year- old. ‘I didn’t know her. I always thought she was a bitch; you know?’

Because of her clothes and stuff. But that’s all her parents. They’re super strict, really protective and stuff.’ Hana shakes her head. ‘She’s not like that at all. She is- well different...’

That word seems to vibrate in the air for a second: different. For a second, I have an image of Hanna and Kellie, arms linked, trying not to laugh, sneaking through the streets after curfew: Angelica was fearless and beautiful and fun, just like Hana. I push the image out of my head.

Down the street, one of the kids kicks the can, hard. It skitters between two dented grey garbage cans, that have been set out in the road, a makeshift goal. Half of the children start jumping up and down, pumping their fists; the others, Jenny included, gesticulate and shrieks something about off-sides.

It occurs to me for the first time how ugly my street must look to Hana, all the houses squished together, half of them missing windowpanes, porches sagging in the middle like old beaten-down mattresses.

It’s so different from the clean, quiet streets in West End, from the silent, gleaming cars and the gates and the green hedges.

‘You could come tonight,’ Hanna says quietly.

A rush of hatred overwhelms me. Hatred for my life, for its narrowness and cramped spaces; hatred for Kellie, with her secretive smile and rich parents; hatred for Hanna, for being so stupid and careless and stubborn, first and foremost, and for leaving me behind before, I was ready to be left; and underneath all those layers to some degree else, too, some white-hot blade of unhappiness flashing in the very deepest part of me. I can’t name it or even focus on it clearly, but somehow, I understand that this- that other thing-makes me the angriest of all.

‘Thanks for the invitation,’ I say, not even bothering to keep the sarcasm out of my voice. ‘Sounds like a blast. Will there be boys there too?’

Either Hanna doesn’t notice the tone of my voice-which is, doubtful-or she chooses to ignore it. ‘That’s kind of the whole point,’ she says, deadpan. ‘Well, and the music.’

‘Music?’ I say. I can’t help but sound interested. ‘Like the last time?’ Hana’s face lights up. ‘Yeah. I mean, no. Different band. But these guys are supposed to be amazing-even better than last time.’ She pauses, then repeats quietly, ‘You could come with us.’

Despite everything, this gives me pause. In the days after the party at Roaring Brook Farms, snatches of music seemed to follow me everywhere: I heard it winging in and out of the wind, I heard it singing off the ocean and moaning through the walls of the house.

Sometimes, I woke up in the middle of the night, drenched in sweat, my heart pounding, with the notes sounding in my ears. But every time I was awake and trying to remember the melodies consciously, hum a few notes or recall any of the chords, I couldn’t.

Hanna’s staring at me hopefully, waiting for my response. For a second, I feel bad for her. I want to make her happy, like I always did, want to see her give a whoop and put her fist in the air and flash me one of her well-known smiles.

But then I remember she has Kellie now, and something hardens in my throat, and significant that I’m going to disappoint her gives me a kind of dull satisfaction.

‘I think I’ll pass,’ I say. ‘But thanks anyway.’

Hana shrugs, and I can tell she’s fighting to look like it’s no big deal. ‘If you change your mind-’ She tries to smile but can’t keep it up for longer than a second. ‘Deering Highlands... You know where to find me.’ Deering Highlands.

Of course...

The Highlands is an abandoned subdivision off-peninsula. A decade ago, the government discovered sympathizers- and, if the rumors are true, even some Invalids- living together in one of the big mansions out there. It was a huge scandal, and the bust the result of a yearlong sting operation.

When all was said and done, forty-two people had been executed and another hundred thrown in the Vaults. Since then Deering Highlands has been a ghost town: avoided, forgotten, condemned.

‘Yeah, well. You know where to find me.’ I gesture lamely down the street.

‘Yeah.’ Hanna looks down at her feet, hops from one to the other. There’s nothing else to say, but I can’t stand to turn around, and just walk away. I have a terrible feeling this is the last time I’ll see Hanna before we’re cured.

Part: 6

Fear-

seizes me all at once, and I wish I could backpedal through our conversation, take back all the sarcastic or mean things that I said, tell her I miss her and I want to be best friends again.

But just when I’m about to blurt this out, she gives me a quick wave and says, ‘Okay, then. See you around,’ and the moment collapses in on itself and with it, my chance to speak.

‘Okay. See you.’

Hanna starts down the road. I’m tempted to watch her go. I get the urge to memorize her walk-to imprint her in my brain somehow, just as she is but as I’m watching her waver in and out of the fierce sunlight, her silhouette gets confused with another one in my head, a shadow weaving in and out of darkness, about to walk off the cliff, and I don’t know whom I’m looking at anymore.

Suddenly the edges of the world are blurring and there’s a sharp pain in my throat, so I turn around and walk quickly toward the house.

‘Liv!’ She calls out to me, just before I reach the gate.

I spin around, heart leaping, thinking maybe she’ll be the one to say it. I miss you. Let’s go back.

In the years before the cure was perfected, it was offered on a trial basis only. The risks attached to it were great. At the time one out of every hundred patients suffered a fatal loss of brain function after the procedure.

Unflinching from a distance of fifty feet, I can see Hanna hesitating. Then she makes this fluttering gesture with her hand and calls out, 'Never- mind.' This time when she turns around, she doesn't waver. She walks straight and speedily, turns a corner, and is gone.

But what did I expect?

That's the whole point, after all:

There's no going back.

And if there were people who died on the operating table, they died for a good cause, and no one can lament them- Nonetheless, people swarmed the hospitals in record number, demanding to be cured; they camped outside the laboratories for days at a time, hoping to secure a procedural slot.

These years are also known as the Miracle Years for the reason that of the number of lives that were healed and made whole, and the number of souls brought out of sickness.

Part: 7

Hanna- Her face is red and she's sweating big-time. Dark swaths of sweat have left pit stains on her pale blue blouse, navy crescents.

'Better get changed,' she says.

'Rachel and Deved will be here any second.'

'She's grown up now,' she told me when I asked her... why? Why Rachel- didn't like to play anymore. 'Someday you'll see.' After that, I stopped paying attention to the notation that appeared every few months on the kitchen wall calendar: ER to visit. At dinner the big topics of conversation are Brian Scharff- Rachel's husband, David, works with Brian's cousin's friend, so David feels like he's an expert on the family-and Moon of Pittsburgh, where I'll be starting in the fall. It's the first time in my life I'll be in class with members of the opposite sex, but Rachel tells me not to worry.

I would completely have forgotten my sister, and her husband; was coming over for dinner. Normally- like I see Rachel four or five times a year, tops. When I was younger, especially after Rachel had first moved out of her house, I used to count the days until she would come and see me.

I don't think I fully understood then about the procedure and what it meant for her- for me- for us. I knew that she'd been saved from Thomas and the disease, but that was it. I think I thought that otherwise, things would be the same.

I thought that as soon as she came to see me it would be like old times again, that we would bust out our socks to have a dance party, or she would pull me onto her lap and start braiding my hair, launch into one of her stories of distant places and witches who could change into animals.

But then again, she only skimmed a hand over my head as she came through the door, and applauded politely when Carol made me recite my multiplication and division tables.

'You won't even notice,' she says.

'You'll be so busy with work and study.'

'There are safeguards,' says she. 'All the students are vetted.'

Code for: All the students are cured.

I think of Kellie and almost say, Not all of them.

Dinner drags on well past curfew. By the time my aunt helps me clear the plates, it's almost eleven o'clock, and still, Rachel and her husband make no sign to leave. That's another thing I'm excited about: In thirty-six days, I don't like- have to worry about curfew anymore.

After dinner, my uncle and David go out onto the porch. She has brought two cigars- cheap ones, but still- and the smell of the smoke, sweet and spicy and just a little bit oily- float in through the windows, intermingles with the sound of their voices, fills the house with a blue-like haze.

Rachel and Hanna stay in the dining room, drinking cups of watered-down boiled coffee; the dirty pale color of old dishwater.

From upstairs, I hear the sound of scampering feet. Kellie will tease her until she's bored, until she climbs into bed, sour and dissatisfied, letting the dullness and sameness of another day lull her to sleep.

I wash the dishes-many more of them than usual since Carol insisted on having a soup (hot carrot, which we all choked down, sweating) and a pot roast slathered in garlic and limp asparagus, probably rescued from the very bottom of the vegetable bin, and some stale cookies.

Part: 8

I'm full, and the warmth of the dishwater on my wrists and elbows- plus the familiar rhythms of conversation, the pitter-patter of feet upstairs, the heavy blue smoke-make me feel very sleepy. Kellie has finally remembered to ask about Rachel's children; Rachel goes over their accomplishments as though reciting a list she has only memorized recently, and with difficulty- Sara is reading already; Hanna said her first word at only thirteen months, to Rachel now part of Ray's fuck body party.

'Raid, raid... this is a raid. Please do as you are commanded and do not try and resist.'

The voice booming from outside makes me jump. Rachel and Hanna have paused momentarily in their conversation, are listening to the commotion in the street. I can't hear David and Uncle, either. Even this girl and she have stopped fooling around upstairs.

There is no more knocking on the walls and to girls sighing. Patchy interference from the street; the sounds of hundreds and hundreds of boots, clicking away in time; and that awful voice, amplified by a bullhorn: 'This is a raid. Attention, this is a raid. Please be ready with your identification papers.'

A raid night. Instantly I think of Hanna and the party. The room starts spinning. I reached out, grabbing on to the counter.

'Seems pretty early for a raid,' She says mildly from the dining room. 'We had one just a few months ago, I think.'

'February seventeenth,' Rachel says...'

I remember...

Our lips are so wet-

Chapter: 130

Rachel

Part: 1

Rachel- We stood in the snow for half an hour before we could be verified. Afterward, Hanna had pneumonia for two weeks.' She relates this story as though she's chatting about some minor inconvenience at the Laundromat like she's erroneous a sock.

My name is Rachel Anderson, my gram would be Lily.

'Has it been that long?' Hanna shrugs take a sip of her coffee.

The voices, the feet, the static-it's all coming closer. The raiding parties move as one, from house to house- sometimes hitting every house on a street, sometimes skipping whole blocks, sometimes going every other. It's random. Or at least, it's supposed to be random. The houses always get targeted more than others.

But even if you're not on a watch list you can end up standing in the snow, like Rachel and her husband, while the regulators and police try to prove your rationality. Otherwise- even worse- while the raiders come inside your house, tear the walls down, and look for signs of suspicious activity. Isolated property laws are suspended on raid nights. Pretty much every law is adjourned on raid nights.

We've all heard horror stories: pregnant women stripped down and probed in front of everybody, people thrown in jail for two or three years just for looking at a cop incorrectly, or for trying to prevent a supervisor from entering a certain room.

Part: 2

'This is a raid. If you are asked to step out of the house, please make sure you have all your identification papers in hand, including the papers of any children over the age of six months.

Anyone who resists will be detained and questioned. Anyone who delays will be charged with obstruction.'

At the end of the street. Then a few houses away. Then two houses away. No, the next door over. I hear the Rake's' mother fucking dog start barking furiously.

Then Mrs. Cumshot, apologizing, yet not enough.

More barking-then someone (a regulator?) mutters something, and I hear a few heavy thuds and a whimper, then someone else saying, 'You don't have to kill the damn thing,' and someone else saying, 'Why not? Probably has fleas, anyway.'

Then for a while, there's quiet: just the occasional crackle of walkie-talkies, someone reciting identification numbers into a phone, the shuffling of papers.

Then: 'All right, then. You're in the clear.' And the boots start up again.

For all their nonchalance, even Rachel and I tense up as the boots clomp by our house. I can see Hanna gripping her coffee cup tightly, knuckles white. My heart is jumping and skipping, a grasshopper in my chest. But the boots pass us by.

~*~

Rachel heaves out a perceptible sigh of relief as we hear the regulators pound on a door farther down the street. 'Open up... this is a raid.'

I have a- teacup rattles in its saucer, making me jump. 'Silly, isn't it?' She says, forcing a laugh. 'Even when you haven't done anything wrong, it still makes you jumpy.' I feel that Jenny is my dark angel, that I need to have faith within, she makes me come for her.

I feel a dull pain in my hand and realize I'm still holding on to the counter as though it's going to save my life. I can't relax, can't calm down, even as the sounds of the footsteps grow fainter, the bullhorn voice more and more distorted until it is completely unintelligible.

All I can picture are the raiding parties- sometimes as many as fifty in a single night- swirling around Pitt., swarming it, surrounding it like water cascading around a whirlpool, sweeping up anyone and everyone they can find and accused of misbehavior or disobedience, and even people they can't.

Somewhere out there Hanna is dancing, spinning, blond hair fanning out behind her, smiling-while around her boys are pressing close and unapproved music pumps through the speakers.

I fight a feeling of incredible nausea. I don't even want to think about what will happen to her to all of them if they're caught.

All I can do is hope she hasn't made it to the party yet. Maybe she took too long to get ready-it seems possible, Hana's always late-and was still at home when the raids started. Even Hanna would never venture outside during raids. It's suicide.

But I and everyone else - Every single person there - Everyone who just wanted to hear some music - I think about what Hanna said the night I ran into him at Brooke Farms: I came to hear the music, like everybody else.

I will the image out of my mind and tell myself it's not my problem. I should be happy if the party is raided and everyone there is busted. What they're doing is dangerous, not just for them but for all of us: That's how the disease gets in. But the beneath part of me, the stubborn part that said gray at my first evaluation, keeps tenacious and nagging at me. So, what? It says.

So, they wanted to hear some music. Some real music- not the dinky little songs that get trotted out at the Pitt Concert Series, all boring rhythms and bright, chipper notes.

They're not doing anything that bad.

Then I remember the other thing Hanna said: Nobody's hurting anybody.

Besides, there's always the possibility that Hanna didn't run late tonight, and she's out there, oblivious, as the raids circle closer and closer.

Myself- Rachel, have to squeeze my eyes shut against the thought and the thought of lots of glittering blades descendant on her. If she's not thrown in jail she'll be carted directly to the labs-she'll be cured before dawn, regardless of the dangers or risks.

Somehow, despite my racing thoughts and the circumstance that the room continues its frantic spinning, I've been able to clean all the dishes. I've also come to a decision.

I have to go. I have to warn her.

I have to warn all of them.

By the time Rachel and I leave and all and sundry are settled in bed it's midnight.

Every second that passes feels like agony. I can only hope the door-to-door on the peninsula is taking longer than usual, and it will be a while before the raiders make it to the Laurel Highlands. Maybe they've decided to skip the Highlands altogether. Given the fact that the majority of the houses up there are vacant, it's always a possibility. Still, since Highlands used to be the hotbed of resistance in Pitt., it seems doubtful.

I slip out of bed, not bothering to change out of my sleep pants and T-shirt, both of which are black. Then I put on black flats, and, even though it's about a thousand degrees, pull a black ski hat out of the closet. Can't be too careful tonight.

Just as I'm about to crack open the bedroom door I hear a small noise behind me, like the mewling of a cat. I whip around. She is sitting up in bed, watching me, all naked dancing for her.

Do you like what you see? Yes, suck on me!

Okay and she did. I got a happy ending!

~*~

Hanna- tips for eating a girl like Kellie or Rachel.

Hanna- Aha! You are in luck, my friend. I will tell you how to perform the best oral sex. She'll probably come in less than two minutes if you do this right.

First of all, there is the normal way to do it as described by my friends here. Teasing, lacking, introducing your tongue. All that is great, she'll love that, but she'll love this even more.

STARTING OUT -

Well, you have to start the normal way, as described above. Go down there and lick the clitoris. (if you don't know where or what the clitoris is, I recommend you look it up on google and look at several pictures.)

Also, another tip for the regular oral sex is that you get your mouth closed like you are French kissing it, not like in porn where they just use the flapping tongue at a distance. They do that, so you can see her business.

GETTING DOWN TO IT-

Ok, now, after 2 or 3 minutes of regular oral sex, this is what you are going to do. tighten your cheeks and lips and blow (note that if you don't tighten, the effect will be a motorboat, you don't want that,) this will make your lips vibrate fast. Practice this by yourself first, then apply that to her clit and she'll love it. I could not find any videos of grownups doing this, but babies do it all the time, here is a video of a baby doing something similar to what I explained.

First off, do whatever you can to get her turned on. Every girl is different, try making out, humping her, sexually removing her clothes, take off your clothes get hot and wet, whatever it takes. If her clothes are not removed, take them off. Don't have light in the room. Try to have it as dark as possible, because it will relax the girl more.

Don't finger her right away, just place your hand or fingers on her pussy and rub it and play around with it, do this with her laying down and you sitting up. Look at her to see her response. Then you can start to finger her, start slow with one finger, then add the second one, or third or fourth... however many you can. The more fingers, the better it feels.

Then go faster and faster. Get her moaning and sighing. THEN: PUT AS MANY FINGERS AS POSSIBLE IN AS FAR AS THEY WILL GO! AND PUT YOUR THUMB ON THE TOP OF HER PUSSY AND MASSAGE IT.

THAT WILL DRIVE HER WILD. GET HER TURNED ON.

If she has no clothing on, take the come from your fingers and massage her boobs and spread it all over her stomach while she relaxes. If you want, stick your fingers in her mouth so she will lick them or suck them clean. Then, get down and start eating her out. Start by licking the outside of it and then use your fingers to open it up and get your tongue in as far as you can. Move it around fast, if she comes, lick it up. Ignore the smell, of course, it isn't going to be good, ignore it though, just think about how good you are making her feel.

Kellie- TIPS:

Make sure you get enough air before you start doing this. Let the air go steadily but slowly so you can last longer in one breath.

While you get more air, suck in so down on her.

Do not blow air into her vagina, do this at the clitoris.

When you practice this by yourself, it'll be and sound different than when you do it. When you perform this on her, there will be a bunch of fluids and saliva flying everywhere because of the blowing and it will sound kind of like you are blowing on her tummy, which may sound funny and silly... but believe you- me, if she starts laughing, she won't laugh for more than three seconds, then her face will change to that of a pleased woman.

1. What's that smell nothing if she is clean about it? It tests like skin, so yeah. While some folks prefer their poontang to be on the gamey side, for many people, fear of a funky odor or taste is the chief barrier to going down on a woman. All women do have a distinctive scent and flavor, and for some would-be cunning linguists, these may be an acquired taste.

2. However, if your partner is clean and in good health, her taste and smell should not be unpleasant or overwhelming. If you have concerns about her hygiene, the most tactful approach is to suggest a shared shower or bath before sex. If after a good soaping, her pussy still smells like something crawled up it and died, or she has an unusual discharge, she probably has an infection and should see a doctor.

3. Work your way up.

Take your time when you start to eat pussy. Get her warmed up with some basic foreplay- kissing, fondling, etc. It's better to go down on a wet pussy than a dry one.

Once she's aroused, make your descent. Try kissing and tonguing her ankle or the sole of her foot. Then kiss and lick your way slowly up the inside of her leg (the back of the knee is a good erogenous zone, too). Tease her a bit more by kissing and tonguing her inner thighs. Blow some air lightly over her clit and opening. She'll go nuts.

4. Get acquainted.

Once your face is up in her crotch, don't dive straight for her panic button. Explore the whole area with your mouth. Gently probe with your tongue and locate her vagina and clit. Suck on her labia. Get your whole face messy.

5. Get busy.

Now you want to go to work on her clit. The key is to use your tongue and lips to suck and massage it gently. Don't poke at it or press too hard. Go in circles, go up and down, flick back and forth lightly. There is no real 'right' way to go down on a woman; just make it up as you go along and pay attention to what works. Vary your speed and pressure and see what she responds to.

When you hit the right groove, you'll probably know it because she'll grab the back of your head and clamp her thighs around your ears like a vice. But to be on the safe side, ask her beforehand to let you know what she likes. Once you hit her hot spot, there's no need to rush; just keep her engine revving. Feel free to explore some other techniques or positions before you take her over the top.

Rachel- TIPS

1. ABC's.

This is perhaps the most common tip when you eat pussy: use your tongue to trace the letters of the alphabet on her clit. Some people swear by it. I don't recommend it. I don't think it's a good technique. Also, it's too much of a distraction, and if she catches you humming the Alphabet Song under your breath, you're busted. You should be paying attention to her, not what comes after Q.

2. Use your hands.

You can create some wild sensations for her by stimulating her clit with both your fingers and your tongue simultaneously. Also, most women enjoy a finger or two in their PUSSY while being eaten out. Insert your fingers with your palm up, crook them slightly, and stroke toward you in a 'come hither' motion to hit her G-spot. A finger up the CLIT will also drive her over the edge if she's into anal play. (As always, to avoid infection, if you put something in her ASS, make sure you don't put it in her pussy or mouth afterward.) You can if she wants but asks.

3. Stick out your tongue.

You can also use your tongue to penetrate her- just make it rigid and plunge in. You can then tongue- CLIT, and PUSSY and kiss her by moving your tongue in and out, or by keeping it stationary and bobbing your whole head. For bonus points, try stimulating her clit with your nose while your tongue is inside her.

4. Let her ride.

Put a pillow or two under your neck and let her sit on your face. This gives you a nice view of her PUSSY and junk and gives her a degree of control over pressure and position. Let her grind her juices all over your mug.

Um...

Part: 3

#- Lez-bo's! Maddie and Olivia

Rachel- Boys balls are hairy- and gross not tasty at all to me.

For a second, we just stare at each other. If Kellie makes a noise, or gets out of bed, or does anything, she's bound to wake Hanna, and then I'm done to make a baby, finished, kaput. I'm trying to think of what I can say to reassure her, trying to fabricate a lie, but then, the miracle of miracles, she just lies back down in bed and closes her eyes. And even though it's very dark, I would swear that there's the smallest smile on her face.

I feel a quick rush of relief. One good thing about the fact that Gracie refuses to speak? I know she won't tell me. I slip out into the street without any other problems, even remembering to skip the third-to-last stair, which last time let out such an awful squeak, I thought for sure Hanna and the teenage girls wake up all in the same bad.

Lying side by side ass naked.

After the noise and the commotion of the raids, the street is freakily still and quiet. Every single window is dark, all the blinds drawn, like the houses are trying to turn away from the street, or put up their shoulders against prying eyes.

Almost...

The Raiders have moved on.

I start quickly in the direction of the Highlands. I'm too afraid to take my bike. I'm worried the little reflective patch on the wheels will attract too much attention.

I can't think about what I'm doing, I can't think about the consequences if I'm caught. A stray piece of red paper sweeps by me, turning on the wind like the tumbleweed you see in old cowboy movies.

I recognize it as a raider's notice, a proclamation filled with impossible- to pronounce words explaining the legality of suspending everyone's rights for the evening. Other than that, it could be any other night-any other quiet, dead, ordinary night.

Excluding that on the wind, just faintly, you can hear the distant murmur of footsteps, and a high wail as if someone is crying. The sounds are so quiet you might almost mistake them for ocean and wind sounds.

I don't know where I even got this rush of resolution. I would never have thought I would have the courage to leave the house on a raid night, not in a million years.

I guess Hanna was wrong about me. I guess I'm not scared all the time. I'm passing a black trash bag heaped on the sidewalk when a low whimper stops me short. I spin around, my whole body on high alert in an instant. Nothing. The sound is repeated: an eerie, crooning sound that makes the hair on my arms stand up. Then the garbage bag by my feet shakes itself.

No. Not a garbage bag. It's Riley, the Next door' black yappy f*cking ass and a 2 by 4 in it- a mutt.

I take a few shaky steps toward him. I need only one glance to know that he's dying. He's completely coated with a sticky, shiny, black substance-blood, I realize as I get closer.

That's the reason I mistook his fur, in the dark, for the slick black surface of a plastic bag. One of his eyes is pressed to the pavement; the other is open. His head has been clubbed in.

Blood is flowing freely from his nose, black and viscous. I think of the voice I heard- probably has fleas, anyway, the regulator said- and the swift thudding sound that followed.

Hanna is staring at me with a look so mournful and accusatory I swear for a second it's like he's a human and he's trying to tell me something trying to say, you did this to me. A wave of nausea overtakes me, and I'm tempted to get down on my knees and scoop him up in my arms, or strip off my clothes and start soaking the blood off him. But at the same time, I feel paralyzed. I can't move.

As I'm standing there, frozen, he gives a long, shuddering jerk, from the tip of his tail to his nose. Then he goes still. Instantly my arms and legs unfreeze.

Part: 4

I- Rachel stumble backward, bile pushing itself up into my mouth. I career in a full circle, feeling like I did the day I got drunk with Hana, totally out of control of my own body. Anger and disgust are shredding through me, making me want to scream. I find a flattened cardboard box sitting behind a Dumpster and drag it over to Kellie's body, covering her completely. I try not to think of the insects that will tear into him by morning. I'm surprised to feel tears prick at my eyes. I wipe them away with the back of my arm. But as I start toward Deering all I can think is, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, like a mantra, or a prayer.

One good thing about raids: They're loud. All I have to do is pause in the shadows and listen for the footsteps, the static, the freak'n harsh voices. I switch directions, choose the side streets, the ones that have been skipped over or raided already. The people who live in these houses have been identified as troublemakers or resisters. The burning wind whistling through the streets carries sounds of yelling and crying, dogs barking.

Kellie- I do my best not to think about

Hanna.

Part: 5

#- She was embarrassed when she did this for the first time- normal!

Rachel- Evidence of the raids is everywhere: overturned garbage cans and Dumpsters, trash picked through and spilled out onto the street, mountains of old receipts and shredded letters and rotting vegetables and foul-smelling goop I don't even want to identify, red notices coating everything like a speck of dust. My shoes get slick from clomping over it, and in the worst places, I have to keep my arms out like a tightrope walker just to stay on my feet. I pass a few houses marked with a big X, black paint splashed across their walls and windows like a black gash, and my stomach sinks.

I stick to the shadows, slipping in and out of alleys and darting from one Dumpster to the next. Sweat is pooling at the base of my neck and under my arms, and it's not just from the heat. Everything looks strange and grotesque and distorted, certain streets glittering with glass from smashed windows, the smell of burning in the air. At one point, I come around a corner onto Forest Avenue just as a group of regulators turns onto it from the other end. I whip back around, pressing flat against the wall of a hardware store and inching back in the direction I've come.

The chances any of the regulators saw me are slim- I was a block away and its pitch-black-but still, my heart never goes back to its normal pace. I feel like I'm playing some giant video game or trying to solve a complicated math equation.

One girl is trying to avoid forty raiding parties of between fifteen to twenty people each, spread out across a radius of seven miles. If she has to make it 2.8 miles through the center, what is the probability she will wake up tomorrow morning in a jail cell?

~*~

Before the shakedown, Deering

Highlands was a nicer part of Pittsburgh.

The houses were big and new-at least For Hanna, which means they were built within the past hundred years-and set back behind gates and hedges, on streets with names like Kellie and the other girl.

Road... There are a few families still clinging on in some of the houses, dirt-poor ones who can't afford to move anywhere else, or haven't gotten permission for a new residence, but for the most part, it's empty. Nobody wanted to stay on; nobody wanted to be associated with the resistance.

The weirdest thing about Deering Highlands is how quickly it was abandoned. There are still rusting toys scattered among the grass and cars parked in some of the driveways, though most of them have been picked apart, cleaned of metal and malleable like corpses scavenged by enormous buzzards.

The whole area has the forlorn look of an abandoned animal: houses drooping slowly into the overgrown lawns.

Normally, I get freaked out just being in the vicinity of the Highlands. A- a lot of people say it's bad luck, like passing a graveyard without holding your breath.

But tonight, when I finally make it there, I feel like I could dance a jig on the sidewalk. Everything is dark and quiet and undisturbed, not a single raider's notice to be seen, not a whisper of conversation or the brush of a heel on a sidewalk. The Raiders haven't come yet.

Maybe they won't come at all. I speed quickly through the streets, picking up the pace now that I don't have to worry so much about sticking to the shadows and moving soundlessly. Highlands is pretty big, a maze of winding streets that all look weirdly similar, houses looming out of the darkness like ships run aground. The lawns have all gone wild over the years, trees stretching their gnarled branches to the sky and casting crazy zigzag shadows on the moonlit pavement.

I get lost in Hanna- ah- way-somehow, I manage to make a complete circle and wind up hitting the same intersection twice-but when I turn onto jumble desolate lane I see a dull light burning dimly in the distance, behind a knotted mass of trees, and I know I've found the place.

An old mailbox is staked crookedly in the ground next to the driveway. A black X is still faintly visible on one of its sides.

Part: 6

I can see why they've chosen this house for the party. It's set back pretty far from the road and surrounded by trees so dense I can't help but think of the dark and whispering woods on the far side of the border. Walking up the driveway is creepy. I keep my eyes focused on the fuzzy pale light of the house, which expands and brightens slowly as I get closer, eventually resolving into two lit windows.

The windows have been covered with some kind of fabric, maybe to hide the fact that there are people inside. It isn't working. I can see shadow-people moving back and forth inside the house. The music is very quiet. It's not until I make it onto the porch that I hear it at all-faint, muffled strains that seem to vibrate up from the floorboards. There must be a basement.

I have been rushing to arrive, but I hesitate with my hand on the front door, my palm slick with sweat. I haven't given much thought to how I'll get everyone out. If I just start screaming about a raid it will cause a panic. Everyone will stream into the streets at once, and then the chances of getting home undetected go to zero. Someone will hear something; the raiders will catch on, and then we'll all be screwed.

I do a mental correction. They'll be screwed. I am not like these people on the other side of the door. I'm not them. But then I think of Hanna trembling, going limp. I am not those people either, the ones who did that, the ones who watched. Even the next door over didn't bother trying to save him, their dog.

They didn't even cover him up as he was dying.

I would never do that. Never - ever. Not even if I had a million procedures. He was alive. He had a heartbeat and blood and breath, and they left him there like trash.

Me- Us- We- Them- and They. The words ricochet in my head. I rub my palm and my hands on the back of my pants and open the door.

~*~

Rachel- said this party would be smaller, but to me, it seems even more crowded than the last one, maybe because the rooms are tiny and packed.

They are filled with a choking curtain of cigarette smoke, which shimmers over everything and makes it look as though everyone is swimming underwater. It's deathly hot in here, at least ten degrees hotter than it was outside-people move slowly and have rolled up their shirt sleeves above the shoulders, tugged their jeans to their knees, and wherever there is skin, there is a glistening sheen on it. For a moment I can only stand there and watch. I think I wish I had a camera. If I ignore the fact that there are hands touching hands and bodies bumping together and a thousand things that are terrible and wrong, I can see that it's kind of beautiful.

Part: 7

#- Nice- butt-hole Liv! Ha- crack head!

Then I realize I'm wasting time.

A girl is standing directly in front of me, blocking my way. She has her back to me. I reach out and put a hand on her arm. Her skin is so hot it burns. She turns to me, face red and flushed, craning her head backward to hear.

'It's a raid night,' I say to her, surprised that my voice comes out so steady.

The music is soft but insistent-it's coming up from a basement of some kind-not as crazy as the last time but just as strange and just as gorgeous. It reminds me of warm, dripping things, honey and sunlight and red leaves swirling down on the wind. But the layers of conversation, the creaking of footsteps and floorboards, make it difficult to hear.

'What?' She sweeps her hair away from her ear.

I open my mouth to say raid but instead of my voice it's someone else's that, comes out: an enormous, mechanical voice bellowing from outside, a voice that seems to shake and rattle from all sides at once, a voice that cuts through the warmth and the music like a cold razor edge through the skin.

At the same time, the room starts spinning, a swirling mass of red and white lights revolving over terrified, stunned faces.

'Attention. This is a raid. Do not try to run. Do not try to resist. This is a raid.'

A few seconds later, the door explodes inward and a spotlight as bright as the sun turns everything white and motionless, turns everything to dust and statue.

Then they let the dogs loose. Kellie- The worst part-the the part I have never- ever forgotten- was its panicked roaring: a horrible, incessant, enraged bellow that sounded somehow human.

That's what I think of as the raiders start flooding the house, pouring in through the shattered door, battering on the windows. That's what I think of as the music cuts off suddenly and instead, the air is full of barking and screaming and shattering glass, as hot hands push me from the front and the side and I catch an elbow under my chin and another one in my ribs.

I remember the bear...

Human beings, in their natural state, are unpredictable, erratic, and unhappy. It is only once their animal instincts are controlled that they can be responsible, dependable, and content.

I once saw a news report about a brown bear, that had accidentally been punctured by its trainer at the Pittsburgh circus during routine training. I was young, but I'll never forget the way the bear looked, a mammoth dark blob, tearing around its circle with a ridiculous red paper hat still flopping crazily from its head, ripping into whatever it could get its jaws around: paper streamers, folding chairs, balloons. Its trainer, too: The bear mauled him, turned his face into hamburger meat.

Somehow, I've surged forward in the panicked crowd that is flowing and scrabbling toward the back of the house. Behind me, I hear dogs snapping their jaws and regulators swinging heavy clubs. Folks are screaming- so many people it sounds like a single voice.

A girl falls behind me, stumbling forward and reaching for me as one of the regulator's batons catches her on the back of the head with a sickening crack. I feel her fingers tighten momentarily on the cotton of my shirt, and I shake her off and keep running, pushing, squeezing forward. I have no time to be sorry and no time to be scared. I have no time to do anything but move, push, go, can't think of anything but escape, escape, escape.

The strange thing is that for a minute in the middle of all that noise and confusion, I see things super clearly, in slow motion, like I'm watching a film from a distance: I see a guard dog leap over a guy to my left; I see his knees buckle as he topples forward with the barest, tiniest noise, like a breath or a sigh, a crescent of blood spattering up from his neck, where the dog's teeth tear into him.

A girl with flashing blond hair goes down under the raiders' clubs, and as I see the arc of her hair, for a second my heart goes still, and I think I've died; I think it's all over. Then she twists her head my way, shouting, as the regulators get her with pepper spray, and I see that she isn't Rachel, and relief rushes through me, a wave.

More snapshots. A movie-only a movie. Not happening, could never really happen. A boy and a girl, fighting to make it into one of the side rooms, maybe thinking there's an exit that way.

The door is too small for both of them to enter at once. He is wearing a blue shirt that reads Pittsburgh NAVAL SCHOOL OF THE ARTS, and she has long red hair, bright as a flame. Only five minutes ago they were talking and laughing together, standing so close that if one of them had even tipped forward accidentally they might have kissed.

Now they wrestle, but she is too small. She locks her teeth on his arm like a dog, like a wild thing; he roars, rages grab her by the shoulders, and slams her back against the wall, out of the way.

She stumbles, falls, slipping, trying to stand up; one of the raiders, an enormous man with the reddest face I've ever seen, reaches down, knots his fingers around her ponytail, and hauls her to her feet.

Naval Conservatory doesn't get away either. Two raiders follow him, and as I run by- I hear the thud of their clubs, the mangled sound of screaming.

They've got the place surrounded. And then the open back door rises in front of me- and beyond it- dark trees, the cool and whispering woods behind the house. If I can make it outside - if I can hide from the lights for long enough- animals, I think. We're animals. People are shoving, pulling, using one another as shields as the raiders keep gaining, surging forward, swinging at us, dogs at our heels, batons whirling so close to my head I can feel the air whooshing on my neck as the wood twirls, twirls near the back of my skull. I think of searing pain, I think of red.

The crowd is thinning around me as the raiders advance. One by one people is screaming next to me-crack! And dropping, getting wrestled to the ground by three, four, five dogs. Screaming, screaming. Everyone screaming.

Somehow, I have managed to avoid being caught, and I'm still rocketing through the narrow, creaking hallways, passing a blur of rooms, a blur of publics and raiders, more lights, more devastating windows, the sound of engines. I hear a dog barking behind me, and behind that, a raider's pounding footsteps, gaining, gaining, a sharp voice yelling, 'Halt!' and I suddenly realize- I'm alone in the hallway. Fifteen more steps - then ten. If I can make it into the darkness-

Five feet from the door and sudden, shooting pain rips through my leg. The dog has got its jaws around my calf, and I turn and that's when I see him, the regulator with the massive red face, eyes glittering, smiling-oh, God, he's smiling, he enjoys this-club raised, ready to swing. I close my eyes, think of pain as big as the ocean, think of a blood-red sea. Think of my mother.

Then I'm being jerked to the side, and I hear a crack and a yelp, the regulator saying, 'Shit.' The fire in my leg stops and the weight of the dog falls off, and there's an arm around my waist and a voice in my ear-a voice so familiar in that moment it's like I've been waiting for it all along like I've been hearing it forever in my dreams-breathing out:

'This way.' Rachel keeps one arm around my waist, half carrying me. We're in a different hallway now, this one smaller and empty. Every time I put weight on my right leg the pain flares up again, searing into my head. The raider is still behind us and pissed -Hanna must have pulled me to safety at just the right second, so the raider cracked down on his dog instead of my skull and I know I must be slowing Kellie down, but he doesn't let me go, not for a second.

'In here,' she says, and then we're ducking into another room. We must be in a part of the house that wasn't being used for the party. This room is pitch- black, although Rachel doesn't slow down at all, just keeps going through the dark. I let the heaviness of his fingertips guide me- left, right, left, right. It smells like mold in here, besides approximately else- fresh paint, almost, and something smoky, like someone's, been cooking here. But that's impossible. These houses have been empty- for years.

Behind us, the raider is struggling in the dark. He bumps up against something and curses. A second later something crashes to the ground; glass shatters; more cursing. From the sound of his voice, I can tell that he's falling behind. 'Up,' Kellie whispers, so quiet and so close it's like I've only imagined it, and just like that he is lifting me, and I realize I'm going out a window, feel the rough wood of the windowsill grate against my back, land on my good foot on the soft, damp grass outside.

Part: 8

Photos of Madalyn or as we girl's call here- Maddie! No makeup! Yet Maddie always looks gross- to me... ha- love- her too!

Rachel- dick in a condom- I think to myself- A second later Hanna follows soundlessly, materializing beside me in the dark. Though the air is hot, a breeze has picked up, and as it sweeps across my skin I could cry from gratitude and relief.

But we're not safe yet far from it. The darkness is mobile, twisting, alive with paths of light: Flashlights cut through the woods to our right and left, and in their glare, I see fleeing figures, lit up like ghosts like an angel like the dark that was Jenny, frozen for a moment in the beams. The screams continue, some only a few feet away, some so distant and forlorn you could mistake them for something else-for owls, maybe, hoot peacefully in their trees.

Then Kellie sees Jenny all the time that way or, so she said. has taken my hand and we're running again. Every single step on my right or left foot is a fire down below, a blade. I bite the inside of my cheeks to keep from crying out, as well as taste blood. It's falling apart, and so overgrown with moss and climbing vines that even from a distance of only a few feet it appeared to be a tangle of bushes and trees. I do what he says without irresolute. A tiny wooden shed has appeared miraculously in the dark. I have to stoop to get inside, and when I do the smell of animal urine and the wet dog is so strong I almost gag.

Confusion... Scenes from hell: floodlights from the road, shadows falling, bone-cracking, voices shattering apart, dissolving into silence.

'In here.' Alex comes in behind me and shuts the door. I hear a rustling and see him kneeling, stuffing a blanket in the gap between the door and the ground. The blanket must be the source of the smell. It reeks.

'God,' I whisper, the first thing I've said to him, cupping my hand over my mouth and nose.

'This way the dogs won't pick up our scent,' he whispers back matter-fact- like.

I've never met someone so calm in my life. I think fleetingly that maybe the stories I heard when I was little where true-maybe Invalids are monsters, freaks.

Then I feel embarrassed... He just saved my life.

He saved my life-from the raiders. From the people who are supposed to protect us and keep us safe. From the people who are supposed to keep us safe from the people like Hanna or her. Nothing makes sense anymore. My head is spinning, and I feel dizzy. I stumble, bumping against the wall behind me, and Alex reaches up to steady me.

‘Sit down,’ he says, in that same commanding voice he has been using all along. It’s comforting to listen to his low, forceful directives, to let myself go. I lower myself to the ground. The floor is damp and rough underneath me.

The moon must have broken through the clouds; gaps in the walls and roof let in little spots of silvery light. I can just make out some shelves beyond Kellie or her or even her. head, a set of cans-paint, maybe? - Piled in one corner. Now that Hanna and I- Rachel, are both sitting there’s hardly any room left to maneuver-the whole structure is only a few feet wide.

‘I’m going to take a look at your leg now, okay?’ He’s still whispering. I nod okay. Even when I’m sitting down, the dizziness doesn’t subside. He sits upon his knees and draws my leg into his lap. It’s not until he begins rolling up my pant leg that I feel how wet the fabric is against my skin. I must be bleeding. I bite my lip and press my back up hard against the wall, expecting it to hurt, but the feeling of his hands against my skin-cool and strong- somehow dampens the whole kit and caboodle, sliding across the pain like an eclipse blotting the moon dark.

Once he has my pants rolled up to the knee, he tilts me gently, so he can see the back of my calf. I lean one elbow on the floor, feeling the room swaying. I must be bleeding a lot.

She let your breath out suddenly, a quick sound between her teeth.

‘Is it bad is it not?’ I say, too afraid to look. ‘Hold still,’ he says, like- I know that it is bad, but he won’t tell me so, and at that moment I’m so flooded with gratitude for him and hatred for the people outside-hunters, primitives; with their sharp teeth and heavy sticks, and the air goes out of me- and I have to struggle to breathe.

I not so into Kellie as I am Hanna, you see that I love them both yet her more, do you get that.

Yet we all want the same boy- so I do what I have too.

It’s nine inches cock- so yeah... ha- maybe be not- but you’ll never know.

Hanna reaches into a corner of the shed without removing my leg from his lap. He fiddles with a box of some kind and metal latches creak open. A second later he’s hovering over my leg with a bottle.

‘This is going to burn for a second,’ he says. Liquid splatters my skin, and the astringent smell of alcohol makes my nostrils flare. Flames lick up my leg and I nearly scream. Alex reaches out a hand, and without thinking I take it and squeeze.

‘What is that?’ I force out through gritted teeth.

‘Rubbing alcohol,’ he says. ‘Prevents infection.’

‘How did you know it was here?’ I ask, but he doesn’t answer.

He draws his hand away from mine and I realize I’ve been grabbing on to him, hard. But I don’t have the energy to be embarrassed or afraid: The room seems to be pulsing, the half-darkness growing fuzzier.

‘Shit,’ Kellie mutters. ‘You’re bleeding.’

‘It doesn’t hurt that much,’ I whisper, which is a lie. But he’s so calm, so together, it makes me want to act brave too.

Everything has taken on a strange, distant quality-the sound of running and shouting outside get warped and weird like they’re being filtered through water, and Kellie looks miles away. I start to think I might be dreaming, or about to pass out. And then I decide I’m dreaming because as I’m watching, Kellie starts peeling her shirt off over her head.

What are you doing? I almost scream. Kellie finishes shaking loose the shirt and begins tearing the fabric into long strips, shooting a nervous glance at the door and pausing to listen every time the cloth goes rip.

Part: 9

I’ve never in my whole life seen a guy without a shirt on, except for really little kids or from a distance on the beach, when I’ve been too afraid to look for fear of getting in trouble.

Now I can’t stop staring. The moonlight just touches his shoulder blades so they glow slightly, like wingtips, like pictures of angels I’ve seen in textbooks. Hanna, she’s thin but muscular, too: When he moves, I can make out the lines of his arms and chest, so strangely, incredibly, beautifully different from a girl’s, a body that makes me think of running and being outside, of warmth and sweating. Heat starts beating through me, a thrumming feeling like a thousand tiny birds have been released in my chest.

I'm not sure if it's from the bleeding, but the room feels like it's spinning so fast we're in danger of flying out of it, both of us, getting thrown out into the night. Before, Kellie seemed far away. Now the room is full of him: He is so close I can't breathe, can't move or speak or think. Every time he brushes me with his fingers, time seems to teeter for a second, like it is in danger of dissolving. The whole world is dissolving, I decide, except for us. Us.

'Hey.' He reaches out and touches my shoulder, just for a second, but in that second my body shrinks down to that single point of pressure under his hand and glows with warmth. I've never felt like this, so calm and peaceful. Maybe I'm dying... The idea doesn't upset me, for some reason. It seems kind of funny. 'You okay?' 'Fine.' I start to giggle softly. 'You're naked.'

'What?' Even in the dark, I can tell he's squinting at me.

'I've never seen a boy like-like that.

With no shirt on. Not up close.' He begins wrapping the shredded T-shirt around my leg carefully, tying it tight. 'The dog got you good,' he says.

'But this should stop the bleeding.' The phrase stop- the bleeding sounds so clinical and scary it snaps me awake and helps me to focus. Kellie finishes tying off the makeshift bandage. Now the searing pain in my leg has been replaced by dull, throbbing pressure. Alex lifts my leg carefully out of his lap and rests, it on the ground. 'Okay?' he says, and I nod.

Then he scoots around next to me, leaning back against the wall like I am so we're sitting side by side, arms just touching at the elbows. I can feel the heat coming off his bare skin, and it makes me feel hot. I close my eyes and try not to think about how close we are, or what it would feel like to run my hands over his shoulders and chest.

Outside, the sounds of the raid grow more and more distant, the screams fewer, the voices fainter. The raiders must be passing on. I say a silent prayer that Hana managed to escape; the possibility that she didn't is too terrible to contemplate.

Still, Kellie and I don't move. I'm so tired I feel like I could sleep forever. Home seems impossible, incomprehensibly far away, and I don't see how I'll ever make it back. Kellie starts speaking all at once, his voice a low, urgent rush: 'Listen, Liv. What happened at the beach- I'm sorry? I should have told you sooner, but I didn't want to frighten you away.' 'You don't have to explain,' I say.

'But I want to explain. I want you to know that I didn't mean to-' 'Listen,' I cut him off. 'I'm not going to tell anyone, okay? I'm not going to get you in trouble or anything.' She pauses. I feel him turn to look at me, but I keep my eyes fixed on the darkness in front of us.

'I don't care about that,' she says, lower. Another pause, and then: 'I just don't want you to hate me.' Again, the room seems to be shrinking, closing in around us. I can feel his eyes on me like the hot pressure of touch, but I'm too afraid to look at him. I'm afraid that if I do, I'll lose myself in his eyes, forget all the things I'm supposed to say.

Outside, the woods have fallen silent.

The raiders must have left. After a second the crickets begin singing all at once, warbling throatily, a great swelling of sound.

'Why do you care?' I say, barely a whisper.

'I told you,' he whispers back. I can feel his breath just tickling the space behind my ear, making the hair prick up on my neck. 'I like you.'

'You don't know me,' I say quickly.

'I want to, though.' The room is spinning more and more quickly. I press up more confidently against the wall, trying to stable myself against the feeling of dizzying movement.

It's impossible: She has an answer for everything. It's too quick. It must be a trick. I press my palms against the damp floor, taking comfort in the solidity of the rough wood.

Part: 10

'Why me?'

I don't mean to ask it, but the words slide out. 'I'm nobody.' I want to say, I'm nobody special, but the words dry up in my mouth. This is what I imagine it feels like to climb to the top of a mountain, where the air is so thin you can inhale and inhale and inhale and still feel like you can't take a breath.

Ray doesn't answer, and I realize he doesn't have an answer, just like I suspected - there's no reason for it at all. He's picked me at random, as a joke, or because he knew I'd be too scared to tell on him.

'My point is that it's possible to get in and out. Difficult, but possible. I moved in with two strangers-supporters, both of them and was told to call them my aunt and uncle.' He shrugs ever so slightly next to me. 'I didn't care. I'd never known my real parents, and I'd been raised by dozens of different aunts and uncles. It didn't make a difference to me.'

But then he starts speaking. His story is so rapid and fluid you can tell he has thought about it a lot, the kind of story you tell over and over to yourself until the edges get all smoothed over. 'I was born in the Wilds.

My mother died right afterward; my father's death. He never knew he had a son. I lived there for the first part of my life, just kind of bouncing around. All the other' - he hesitates slightly, and I can hear the grimace in his voice- 'Invalids took care of me together. Like a community thing...'

Outside, the crickets pause temporarily in their song. For a second it's like nothing bad has happened like nothing has happened tonight out of the ordinary at all-just another hot and lazy summer night, waiting for morning to peel it back. Pain knives through me at that moment, but it has nothing to do with my leg. It strikes me how small everything is, our whole world, everything with meaning-our stores and our raids and our jobs and our lives, even.

Meanwhile, the world just goes on the same as always, night cycling into day and back into the night, an endless circle; seasons shifting and reforming like a monster shaking off its skin and growing it again.

Ray keeps talking. 'I came into Pitt when I was ten, to join up with the resistance here. I won't tell you how. It was complicated. I got an ID number; I got a new last name, a new home address. There are more of us than you think- Invalids, and supporters, too- more of us than anybody distinguish. We have people in the police force and all the municipal subdivisions. We have people in the labs, even.' Goosebumps pop up all over my arms when he says this.

I love her and him too what can I do...

I have fallen to them.

The tied bit with me- at the top of your vag. do you ever just tickle and pull up where the hair and end and the shat starts, and it pulls the hood up some and feels so good? Just the tip poops out a little, do you do that?

Part: 11

Anne's face turned colors, as though Maggie was watching her on a screen and someone had just adjusted the contrast. 'You're - you're joking.'

Maggie managed to shake her head.

'How?' Anne said.

Before Maggie could speak, Joh- John cut in, 'It was my fault.' At last, Maggie found her voice.

'No. Joh- John had nothing to do with it. It was me. It was - the game.'

'The game?' Anne squinted at Maggie as she'd never seen her before. 'The game?' 'Terror,' Maggie said. Her voice was hoarse. 'I opened the gates... I must have forgotten to lock them again.' For a second, Anne was silent. Her face was awful to see: white and ghastly. Horrified.

'But I was the one who told her to do it,' Joh- John said suddenly. 'It's my fault...'

No.' Maggie was embarrassed that Joh- John felt he had to stand up for her, even as she was grateful to him. 'He had nothing to do with it.'

'I did.' Joh- John's voice got louder.

He was sweating. 'I told her to do it. I told all of them to do it. I started the fire at the Graybill place. I'm the one.'

His voice broke. He turned to Maggie.

His eyes were pleading, desperate. 'I'm a judge. That's what I wanted to tell you. That's what I wanted to explain. What you saw the other day, with Vivian -' He didn't finish.

Maggie couldn't speak either. She felt like time had stopped; they were all transformed into statues. Joh- John's words were sifting through her like snow, freezing her insides, her ability to speak.

Impossible... Not Joh- John. He hadn't even wanted her to play...

'I don't believe it.' She heard the words, and only then realized she was speaking.

'It's true...' Now he turned back to Anne. 'It wasn't Maggie's fault. You have to believe me.' Anne brought her hand briefly to her forehead, as though pressing back pain.

She closed her eyes... Lily was still standing several feet away, shifting her weight, anxious and silent. Anne opened her eyes again. 'We need to call the police,' she said quietly. 'They'll need to put out the alert.'

Joh- John nodded. But for a second no one moved. Maggie wished Anne would yell-it would be so much easier.

And Joh- John's words kept swirling through her: I told her to do it. I told all of them to do it.

'Come on, Lily,' Anne said.

'Come inside with me.' Maggie started to follow them into the house, but Anne stopped her. 'You wait out here,' she said sharply. 'We'll talk in a bit.'

Her words brought little knife aches of pain to Maggie's stomach. It was all over. Anne would hate her now. Lily shot Maggie a worried glance and then hurried after Anne. Joh- John and Maggie was left standing alone in the yard, as the sun pushed through the clouds and the day transformed into a microscope, focusing its heat.

'I'm sorry, Maggie,' Joh- John said. 'I couldn't tell you. I wanted to-you to have to know that. But the rules-'

‘The rules?’ she repeated. The anger was bubbling up from a crack opening inside her. ‘You lied to me. About everything. You told me not to play, and all this time.’

‘I was trying to keep you safe,’ he said. ‘And when I knew you would not back down, I tried to help you.’

Whenever I could, I tried.’ Joh- John had moved closer and his arms were out-he was reaching for her. She took a step backward.

‘You almost got me killed,’ she said. ‘The gun- if it wasn’t for Marcel.’

‘I told Marcel to do it,’ Joh- John cut in. ‘I made sure of it.’ Click-click-click. Memories slotted together: Joh- John insisting on taking the shortcut that led past Trigger-Happy Jack’s house. The fireworks at the Graybill house on the Fourth of July, which Joh- John made sure she would see.

A clue: fire.

‘You have to believe me, Maggie.’

I never meant to lie to you.’

‘So why did you do it, Joh- John?’

Maggie crossed her arms. She didn’t want to listen to him. She wanted to be angry. She wanted to give in to the black tide, let it suck away all her other thoughts about the tigers, about how badly she had disappointed Anne, about how she would be homeless again.

‘What did you need to prove so badly, huh?’ More parts of her were flaking off. Crack. ‘That you’re better than us? Smarter than us? We get it, okay? You’re leaving.’ Crack. ‘You’re getting out of here. That makes you smarter than the whole fucking rest of us put together.’ Joh- John’s mouth was as thin as a line. ‘You know what your problem is?’ he said quietly. ‘You want everything to be shitty. You have a sister who loves you. Friends who love you. I love you, Maggie.’ He said it recklessly, in a mumble, and she could not even be happy, for the reason that, he kept going.

‘You’ve endured almost everyone in Fear. But all you see is the crap. So, you don’t have to believe in anything. So, you’ll have an excuse to fail.’ Crack. Maggie turned around, so if she started crying again, he wouldn't see. But she realized she had nowhere to go. There was the house, the high bowl of the sky, the sun like a laser.

And she, Maggie, had no place in any of it. The last bits of her broke apart, opened like a wound: she was all hurt and anger.

'You know what I wish? I wish you were gone already.'

She thought he might start yelling. She was almost hoping he would. But instead, he just sighed and rubbed his forehead. 'Look, Maggie. I don't want to fight with you. I want you to understand-'

'Didn't you hear me? Just go.'

Leave... Get out of here.' She swiped at her eyes with the palm of her hand. His voice was screaming in her head. You want everything to be shitty - so you'll have an excuse to fail.

'Maggie.' Joh- John put a hand on her shoulder, and she shook him off.

'I don't know how many other ways I can say it.' Joh- John hesitated. She felt him close to her, felt the warmth of his body, like a comforting force, like a blanket. For one wild second, she thought he would refuse, he would turn around and hug her and tell her he was never leaving. For one wild second, it was what she wanted more than anything. Instead, she felt his fingers just graze her elbow.

'I did it for you,' he said in a low voice. 'I was planning to give you the money.' His voice cracked a little. 'Everything I've ever done is for you, Maggie.' Then he was gone. He turned around, and by the time she couldn't stand it anymore and her legs were about to give out and the anger had turned to eight different tides pulling her to pieces, and she thought to turn around and call out for him-by then he was in the car and couldn't hear her.

It was an upside-down day for Carp. Joh- John Marks turned himself into the police for the murder of Little Kelly- even though, as it turned out, Little Kelly hadn't been killed in the fire at the Graybill house.

Still, no one could believe it: Joh- John Marks, that nice kid from down the way, whose dad had a frame shop over in Hudson. Shy kid. One of the good ones. At the police station, Joh- John denied the fire had anything to do with Panic. A prank, he said. Upside down and inside out.

Sign of the messed-up times we're living in. That night, Kirk Finnegan came outside when his dogs began to go crazy. He was carrying a rifle, suspecting drunk kids or maybe his piece-of-shit neighbor, who'd recently started parking on Kirk's property and couldn't be convinced that it wasn't his right. Instead, he saw a tiger.

A f*cking tiger, right there in his yard, with its enormous mouth around one of Kirk's cocker spaniels.

He thought he was dreaming, hallucinating, drunk. He was so scared he peed in his boxer shorts and didn't notice until later.

He acted without thinking, swung the rifle up, fired four shots straight into the tiger's flank, kept firing, even after it collapsed...

Even after by some grace-of-God miracle its jaws went slack, and his spaniel got to his feet and started barking again-kept firing, because those eyes kept staring at him, dark as an accusation or a lie.

Part: 12

TUESDAY,

AUGUST 16

Maggie-

MAGGIE HAD SUCCESSFULLY MANAGED TO AVOID talking to Anne for a whole day.

After her fight with Joh- John, she had walked two miles to the gully, and spent the afternoon cursing and throwing rocks at random things (street signs, when there were any; fences; and abandoned cars.)

His words played on endless repeat in her head. You want everything to be shitty - so you'll have an excuse to fail.

Unfair, she wanted to scream. But a second, smaller voice in her head said, True.

Those two words -unfair and true-pinged back and forth in her head, like her mind, was a giant Ping-Pong table. By the time she returned from the gully, it was evening and both Anne and Lily were gone.

She was seized with a sudden and irrational fear that Anne had taken Lily back to 'Fresh Pines'. Then she saw a note on the kitchen table.

Grocery store, it said simply.

It was only seven-thirty, but Maggie curled up in bed, under the covers, despite the stifling heat, and waited for sleep to put a stop to the Ping-Pong game in her mind.

Nonetheless, when she woke up early when the sun was still making its first, tentative entry into the room, poking like an exploratory animal through the blinds -she knew there was no avoiding it anymore.

Overnight, the Ping-Pong game had been resolved, and the word true had appeared victorious.

What Joh- John had said was true. She felt even worse than she had the day before, which she had not believed was possible.

Already, she could hear Anne noises from downstairs: the clink-clink-clink of dishes coming out of the dishwasher, the squeak of the old wooden floorboards.

When waking up in 'Fresh Pines' to the usual explosion of sounds-cars backfiring, people yelling, doors banging and dogs barking and loud music-she had dreamed of just this kind of home, where mornings were quiet and mothers did dishes and got up early and then yelled at you to get up.

Funny how in such a short time, Anne's house had become more like home than 'Fresh Pines' had ever been. And she had ruined it. Another truth...

By the time she came downstairs, Anne was on the porch. She called, Maggie out to her immediately, and Maggie knew: this was it.

Maggie was shocked to see a squad car parked some little ways down the drive, half pulled off into the underbrush. The cop was outside, leaning his butt against the hood of the car, drinking a coffee and smoking.

‘What’s he doing here?’ Maggie said, forgetting for a moment to be scared. Anne was sitting on the porch swing without swinging. Her knuckles around her mug of tea were very white.

‘They think the other one might come back.’ She looked down. ‘The ASPCA would at least use a stun gun...’ ‘The other one?’ Maggie said. ‘You didn’t hear?’ Anne said. And she told her: about Kirk Finnegan and his dog and the gunshots, twelve in total.

By the time she was done, Maggie’s mouth was as dry as sand. She wanted to hug Anne, but she was paralyzed, unable to move.

Anne shook her head. She kept her eyes on the mug of tea; she hadn’t yet taken a sip. ‘I know it was irresponsible, keeping them here.’ When she finally looked up, Maggie saw she was trying not to cry. ‘I just wanted to help. It was Larry’s dream, you know. Those poor cats. Did you know there are only thirty-two hundred tigers left in the wild? And I don’t even know which one was killed.’

‘Anne.’ Maggie finally found her voice. Even though she was standing, she felt like she was shrinking from the inside out until she was little-kid-sized.

‘I’m so, so, so sorry.’ Anne shook her head. ‘You shouldn’t be playing Panic,’ she said, and her voice momentarily held an edge.

‘I’ve heard too much about that game. People have died. But I don’t blame you,’ she added. Her voice softened again.

‘You’re not very happy, are you?’ Maggie shook her head. She wanted to tell Anne everything: about how she’d been dumped by Matt just when she was ready to say I love you; about how she realized now she hadn’t loved him at all, because she had always been in love with Joh- John; about her fears that she would never get out of Carp and it would eat her up, swallow her as it had her mom, turn her into one of those brittle, bitter women who are old and drug-eaten and done at twenty-nine.

But she couldn't speak. There was a thick knot in her throat.

'Come here.' Anne patted the swing next to her. And then, when Maggie sat down, she was shocked: Anne put her arms around her.

And all of a sudden Maggie was crying into her shoulder, saying, 'I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm so sorry.' 'Maggie.' Anne pulled away but kept one hand on Maggie's shoulder. With her other hand, she brushed the hair back from Maggie's face, where it was sticking to her skin. Maggie was too upset to be embarrassed. 'Listen to me.

I'm not sure what this means for you and Lily. What I- did-keeping the tigers here - was illegal. If your mom wants to make a big deal out of it if the county wants the police might force you to go home. I'll do everything I can to keep you here for as long as you and Lily want to stay, but-' Maggie nearly choked. 'You-you're not kicking me out?'

Anne stared at her. 'Of course not.' 'But-' Maggie couldn't believe it. She must have misheard. 'I was the one who let the tigers out. It's all my fault.'

Anne rubbed her eyes and sighed. Maggie never thought of Anne as old, but at that moment, she truly looked at it.

Her fingers were brittle and sun-spotted, her hair a dull and uniform gray.

Someday she would die. Maggie's throat was still thick from crying, and she swallowed the feeling.

'You know, Maggie, I was with my husband for thirty years. Since we were kids. When we first got together, we had nothing. We spent our honeymoon hitchhiking in California, camping out.

We could not afford anything else. And some years were very hard. He could be moody...'

She made a restless motion with her hands. 'My point is, when you love someone, when you care for someone, you have to do it through the good and the bad. Not just when you're happy and it's easy. Do you understand?'

Maggie nodded, she felt as though there was a glass ball on her chest- something delicate and lovely gorgeous that might shatter and crack if she said the wrong word if she disturbed the balance in any way.

‘So - you’re not mad at me?’ she asked. Anne half laughed. ‘Of course, I’m mad at you,’ she said. ‘But that doesn’t mean I don’t want you to stay. That doesn’t mean I’ve stopped caring.’ Maggie looked down at her hands. Once again, she was too overwhelmed to speak.

She felt as though, just for a second, she had understood something vastly important, had had a glimpse of it: love, pure and simple and undemanding.

‘What’s going to happen?’ she said, after a minute.

‘I don’t know.’ Anne reached over and took one of Maggie’s hands. She squeezed... ‘It’s okay to be scared, Maggie,’ she said, in a low voice, like she was telling her a secret.

Maggie thought of Joh- John, and the fight she’d had with Nat. She thought about everything that had happened over the summer, all of the changes and tension and weird shifts, as though the air was blowing from somewhere unfamiliar. ‘I’m scared all the time,’ she whispered.

‘You’d be an idiot if you weren’t,’ Anne said. ‘And you wouldn’t be brave, either.’ She stood up. ‘Come on. I’m going to put the kettle on. This tea is ice cold.’ Joh- John had, for the most part, come clean to the police. He’d been questioned for the better part of three hours and had at last been released back home to his father, pending official charges.

But he’d lied about one thing. The game wasn’t over. There were still three players left.

It was time for the final challenge.

It was time for Joust.

Part: 13

THURSDAY,

AUGUST 18

Marcel-

Marcel KNEW IT WAS JUST A MATTER OF TIME before Joh- John came to see him. He didn't wait long.

Just three days after Joh- John had turned himself into the police for the Graybill fire, Marcel came home from work and spotted Joh- John's car.

He wasn't outside, though; Marcel was surprised to see that Dayna had let him in. Joh- John was sitting on the couch, hands on his knees, knees practically to his chin, he was so tall, and the couch was so low. And Dayna was reading in the corner like it was normal like they were friends.

'Hey,' Marcel said. Joh- John stood up, looking relieved. 'Let's go outside, okay?' Dayna looked at Marcel suspiciously. He could tell she was waiting for a sign, an indication that everything was okay. But he refused to give it to her. She had betrayed him-by changing, by suddenly flipping the script. Panic had been their game, a plan they had made together, a shared desire for revenge.

He knew that nothing could bring his sister back, and that, hurting Ray, or even killing him, would not restore Dayna's legs. But that was the whole point: Ray and Luke Hanrahan had stolen something Marcel could never get back.

So-o - Marcel was going to steal something from them. Now that Dayna was shifting, turning into someone he didn't know or recognize-telling him he was immature, criticizing him for playing, spending all her time with Ricky-he felt it even more strongly. It wasn't fair. It was all their fault.

Someone had to pay. Outside, he gestured for Joh- John to follow him into Meth Row. For once, there were signs of life here. Several people were sitting out on their sagging porches, smoking, drinking beers. One woman had snaked a TV out into the front yard with her. Everyone was hoping to catch a glimpse of the tiger; in just a few days, it had become an obsession.

'I'm out, you know,' Joh- John said abruptly. 'I won't get my cut or anything.

It was all pointless.' His voice was bitter. Marcel felt almost bad for him. He wondered why Joh- John had ever agreed to judge, to go along with it. Or why anyone else agreed to it, for that matter. Maybe all of them- the players, the judges, -Digging, even had their secrets. Maybe the money was only part of it, and the stakes were much higher for each of them.

Marcel said, 'We're almost at the end. Why back out now?'

'I don't have a choice. I broke the rules. I talked.' Joh- John took off his hat, ran a hand through his hair, then smashed his hat back on. 'Besides, I hate it. I always have. F*cking Fear...

It drives people crazy. It is crazy. I only did it because-' He looked down at his hands. 'I wanted to give Maggie my cut,' he said quietly. 'When she started playing, I had to keep going. To help her.

And keep her safe.' Marcel said nothing. In a screwed-up way, they were both acting out of love. Marcel felt sad that he hadn't gotten to know Joh- John better. There was so much he regretted. Not spending more time with Maggie, for example. They could have been real friends.

And Nat, of course. He'd royally screwed things up with her. He wondered if all of life would be like this: regret piled on regret.

'Did you ever do something bad for a good reason?' Joh- John blurted out suddenly.

Marcel almost laughed. Instead, he simply answered, 'Yes...!'

'So, what does that make us?'

Joh- John said. 'Good, or bad?' Marcel shrugged. 'Both, I guess,' he said. 'Like everybody else.' He felt a sudden pang of guilt. What he was doing -what he wanted to do to Ray-was bad. Worse than anything he'd ever done.

Nevertheless, there was that old saying: an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. That's all he was doing. Getting even.

After all, he wasn't the one who had started this.

Joh- John turned to him and stopped walking. 'I need to know what you're going to do,' he said. Joh- John looked so lost, standing there with his big arms and legs as if he didn't know how to work them.

‘I’m going to keep playing,’ Marcel said quietly. ‘We’re almost done. But not quite, not yet...’

Joh- John exhaled loudly, as though Marcel had just punched him in the stomach, even though he must have been expecting it. And Marcel suddenly knew how he could make Joh- John feel better, how he could do something good for a change, and how he could make sure that Ray lost.

‘I can keep Maggie safe,’ Marcel said. Joh- John stared at him. ‘I can make sure she doesn’t go up against Ray. I’ll make sure she doesn’t get hurt. Deal?’ Joh- John watched him for several long minutes.

Marcel could tell he was struggling with something; he probably didn’t trust- Marcel completely. Marcel couldn’t blame him.

‘What do I have to do?’ Joh- John said.

Marcel felt a weight lift from his chest. One step closer. Everything was slotting into place.

‘A car,’ he said. ‘I need to borrow a car.’

Marcel had been worried Maggie wouldn’t listen to him. After all, he was the one who’d told her all deals were off, no splits. However, when he asked her to meet him at Dot’s, she agreed. It was ten p.m. the only time the dinner was ever empty, in between the dinner rush and the late-night crowd when couples blasted from the bar next door came in for pancakes and coffee to sober them up.

He explained what he needed her to do. She’d ordered a coffee, made it light with cream. Now she stared at him mid-sip.

She set her cup back down.

‘You’re asking me to lose?’ she said.

‘Keep your voice down,’ Marcel said. His mom had worked the early shift and was probably out with Bill Kelly-they were practically goddamn inseparable at this, point-but he knew everyone else in Dot's. Including Ricky, whom he could see every time the kitchen door opened and closed, grinning and waving at him like an idiot.

Marcel had to admit the kid was pretty nice. He'd already sent out a free grilled cheese and some mozzarella sticks.

'Look, you don't want to go up against Ray, do you? The kid's a beast.' Marcel felt a tightening in his throat. He thought about why he was doing this- thought about Dayna wheeled home for the first time, Dayna falling out of bed in the night and crying for help, unable to climb back into bed. Dayna wheeling around, hopped up on pain meds, practically- comatose. And even though she'd seemed better and happier lately- hopeful, even he, Marcel, would never- ever forget. 'He'll knock you off the road, Maggie. You'll end up losing anyway.'

She made a face but said nothing.

He could tell she was thinking about it.

'If we play it my way, you still win,' he said, leaning over the table, tacky from years of accumulated grease.

'We split the money. And nobody gets hurt.' Except for Ray. She was quiet for a minute. Her hair was swept back into a ponytail, and she was flushed from a summer outside. All her freckles had kind of merged into a tan. She looked pretty. He wished he could tell her that he thought she was great. That he was sorry they had never been closer.

That he had fallen for her best friend and had messed it up.

But none of that mattered now.

'Why?' she asked finally, turning back to him. Her eyes were clear, gray-sh green, like an ocean reflecting the sky.

'Why do you want it so bad? It's not even the money, is it? It's about the win. It's about beating Ray.'

'Don't worry about it,' Marcel said a little roughly. The kitchen doors swung open again and there was Ricky, his cook's whites streaked with marinara sauce and grease, grinning and giving him the thumbs-up. Jesus. Did Ricky think he was on a date? He turned his attention back to Maggie. 'Listen. I promised Joh- John I would-'

'What's Joh- John got to do with it?' she asked sharply, cutting him off.

'Everything,' Marcel said. He drained his Coke glass of ice, enjoying the burn on his tongue. 'He wants you to be safe.'

Maggie looked away again. 'How do I know I can trust you?' she said finally.

'That's the thing about trust.' He crunched an ice cube between his teeth.

'You don't know.'

She stared at him for a long second.

'All right,' she said finally. 'I'll do it.' Outside, at the edge of the parking lot, the trees were dancing in the wind. Some of the leaves had already begun to turn. Gold ate up their edges. Others were splotted with red, as though diseased. Less than three weeks until Labor Day and the official end of summer.

Besides only a week until the showdown. After saying goodbye to Maggie, Marcel didn't go home straight away but spent some time walking the streets. He smoked two cigarettes, not because he wanted them, but because, he was enjoying the dark and the quiet and the cool wind, the smells of autumn coming: a clean smell, a wood smell, like a house newly swept and sprayed down.

He wondered whether the tiger was still loose. It must be; he hadn't heard anything about its capture. He half hoped he would see it, and half feared he would.

All in all, the conversation with Maggie had gone easier than he'd expected. He was so close.

Rigging the explosion, he knew, would be the hard part.

Part: 14

MONDAY,

AUGUST 22

Maggie-

IN THE DAYS FOLLOWING THE

TIGERS' ESCAPE, MAGGIE was so- anxious she couldn't sleep. She kept expecting Krista to show up with some court order, demanding that Lily return home. Or, even worse, for the cops or the ASPCA to show up and haul Anne off to jail.

What would she do then? But as more days passed, she relaxed. Maybe Krista realized she was happier with her daughters out of the house. That she wasn't meant to be a mother. All the things Maggie had heard her say a million times. And although the cops floated in and out, still trying to locate the second tiger, still patrolling Anne's property, and the ASPCA showed up to verify the conditions of the other animals and make sure they were all legal, Anne wasn't clapped in handcuffs and dragged away, as Maggie had feared.

Maggie knew, deep down, that her situation at Anne's was temporary. She couldn't stay here forever. In the fall, Lily had to go back to school. Anne was floating them, paying for them, but how long would that last? Maggie had to get a job, pay Anne back, do something. She just kept clinging to the hope that Panic would fix it: that with the money she earned, even if she had to split it with Marcel, she could rent a room from Anne or get her own space with Lily.

The longer she stayed away from 'Fresh Pines,' the more certain she became: she would never, ever go back there.

She belonged here, or somewhere like it somewhere with space, where no neighbors were crawling up your butt all the time and there was no shouting, no sounds of bottles breaking and people blasting music all night. Somewhere between animals and big trees and that fresh smell of hay and poop that somehow wasn't unpleasant. It was amazing how much she loved making the rounds, cleaning out the chicken coop and brushing the horses down and even sweeping the stalls. It was amazing, too, how good it felt to be wanted somewhere.

Because, Maggie believed, now, what Anne had said to her. Anne cared. Maybe even loved her, a little bit.

Which changed everything.

Three days until the final challenge. Now that Maggie knew how it would go down- that she would only be called on to lose in the first round of Joust, to Marcel-she felt incredibly relieved. The first thing she was going to do with the money bought Lily a new bike, which she'd been eyeing when they took a trip to Target the other day.

No! First, she would give Anne some money, and then she would buy a bike.

And then maybe a nice sundress for herself, and some strappy leather sandals. Something pretty to wear when she finally worked up the courage to talk to Joh- John-if she did.

She fell asleep and dreamed of him. He was standing with her on the edge of the water tower, telling her to jump, jump. Beneath her-far beneath her- was a swollen rush of water, interspersed with bright white lights, like unblinking eyes pasted in the middle of all that black water.

He kept telling her not to be afraid, and she didn't want to tell him she was terrified, so weak she couldn't move. Then Marcel was there. 'How are you going to win if you're scared of the jump?' he was saying. Suddenly Joh- John was gone, and the ledge under her feet wasn't metal, but a kind of wood, half-rotten, unstable.

Boom!

Marcel was swinging at it with a baseball bat, whittling away the wood, sending showers of splinters down toward the water. Boom. 'Jump, Maggie.' Boom. 'Maggie.'

'Maggie...'

Maggie woke up to double-ness- Lily whispering her name urgently, standing in the space between their beds; and also, like an echo, a voice from outside.

'Maggie Lynn!' the voice cried. Boom. The sound of a fist on the front door. 'Get down here! Get down here so I can talk to you.' 'Mom,' Lily said, just as Maggie placed the voice. Lily's eyes were wide.

'Get in bed, Lily,' Maggie said. She was awake in an instant. She checked her phone. 1:14 a.m. In the hall, a small fissure of light was showing underneath Anne's bedroom door.

Maggie heard sheets rustling. So, she'd been woken too. The banging was still going, and the muffled cries of 'Maggie!

I know you're in there. You going to ignore your mother?' Even before reaching the door, Maggie knew her mom was drunk. The porch light was on. When she opened the door, her mom was standing with one hand to her eyes, like she was shielding them from the sun. She was a mess.

Hair frizzy; shirt so low Maggie could see all the wrinkles of her cleavage and the white half-moons where her bikini had prevented a tan; jeans with stains; enormous wedge heels. She was having trouble standing in one place and kept taking miniature steps for balance.

'What the hell are you doing here?' 'What am I doing here?' She slurred... 'What are you doing here?' 'Leave.' Maggie took a step onto the porch, hugging herself. 'You have no right to be here. You have no right to come barging.'

'Right? Right? I got every right.' Her mom took an unsteady step forward, trying to move past her. Maggie blocked her, grateful, for the first time, that she was so big. Krista started shouting,

'Lily! Lily Anne! Where are you, baby?'

'Stop it.' Maggie tried to grab Krista by the shoulders, but her mom reeled away from her, swatting her hand.

'What's going on?' Anne had appeared behind them, blinking, wearing an old bathrobe. 'Maggie? Is everything okay?'

'You.' Krista took two steps forward before Maggie could stop her.

'You stole my babies.' She was weaving, swaying on her shoes. 'You a mother fucking bitch, I should-'

'Mom, stop!' Maggie hugged herself tightly, trying to keep her insides together, trying to keep everything from spilling out.

And Anne was saying, 'Okay, let's calm down, let's everyone calm down.'

Hands up, like she was trying to keep Krista at bay.

‘I don’t need to calm down-’

‘Mom, stop it!’

‘Get out of my way-’

‘Hold on, just hold on.’ And then a voice from the darkness beyond the porch: ‘What’s the trouble?’ A flashlight clicked on, just as the porch light went off. It swept over all of them in turn, like a pointed finger. Someone emerged from the dark, came heavily up the stairs, as the porch light, in response to his movement, clicked on again. The rest of them were momentarily frozen. Maggie had forgotten there was a patrol car parked in the woods. The cop was blinking rapidly like he’d been sleeping.

‘The problem,’ Krista said, ‘is that this woman has my babies. She stole them.’ The cop’s jaw was moving rhythmically like he was chewing gum.

His eyes moved from Krista to Maggie, to Anne, then back again. His jaw hinged left, right. Maggie held her breath.

‘That your car, ma’am?’ he said finally, jerking his head over his shoulder, where Krista’s car was parked.

Krista looked at it. Looked back at him. Something flickered in her eyes.

‘Yeah, so?’

He kept chewing, watching her.

‘Legal limit .08.’ ‘I’m not drunk.’ Krista’s voice was rising. ‘I’m as sober as you are.’ ‘You mind stepping over here for a minute?’ Maggie found herself ready to throw her arms around his neck and say thank you. She wanted to explain, but her breath was lodged in her throat.

‘I do mind.’ Krista sidestepped the cop as he took a step toward her. She nearly stumbled over one of the flowerpots. He reached out and grabbed her elbow. She tried to shake him off.

‘Ma’am, please. If you could just walk this way-’

‘Let go of me.’ Maggie watched it in slow motion.

There was a swell of noise. Shouting. And Krista was swinging her arm, bringing her fist to the officer’s face. The punch seemed amplified by a thousand: a ringing, hollow noise.

And then time sped forward again, and the cop was twisting Krista’s arms behind her as she bucked and writhed like an animal. ‘You are under arrest for assaulting a police officer.’

‘Let go...!’

‘You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law.’

She was like- handcuffed. Maggie didn’t know whether to feel relieved or terrified. Maybe both, Krista was still shouting at the cop led her off the porch, toward the squad car- calling up to Lily, screaming about her rights. Then she was in the car and the door closed and there was silence, except for the engine running on, the spit of gravel as the cop turned a circle. A sweep of headlights. Then darkness. The porch light had gone off again.

-And-

Maggie was shaking. When she could finally speak, the only thing she could say was: ‘I hate her.’ Then again: ‘I hate her.’

‘Come on, sweetie.’ Anne put her arm around Maggie’s shoulders. ‘Let’s go inside.’

Maggie exhaled some, she let the anger go with it. They stepped into the house together, into the coolness of the hall, the patterns of shadow and moonlight that already looked familiar.

She thought of Krista, raging away in the back of a cop car. Her stomach started to unknot. Now everyone would know the truth: how Krista was, and what Maggie and Lily were escaping.

Anne squeezed Maggie. ‘It’s going to be okay,’ she said. ‘You’re going to be okay.’

Maggie looked at her. She managed a smile. 'I know,' she said. The end of August was the saddest time of the year in Carp.

Maybe the saddest time everywhere? Every year, no matter what the weather, the public pools were suddenly clogged with people, the parks carpeted in picnic blankets and beach towels, the road packed bumper-to-bumper with weekenders descending on Copake Lake.

A shimmering veil of exhaust hung over the trees, intermingling with the smell of charcoal and smoke from a hundred fire pits. It was the final, explosive demonstration of summer, the line in the sand, a desperate attempt to hold fall...

This is the first thing you'll open up, don't let it stop you unless your saying you can't handle the fact that you're being a teen girl hypocrite, remember were just girls being girls and that the next page is going to make you judge me...

Yet should I judge you first if you close the book of my life, yet, if you think about it- you're a girl, and at some point, in your day you would like me, and looking up to your hero- just like me, and she will always be.

This is my disclaimer now- if you don't want to know me over me being me, then go away... yet, I am sure you'll like me, and then maybe not- it's up to you.

You'll understand by the end...

'Say HELLO to my sister!'

(picture this... She has her hand up in this photo- not looking a day over pubescent- yet she thinks she is a hot woman- and to me being a woman means you either have been penetrated, or you have hardcore intercourse, her eyes flirty her top pushed up showing her mosquito, she calls boobs, she waving like a dumb but, and a sinful smile, and the tucked tight line she calls her goodies and the bean that looks like there is too much hanging from it.)

Nevaeh

Book: 23

Kiss me Here

Part- 1

I - Karly Make $10,000 a week just making cummie on cam! Other jobs can go suck it! That is $400 a day, and like 3 shows- so about 5 times making cummie!!

Part- 2

Here are the facts.

- When you look bored; you are much less likely to make any money because your guests will get bored along with you.
- With the proper equipment; training, and attitude - a new model does have the potential to start off making anywhere from $20 - $40 per hour.
- I read all the tips I could find before I started, and I did my best to have a good setup. During my first week on cam; I was shy and awkward - and I averaged about $13 per hour.
- The better looking; she is; the easier it will be starting.
- In the long run; though; a great personality is much more important to the longevity of her career as a webcam model.
- The more a camgirl is willing to do on cam; the higher her earning potential will be.

- If she's not willing to do some X rated performances; she will have a harder time starting. That does not mean it's impossible; as of course there are fetishes and niches out there that are in high demand as well. It's just a matter of finding her audience.

- Consistent earnings come from sticking to a consistent schedule and working toward developing a solid fan base.

Tip #1

New Model Status- Take Advantage of Extra Promotion

The promotion period varies from site to site; so, pay attention when you're setting up your account.

Streamate - 30 days

Chaturbate - 7 days

These examples are current while I'm writing this, but you should always cross-reference in case they become outdated.

The key to your success as a webcam model is your fan base. These are the top 5 tips to help you develop your solid foundation of loyal customers. Follow these from the start, and you'll be setting yourself up for long-term success.

Tip #2

Treat Camming Like the Job it is- Consistency is Key Repeat customers become repeat customers because they know when you're open for business.

Imagine you're the customer for a sec. You're hooked on this awesome camgirl and she tells you she's going to be online at a certain time; so, you go to meet her in her chat room. But she doesn't show up. Think you'll be inclined to keep coming back?

Treat your customers like you would in any business, and be reliable with your schedule.

Your consistent schedule will lead to your consistent fan base.

Tip #3

Tweet; Tweet; Tweet!

Twitter-

Second to keeping your consistent schedule is to keep up with Twitter. Get your fans following you so you can keep them updated on what sites you're using and what shows you're planning.

If you decide to try a new site; for example; your fan base will follow you there. Many cam sites do not allow mentioning other cam sites or outside contact information; so, Twitter serves as a platform where you are free to market yourself wherever you may be and keep in touch with your loyal customers.

Get repeat boys and you have them giving you loads- in more ways than one! It's nice to have boys love you! When you're not all that loved or love yourself. And doing this I don't feel that way. This is safe- and I do not fuck some dick- that is going to be a dick to me the next or break my heart... see!

More on Twitter.

Tip #4

Money happens more when you don't think about it.

If you act like you're just there for the money; you're going to lose potential clients. Your guests want to believe that you WANT to be online hanging with them. Sure; at the back of their minds they know you're working for an income, but that's not what they need to be focused on.

Chill out; enjoy getting to know your guests and learning to rock your cam. Get your fans' focus away from their wallets and they're more likely to open their wallets for you.

Get your fans' focus away from their wallets and they're more likely to open their wallets.

Tweet This.

Tip #5

Turn Up Personality; Be Assertive, and Be Ready for Anything-

Remember your personality is the ultimate factor to whether you're going to gain a loyal following. Let yourself shine. Let them see you. Trust me; your quality fans will love you.

Know your boundaries and be ready to experiment within your boundaries. Customers love a camgirl willing to try new things within her limits. Eventually; you may even push those limits, but don't rush that process. Stay true to yourself and your personality, and your best fans will keep coming back for more.

Stay true to yourself and your personality, and your best fans will keep coming back for more.

- The ads report the earnings of the site's best models and usually state 'up to' - like how your Internet Service Provider says; 'up to' the download/upload speeds you pay for lol.
- When you try too hard; you are much less likely to make any money because you look desperate.
- When you engage your visitors; keep a positive attitude and just be yourself on cam; you are much more likely to make money because your guests are more likely to find you entertaining and likable.
- I'm about oh 5 years into this job. On my best days; I can make $100 in an hour. On worse to average days; I can see anything from $20 - $50 per hour. Hell; this is better than $2.50 at an eating hole- serving A-holes- where I get nothing- and the same gets it all!
- When they make those claims of weekly earnings or even sometimes monthly or yearly earnings; this is dependent on the model's stamina and how much time she wants to put into this.
- Sure; I could make $100,000 in a year; if I worked 40-hour weeks; but I work less than 10 hours most weeks because it's better for my health and overall sense of well-being.
- It makes me feel good in all ways too- about me...

- The longer you stay logged on; the better your chances are of actually making money.

- Don't base your hourly wage off of logging on for one hour and then logging off. It's an average, and traffic comes and goes so it's best to try and be around when your guests are around.

- I'd be willing to wager that every model in the history of webcam modeling has gone through a shift and earned zero dollars. This is unlikely... boys love to see girls make cummie!

Someone said to me- like- that I am a lazy girl- that people who want to what I am just abusing the system... if you say so... I do it for its fun and I make more than you do your shitty job so...

Eat me- ha- OUT!

Like it better to me than having some boss thinking he knows more than I do... I make my times... also; there no mean girls I have to work for or with... remember there is a lot of sucks out there with others... the real world is an ass... here I am queen bee! And they all just loooovvvee me!

'BE NICE OR YOU'LL BE BANNED!'

Part- 3

A text message from Jenny of here sitting out the pot- 'There is nothing like the sweet pitter-patter of piss.'

Right on- I said back it just feels good to let it all out in three pushes!

Mumm hum...

THURSDAY;

AUGUST 25

Marcel,

THE DAY OF JOUST WAS WET AND VERY COLD. Marcel dressed in his favorite jeans and a worn T-shirt; emerged sockless into the den; ate cereal from a mixing bowl, and watched a few reality TV shows with Dayna; then making some jokes about the douche bags who would let their whole lives get filmed. He seemed relieved that he was acting somewhat normal.

Nevertheless, the whole time; his mind was several miles away; on a dark straightaway; on engines gunning and tires screeching and the smell of smoke. He was worried.

Worried the fire would start too early when Marcel was driving the car. Likewise, ever-so worried that Ray wouldn't go for the switch. He was counting on that; he had rehearsed a speech in his head.

'I want to change cars like now;' he'd say after Maggie let him win the first round. 'So, I know it's fair... and so, like I know he didn't go turbo on his engine, or screwed around with my brakes and all.'

How could Ray say no... to this?

If Marcel drove carefully; no more than forty miles per hour; the engine shouldn't heat up too much, and the explosion wouldn't get triggered.

Maggie had to let him win even if she was going at a crawl. Ray would never suspect.

And then she'd get in the car; floor it, and the engine would start smoking and sparking- and even flaming and then - Revenge.

If everything went according to plan. If- if- if, Maggie hated that stupid word.

At three p.m. Kelly Bill came by to take Dayna to physical therapy. Yet Maggie though she needs it more than this girl who was getting for free.

Marcel so, didn't understand or get, like how Kelly had just wormed his way into their lives.

Dayna was practically up to his ass all day- breathing off of his farts.

Like they were suddenly all one big happy family unit in all; nonetheless, Marcel was the only one who could remember anything at all- they weren't family; would never-ever be one. It had always been Marcel and Dayna and no one else, from a turning point in time- of their lives.

-And-

Now; he'd even lost her, to his ways- of how he is and all.

'You going to be okay?' She asked confused.

She was getting good with her chair; spinning herself around furniture dumbly; bumping up the place where the floor was slightly uneven, just to be childlike and annoying. hated that she'd had to get good at being crippled.

'Yeah; sure,' it was so deliberately don't, so- we all didn't even look at her.

'Just going to watch some TV and stuff like that.'

'Okay have fun playing with yourself...' she said.

'We'll be back in a couple of hours;' she said. And then at that moment at that time and place- 'I think it's working; Marcel.'

'I'm happy for you;' he said. He was surprised and alarmed to feel his throat getting so-o tight. She was halfway out the door when he called her back. 'Dayna;' he said. All for you...

She turned. 'What?'

He managed to smile. 'Love yah, always- You and I always- that what we make.'

'Don't be such a dick then from now own- and I/we agree;' she said and smiled back.

Then she wheeled out of the house and closed the door behind her, sighing- in happiness.

Maggie WITH EVERY PASSING MINUTE; SHE WAS CLOSER TO THE END.

Maggie should have felt a sense of relief and letting go of a feeling of tenseness, but instead; she was gripped; all day; with dread.

She told herself that all she had to do was loose. She would have to trust that Marcel would keep his promise about the money- and love and everything that has was not holding up to in the past- and if he had changed.

He wasn't playing for the money. She had always known that on some level. Nevertheless, she wished she'd pushed him about what motivated him some.

Maybe that was making her jumpy- now; even at the very end of the game; she didn't understand his end goal.

It made her feel as though other games were going on; secret rules and pacts and alliances being made, and she was just a pawn.

...Around five o'clock; the storm passed, and the clouds started to shred apart.

The air was so thick with moisture and mosquitoes, and all the roads would be slick and wet.

Barring in mind she reminded herself it wouldn't matter at all.

She could back out; even; if she wanted to; pretend to flake out, or pussy out; at the last second.

Then Marcel and Ray could face off and she'd be done. Still; the sick feeling a weight in her stomach; an itch under her skin- wouldn't leave her.

Just had been moved. There had been no formal messages about it; no texts or emails, or even Facebook.

Joh- John was lying low and being mysterious... just in case anyone was angry about the way the game had shaken out.

Maggie didn't blame him, at all for this- and presumably Vivian; too; was keeping her head down.

Like, for the first time, in the history of the game; the final challenge would proceed with or without the judges.

...Apart from word had come back to Maggie; as it always did in a town so small; with so little but talk to feed it.

The officers and cops were all posted all around the runway where Joust traditionally occurred.

So- a change in location, a spot not far from the gully and the old train tracks.

Maggie wondered; with another pang; whether Nat would show up.

It was six o'clock when she left, her hands were already shaking, and she worried that in another hour or so; she'd be too nervous to drive, or she'd flacked out entirely.

Anne had agreed to let- Maggie uses the car for that night, and Maggie hated herself for lying about why she needed it in all.

Likewise, she said to herself in her mind that this was it; the end- no more lies from here on out.

Then she would be extra careful about everything- just like a young preteen girl, needed to feel safe and warm and content like a lost child, and pull the car off the road well before Marcel came anywhere close to her. Seeing her like this...

She didn't say goodbye to- Lily.

She didn't want to make a big deal of it all and such.

It wasn't a big deal- at all. This was running through her head.

She'd be home in a few hours.

She had just turned out of the driveway when she felt her I-phone- buzzing on her ass cheek.

She ignored it for the time being; but the calls started up again right away, even on vibrate.

-And-

Then a third time and even fourth time. She ripped the battery out of the back by the fifth... and through the phone to the floor, and the battery to the back.

She pulled over, to get all the flown parts of her phone, to see what could not weigh, Nat. As soon as she picked up; she knew something was very; very wrong.

‘Maggie; please;’ Nat was saying; even before Maggie said- hello.

‘Something really- really- bad is going to happen. We have to stop it- now.’

‘Hold on; hold on.’ Maggie could hear Nat sniffing. ‘Calm down. Start at the beginning.’

‘It’s going to happen tonight;’ Nat said as if foreseeing the future. ‘We have to do something. He’ll end up dead. Or he’ll kill Ray.’ Maggie could barely follow the thread of the conversation.

‘Who?’

‘Marcel;’ Nat wailed. ‘Please; Maggie. You have to help us.’

Maggie sucked in a deep breath hard and very fast. The sun chose that moment to break through the clouds completely with heavy rays.

The sky was streaked with fingers of red and orange; the exact color of new blood.

‘Who’s us...?’

‘Just come;’ Nat said. ‘Please. I’ll explain everything when you get here.’

Marcel; Marcel DROVE PAST THE GULLY JUST AFTER SIX O’CLOCK. The car Joh- John had lent him-a Le Sabre that Marcel knew could never- ever- never- ever, ever- never- be returned- was old and temperamental, and drifted to the left whenever he didn’t correct it.

It didn’t matter at all. Marcel didn’t need it for very long.

He parked on the side of the road next to a yield sign on one side of the straightaway that had been selected for the challenge.

The road was pretty dead-maybe people were discouraged by the bad weather.

Marcel was glad about this. He couldn't risk being spotted.

It didn't take long at all. Like- It was surprisingly easy- kaddish stuff; which was so-o ironic; especially considering that Marcel had failed chemistry three times, and wasn't exactly a science guy at all.

Funny to me, how easily you could look this shit up online, and just pass without knowing or even caring- yet that the times we live in.

Explosives; bombs; Molotov cocktails; IED's - anything you wanted.

Learning how to blow someone up was easier than buying a frigging beer.

Earlier that day; he would linkify a bit of an old Styrofoam cooler in some gasoline and poured the whole mixture into a mason jar.

Homemade napalm I call it- so-o it's like easy as making dressing for a Caesar salad, now he carefully duct-taped everything with a firecracker to the outside of the mason jar and tightly packed the whole thing down into the engine compartment.

Not too close to the exhaust manifold- he needed to get through the challenge with Maggie first.

And he would drive carefully; make sure in all the engine didn't get too hot.

Then the car would go to Ray.

Ray would gun it, and the firecracker would ignite, and the jar would shatter; discharging the explosives.

Kaboom and all would be done!

All he had to do now was wait. But almost immediately; he got a text from Maggie. Need to pick u up.

Emergency, we have to talk about this.

And then- now, Marcel cursed out loud. Then he had a sudden fear- she was going to back out. That would ruin everything. He wrote her back quickly. Corner of Wolf Hill and Pleasant-Valley. Pick me up.

Coming; she wrote back. He walked circles while he waited for her; smoking cigarettes. He had been calm before, but now he was filled with anxiety; a crawling; itching sensation; as though spiders were scurrying under his skin.

He thought of Dayna in the hospital bed as he'd first seen her after the accident-wide-eyed; a little blood and snot crusted above her mouth; saying; 'I can't feel my legs. What happened to my legs?' Getting hysterical in the hospital room; trying to stand, and landing instead in Marcel's lap. He thought of Luke Hanrahan; driving off with fifty grand, and the night

Marcel had stood outside the Hanrahan's house with a baseball bat and been too afraid to act.

And by the time Maggie pulled up; he felt a little better.

Maggie wouldn't tell him anything in the car. 'What's this about?' he asked her. But she just kept repeating; 'Just hold on. Okay? She'll want to tell you herself.' 'She?' His stomach flipped. 'Nat;' she said.

'Is she okay?' he asked. Nonetheless, Maggie just shook her head; indicating she would say no more. He was getting annoyed now.

This was a bad time; he needed to focus. His stomach was tight with nerves.

Or at the same time; he was flattered that Maggie needed him- flattered; too; that Nat might have asked to see him.

Then they still had two hours before full dusk. More than enough time.

There were two cars in Nat's driveway; one of them a battered 1952 Ford truck he didn't recognize.

He wondered if this was some kind of intervention for her and got that crawling feeling under his skin again.

‘What’s going on here...?’ He asked again and again. ‘I told you,’ Maggie said.

‘She’ll want to explain it herself.’ The door was unlocked. Weirdly; although the light was rapidly fading outside; there were no lamps on in the house.

The air was dull and gray like the primer on the side of the old Ford truck; lying like a textured blanket over everything; smudging out details.

Walking into Nat’s house; Marcel had the feeling he used to get in the church before given up on that too- like he was trespassing on sacred ground.

There were tick trees everywhere; lots of nice-looking furniture; things that screamed money to him. But not a sound.

‘Is she even here...?’ he asked. His voice sounded extremely loud.

‘Downstairs, at that moment,’ Maggie moved ahead of him.

She opened a door just to the right of the living room.

A set of unfinished stairs led down into what was a basement.

Marcel thought he heard some slight movements; maybe a whisper or footsteps; but then it stopped.

‘Go ahead,’ Maggie said. He was going to tell her to go first, but he didn’t want her to think he was afraid. Which he was; for whatever reason. Something about this place-the silence; maybe- was freaking him out.

As if sensing his hesitation; Maggie said; ‘Look; we’ll be able to talk down there. She’ll tell you everything.’ Maggie paused. ‘Nat?’ she called out.

‘Down here!’ Nat’s voice came from the basement. Reassured; he headed down the stairs; into the musty gritty; humid; underground air.

The basement was large and filled with discarded furniture. He had just reached the bottom of the stairs and turned around to look for Nat when the lights went off. He froze; confused and dazed.

‘What the-’ he started to say; but then he felt roughly seized; heard an explosion of voices. He thought for one second this must be part of the game; a challenge he hadn’t anticipated.

‘Over here; over here!’ Nat was saying. Marcel struck out; struggling, but whoever was holding him was big; fleshy, and strong. A guy, Marcel could tell by his size, and by the smell; too- menthol; beer; aftershave. Marcel kicked out; the guy cursed, and something toppled over. There was the sound of breaking the glass. Natalie said; ‘Shit. Here. Here.’ Marcel was forced into a chair. His hands were twisted behind him; tied up with something. Duct tape. His legs; too.

‘What the fuck?’ He was yelling now. ‘Get the fuck off me.’

‘Sh-h-h, Marcel, It’s okay.’ Even now; here; Marcel was paralyzed by the sound of Natalie’s voice.

He couldn’t even struggle. ‘What the hell is this?’ He said. ‘What are you doing?’ His eyes were slowly adjusting to the dark. He could just make her out; the wide contours of her eyes; two sad; dark holes.

‘It’s for you;’ she said. ‘For your good.’

‘What are you talking about?’ He thought; suddenly; of the car parked on Pleasant-Valley Lane; the mason jar of gasoline and Styrofoam; nestled in the engine like a secret heart. He strained against the duct tape binding him.

‘Let me go.’ It was said.

‘Marcel; listen to me.’ Nat’s voice broke, and he realized she’d been crying. ‘I know- I know you blame Luke for what happened to your sister.

For the accident; right?’ Marcel felt something ice-cold move through him. He couldn’t speak at all. ‘I don’t know exactly what you’re planning, but I won’t let you go through with it;’ Nat said. ‘This has to stop now.’

‘Let me go.’ His voice was rising. He was fighting a panicked feeling; a sense of dull dread in his whole body; the same feeling he’d had two years earlier; standing on the lawn in front of the Hanrahan's house; trying to get his feet to move.

‘Marcel; listen to me.’ Her hands were on his shoulders. He wanted to push her off, but he couldn’t. And another part of him wanted her and hated her at the same time. ‘This is for you. This is because I do care.’

‘You don’t know anything;’ he said. He could smell her skin; a combination of vanilla and bubblegum, and it made him ache. ‘Let me go; Natalie. This is insane.’ ‘No. I’m sorry, but no.’ Her fingers grazed his cheek. ‘I won’t let you do anything stupid. I don’t want you to get hurt.’

She leaned even closer until her lips were nearly touching his. He thought she might be leaning in to kiss him, and he was unable to turn away; unable to resist. Then he felt her hands moving along his thighs; groping.

‘What are you-?’ he started to say. But just then she found his pocket and extracted his keys and phone.

‘I’m sorry;’ she said; straightening up. And she did truly sound sorry. ‘You must believe me; it’s for the best.’

A wave of helplessness overtook him completely. He made a final; futile attempt to free himself. The chair moved forward a few inches or two on the concrete floor.

‘Please;’ he said. ‘Natalie...’

‘I’m sorry; Marcel;’ Nat said. ‘I’ll be back as soon as the challenge is over; I swear.’

She was fumbling with his phone, and the screen lit up temporarily; casting her face in brightness; showing the deep; mournful hollows of her eyes; her expression of pity and regret. And lighting up; too; the guy behind her. The one who’d wrestled Marcel into the chair.

He’d gained weight-at least thirty pounds-and he’d let his hair get long.

Fifty grand wasn’t sitting too well on him. But there was no mistaking his eyes; the hard set of his jaw, and the scar; like a small white worm; cutting straight through his left eyebrow. Marcel felt a fist of shock plunge straight through him. He could no longer speak or even breathe.

Luke Hanrahan.

Maggie-

MAGGIE WAITED IN THE CAR WHILE NATALIE AND LUKE did whatever they had to do. She was trying to breathe normally, but her lungs weren't obeying and kept fluttering weirdly in her chest.

She would have to go up against Ray Hanrahan now. There was no giving in or weaseling out. She wondered what Marcel had planned for tonight. Luke hadn't exactly known either; although he'd shown Nat and Maggie some of the threatening messages that had come from Marcel.

It was surreal; sitting in Nat's kitchen with Luke Hanrahan; football star Luke-Hanrahan; the homecoming king who'd gotten kicked out of homecoming for smoking weed in the locker room during the announcement of the court.

Winner of Fright.

Who'd once assaulted a cashier at the 7-Eleven in Happy when the guy wouldn't sell him cigarettes. He looked like shit. Two years away from Cace hadn't done him any good; which was shocking to Maggie. She thought all you needed to do-all all of them needed was to get out. But maybe you carried your demons with you everywhere; the way you carried your shadow.

He would have found Nat; he said; because of a betting slip that had reached him in Buffalo. And because of that stupid video- the; one filmed at the water towers; which showed Marcel with his arm slung around Nat. Nat had been the easiest of the remaining players to locate, and he was hoping he could talk her into helping him convince Marcel to bow out.

Nat emerged from the house at last. Maggie watched her talking with Luke on the front porch; he was nearly double her size. Crazy how several years ago;

Nat would have freaked at the idea that Luke might ever look in her direction or know who she was. It was so strange; the way that life moved forward- the twists and the dead ends; the sudden opportunities. She supposed if you could predict or foresee everything that was going to happen; you'd lose the motivation to go through it all. The promise was always in the possibility.

'Is Marcel okay?' Maggie asked when Nat slid into the car.

'He's mad;' Nat said.

'You did kidnap him;' Maggie pointed out.

'For his good;' Nat said, and for a minute she looked angry. But then she smiled. 'I've never kidnapped someone before.'

'Don't make a habit of it.' They both seemed to have resolved not to mention their fight, and Maggie was glad. She nodded at Luke; who was getting into his truck. 'Is he coming to watch?'

Nat shook her head. 'I don't think so.' She paused, and said in a low voice; 'It's awful; what he did to Dayna. I think he must hate himself.' 'He seems like he does;' Maggie said. But she didn't want to think about Luke; or Marcel's sister; or legs buried beneath a ton of metal; rendered useless.

She was already sick with nerves.

'Are you okay?' Nat said.

'No;' Maggie said bluntly and belligerently.

'You're so close; Maggie. You're almost at the end. You're winning.'

'I'm not winning yet;' Maggie said. But she put the car into gear. There was no more delaying it. There was hardly any light left in the sky as though the horizon where a black hole; sucking all the color away. Something else occurred to her. 'Jesus. This is Anne's car. I'm barely allowed to be driving it. I can't go up against Ray in this.'

'You don't have to.' Nat reached into her purse and extracted a set of keys; jiggling them dramatically.

Maggie looked at her. 'Where'd you get those?'

‘Marcel,’ Nat said. She flipped the keys into her palm and returned them to her bag. ‘You can use his car. Better to be safe than sorry; right?’ As the last of the sun vanished, and the moon; like a giant scythe; cut through the clouds; they gathered...

Quietly they materialized from the woods; they came down the gully; scattering gravel; sliding on the hill; or they came packed together in cars; driving slowly; headlights off; like submarines in the dark.

And by the time stars surfaced from the darkness; they were all there- all the kids of Cace; come to witness the final challenge, it was time.

There was no need for -Digging to repeat the rules; everyone knew the rules of Joust. Each car aimed for the other; going fast in a single lane.

The first person to swerve would lose...

And the winner would take the pot. Maggie was so nervous; it took her three tries to get the key in the ignition.

She’d found the LeSabre pulled over on the side of the road; practically buried in the bushes. It was Joh- John’s car- Marcel must have borrowed it.

She was unreasonably annoyed that Joh- John had helped Marcel in this way. She wondered if Joh- John had risked coming tonight-somewhere in the crowd; the dark masses of people; faces indistinguishable in the weak moonlight.

She was too proud to text him and see.

Ashamed; too. He’d tried to talk to her; to explain, and she had acted awful. She wondered whether he would forgive her.

‘How are you feeling?’ Nat asked her. She’d offered to stay with Maggie until the last possible second.

‘I’m okay,’ Maggie said; which was a lie. Her lips were numb. Her tongue felt thick. How would she drive when she could barely feel her hands? As she pulled the car up to her starting position; the headlights lit up clusters of faces; ghost-white; standing quietly in the shadow of the trees. The engine was whining like there was something wrong with it.

‘You’re going to be fine;’ Nat said. She twisted in her seat. Her eyes were suddenly wide; urgent. ‘You’re going to be fine; okay?’ She said it like she was trying to convince herself. -Digging was gesturing to Maggie; indicating she should turn the car around.

The engine was making a weird grinding noise. She thought she smelled something weird too; but then thought she must be imagining it. It would all be over soon; anyway.

Thirty; forty seconds; tops. When she managed to get her car pointed in the right direction; -Digging rapped on her windshield with his fingers; gave her a short nod. At the other end of the road-a thousand feet away from her; a thousand miles-she saw the twin circles of Ray’s headlights. They went on and off again. On and off. Like some kind of warning.

‘You should go,’ Maggie said. Her throat was tight. ‘We’re about to start.’ ‘I love you; Maggie.’ Nat leaned over and put her arms around Maggie’s neck. She smelled familiar and Nat-like, and it made Maggie want to cry; as though they were saying good-bye for the last time. Then Nat pulled away.

‘Look; if Ray doesn’t swerve- I mean; if you’re close and it doesn’t look like he’s going to turn - You have to promise me you will. You can’t risk a collision; okay? Promise me.’

‘I promise;’ Maggie said.

‘Good luck.’ Then Nat was gone. Maggie saw her jog to the side of the road.

And Maggie was alone in the car; in the dark; facing a long; narrow stretch of road; pointing like a finger toward the glow of distant headlights.

She thought of Lily...

She thought of Anne...

She thought of Joh- John. She thought of the tigers, and of everything she’d ever screwed up in her life.

She swore to herself that she wouldn’t be the first to swerve. While in a dark basement; with the smell of mothballs and old furniture in his nose; Marcel realized; too late; why Nat had taken his keys-and; crying out; fought against his restraints; thinking of a little time-bomb heart; ticking slowly- away...

Something in the engine was smoking. Maggie saw little trails of smoke unfurling from the hood of the car; like narrow black snakes. But just then -Digging stepped into the center of the road; shirtless; waving his T-shirt above his head like a flag.

Then it was already too late. She heard the high-pitched squeal of tires on asphalt. Ray had started to move. She slammed her foot on the accelerator and the car jumped forward; skidding a little. The smoke redoubled almost instantly; for a second her vision was completely obscured.

(Fear...)

Then it broke apart and she could see. Headlights growing bigger. The slick sheen of the moon. And smoke; pouring like liquid from the hood. Everything was fast; too fast-she was hurtling down the road; there was nothing but two moons; growing larger

- closer-

The stink of burning rubber and the scream of tires - Closer; closer - She was hurtling forward. The speedometer ticked up to sixty miles per hour. It was too late to swerve now, and he wasn't serving either. It was too late to do anything but crash.

Flames leaped suddenly out of the engine; a huge roar of the fire. Maggie screamed. She couldn't see anything. The wheel jerked in her hand, and she struggled to keep her car on the road.

The air stank like burning plastic and her lungs were tight with smoke. She slammed on the brakes; suddenly overwhelmed with certainty- she would die. She saw movement from somewhere on her left-someone running into the road- and realized; a second later; that Ray had swerved to avoid it; had jerked his wheel to the left and was plunging straight into the woods.

There was a shuddering crash as she sailed past him; flames licking her windshield. She was screaming. She knew she had to get out of the car now before she hit anything. Skidding; shuddering; spinning in circles; the car was slowing; it was wandering toward the woods. Maggie fought to open the door.

The handle caught and she thought she would be trapped there as the fire consumed her. Then she thrusts with her shoulder and the door popped open and she jumped; rolled; felt the bite of asphalt on her arm and shoulder. she tasted all the dirt and grit that would fit in her mouth; heard a distant roar of sound as if individuals were yelling her name.

Sparks fell from the wheels of the car as it flipped off the road and into the woods. There was an explosion so loud; she felt it through her whole body. She covered her head. Now she could hear that people were calling her name-and Ray's; too.

A siren wailed in the distance, for a second or so-o; she thought she must be dead. But she could taste blood in her mouth. If she were dead; she wouldn't be able to taste any blood.

She looked up. The car was in ruins; a pillar of flame was eating it; turning it to rubber and metal. Amazingly; she managed to sit up, and then to stand. She felt no pain as if she were watching a movie about her own life.

-And-

Now she couldn't hear anything... Nothing- not the voices calling to her; urging her out of the road; away from the car-not the sirens; either. She was in a watery; deep place of silence. She turned and saw Ray struggling to get out of his car. There was blood trickling down his face; three people were trying to pull him from the wreck.

When he'd swerved; he'd gone straight into a tree; the hood was crumpled; compressed nearly in half.

And now she saw why...

Standing in the middle of the road; perfectly still; not twenty feet away; was the tiger.

It was watching Maggie with those deep black eyes; eyes that were old and sorrowful; eyes that had watched centuries go to dust. And at that moment; she felt a jolt go through her, and she knew that the tiger was afraid of the noise and the fire and the people shouting; crowding the road on both sides. But she; Maggie; wasn't afraid anymore.

She was compelled forward by a force she couldn't explain. She felt nothing but pity and understanding. She was alone with the tiger on the road. And in the final moment of the game; as smoke billowed in swollen plumes into the air and fire licked the sky; Maggie Nill walked without hesitation to the tiger, and placed her hand gently on its head, and won.

Part- 4

SATURDAY;

OCTOBER 8

Maggie;

IN EARLY OCTOBER; CACE ENJOYED A WEEK OF FALSE summer. It was warm and bright and; if it weren't for the trees that had already changed-deep reds and oranges interspersed with the deep green of the pines-it might have been the beginning of summer. One day; Maggie woke up with a sudden; strong impulse to return to where the game had begun. A mist rose slowly over Cace; shimmering; dispersing finally in the mounting sun; the air smelled like the moist ground and Shaddyly cut grass.

'How'd you like to go swimming; Bill?' she asked Lily when Lily rolled over; blinking; hair scattered across the pillow. Maggie could see the light pattern of freckles on Lily's nose; individual lashes highlighted by the sun and thought her sister had never looked so pretty.

'With Joh- John; too?' Lily asked. Maggie couldn't stop herself from smiling. 'With Joh- John; too.' He had been driving home every weekend from college; to fulfill his community service duties. And to see Maggie. In the end; she decided to invite Nat and Marcel; too. It seemed right; somehow.

When the small yellow envelope containing a single gold key- the key to a strongbox at a local bank- had arrived mysteriously in the mail; she had collected and divided the money among the three of them.

She knew Marcel had given most of his portion to Kelly Bill; they were building a small memorial for Little Kelly at the site of the Grayed House; which had been demolished.

Nat was taking some acting classes in Albany, and she'd gotten a job modeling clothes on weekends at the Happy Valley Mall. And starting in January; Maggie would enroll in the Jackson Community College's program in veterinary services.

Maggie packed the trunk with a blanket; beach towels.

Mosquito repellent, and sunscreen; a stack of old; waterlogged magazines from Anne's living room.

A cooler full of iced tea; several bags of large bags of lays potato chips, and creaky beach chairs with faded; striped seats.

She could sense that tomorrow the weather would turn again, and the air would be edged with cold.

Soon Krista would get out of her thirty-day program, and then Maggie and Lily might have to return to Shady Pines; at least temporarily. And soon the months of rain would come.

But today was perfect...

They arrived at the estuary just before lunch. Nobody had spoken much in the car. Lily had squeezed in between Marcel and Nat in the backseat.

Nat braided a portion of Lily's hair and whispered to her about which movie stars she thought were the cutest; Marcel had leaned his head back against the window.

And it was only from the occasional way his mouth twitched into a smile that Maggie knew he wasn't asleep. Joh- John kept one hand on Maggie's knee as she drove; It still seemed miraculous to see it there. To know that he was hers as he always had been; in some way. But everything was different now.

Different and better. Once out of the car; all their restraint lifted. Lily went whooping into the woods; holding her towel over her head so it flapped behind her like a banner. Nat chased after her... swatting away the branches in her path; Marcel and Joh- John helped Maggie clear out the trunk, and together they all went pushing through the woods; loaded down with towels and beach chairs and the cooler clinking ice.

The beach looked cleaner than usual. Two trash cans had been installed at the far end of the shore.

And the sand and- gravel strip of beach was free of the usual cigarette butts and beer cans; Sunlight filtering through the trees patterned the water in crazy colors- purples and greens and vivid blues.

Even the steep face of the rock wall across the water; from which all the players had jumped; now looked beautiful instead of frightening- there where flowers growing out of fissures in the rock.

Then Maggie noticed; tangled vines sweeping down toward the water. The trees at the top of the jumping point where fire-red already; burning in the sun.

Lily trotted back to Maggie as she was shaking out the blanket. There was a light breeze, and Maggie had to tamp down the corners with different belongings- her flip-flops; John's sunglasses; the beach bag.

'Is that it; Maggie?' Lily pointed.

'Is that where you jumped?'

'Nat jumped too;' Maggie said.

'We all did. Well; except Joh- John.'

'What can I say?' He was already unlacing his Converse. He winked at

Lily. 'I'm chicken.'

Briefly; his eyes met Maggie's. After all this time; she still couldn't quite believe that he had planned fear, or forgive him for not having told her.

She would never have guessed in a million years- her Joh- John; her best friend; the boy who used to dare her to eat her scabs and then almost throw up when she did.

However, that was the point. He was the same, and different. And that made her hopeful in away. If people changed; it meant that she was allowed to change too. She could be different.

She could be happier. Maggie would be happier-being happier already.

'It isn't that high;' Lily said. She squinted. 'How'd you get up there?'

'Climbed;' Maggie said. Lily opened her mouth soundlessly.

‘Come on; Lily!’ Nat was standing by the water; shimmying out of her shorts. Marcel stood a short distance away; smiling out over the river; watching her. ‘Race you into the water!’

‘No fair!’ Lily ran; kicking up sand; struggling out of her T-shirt at the same time.

Maggie and Joh- John lay down on the blanket together; on their backs.

She rested her head on his chest; every- so- often; he ran his fingers lightly through her hair. For a while; they didn’t speak.

They didn’t need to. Maggie knew that no matter what; he would always be hers, and they would always have this- a perfect day; a reprieve from the cold.

Maggie had started to drift off to sleep when Joh- John stirred. ‘I love you; Maggie.’ She opened her eyes. She was warm and lazy. ‘I love you; too;’ she said. The words came with no trouble at all.

...He had just kissed her-once; lightly; on the top of her head, and then; when she tilted her face to his; harder; on the lips-when Lily began to shout.

‘Maggie! Maggie! Look at me!

Maggie!’

Lily was standing at the very top of the rocks. Maggie hadn’t seen her climbing; she must have been quick.

Maggie felt a pulse of fear...

‘Get down!’ She called out.

‘She’s fine;’ Marcel said. He was now standing in the water with Nat-Maggie couldn’t believe Nat had managed to convince him to swim; or that he even owned a bathing suit.

One arm was wrapped around Nat’s waist. They looked amazing together; like statues carved from different colored rocks.

‘Watch me!’ Lily crowded, ‘I’m going to jump!’ She did; without hesitating; Lily threw herself into the air. For a second she seemed to be suspended there; legs and arms splayed; mouth open and laughing.

Then she was hitting the water and surfacing; spitting out a mouthful of water; calling; ‘Did you see...? I wasn’t scared. Not at all...’ Then at that moment at that time, this feeling of joy flooded Maggie’s body and heart- made her feel light and dizzy.

She was on her feet and plunging into the water before Lily could reach the shore; splashing past Nat; who shrieked; tackling her sister as she tried to stand up and dragging her back into the water.

‘You weren’t scared; huh?’

Maggie attacked Lily’s bare stomach as Lily wriggled away from her; squealing with laughter; calling for Joh- John’s help.

‘Are you scared of being tickled; huh?’

Are you...?’

‘Joh- John; help me!’ Lily screamed as Maggie wrapped her in a bear hug.

She pauses... ‘Look; you still have time; okay? I just don’t want you to wait too long and have all the good placements go to other people. I’m just worried about you is. But everything’s fine; you’re still okay.’

‘You can’t get rid of me that easily;’ Joh- John said. He kept his arms around her waist. His eyes were the same blue-green as the water. Her Joh- John, her best friend.

‘Children; children; don’t fight;’ Nat said; teasing.

The wind lifted goosebumps on- Maggie’s skin; but the sun was warm. She knew that this day; this feeling; couldn’t last forever. Everything passed; that was partly why it was so beautiful.

Things would get difficult again. But that was okay too. The bravery was in moving forward; no matter what. Someday; she might be called on to jump again. And she would do it.

She knew; now; that there was always light-beyond the dark, and the fear; out of the depths; there was the sun to reach for, and air and space and freedom. There was always a way up, and out, and no need to be afraid.

~*~

I've always been shy, and afraid that I'll say or do the wrong thing. Hanna is the opposite.

But... um- lately; it's been more than that.

She's stopped caring about school altogether; for one thing and has been called to the principal's office many times for talking back to the teachers.

And sometimes in the middle of talking, she'll stop; just shut her mouth as though she's run up against a barrier. Other times I'll catch her staring out at the ocean as though she's thinking of swimming away.

Looking at her now; at her clear gray eyes and her mouth as thin and taut as a bowstring; I feel a tug of fear. I think of my mother floundering for a second in the air before dropping like a stone into the ocean; I think about the face of the girl who dropped from the laboratory roof all those years ago; her cheek turned against the pavement. I will away thoughts of the illness. Hanna isn't sick.

She can't be. I would know. 'If they want us to be happy; they'd let us pick ourselves;' Hanna grumbles.

'Hanna;' I say sharply. Criticizing the system is the worst offense there is.

'Take it back...'

She holds up her hands... 'All right; all right. I take it back.'

'You know it doesn't work. Look how it was in the old days. Chaos all the time; fighting, and war. People were miserable.'

'I said; I take it back.' She smiles at me, but I'm still mad and I look away.

'Besides;' I go on; 'they do give us a choice.'

Usually; the evaluators generate a list of four or five approved matches, and you are allowed to pick among them.

This way; everyone is happy. In all the years that the procedure has been administered and the marriages arranged; there have been fewer than a dozen divorces in Maine; less than a thousand in the entire United States- and in almost all those cases; either the husband or wife was suspected of being a sympathizer and divorce was necessary and approved by the state.

‘A limited choice;’ she corrects me. ‘We get to choose from the people who have been chosen for us.’

‘Every choice is limited;’ I snap.

(‘That’s life...’)

She opens her mouth as though she’s going to respond, but instead she just starts to laugh. Then she reaches down and squeezes my hand; two quick pumps and then two long ones. It’s our old sign; a habit we developed in the second grade when one of us was scared or upset; a way of saying; I’m here; don’t worry.

‘Okay; okay. Don’t get defensive. I love the evaluations; okay? Long live- Evaluation Day.’

‘That’s better;’ I say, but I’m still feeling anxious and annoyed. The line shuffles slowly forward, we pass the iron gates; with their complicated crown of barbed wire, and enter the long driveway that leads to the various lab complexes. We are headed for Building.

The boys go in, and the lines begin to curve away from each other. As we move closer to the front of the line; we get a blast of air-conditioning every time the glass doors slide open and then hum shut.

It feels amazing; like being momentarily dipped head to toe in a thin sheet of ice; popsicle-style, and I turn around and lift my ponytail away from my neck; wishing it weren't so damn hot.

We don’t have to air-condition at home; just tall; gawky fans that are always sputtering out in the middle of the night. And most of the time- Carol won’t even let us use those; they suck up too much electricity; she says, and we don't have any to spare. At last; there are only a few people in front of us. A nurse comes out of the building; carrying a stack of clipboards and a handful of pens, and begins distributing them along the line.

'Please make sure to fill out all required information;' she says; 'including your medical and family history.'

My heart begins to work its way up into my throat. The neatly numbered boxes on the page -Last Name; First Name; Middle Initial; Current Address; Age-collapse together. I'm glad Hanna is in front of me.

She begins filling out the forms quickly; resting the clipboard on her forearm; her pen skating over the paper. 'Next.'

The doors whoosh opens again, and a second nurse appears, and gestures for Hanna to come inside with me. In the dark coolness yonder her; I can see a bright white waiting room with a green Cachet; she is standing over me.

'Good luck;' I say to Hanna.

She turns and gives me a quick smile.

But I can tell she is nervous; finally. There is a fine crease between her eyebrows, and she is chewing on the corner of her lip. She starts to enter the lab and then turns abruptly and walks back to me; her face wild and unfamiliar-looking; grabbing me by both shoulders; putting her mouth directly to my ear. I'm so startled I dropped my clipboard.

'You know you can't be happy unless you're unhappy sometimes; right?' she whispers, and her voice is hoarse; as though she's just been crying. 'What?' Her nails are - Digging into my shoulders, and at that moment I'm terrified of her.

'You can't be really happy unless you're unhappy sometimes. You know that is; right?'

Before I can respond she releases me, and as she pulls away; her face is as serene and beautiful and composed as ever. She bends down to scoop up my clipboard; which she passes to me; smiling. Then she turns around and is gone behind the glass doors; which open and close behind her as smoothly as the surface of the water; sucking closed over something that is sinking.

The devil stole into the Garden of Eden. He carried with him the disease- Amor deliria Nervosa- in the form of a seed. It grew and flowered into a magnificent apple tree; which bore apples as bright as blood.

-From Genesis- A Complete History of the World and the Known Universe; by Steven Horace; Ph.D.; Harvard University By the time the nurse admits me into the waiting room; Hanna is gone-vanished down one of the antiseptic white hallways and whisked behind one of the dozens of identical white doors- although there is about a half-dozen; other girls; milling around; waiting. One girl is sitting in a chair; hunched over her clipboard; scribbling and crossing out her answers, and then re-scrubbing. Another girl is frantically asking a nurse about the difference between 'chronic medical conditions' and 'pre-existing medical conditions.' She looks like she's on the verge of having some kind of fit-a vein is standing out on her forehead and her voice is rising hysterically-and I wonder whether she's going to list a tendency toward excessive anxiety on her sheet.

It's not funny, but I feel like laughing. I bring my hand to my face; snorting into my palm. I tend to get giggly when I'm extremely nervous. During tests at school; I'm always getting in trouble for laughing. I wonder if I should have marked that down.

A nurse takes my clipboard from me and flips through the pages; checking to see that; I haven't left any answers blank.

'Lena Haloway?' She says in the bright; clipped voice that all nurses seem to share like it's part of their medical training.

'Uh-huh;' I say, and then quickly correct myself. My aunt has told me that the evaluators will expect a certain degree of formality. 'Yes. That's me.'

It's still strange to hear my real name; Holloway and a dull feeling settle at the bottom of my stomach. For the past decade; I've gone by my aunt's name;

Tiddle. Even though it's a pretty stupid last name- Hanna once said it reminded her of a little-kid word for peeing-at least it isn't associated with my mother and father. At least the Tiddles is a real family. The Haloway's are nothing but a memory. But for official purposes; I have to use my birth name.

‘Follow me.’ The nurse gestures down one of the hallways, and I follow the neat tick-tock of her heels down the linoleum. The halls are blindingly bright. The butterflies are working their way up from my stomach into my head; making me feel dizzy, and I try to calm myself by imagining the ocean outside; it's ragged breathing; the seagulls turning pinwheels in the sky.

It will be over soon; I tell myself. It will be over soon and then you'll go home, and you'll never have to think about the evaluation again.

The hallway seems to go on forever. Up ahead a door opens and shuts, and a moment later; as we turn a corner; a girl brushes past us. Her face is red, and she's been crying. She must be done with her evaluation already. I recognize her; vaguely; as one of the first girls admitted.

I can't help but feel sorry for her. Evaluations typically last anywhere from half an hour to two hours; but it's common wisdom that the longer the evaluators keep you; the better you're doing. Of course; that isn't always true. Two years ago- Marcy Davies was famously in and out of the lab in forty-five minutes, and she scored a perfect ten. And last year Corey Wine scored a record for longest evaluation -three and a half hours and still received only a three. There's a system behind the evaluations; obviously; but there's always a degree of randomness to them too.

Sometimes; it seems the whole process is designed to be as intimidating and confusing as possible. I have a sudden fantasy of running through these clean; sterile hallways; kicking in all the doors. Then; immediately; I feel guilty. This is the worst of all possible times to be having doubts about the evaluations, and I mentally curse Hanna. This is her fault; for saying those things to me outside.

You can't be happy unless you're unhappy sometimes. A limited choice. We get to choose from the people who have been chosen for us.

I'm glad the choice is made for us. I'm glad I don't have to choose-but more than that; I'm glad I don't have to make someone else choose me. It would be okay for Hanna; of course; if things were still the way they were in the old days.

Hanna; with her golden; halo hair, and bright gray eyes, and perfectly straight teeth, and the laugh that makes everyone in a two-mile radius whip around and looks at her and laughs too.

Even clumsiness looks good on Hanna; it makes you want to reach out a hand to help her or scoop up her books. When I trip over my own feet or spill coffee down the front of my shirt; people look away. You can almost see them thinking; What a mess... And whenever I'm around strangers my mind goes fuzzy and damp and gray; like streets starting to thaw after a hard snow-unlike Hanna; who always knows just what to say. No guy in his right mind would ever choose me when there are people like Hanna in the world- It would be like settling for a stale cookie when what you want is a big bowl of ice cream; whipped cream, and cherries, and chocolate sprinkles included.

So, I'll be happy to receive my neat; printed sheet of 'Approved Matches.' At least it means I'll end up with somebody. It won't matter if nobody ever thinks I'm pretty (although sometimes I wish; just for a second; that somebody would.) It wouldn't matter if I had one eye.

'In here.' The nurse stops; finally; outside a door that looks identical to all the others. 'You can leave your clothing and things in the antechamber. Please put on the gown that is provided for you; with the opening to the back. Feel free to take a moment; have some water; do some meditation.' I imagine hundreds and hundreds of girls sitting cross-legged on the floor; hands cupped on their knees; chanting om, and have to stifle another wild urge to laugh.

'Please be aware; however; that the longer you take to prepare; the less time your evaluators will have to get to know you.'

She smiles tightly. Everything about her is tight- her skin; her eyes; her lab coat. She is looking straight at me; but I have the impression that she isn't focusing; that in her mind she's already tick-tocking her way back to the waiting room; ready to bring yet another girl down yet another hallway, and give her this same spiel. I feel very lonely; surrounded by these thick walls that muffle all sounds; insulated from the sun and the wind and the heat; all of it perfect and unnatural.

'When you're ready; go on through the blue door. The evaluators will be waiting for you in the lab.' After the nurse clicks away; I go into the antechamber; which is small and just as bright as the hallway. It looks like a regular doctor's examination room.

There's an enormous piece of medical equipment squatting in the corner; emitting a series of periodic beeps; a tissue-paper-covered examination table; a stinging; antiseptic smell. I take off my clothes; shivering as the air-conditioning makes goosebumps pop up all over my skin; the fuzz on my arms standing up a little straighter. Great. Now the evaluators will think I'm a hairy beast. I fold- my clothes; including my bra; in a neat pile and slip on the gown. It's made of super-sheer plastic, and as I wrap it around my body; securing it at the waist with a knot; I'm fully aware that you can still see pretty much everything-including the outline of my underwear-through its fabric.

Over. Soon it will be over. I take a deep breath and step through the blue door.

It's even brighter in the lab- dazzlingly bright; so, the evaluators' first impression of me must be of someone squinting; stepping backward; bringing her hand to her face. Four shadows float in a canoe in front of me. Then my eyes adjust, and the vision resolves into the four evaluators; all sitting behind a long; low table. This room is very large and empty except for the evaluators and; in the corner; a steel surgical table that's been shoved up against one wall.

Dual rows of overhead lights beat down on me, and I notice how high the ceiling is- at least thirty feet. I have a desperate urge to cross my arms over my chest; to cover myself up somehow. My mouth goes dry and my mind goes as hot and blank and white as the lights. I can't remember what I'm supposed to do; what I'm supposed to say.

Fortunately; one of the evaluators; a woman; speaks first. 'Do you have your forms?' Her voice sounds friendly, but it doesn't help the fist that has closed deep in my stomach; squeezing my intestines.

Oh; God; I think; I'm going to pee; I'm going to pee right here. I try to imagine what Hanna will say after this is over when we're walking through the afternoon sunshine; with the smell of salt and sun-warmed pavement heavy on the air around us. 'God;' she'll say. 'That was a waste of time. All of them just sitting there staring like four frogs on a log.'

'Um-yes.' I step closer; feeling like the air has turned solid; resisting me.

When I'm a few feet away from the table; I reach out and pass the evaluators my clipboard. There are three men and one woman, but I find I can't focus on their features for too long. I scan them quickly and then shuffle backward again; getting only an impression of some noses; a few dark eyes; the winking of a pair of glasses.

My clipboard bobs its way down the line of evaluators. I squeeze my arms to my sides and try to appear relaxed. Behind me; an observation deck runs along the back wall; elevated about twenty feet off the ground. It is accessed through a small red door high up beyond the tiered rows of white seats that are meant to hold students; doctors; interns, and junior scientists. Not only do the lab scientists perform the procedure; but they also do checkups afterward and often treat difficult cases of other diseases.

It occurs to me that the scientists must perform the cure here; in this very room. That must be what the surgical table is for. The fist of anxiety starts closing in my stomach again. For some reason; though I've often thought about what it would be like to be cured; I've never really thought about the procedure itself- the hard metal table; the lights winking above me; the tubes and the wires and the pain.

‘Lena Haloway?’

‘Yes. That’s me.’ ‘Okay. Why don’t you start by telling us a little about yourself?’ The evaluator with the glasses leans forward; spreading his hands, and smiles. He has big; square white teeth that remind me of bathroom tiles. The reflection in his glasses makes it impossible to see his eyes, and I wish he would take them off.

‘Talk to us about the things you like to do. Your interests; hobbies; favorite subjects.’

I launch into the speech I’ve prepared; about photography and running and spending time with my friends; but I’m not focusing. I see the evaluators nodding in front of me, and smiles beginning to loosen their faces as they take notes; so I know I’m doing fine, but I can’t even hear the words that are coming out of my mouth. I’m fixated on the metal surgical table and keep sneaking looks at it from the corner of my eye; watching it blink and shimmer in the light like the edge of a blade.

And suddenly I’m thinking of my mother. My mother had remained uncured despite three separate procedures, and the disease had claimed her; nipped at her insides and turned her eyes hollow and her cheeks pale; had taken control of her feet and led her; inch by inch; to the edge of a sandy cliff and into the bright; thin air of the plunge beyond.

Or so they tell me. I was six at the time. I remember only the hot pressure of her fingers on my face in the nighttime and her last whispered words to me. I love you. Remember. They cannot take it- they can't take much more.

I close my eyes quickly; overwhelmed by the thought of my mother; writing and a dozen scientists in lab coats watching; scribbling impassively on notepads. Three separate times she was strapped to a metal table; three separate times a crowd of observers watched her from the deck; took note of her responses as the needles, and then the lasers; pierced her skin. Normally patients are anesthetized during the procedure and don't feel a thing, but my aunt had once let slip that during my mother's third procedure they had refused to sedate her; thinking that the anesthesia might be interfering with her brain's response to the cure.

'Would you like some water?' Evaluator One; the woman; gestures to a bottle of water and glass set up on the table. She has noticed my momentary flinch, but it's okay. My statement is done, and I can tell by the way the evaluators are looking at me- pleased; proud like I'm a little kid who has managed to fit all the right pegs in all the right holes that I've done a good job.

I pour myself a glass of water and take a few sips; grateful for the pause. I can feel sweat pricking up under my arms; on my scalp, and at the base of my neck, and I pray to God they can't see it. I try to keep my eyes locked on the evaluators, but there it is in my peripheral vision; grinning at me- that damn table.

'Okay now; Lena. We're going to ask you some questions. We want you to answer honestly. Remember; we're trying to get to know you as a person.'

As opposed to what? The question pops into my mind before I can stop it.

As an animal?

I take a deep breath; force myself to nod and smile. 'Great.' 'What are some of your favorite books?'

'Love; War, and Interference; by Christopher Malley;' I answer automatically. 'Border; by Philippa Harolde.' It's no use trying to keep the images away- They are rising now; a flood. That one word keeps scripting itself on my brain; as though it is being seared there. Pain.

They wanted to make my mother submit to a fourth procedure. They were coming for her on the night she died; coming to bring her to the labs.

But instead; she had fled into the dark; winged her way into the air. Instead; she had woken me with those words- I love you. Remember...? They cannot take it. Which the wind seemed to carry back to me long after she had vanished; repeated on the dry trees; on the leaves coughing and whispering in the cold gray dawn.

‘And Romeo and Juliet; by Krumenacker Shakespeare.’

Romeo and Juliet are required to read in every freshman-year health class. The evaluator's nod; make notes.

‘And why is that?’ Evaluator Three asks.

It's frightening- That's what I'm supposed to say. It's a cautionary tale; a warning about the dangers of the old world; before the cure.

But my throat seems to have grown swollen and tender. There is no room to squeeze the words out; they are stuck there like the burrs that cling to our clothing when we jog through the farms.

And at that moment; it's like I can hear the low growl of the ocean; can hear its distant; insistent murmur; can imagine its weight closing around my mother; water as heavy as stone. And what comes out is-

‘It's beautiful...’

Instantly all four faces jerk up to look at me; like puppets connected to the same string.

‘Beautiful...?’ Evaluator One wrinkles her nose. There's a zinging; frigid tension in the air, and I realize I've made a big; big mistake. The evaluator with the glasses leans forward. ‘That's an interesting word to use. Very interesting.’ This time when he shows his teeth; they remind me of the curved white canines of a dog. ‘Perhaps you find suffering beautifully? Perhaps you enjoy violence?’

‘No. No; that's not it.’ I'm trying to think straight, but my head is full of the ocean's wordless roaring. It is growing louder and louder by the second. And now; faintly; it's as though

I can hear screaming as well-like my mother's scream is reaching me from across the span of a decade. 'I just mean - there's something so sad about it.'

I'm struggling; floundering; feeling like I'm drowning now; in the white light and the roaring. Sacrifice. I want to say something about sacrifice, but the word doesn't come.

~*~

'Let's move on.' Evaluator One; who sounded so sweet when she offered me the water; has lost all pretense of friendliness. She is all business now.

'Tell us something simple. Like your favorite color; for example.' Part of my brain-the the rational; educated part; the logical me part- screams; Blue! Say blue! But this other; older thing inside of me is riding across the waves of sound; surging up with the rising noise. 'Gray;' I blurt out.

'Gray?' Evaluator Four splutters back. My heart is spiraling down to my stomach. I know I've done it; I'm tanking; can practically see my numbers flipping backward. But it's too late. I'm finished-it's the roaring in my ears; growing louder and louder; a stampede; that makes thinking impossible. I quickly stammered out an explanation.

'Not gray; exactly... Right before the sun rises there's a moment when the whole sky goes this pale nothing color-not really gray but sort of; or sort of white, and I've always really liked it because it reminds me of waiting for something good to happen.'

But they've stopped listening. All of them are staring beyond me; heads cocked; expressions confused; as though trying to make out familiar words in a foreign language. And then suddenly the roaring and the screaming surge and I realize, I haven't been imagining them all this time.

People are screaming, and there's a tumbling; rolling; drumming sound; like a thousand feet moving together. There's a third sound too; running under both of those- a wordless bellowing that doesn't sound human.

In my confusion; everything seems disconnected; the way it does in dreams. Evaluator One half rises from her chair; saying; 'What the hell -?' At the same time; Glasses says; 'Sit down; Helen. I'll go see what's wrong.' But at that second the blue door bursts open and a streaming blur of cows- actual; real; live; sweating; mooing cows-come thundering into the lab. A stampede; I think, and for one weird; detached second feel proud of myself for correctly identifying the noise.

Then I realize I'm being charged by a bunch of very heavy; very frightened herd animals, and am about two seconds from getting stomped into the ground. Instantly I launch myself into the corner and wedge myself behind the surgical table; where I'm completely protected from the panicked mass of animals. I poke my head out just a little; so, I can still see what's going on.

The evaluators are hopping up onto the table now; as walls of brown and speckled cow flanks fold around them. Evaluator One is screaming at the top of her lungs, and Glasses is yelling; 'Calm down; calm down!' even though he's grabbing onto her like she's a life raft and he's in danger of sinking. Some of the cows have wigs hanging crazily from their heads, and others are half-swaddled in gowns identical to the one I'm wearing.

For a second I'm sure I'm dreaming. Maybe this whole day has been a dream, and I'll wake up to discover that I'm still at home; in bed; on the morning of my evaluation. But then I notice the writing on the cows' flanks- NOT CURE- DEATH.

The words are written in sloppy ink; just above the neatly branded numbers that identify these cows as destined for the slaughterhouse.

A little chill dance up my spine and everything starts clicking into place. Every couple of years the Invalids-the people who live in the Wilds; the unregulated land that exists between recognized cities and towns-sneak into Pittsburgh and stage some kind of protest.

One year they came in at night and painted red death skulls on every single one of the known scientists' houses. Another year they managed to break into the central police station; which coordinates all the patrols and guard shifts for Pittsburgh and move all the furniture onto the roof; even the coffee machines. That was pretty funny; actually-and pretty amazing since you'd think Central would be the most secure building in Pittsburgh. People in the Wilds don't see love as a disease, and they don't believe in the cure. They think it's a kind of cruelty. Thus; the slogan.

Now I get it- The cows are dressed up like us; the people being evaluated. Like we're all a bunch of herd animals.

The cows are calming down somewhat. They're not charging anymore, and have begun to shuffle back and forth in the lab. Evaluator One has a clipboard in her hand, and she's swooping and swatting as the cow's butt up against the table; mooing and nipping at the papers scattered across its surface -the evaluators' notes; I realize; as a cow snaps up a sheet of paper and begins to rip at it with its teeth.

Thank God- Maybe the cows will eat up all the notes, and the evaluators will lose track of the fact that I was completely tanking. Half-concealed behind the table-and safe; now; from those sharp; stamping hooves- I have to admit the whole thing is kind of hilarious.

That's when I hear it. Somehow; above the snorting and stomping and yelling; I hear the laugh above me-low and short and musical; like someone sounding out a few notes on a piano. The observation decks. A boy is standing on the observation deck; watching the chaos below. And he's laughing.

As soon as I look up; his eyes click on my face. The breath whooshes out of my body and everything freezes for a second; as though I'm looking at him through my camera lens; zoomed in all the way; the world pausing for that tiny period between the opening and closing of the shutter. His hair is golden brown; like leaves in autumn just as they're turning, and he has bright amber eyes.

The moment, I see him- I know that he's one of the people responsible for this. I know that he must live in the Wilds; I know he's an Invalid.

Fear clamps down on my stomach, and I open my mouth to shout something-I'm not sure what; exactly-but at precisely that second- he gives a minute shake of his head, and suddenly I can't make a sound. Then he does the absolutely; positively unthinkable.

He winks at me...

At last; the alarm goes off. It's so loud I have to cover my ears with my hands. I look down to see whether the evaluators have seen him, but they're still doing their little tabletop dance, and when I look up again; he's gone.

Step on a crack; you'll break your mama's back.

Step on a stone; you'll end up all alone.

Step on a stick; you're bound to get the Sick. Watch where you tread; you'll bring out all the dead.

-A common children's playground chant; usually accompanied by jumping rope or clapping... That night; I have the dream again.

I'm at the edge of a big white cliff made out of the sand. The ground is unsteady. The ledge I'm standing on is starting to crumble; to flake away and tumble down; down; down thousands of feet below me; into the ocean; which is whipping and snapping so hard it looks like one gigantic; frothing stew; all Whitecaps, and surging water.

I'm terrified I'm going to fall, but for some reason, I can't move or back away from the edge of the cliff; even as I feel the ground shifting away from underneath me; millions of molecules rearranging themselves into space; into the wind- Any second I'm going to fall.

Likewise, just before, I know that there's nothing underneath me but air-that at any split second I'm going to feel the wind shrieking around me as I drop down into the water-the waves lashing underneath me open up for a moment and- I see my mother's face; pale and bloated and splotched with blue; floating just below the surface. Her eyes are open; her mouth is split apart as though she is screaming; her arms are extended on either side of her; bobbing in the current; as though she is waiting to embrace me.

That's when I wake up. That's when I always wake up.

My pillow is damp, and I've got a scratchy feeling in my throat. I've been crying in my sleep. Gracie is folded next to me; one cheek squashed flat against the sheets; her mouth making endless; noiseless repetitions. She always gets into bed with me when I'm having the dream.

She can sense it; somehow. I brush her hair away from her face and pull the sweat-soaked sheets away from her shoulders. I'll be sorry to leave Grace when I move out.

Our secrets have made us close; bonded us together. She is the only one who knows of the Coldness- a feeling that comes sometimes when I'm lying in bed; a black; the empty feeling that knocks my breath away and leaves me gasping as though I've just been thrown in the icy water.

On nights like that although; it is wrong and illegal- I think of those strange and terrible words; I love you and wonder what they would taste like in my mouth; try to recall their lilting rhythm on my mother's tongue.

And of course; I keep her secret safe. I'm the only one who knows that Grace isn't stupid, or slow- There's nothing wrong with her at all. I'm the only one who has ever heard her speak.

One night after she'd come to sleep in my bed I woke up in the very early morning; the nighttime shadows ebbing off our walls. She was sobbing quietly into the pillow next to me; pronouncing the same word over and over; stuffing her mouth with blankets so I could barely hear her- 'Mommy; Mommy; Mommy.'

As though she was trying to chew her way around it; as though it was choking her in her sleep. I'd put my arms around her and squeezed, and after what felt like hours; she exhausted herself on the word and fell back to sleep; the tension in her body slowly relaxing; her face hot and bloated from the tears.

That's the real reason she doesn't speak. All the rest of her words are crowded out by that single; looming one; a word still echoing in the dark corners of her memory.

Mommy...

I know, I remember. I sit up and watch the light strengthen the walls; listen for the sounds of the seagulls outside; take a drink from the glass of water next to my bed. Today is June 3. Ninety-five days.

I wish; for Grace; the cure could come sooner. I comfort myself by thinking that someday she will have the procedure too. Someday she will be saved, and the past and all its pain will be rendered as smoothly palatable as the food we spoon to our babies.

Someday we'll all be saved. By the time I drag myself down to breakfast-feeling as though someone is grinding sand into both of my eyes-the official story about the incident at the labs has been released.

Carol keeps our small TV on low while she makes breakfast, and the murmur of the newscasters' voices almost puts me back to sleep.

'Yesterday a truck full of cattle intended for the slaughterhouse was mixed up with a shipment of pharmaceuticals; resulting in the hilarious and unprecedented chaos you see on your screen.' Cue- nurses squealing; swatting at lowing cows with clipboards.

This doesn't make any sense, but as long as no one mentions the Invalids; everyone's happy. We're not supposed to know about them. They're not even supposed to exist; supposedly; all the people who live in the Wilds were destroyed over fifty years ago; during the blitz.

Fifty years ago; the government closed the borders of the United States. The border is guarded constantly by military personnel. No one can get in. No one goes out. Every sanctioned and approved community must also be contained within a border that's the law and all travel between communities requires the official written consent of the municipal government; to be obtained six months in advance. This is for our protection. Safety; Sanctity; Community- That is our country's motto. For the most part; the government has been successful. We haven't seen a war since the border was closed, and there is hardly any crime, except for the occasional incident of vandalism or petty theft. There is no more hatred in the United States; at least among the cured. Only sporadic cases of detachment-but every medical procedure carry a certain risk.

But so far; the government has failed to rid the country of the Invalids, and it is the single blemish on the administration and the system in general. So, we don't talk about them. We pretend that the Wilds-and the people who live there- don't even exist. It's rare to hear the word even spoken; except when a suspected sympathizer disappears; or when a young diseased couple is found to have vanished together before a cure can be administered.

One piece of really good news is this-

All of yesterday's evaluations have been invalidated. All of us will receive a new evaluation date, which means I get a second chance. This time I swear I'm not going to screw it up. I feel completely idiotic about my meltdown at the labs.

Sitting at the breakfast table; with everything looking so clean and bright and normal-the chipped blue mugs full of coffee; the erratic beeping of the microwave (one of the few electronic devices; besides the lights; Carol allows us to use)-makes yesterday seem like a long; strange dream. It's a miracle; actually; that a bunch of fanatical Invalids decided to let loose a stampede at the exact moment I was failing the most important test of my life. I don't know what came over me. I think about Glasses showing his teeth, and the moment I heard my mouth say.

'Gray;' and I wince. Stupid; stupid.

Suddenly I'm aware that Jenny has been talking to me.

'What?' I blink at Jenny as she swims into focus. I watch her hands as she cuts her toast precisely into quarters.

'I said; what's wrong with you?' Back and forth; back and forth. The knife dings against the edge of the plate. 'You look like you're about to puke or something.' 'Jenny;' Carol scolds. She is at the sink; washing dishes. 'Not while your uncle is eating breakfast.' 'I'm fine.' I rip off a piece of toast; slide it across the stick of butter that's getting melty in the middle of the table, and force myself to eat. The last thing I need is a good old family-style interrogation. 'Just tired.' Carol turns to look at me. Her face has always reminded me of a doll's. Even when she's talking; even when she's irritated or happy or confused; her expression stays weirdly immobile.

'Couldn't sleep?'

'I slept;' I say. 'I just had a bad dream; that's all.' At the end of the table; my uncle Krumenacker starts up from his newspaper.

'Oh; God. You know what? You just reminded me. I had a dream last night too.'

Carol raises her eyebrows, and even Jenny looks interested. It's extremely unusual for people to dream once they've been cured. Carol once told me that on the rare occasions she still dreams; her dreams are full of dishes; stacks and stacks of them climbing toward the sky, and sometimes she climbs them; lip to lip; hauling herself up into the clouds; trying to reach the top of the stack. But it never ends; it stretches on into infinity. As far as I know; my sister Rachel never dreams anymore.

Krumenacker smiles; 'I was caulking the window in the bathroom. Carol; you remember I said there was a draft the other day? Anyway; I was piping in the caulk, but every time I finished; it would just flake away-almost like it was snow-and the wind would come in and

I'd have to start all over. On and on and on for hours; it felt like.'

'How strange;' my aunt says; smiling; coming to the table with a plate of fried eggs. My uncle likes them super runny, and they sit on the plate; their yolks jiggling and quivering like hula-hoop dancers; spotted with oil. My stomach twists. Krumenacker says; 'No wonder I'm so tired this morning. I was doing housework all night.'

Everyone laughs but me. I choke down another bit of toast; wondering whether I'll dream once I've been cured.

I hope not.

This year is the first year since sixth grade that I don't have a single class with Hanna; so, I don't see her until after school; when we meet up in the locker room to go running; even though the cross-country season ended a couple of weeks ago.

(When the team went to Regionals it was only the third time I'd ever been out of Pittsburgh, and even though we went just forty miles along the gray; bleak municipal highway; I could still hardly swallow; the butterflies in my throat were so frantic.)

Still; Hanna and I try to run together as much as we can; even during school vacations. I started running when I was six years old after my mom committed suicide. The first day I ever ran a whole mile was the day of her funeral. I'd been told to stay upstairs with my cousins while my aunt prepared the house for the memorial service and laid out all the food.

Marcia and Rachel were supposed to get me ready, but in the middle of helping me dress, they'd started arguing about something and had stopped paying me any attention at all. So-o I had wandered downstairs; my dress zipped halfway up my back; to ask my aunt for help. Mrs. Eisner; my aunt's neighbor at the time; was there. As I came into the kitchen she was saying; 'It's horrible; of course. But there was no hope for her anyway. It's much better this way. It's better for Lena; too. Who wants a mother like that?'

I wasn't supposed to have heard. Mrs. Eisner gave a startled little gasp when she saw me, and her mouth shut quickly; like a cork popping back into a bottle.

My aunt just stood there, and in that second it was as though the world and the future collapsed down into a single point, and I understood that this-the kitchen; the spotless cream linoleum floors; the glaring lights, and the vivid green mass of Jell-O on the counter- was all that was left now that my mother was gone.

Suddenly, I couldn't stay there. I couldn't stand the sight of my aunt's kitchen, which I now understood would be my kitchen. I couldn't stand the Jell- O.

My mother hated Jell-O. An itchy feeling began to work its way through my body; as though a thousand mosquitoes were circulating through my blood; biting me from the inside; making me want to scream; jump; squirm.

I ran...

Nevaeh

Book: 24

This Kiss

Hanna; one foot on a bench; is lacing up her shoes when I come in. My awful secret is that I like to run with Hanna partly because it's the single; sole; a solitary shred of a thing that I can do better than she can; but I would never admit that out loud in a million years.

I haven't even had a chance to put my bag down before she's leaning forward and grabbing my arm.

'Can you believe it?' She's fighting a smile, and her eyes are a pinwheel of color-blue; green; gold-flashing like they always do when she's excited about something. 'It was definitely the Invalids. That's what everybody's saying; anyway.'

We're the only people in the locker room-all the sports teams have finished their seasons-but I instinctively whip my head around when she says the word.

'Keep your voice down.'

She pulls back a little; tossing her hair over one shoulder. 'Relax. I did recon. Even checked the toilet stalls. We're in the clear.'

I open up the gym locker I've had for all my ten years at St. Anne's. At its bottom is a film of gum wrappers and shredded notes and lost paper clips, and on top of that; my small limp pile of running clothes; two pairs of shoes; my cross-country team jersey; a dozen half-used bottles of deodorant; conditioner, and perfume. In less than two weeks I'll graduate and never see the inside of this locker again, and for a second I get sad.

It's gross; but I've actually always loved the smell of gyms- the industrial cleaning fluid and the deodorant and soccer balls and even the lingering smell of sweat.

It's comforting to me. It's so strange how life works- You want something, and you wait and wait and feel like it's taking forever to come. Then it happens and it's over and all you want to do is curl back up at that moment before things changed.

'Who's everybody; anyway? The news is saying it was just a mistake; a shipping error or something.' I feel the need to repeat the official story; even though I know just as well as Hanna that it's BS.

She straddles the bench; watching me.

As usual; she's oblivious to the fact that I hate it when other people see me change. 'Don't be an idiot. If it was on the news; it definitely isn't true. Besides; who mixes up a cow and a box of prescription meds? It's not like it's hard to tell the difference.'

I shrug. She's right; obviously. She's still looking at me; so- I angle slightly away. I've never been comfortable with my body like Hanna and some of the other girls at St. Anne's; never gotten over the awkward feeling that I've been fitted together just a little wrong in some very key places. Like I've been sketched by an amateur artist- If you don't look too closely; it's all right, but start focusing and all the smudges and mistakes become really obvious. Hanna kicks one leg out and begins stretching; refusing to let the issue drop.

Hanna's more fascinated with the Wilds than anyone I've ever met. 'If you think about it; it's pretty amazing. The planning and all that. It would have taken at least four or five people-maybe more-to coordinate everything.' I think briefly of the boy I saw on the observation deck; of his flashing; autumn-leaf-colored hair, and the way he tipped his head back when he laughed so I could see the vaulted black arch of his mouth. I told no one about him; not even Hanna, and now I feel I should have.

Hanna goes on; 'Someone must have had security codes. Maybe a sympathizer.'

A door bangs loudly at the front of the locker room, and Hanna and I both jump; staring at each other with wide eyes. Footsteps click quickly across the linoleum. After a few seconds of hesitation; Hanna launches smoothly into a safe topic- the color of the graduation gowns; which are orange this year. Just then Mrs. Jonson; the athletic director; comes around the bank of lockers; swinging her whistle around one finger.

'At least they're not brown; like at Fieldston Prep;' I say; though I'm barely listening to Hanna. My heart is pounding and I'm still thinking about the boy and wondering whether Jonson heard us say the word sympathizer. She doesn't do anything but nod as she passes us; so, it seems unlikely.

I've learned to get really good at this -say one thing when I'm thinking about something else; act like I'm listening when I'm not; pretend to be calm and happy when really; I'm freaking out. It's one of the skills you perfect as you get older. You have to learn that people are always listening.

The first time I ever used the cell phone that my aunt and uncle share; I was surprised by the patchy interference that kept breaking up my conversation with Hanna at random intervals; until my aunt explained that it was just the government's listening devices; which arbitrarily cut into cell phone calls; recording them; monitoring conversations for target words like love; or Invalids; or sympathizer.

No one; in particular; is targeted; it's all done randomly; to be fair. But it's almost worse that way. I pretty much always feel as though a giant; revolving gaze is bound to sweep over me at any second; lighting up my bad thoughts like an animal lit still and white in the ever-turning beam of a lighthouse. Sometimes I feel as though there are two me's; one coasting directly on top of the other- the superficial me; who nods when she's supposed to nod and says what she's supposed to say, and some other; deeper part; the part that worries and dreams and says 'Gray.'

Most of the time they move along in sync and I hardly notice the split, but sometimes it feels as though I'm two wholly different people and I could rip apart at any second. Once I confessed this to Rachel. She just smiled and told me it would all be better after the procedure. After the procedure; she said; it would be all coasting; all glide; every day as easy as one; two; three.

'Ready;' I say; spinning my locker closed. We can still hear Mrs. Jonson shuffling around in the bathroom; whistling. A toilet flushes. A faucet goes on.

'My turn to pick the route;' Hanna says; eyes sparkling, and before I can open my mouth to protest; she lunges forward and smacks me on the shoulder.'

'Tag- you're it;' she says, and just as easily spins off the bench and sprints for the door; laughing; so- I have to run to catch up.

Earlier in the day; it rained, and the storm cooled everything off. Water evaporates from puddles in the streets; leaving a shimmering layer of mist over Pittsburgh. Above us; the sky is now a vivid blue. The bay is flat and silver; the coast like a giant belt cinched around it; keeping it in place.

I don't ask Hanna where she's going, but it doesn't surprise me when she starts winding us toward Old Port; toward the old footpath that runs along Commercial Street and up to the labs.

We try to keep on the smaller; less-trafficked streets, but it's pretty much a losing game. It's three-thirty. All the schools have been released, and the streets surge with students walking home. A few buses rumble past, and one or two cars squeeze by. Cars are considered good luck. As they pass; people reach out their hands and brush along with the shiny hoods; the clean; bright windows; which will soon be smudged with fingerprints. Hanna and I run next to each other; reviewing all the day's gossip. We don't talk about the botched evaluations yesterday, or the rumors of the Invalids.

There are too many people around. Instead; she tells me about her ethics exam, and I tell her about Cora Dervish's fight with Minna Wilkinson. We talk about Willow Marks; too; who has been absent from school since the previous Wednesday. Rumor is that Willow was found by regulators last week in Deering Oaks Park after curfew -with a boy.

We've been hearing rumors like that about Willow for years. She's just the kind of person people talk about. She has blond hair, but she's always coloring different streaks into it with markers, and I remember once on a freshman class trip to a museum; we passed a group of Spencer Prep boys and she said; so loud one of our chaperones could have easily heard; 'I'd like to kiss one of them straight on the lips.' Supposedly she was caught hanging out with a boy in tenth grade and got off with a warning because she showed no signs of the deliria.

Every so often people make mistakes; it's biological; a result of the same kind of chemical and hormonal imbalances that occasionally lead to Un-naturalism; to boys being attracted to boys and girls to girls. These impulses; too; will be resolved by the cure. But this time it is serious; apparently, and Hanna drops the bomb just as we turn onto Center- Mr. and Mrs. Marks have agreed to move the date of Willow's procedure up by a full six months. She'll be missing graduation day to get cured.

'Six months?' I repeat. We've been running hard for twenty minutes; so- I'm not sure if the heavy thumping in my chest is a result of the exercise or the news. I'm feeling more out of breath than I should be like someone's sitting on my chest. 'Isn't that dangerous?' Hanna tips her head to the right; gesturing the way to a shortcut through an alley. 'It's been done before.'

'Yeah; but not successfully. What about all the side effects? Mental problems? Blindness?' There are a few reasons why the scientists won't let anyone under the age of eighteen have the procedure, but the biggest one is that it just doesn't seem to work as well for people younger than that, and in the worst cases it's been known to cause all kind of crazy difficulties. Scientists speculate that the brain and its neuropathways are still too plastic before then; still in the middle of forming themselves. Actually; the older you are when you have the procedure; the better; but most people are scheduled for the procedure as close as possible to their eighteenth birthday.

'I guess they think it's worth the risk;'

Hanna says. 'Better than the alternative; you know? Amor deliria Nervosa. The deadliest of all deadly things.' This is the catchphrase that's written on every mental health pamphlet ever written about the deliria; Hanna's voice is flat as she repeats it, and it makes my stomach dip. All of yesterday's craziness has made me forget Hanna's comment to me before the evaluations. But now I remember and remember how strange she looked too; eyes cloudy and unreadable.

'Come on.' I feel a straining in my lungs and my left thigh is starting to cramp. The only way to push through it is to run harder and faster. 'Let's pick it up; Slug.'

'Bring it.' Hanna's face splits into a grin, and both of us start pumping faster. The pain in my lungs swells up and blossoms until it feels like it's everywhere; tearing through all my cells and muscles at once. The cramp in my leg makes me wince every time my heel hits the pavement. It's always like this on miles two and three; like all the stress and anxiety and irritation and fear get transformed into little needling points of physical pain, and you can't breathe or imagine going farther or think anything but I can't. I can't. I can't.

And then; just as suddenly; it's gone. All the pain lifts away; the cramp vanishes; the first ease off my chest, and I can breathe easily. Instantly a feeling of total happiness bubbles up inside of me- the solid feeling of the ground underneath me; the simplicity of the movement; rocketing off my heels; pushing forward in time and space; total freedom and release. I glance over at Hanna. I can tell from her expression that she's feeling it too. She has made it through the wall. She senses me looking and whips around; her blond ponytail a bright arc; to give me the thumbs-up.

It's strange. When we run; I feel closer to Hanna than at any other time. Even when we're not talking; it's like there's an invisible cord tethering us together; matching our rhythms; our arms and our legs; as though we're both responding to the same drumbeat.

For my sister; Karly- Han girl's forever I like to save things. Not important things like whales or people or the environment. Silly things. Porcelain bells; the kind you get at souvenir shops. Cookie cutters you'll never use; because who needs a cookie in the shape of a foot? Ribbons for my hair.

Love letters. Of all the things I save; I guess you could say my love letters are my most prized possession. I keep my letters in a teal hatbox my mom bought me from a vintage store downtown.

They don't love letters that someone else wrote for me; I don't have any of those. These are the ones I've written. There's one for every boy I've ever loved - five in all.

When I write; I hold nothing back. I write as he'll never read it. Because he never will.

Every secret thought; every careful observation; everything I've saved up inside me; I put it all in the letter. When I'm done; I seal it; I address it, and then I put it in my teal hatbox.

They do not love letters in the strictest sense of the word. My letters are for when I don't want to be in love anymore. They're for good-bye. Because after I write my letter; I'm no longer consumed by my all-consuming love. I can eat my cereal and not wonder if he likes bananas over his Cheerios too; I can sing along to love songs and not be singing them to him. If love is like a possession; maybe my letters are like my exorcisms. My letters set me free. Or at least they're supposed to.

JOSH IS MARGOT'S BOYFRIEND; BUT I guess you could say my whole family is a little in love with him. It's hard to say who most of all. Before he was Margot's boyfriend; he was just Josh. He was always there. I say always, but I guess that's not true. He moved next door five years ago, but it feels like always.

My dad loves Josh because he's a boy and my dad is surrounded by girls. I mean it - all day long he is surrounded by females. My dad is an ob-gyn, and he also happens to be the father of three daughters; so, it's like girls; girls; girls all day. He also likes Josh because Josh likes comics and he'll go fishing with him. My dad tried to take us fishing once, and I cried when my shoes got mud on them, and Margot cried when her book got wet, and Kellie cried because Kellie was still practically a baby.

Kellie loves Josh because he'll play cards with her and not get bored. Or at least pretend to not get bored. They make deals with each other - if I win this next hand; you have to make me a toasted crunchy-peanut-butter-sandwich; no crusts.

That's Kellie...

Inevitably there won't be crunchy peanut butter and Josh will say too bad; pick something else. But then Kellie will wear him down and he'll run out and buy some because that's Josh.

If I had to say why Margot loves him; I think maybe I would say it's because we all do.

We are in the living room; Kellie is posting pictures of dogs to a giant piece of cardboard. There are paper and scraps all around her. Humming to herself; she says; 'When Daddy asks me what I want for Christmas; I am just going to say; 'Pick any one of these breeds and we'll be good.' 'Margot and Josh are on the couch; I'm lying on the floor; watching TV. Josh popped a big bowl of popcorn, and I devote myself to it; handfuls and handfuls of it.

A commercial comes on for perfume- a girl is running around the streets of- Paris in an orchid-colored halter dress that is thin as tissue paper. What I wouldn't give to be that; the girl in that tissue-paper dress running around Paris in springtime! I sit up so-o suddenly; I choke on a kernel of popcorn. Between coughs I say; 'Margot; let's meet in Paris for my spring break!' I'm already picturing myself twirling with a pistachio macaron in one hand and a raspberry one in the other.

Margot's eyes light up. 'Do you think Daddy will let you?'

'Sure; it's culture. He'll have to let me.' But it's true that I've never flown by myself before. And also; I've never even left the country before. Would Margot meet me at the airport; or would I have to find my own way to the hostel?

Josh must see the sudden worry on my face because he says; 'Don't worry.

Your dad will definitely let you go if I'm with you.'

I brighten. 'Yeah! We can stay at hostels and just eat pastries and cheese for all our meals.'

'We can go to Jim Morrison's grave!' Josh throws in.

'We can go to a perfumeries' and get our personal scents done!' I cheer, and Josh snorts.

‘Um; I’m pretty sure ‘getting our scents done’ at some perfumeries’ would cost the same as a week’s stay at the hostel;’ he says. He nudges Margot. ‘Your sister suffers from delusions of grandeur.’

‘She is the fanciest of the three of us;’ Margot agrees.

‘What about me?’ Kellie whimpers.

‘You?’ I scoff. ‘You’re the least fancy Song girl. I have to beg you to wash your feet at night; much less take a shower.’

Kellie’s face gets pinched and red. ‘I wasn’t talking about that; you dodo bird. I was talking about Paris.’

Airily; I wave her off. ‘You’re too little to stay at a hostel.’

She crawls over to Margot and climbs in her lap; even though she’s nine and nine is too big to sit in people’s laps. ‘Margot; you’ll let me go; won’t you?’

‘Maybe it could be a family vacation;’ Margot says; kissing her cheek. ‘You and Lara Jean and Daddy could all come.’

I frown... That’s not at all the Paris trip I was imagining. Over Kellie’s head Josh mouths to me; we’ll talk later, and I give him a discreet thumbs-up.

It’s later that night; Josh is long gone. Kellie and our dad are asleep. We are in the kitchen. Margot is at the table on her computer; I am sitting next to her; rolling cookie dough into balls and dropping them in cinnamon and sugar. Snickerdoodles to get back in Kellie’s good graces. Earlier; when I went in to say good night; Kellie rolled over and wouldn’t speak to me because she’s still convinced; I’m going to try to cut her out of the- Paris trip.

My plan is to put the snickerdoodles on a plate right next to her pillow so she wakes up to the smell of fresh-baked cookies.

Margot’s being extra quiet, and then; out of nowhere; she looks up from her computer and says; ‘I broke up with Josh tonight. After dinner.’

My cookie-dough ball falls out of my fingers and into the sugar bowl.

‘I mean; it was time;’ she says. Her eyes aren’t red-rimmed; she hasn’t been crying; I don’t think. Her voice is calm and even. Anyone looking at her would think she was fine.

Because Margot is always fine; even when she’s not.

‘I don’t see why you had to break up;’ I say. ‘Just cause you’re going to college doesn’t mean you have to break up.’

‘Lara Jean; I’m going to Scotland; not UVA. Saint Andrews is nearly four thousand miles away.’ She pushes up her glasses. ‘What would be the point?’

I can’t even believe she would say that. ‘The point is; it’s Josh. Josh who loves you more than any boy has ever loved a girl!’

Margot rolls her eyes at this. She thinks I’m being dramatic, but I’m not. It’s true; that’s how much Josh loves Margot. He would never so much as look at another girl.

Suddenly she says; ‘Do you know what Mommy told me once?’

‘What?’ For a moment; I forget all about Josh. Because no matter what I am doing in life; if Margot and I are in the middle of an argument; if I am about to get hit by a car; I will always stop and listen to a story about Mommy.

Any detail; any remembrance that; Margot has; I want to have it too. I’m better off than Kellie; though. Kellie doesn’t have one memory of Mommy that we haven’t given her. We’ve told her so many stories so many times that they’re hers now. ‘Remember that time-;’ she’ll say. And then she’ll tell the story like she was there and not just a little baby.

‘She told me to try not to go to college with a boyfriend. She said she didn’t want me to be the girl crying on the phone with her boyfriend and saying no to things instead of yes.’

Scotland is Margot’s; yes; I guess. Absently; I scoop up a mound of cookie dough and pop it in my mouth.

‘You shouldn’t eat raw cookie dough;’ Margot says.

I ignore her. ‘Josh would never hold you back from anything. He’s not like that.’

Remember how when you decided to run for student-body president; he was your campaign manager? He's your biggest fan!'

At this; the corners of Margot's mouth turn down, and I get up and fling my arms around her neck. She leans her head back and smiles up at me. 'I'm okay;' she says, but she isn't; I know she isn't.

'It's not too late; you know. You can go over there right now and tell him you changed your mind.'

Margot shakes her head. 'It's done; Lara Jean.' I release her and she closes her laptop. 'When will the first batch be ready? I'm hungry.'

I look at the magnetic egg timer on the fridge. 'Four more minutes.' I sit back down and say; 'I don't care what you say; Margot. You guys aren't done. You love him too much.'

She shakes her head. 'Lara Jean;' she begins; in her patient Margot's voice; like I am a child and she is a wise old woman of forty-two.

I wave a spoonful of cookie dough under Margot's nose, and she hesitates and then opens her mouth. I feed it to her like a baby. 'Wait and see; you and Josh will be back together in a day; maybe two.' But even as I'm saying it; I know it's not true. Margot's not the kind of girl to break up and get back together on a whim; once she's decided something; that's it. There's no waffling; no regrets. It's like she said- when she's done; she's just done.

I wish (and this is a thought I've had many; many times; too many times to count) I was more like Margot. Because sometimes it feels like I'll never be done.

Later; after I've washed the dishes and plated the cookies and set them on Kellie's pillow; I go to my room. I don't turn the light on. I go to my window. Josh's light is still on.

THE NEXT MORNING; MARGOT making coffee and I am pouring cereal into bowls, and I say the thing I've been thinking all morning. 'Just so you know; Daddy and Kellie are going to be really upset.' When Kellie and I were brushing our teeth just now; I was tempted to go ahead and spill the beans, but Kellie was still mad at me from yesterday; so- I kept quiet. She didn't even acknowledge my cookies; though I know she ate them because all that was left on the plate where crumbs.

Margot lets out a heavy sigh. 'So; I'm supposed to stay with Josh because of you and Daddy and Kellie?'

'No; I'm just telling you.'

'It's not like he would come over here that much once I was gone; anyway.'

I frown... This didn't occur to me; that Josh would stop coming over because Margot was gone. He was coming over long before they were ever a couple; so- I don't see why he should stop. 'He might;' I say. 'He really loves Kellie.'

She pushes the start button on the coffee machine. I'm watching her super carefully because; Margot's always been the one to make the coffee and I never have, and now; that she's leaving (only six more days); I'd better know-how. With her back to me; she says; 'Maybe I won't even mention it to them.'

'Um; I think they'll figure it out when he's not at the airport; Gogo.' Gogo is my nickname for Margot. As in go-go boots. 'How many cups of water did you put in there?

And how many spoons of coffee beans?'

'I'll write it all down for you;' Margot assures me. 'In the notebook.'

We keep a house notebook by the fridge. Margot's idea; of course. It has all the important numbers and Daddy's schedule and Kellie's Caceool. 'Make sure you put in the number for the new dry cleaners;' I say.

'Already done.' Margot slices a banana for her cereal- each slice is perfectly thin. 'And also; Josh wouldn't have come to the airport with us anyway. You know how I feel; about sad good-byes.' Margot makes a face; like Ugh; emotions.

I do know.

When Margot decided to go to college in Scotland; it felt like a betrayal.

Even though I knew it was coming because of course; she was going to go to college somewhere far away. And of course; she was going to go to college in Scotland and study anthropology; because she is Margot; the girl with the maps and the travel books and the plans. Of course; she would leave us one day.

I'm still mad at her; just a little. Just a teeny-tiny bit. Obviously; I know it's not her fault. But she's going so far away, and we always said we'd be the Song girls forever.

Margot first; I in the middle and my sister Kellie last. On her birth certificate, she is Katherine; to us she is Kellie. Occasionally we call her Kitten because that's what I called her when she was born- she looked like a scrawny; hairless kitten.

We are the three Song girls. There used to be four. My mom; Eve Song. Evie to my dad; Mommy to us; Eve to everyone else. The song is; was my mom's last name. Our last name is Covey- Covey like a lovey; not like a cove. But the reason we are the Song girls and not the Covey girls is my mom used to say that she was a Song girl for life, and Margot said then we should be too. We all have Song for our middle name, and we look more Song than Covey anyway; more Korean than white. At least Margot and I do; Kellie looks most like Daddy- her hair is light brown like this. People say I look the most like Mommy, but I think Margot does; with her high cheekbones and dark eyes. It's been almost six years now, and sometimes it feels like just yesterday she was here, and sometimes it feels like she never was; only in dreams.

She'd mopped the floors that morning; they were shiny, and everything smelled like lemons and clean house. The phone was ringing in the kitchen; she came running in to answer it, and she slipped. She hit her head on the floor, and she was unconscious; but then she woke up and she was fine. That was her lucid interval. That's what they call it. A little while later she said she had a headache; she went to lie down on the couch, and then she didn't wake up.

Margot was the one who found her. She was twelve. She took care of everything- she called 911; she called Daddy; she told me to watch over Kellie; who was only three. I turned on the TV for Kellie in the playroom and I sat with her. That's all I did. I don't know what I would have done if Margot hadn't been there. Even though Margot is only two years older than me; I look up to her more than anybody.

When other adults find out that my dad is a single father of three girls; they shake their heads in admiration; like How does he do it? How does he ever manage that all by himself? The answer is Margot. She's been an organizer from the start; everything labeled and scheduled and arranged in neat; even rows. Margot is a good girl, and I guess Kellie and I have followed her lead. I've never cheated or gotten drunk or smoked a cigarette or even had a boyfriend.

We tease Daddy and say how lucky he is that we're all so good, but the truth is; we're the lucky ones. He's a really good dad. And he tries hard. He doesn't always understand us, but he tries, and that's the important thing. We three Song girls have an unspoken pact- to make life as easy as possible for Daddy. But then again; maybe it's not so unspoken; because how many times have; I heard Margot say; 'Shh; be quiet; Daddy's taking a nap before he has to go back to the hospital;' or 'Don't bother Daddy with that; do it yourself'?

I've asked Margot what she thinks it would have been like if Mommy hadn't died. Like would we spend more time with our Korean side of the family and not just on- Thanksgiving and New Year's Day? Or- Margot doesn't see the point in wondering. This is our life; there's no use in asking what if. No one could ever give you the answers. I try; I really do, but it's hard for me to accept this way of thinking. I'm always wondering about the what-ifs; about the road not taken.

Daddy and Kellie come downstairs at the same time. Margot pours Daddy a cup of coffee; black, and I pour milk into Kellie's cereal bowl. I push it in front of her, and she turns her head away from me and gets a yogurt out of the fridge. She takes it into the living room to eat in front of the TV. So; she's still mad.

'I'm going to go to Costco later today; so- you girls make a list of whatever you need;'

Daddy asks; taking a big sip of coffee. 'I think I'll pick up some New York strips for dinner.

We can grill out. Should I get one for Josh; too?'

My head whips in Margot's direction. She opens her mouth and closes it.

Then she says; 'No; just get enough for the four of us; Daddy.'

I give her a reproving look, and she ignores me. I've never known Margot to chicken out before, but I suppose in matters of the heart; there's no predicting how a person will or won't behave.

SO NOW IT'S THE LAS Todays of summer and our last days with Margot.

Maybe it's not altogether such a bad thing that she broke up with Josh; this way we have more time with just us sisters. I'm sure she must have thought of that. I'm sure it was part of the plan.

We're driving out of our neighborhood when we see Josh run past. He joined track last year; so now he's always running. Kellie yells his name, but the windows are up, and it's no use anyway- he pretends not to hear. 'Turn around;' Kellie urges Margot.

'Maybe he wants to come with us.'

'This is a Song-girls-only day;' I tell her.

We spend the rest of the morning at Target; picking up last minute things like Honey Nut Chex mix for the flight and deodorant and hair ties. We let Kellie push the cart so she can do that thing where she gets a running start and then rides the cart like; she's pushing a chariot. Margot only lets her do it a couple of times before she makes her stop; though; so as not to annoy other customers.

Next; we go back home and make chicken salad with green grapes for lunch and then it's nearly time for Kellie's swim meet. We pack a picnic dinner of ham-and-cheese sandwiches and fruit salad and bring Margot's laptop to watch movies on because swim meets can go long into the night. We make a sign; too; that says Go Kellie Go!

I draw a dog on it. Daddy ends up missing the swim meet because he is delivering a baby, and as far as excuses go; it's a pretty good one. (It was a girl, and they named her Patricia Rose after her two grandmothers. Daddy always finds out the first and middle name for me. It's the first thing I ask when he gets home from delivery.)

Kellie's so excited about winning two first-place ribbons and one-second place that she forgets to ask where Josh is until we're in the car driving back home. She's in the backseat and she's got her towel wrapped around her head like a turban and her ribbons dangling from her ears like earrings. She leans forward and says; 'Hey! Why didn't Josh come to my meet?'

I can see Margot hesitate; so- I answer before she can. Maybe the only thing I'm better at than Margot is lying. 'He had to work at the bookstore tonight. He really wanted to make it; though.' Margot reaches across the console and gives my hand a grateful squeeze.

Sticking out her lower lip; Kellie says; 'That was the last regular meet! He promised he'd come to watch me swim.'

'It was a last-minute thing;' I say. 'He couldn't get out of working the shift because one of his coworkers had an emergency.'

Kellie nods begrudgingly. Little as she is; she understands emergency shifts.

'Let's get frozen custards;' Margot says suddenly.

Kellie lights up, and Josh and his imaginary emergency shift are forgotten.

'Yeah! I want a waffle cone! Can I get a waffle cone with two scoops? I want a mint chip, and peanut brittle. No; rainbow sherbet and double fudge. No; wait...'

I twist around in my seat. 'You can't finish two scoops and a waffle cone;' I tell her.

'Maybe you could finish two scoops in a cup; but not in a cone.'

'Yes; I can... Tonight I can. I'm starving.'

'Fine; but you better finish the whole thing.' I shake my finger at her and say it like a threat; which makes her roll her eyes and giggle. As for me; I'll get what I always get; the cherry chocolate-chunk custard in a sugar cone.

Margot pulls into the drive-thru, and as we wait our turn; I say; 'I bet they don't have frozen custard in Scotland.'

'Probably not;' she says.

'You won't have another one of these until Thanksgiving;' I say.

Margot looks straight ahead. 'Christmas;' she says; correcting me.

'Thanksgiving's too short to fly all that way; remember?'

‘Thanksgiving’s going to suck.’ Kellie pouts.

I’m silent. We’ve never had a Thanksgiving without Margot. She always does the turkey and the broccoli casserole and the creamed onions. I do the pies (pumpkin and pecan) and the mashed potatoes. Kellie is the taste tester and the table-setter. I don’t know how to roast a turkey. And both of our grandmothers will be there, and Nana; Daddy’s mother; likes Margot best of all of us. She says Kellie drains her and I’m too dreamy-eyed.

All of a sudden; I feel panicky and it’s hard to breathe and I couldn’t care less about cherry chocolate-chunk custard. I can’t picture Thanksgiving without Margot. I can’t even picture next Monday without her.

I know most sisters don’t get along, but I’m closer to Margot than I am to anybody in the world. How can we be the Song girls without Margot?

MY OLDEST FRIEND CHRIS SMOKE- She hooks up with boys she doesn’t know hardly at all, and she’s been suspended twice. One time she had to go to the court for truancy.

I never knew what truancy was before I met Chris. FYI; it’s when you skip so much school; you’re in trouble with the law.

I’m pretty sure that if Chris and I met each other now; we wouldn’t be friends. We’re as different can be. But it wasn’t always this way. In sixth grade; Chris liked stationery and sleepovers and staying up all night watching John Hughes movies; just like me. But by eighth grade; she was sneaking out after my dad fell asleep to meet boys she met at the mall. They’d drop her back off before it got light outside. I’d stay up until she came back; terrified she wouldn’t make it home before my dad woke up. She always made it back in time though.

Chris isn’t the kind of friend you call every night or have lunch with every day. She is like a street cat; she comes and goes as she pleases. She can’t be tied down to a place or a person. Sometimes I won’t see Chris for days and then in the middle of the night there will be a knock at- my bedroom window and it’ll be Chris; crouched in the magnolia tree. I keep my window unlocked for her in case. Chris and Margot can’t stand each other. Chris thinks Margot is uptight, and Margot thinks Chris is bipolar. She thinks Chris uses me; Chris thinks Margot controls me. I think maybe they’re both a little bit right.

But the important thing; the real thing; is Chris and I understand each other; which I think counts for a lot more than people realize.

Chris calls me on the way over to our house; she says her mom's being a beotch and she's coming over for a couple of hours and does we have any food?

Continued

Chris and I are sharing a bowl of leftover gnocchi in the living room when Margot comes home from dropping Kellie off at her swim team's end-of-season barbecue. 'Oh; hey;' she says. Then she spots Chris's glass of Diet Coke on the coffee table; sans coaster. 'Can you please use a coaster?'

As soon as Margot's up to the stairs; Chris says; 'Gawd! Why is your sister such a botch?'

I slide a coaster under her glass. 'You think everyone's a be-otch today.'

'That's because everyone is.' Chris rolls her eyes toward the ceiling.

Loudly; she says; 'She needs to pull that stick out of her ass.'

From her room Margot yells; 'I heard that!'

'I meant for you too!' Chris yells back; scraping up the last piece of gnocchi for herself.

I sigh. 'She's leaving so soon.'

Snickering; Chris says; 'So is Joshy; like; going to light a candle for her every night until she comes back home?'

I hesitate. While I'm not sure if it's still supposed to be a secret; I am sure that Margot wouldn't want Chris knowing any of her personal business. All I say is; 'I'm not sure.'

'Wait a minute. Did she dump him?' Chris demands.

Reluctantly I nod. 'Don't say anything to her; though;' I warn. 'She's still really sad about it.'

‘Margot? Sad?’ Chris picks at her nails. ‘Margot doesn’t have normal human emotions like the rest of us.’

‘You just don’t know her;’ I say. ‘Besides; we can’t all be like you.’

She grins a toothy grin. She has sharp incisors; which make her look always a little bit hungry. ‘True.’

Chris is pure emotion. She screams at the drop of a hat. She says sometimes you have to scream out emotions; if you don’t; they’ll fester. The other day she screamed at a lady at the grocery store for accidentally stepping on her toes. I don’t think she’s in any danger of her emotions festering.

‘I just can’t believe that in a few days she’ll be gone;’ I say; feeling sniffly all of a sudden.

‘She’s not dying; Lara Jean. There’s nothing to get all boo-hoo about.’ Chris pulls at a loose string on her red shorts. They’re so short that when she’s sitting; you can see her underwear. Which are red to match her shorts. ‘In fact; I think this is good for you. It’s about time you did your own thing and stopped just listening to whatever Queen Margot says. This is your junior year; beotch. This is when it’s supposed to get good. French some guys; live a little; you know?’

‘I live plenty;’ I say.

‘Yeah; at the nursing home.’ Chris snickers and I glare at her.

Margot started volunteering at the Belleview Retirement Community when she got her driver’s license; it was her job to help host cocktail hour for the residents. I’d help sometimes. We’d set out peanuts and pour drinks and sometimes Margot would play the piano, but usually Stormy hogged that. Stormy is the Belleview diva. She rules the roost.

I like listening to her stories. And Miss Mary; she might not be so good at conversation due to her dementia, but she taught me how to knit.

They have a new volunteer there now, but I know that at Bellevue it really is the more the merrier; because most of the residents get so few visitors. I should go back soon; I miss going there. And I for sure don't appreciate Chris making fun of it.

'Those people at Bellevue have lived more life than everyone we know combined;' I tell her. 'There's this one lady; Stormy; she was a USO girl! She used to get a hundred letters a day from soldiers who were in love with her. And there was this one veteran who lost his leg; he sent her a diamond ring!'

Chris looks interested all of a sudden. 'Did she keep it?'

'She did;' I admit. I think it was wrong of her to keep the ring since she had no intention of marrying him, but she showed it to me, and it was beautiful. It was a pink diamond; very rare. I bet it's worth so much money now.

'I guess Stormy sounds kind of like a badass;' Chris says begrudgingly.

'Maybe you could come with me to Bellevue sometime;' I suggest. 'We could go to their cocktail hour. Mr. Perelli loves to dance with new girls. He'll teach you how to foxtrot.'

Chris makes a horrible face like I suggested we go hang out at the town dump. 'No; thanks. How about I take you dancing?' She nudges her chin toward upstairs. 'Now that your sister's left; we can have some real fun. You know I always have fun.'

It's true; Chris does always has fun. Sometimes a little too much fun; but fun nonetheless.

THE NIGHT BEFORE MARGOT LEAVE; Sall three of us are in her room helping pack up the last little things. Kellie is organizing Margot's bath stuff; packing it nice and neat in the clear shower caddy. Margot is trying to decide which coat to bring.

'Should I bring my pea-coat and my puffy coat or just my pea-coat?' She asks me.

'Just the pea coat;' I say. 'You can dress that up or down.' I'm lying on her bed directing the packing process. 'Kellie; make sure the lotion cap is on tight.'

'It's brand-new - course it's on tight!' Kellie growls, but she double-checks.

‘It gets cold in Scotland sooner than it does here;’ Margot said; folding the coat and setting it on top of her suitcase. ‘I think I’ll just bring both.’

‘I don’t know why you asked if you already knew what you were going to do;’ I say.

‘Also; I thought you said you were coming home for Christmas. You’re still coming home for Christmas; right?’

‘Yes; if you’ll stop being a brat;’ Margot says.

Honestly; Margot isn’t even packing that much. She doesn’t need a lot. If it was me; I’d have packed up my whole room; but not Margot. Her room looks the same; almost.

Margot sits down next to me, and Kellie climbs up and sits at the foot of the bed.

‘Everything’s changing;’ I say; sighing.

Margot makes a face and puts her arm around me. ‘Nothing’s changing; not really.

We’re the Song girls forever; remember?’

Our father stands in the doorway. He knocks; even though the door is open, and we can clearly see it is him. ‘I’m going to start packing up the car now;’ he announces. We watch from the bed as he lugs one of the suitcases downstairs, and then he comes up for the other one. Daily he says; ‘Oh no; don’t get up. Don’t trouble yourselves.’

‘Don’t worry; we won’t;’ we sing out.

For the past week; our father has been in spring-cleaning mode; even though it isn’t spring. He’s getting rid of everything- the bread machine we never used; CDs; old blankets; our mother’s old typewriter. It’s all going to Goodwill. A psychiatrist or someone could probably connect it to Margot’s leaving for college, but I can’t explain the exact significance of it. Whatever it is; it’s annoying. I had to shoo him away from my glass- unicorn collection twice.

I lay down my head in Margot’s lap. ‘So; you really are coming home for Christmas; right?’

‘Right...’

‘I wish I could come with you.’ Kellie pouts. ‘You’re nicer than Lara Jean.’

I give her a pinch. ‘See?’ she crows.

‘Lara Jean will be nice,’ Margot says; ‘as long as you behave. And you both have to take care of Daddy. Make sure he doesn’t work too many Saturdays. Make sure he takes the car in for inspection next month. And make sure you buy coffee filters; you’re always forgetting to buy coffee filters.’

‘Yes; drill sergeant,’ Kellie and I chorus. I search Margot’s face for sadness or fear or worry; for some sign that she is scared to go so far away; that she will miss us as much as we will miss her. I don’t see it; though.

The three of us sleep in Margot’s room that night.

Kellie falls asleep first; as always. I lie in the dark beside her with my eyes open. I can’t sleep. The thought that tomorrow night Margot won’t be in this room- it makes me so sad I can hardly bear it.

I hate to change more than almost anything.

In the dark next to me, Margot asks; ‘Lara Jean - do you think you’ve ever been in love before? Real love?’

She catches me off guard; I don’t have an answer ready for her. I’m trying to think of one, but she’s already talking again.

Wistfully; she says; ‘I wish I’d been in love more than once. I think you should fall in love at least twice in high school.’ Then she lets out a little sigh and falls asleep. Margot falls asleep like that- one dreamy sigh and she’s off to never-never land; just like that.

I wake up in the middle of the night and Margot’s not there. Kellie’s curled up on her side next to me; but no Margot. It’s pitch- dark- out; only the moonlight filters through the curtains.

I crawl out of bed and move to the window. My breath catches. There they are; Josh and Margot; standing in the driveway. Margot’s face is turned away from him; toward the moon.

Josh is crying. They aren't touching. There's enough space between them for me to know that Margot hasn't changed her mind.

I drop the curtain and find my way back to the bed; where Kellie has rolled farther into the center. I push her back a few inches so there will be room for Margot. I wish I hadn't seen that. It was too personal. Too real, it was supposed to be just for them.

If there was a way for me to un-see it; I would.

I turn on my side and close my eyes. What must it be like; to have a boy like you so much he cries for you? And not just any boy. Josh. Our Josh.

To answer her question- yes; I think I have been in real love. Just once; though. With Josh. Our Josh.... Um maybe...

THIS IS HOW MARGOT AND Josh got together. In a way; I heard about it from Josh first.

It was two years ago. We were sitting in the library during our free. I was doing the mathhomework; Josh was helping because he's good at math. We had our heads bent over my page; so close I could smell the soap he'd used that morning. Irish Spring.

And then he said; 'I need your advice on something. I like someone.'

For a split-second; I thought it was me. I thought he was going to say to me. I hoped. It was the start of the school year. We'd hung out nearly every day that August; sometimes with Margot but mostly just by ourselves because Margot had her internship at the Montpelier plantation three days a week. We swam a lot. I had a great tan from all the swimming. So-o for that split-second I thought he was going to say my name.

But then I saw the way he blushed; the way he looked off into space, and I knew it wasn't for me.

Mentally; I ran through the list of girls it could be. It was a shortlist. Josh didn't hang out with a ton of girls; he had his best friend Jersey Mike; who had moved from New Jersey in middle school, and his other best friend; Ben, and that was it.

It could have been Ashley; a junior on the volleyball team. He'd once pointed her out as the cutest of all the junior girls. In Josh's defense; I'd made him do it- I asked him who was the prettiest girl in each grade. For the prettiest freshman; my grade; he said, Genevieve.

Not that I was surprised; but it still gave me a little pinch in my heart.

It could have been Jodie; the college girl from the bookstore. Josh often talked about how smart Jodie was; how she was so cultured because she'd studied abroad in India and was now Buddhist. Ha! I was the one who was half-Korean; I was the one who'd taught Josh how to eat with chopsticks. He'd had kimchi for the first time at my house.

I was about to ask him who when the librarian came over to shush us, and then we went back to doing work and Josh didn't bring it up again and I didn't ask.

Honestly; I didn't want to know. It wasn't me, and that was all I cared about.

I didn't think for one second that the girl he liked was Margot. Not that I didn't see her as a girl who could be liked. She'd been asked out before; by a certain type of guy. Smart guys who would partner up with her in chemistry and run against her for student government. In retrospect; it wasn't so surprising that Josh would like Margot since he's that kind of guy too.

If someone were to ask me what Josh looks like; I would say he's just ordinary. He looks like the kind of guy you'd expect would be good at computers; the kind of guy who calls comic books graphic novels. Brown hair. Not a special brown; just regular brown.

Green eyes that go muddy in the center. He's on the skinny side, but he's strong. I know because I sprained my ankle once by the old baseball field and he piggybacked me all the way home. He has freckles; which make him look younger than his age. And a dimple on his left cheek. I've always liked that dimple. He has such a serious face otherwise.

What was surprising; what was shocking; was that Margot would like him back. Not because of who Josh was; but because of who Margot was. I'd never heard her talk about liking a boy before; not even once. I was the flighty one; the flibbertigibbet; as my white grandma would say. Not Margot. Margot was above all that. She existed on some higher plane where those things- boys; makeup; clothes- didn't really matter.

The way it happened was sudden. Margot came home from school late that day in October; her cheeks were pink from the cold mountain air and she had her hair in a braid and a scarf around her neck. She'd been working on a project at school; it was dinnertime, and I'd cooked chicken parmesan with thin spaghetti in watery tomato sauce.

She came into the kitchen and announced; 'I have something to tell you.'

Her eyes were very bright; I remember she was unspooling the scarf from around her neck.

Kellie was doing her homework at the kitchen table; Daddy was on his way home, and I was stirring the watery sauce. 'What?' Kellie and I asked.

'Josh likes me.' Margot gave a pleasing kind of shrug; her shoulders nearly went up to her ears.

I went very still. Then I dropped my wooden spoon into the sauce. 'Josh- Josh? Our Josh?' I couldn't even look at her. I was afraid that she would see.

'Yes. He waited for me after school today; so, he could tell me. He said -'

Margot grinned ruefully. 'He said I'm his dream girl. Can you believe that?'

'Wow;' I said, and I tried to communicate happiness in that word, but I don't know if it came out that way. All I was feeling was despair. And envy. Envy so thick and so black I; felt like I was choking on it. So-o; I tried again; this time with a smile. 'Wow; Margot.'

'Wow;' Kellie echoed. 'So-o; are you; boyfriend and girlfriend; now?'

I held my breath; waiting for her to answer.

Margot took a pinch of parmesan between her fingers and dropped it in her mouth.

'Yeah; I think so.' And then she smiled, and her eyes went all soft and liquid. I understood then that she liked him too. So much.

That night I wrote my letter to Josh.

Dear Josh -

I cried a lot. Just like that; it was over. It was over before I even had a chance. The important thing wasn't that Josh had chosen Margot. It was that Margot had chosen him.

So; that was that. I cried my eyes out; I wrote my letter; I put the whole thing to rest. I haven't thought of him that way since. He and Margot are meant to be.

They're MFEO.

Made for each other.

I'm still awake when Margot comes back to bed, but I quickly shut my eyes and pretend to be asleep. Kellie's cuddled up next to me.

I hear a sniffly sound and I peek out of one eye to look at Margot. Her back is to us; her shoulders are shaking. She's crying.

Margot never cries...

Now that I've seen Margot cry over him; I believe it more than ever- they're not over.

THE NEXT DAY; WE DRIVE Margot to the airport. Outside; we load up her suitcases on a luggage carrier- Kellie tries to get on top and dance, but our father pulls her down right away. Margot insists on going in by herself; just like she said she would.

'Margot; at least let me get your bags checked;' Daddy says; trying to maneuver the luggage carrier around her. 'I want to see you go through security.'

'I'll be fine;' she repeats. 'I've flown by myself before. I know how to check a bag.'

She stretches up on her toes and puts her arms around our dad's shoulders.

'I'll call as soon as I get there; I promise.'

'Call every day;' I whisper. The lump in my throat is getting bigger, and a few tears leak out of my eyes. I'd hoped I wouldn't cry because I knew Margot wouldn't, and it's lonely to cry alone, but I can't help it.

'Don't you dare forget us;' Kellie warns.

That makes Margot smile. 'I could never.' She hugs us each one more time.

She saves me for last; the way I knew she would. 'Take good care of Daddy and Kellie. You're in charge now.' I don't want to let go; so, I hold on tighter; I'm still waiting and hoping for some sign; some indication that she will miss us as much as we'll miss her.

And then she laughs, and I release her.

'Bye; Gogo;' I say; wiping my eyes with a corner of my shirt.

We all watch as she pushes the luggage carrier over to the check-in counter.

I'm crying hard; wiping my tears with the back of my arm. Daddy puts one arm around me and one around Kellie. 'We'll wait until she's in line for security;' he says.

When she's done checking in; she turns back and looks at us through the glass doors.

She lifts one hand and waves, and then she heads for the security line. We watch her go; thinking she might turn around one more time, but she doesn't. She already seems so far away from us. Straight-A Margot; ever capable. When it's my time to leave; I doubt I'll be as strong as Margot. But; honestly; who is?

I cry all the way home. Kellie tells me I'm a bigger baby than she is, but then from the backseat; she grabs my hand and squeezes it, and I know she's sad too.

Even though Margot isn't a loud person; it feels quite at home. Empty; somehow. What will it be like when I'm gone in two years? What will Daddy and Kellie do then? I hate the thought of the two of them coming home to an empty; the dark house with no me and no Margot.

Maybe I won't go away far; maybe I'll even live at home; at least for the first semester. I think that would be the right thing to do.

LATER THAT AFTERNOON CHRIS CALL's and tells me to meet her at the mall; she wants my opinion on a leather jacket, and to get the full effect I have to see it in person. I'm proud she's asking for my sartorial advice, and it would be good to get out of the house and not be sad anymore, but I'm nervous about driving to the mall alone. I (or anyone; really) would consider myself a skittish driver.

I ask her if she'll just send me a picture instead, but Chris knows me too well. She says; 'Nuh-uh. You get your ass down here; Lara Jean. You'll never get better at driving if you don't just suck it up and do it.'

So; that's what I'm doing- I'm driving Margot's car to the mall. I mean; I have my license and everything; I'm just not very confident. My dad has taken me for lessons numerous times; Margot too, and I'm basically fine with them in the car, but I get nervous when I drive alone. It's the changing-lanes part that scares me. I don't like taking my eyes away from what's happening right in front of me; not for a second.

Also; I don't like going too fast.

But the worst thing is I have a tendency of getting lost. The only places I can get with absolute certainty are school and the grocery store. I've never had to know how to get to the mall because Margot always drove us there. But now I have to do better; because; I'm responsible for driving Kellie around.

Though truthfully; Kellie is better with directions than I am; she knows how to get to loads of places. But I don't want to have to hear her tell me how to get somewhere. I want to feel like the big sister; I want her to relax in the passenger seat; safe in the knowledge that Lara Jean will get her where she needs to go; just like I did with Margot.

Sure; I could just use a GPS, but I would feel silly putting in directions to go to the mall when I've been there a million times. It should come to me intuitively; easy; where I don't even have to think about it. Instead; I worry about every turn; second- guess every highway sign; is it north or is it south; do I turn right here or is it the next one? I've never had to pay attention to it.

But today; so far so good. I'm listening to the radio; bopping along; even driving with just one hand on the wheel. I do this to feign confidence because the more I fake it; the more it's supposed to feel true.

Everything is going so well that I take the shortcut way instead of the highway way. I cut through the side neighborhood, and even as I'm doing it; I'm wondering if this was such a great idea. After a couple of minutes; things aren't looking so familiar, and I realize; I should have taken a left instead of a right. I push down the panic that's rising in my chest and I try to backtrack.

You can do it; you can do it.

There's a four-way stop sign. I don't see anyone; so, I zip ahead. I don't even see the car on my right; I feel it before I see it.

I scream my head off. I taste copper in my mouth. Am I bleeding? Did I bite my tongue; off? I touch it and it's still there. My heart is racing; my whole body feels wet and clammy.

I try to take deep breaths, but I can't seem to get air.

My legs shake as I get out of the car. The other guy is already out; inspecting his car with his arms crossed. He's old; older than my dad, and he has gray hair, and he's wearing shorts with red lobsters on them. His car is fine; mine has a huge dent in the side. 'Didn't you see the stop sign?' He demands... 'Where you are texting on your phone?'

I shake my head; my throat is closing up. I just don't want to cry. As long as I don't cry. He seems to sense this. The irritated furrow of his brow is loosening. 'Well; my car looks fine;' he says reluctantly. 'Are you; all right?'

Part- 5

I nod again. 'I'm so sorry;' I say.

'Kids need to be more careful;' the man says as if I haven't spoken.

The lump in my throat is getting bigger. 'I'm very; very sorry; sir.'

He makes a grunting sound. 'You should call someone to come get you;' the man says.

'Do you want me to wait?'

'No; thank you.' What if he's a serial killer or a child molester? I don't want to be alone with a strange man. The man drives off.

As soon as he's gone; it occurs to me that maybe I should have called the police while he was still here. Aren't you always supposed to call the police when you're in a car accident; no matter what? I'm pretty sure they told us that in driver's ed. So that's another mistake I made.

I sit down on the curb and stare at Margot's car. I've only had it for two hours and I've already wrecked it. I rest my head in my lap and sit in a tight bundle. My neck is starting to ache. This is when the tears start. My dad is not going to be happy.

Margot is not going to be happy. They'll both probably agree that I have no business driving around town unsupervised, and maybe they're right. Driving a car is a lot of responsibility. Maybe

I'm not ready for it yet...

Maybe I'll never be ready. Maybe even when I'm old; my sisters or my dad will have to drive me around; because that's how useless I am.

I pull out my phone and call Josh. When he answers; I say; 'Josh; can you do me an f-f-favor?' and my voice comes out so wobbly I'm embarrassed.

Which of course he hears because he's Josh. He comes to attention immediately and says; 'What's wrong?'

'I just got into a car accident. I don't even know where I am. Can you come to get me?'

Wobble - Wobble.

'Are you hurt?' He demands...

'No; I'm fine. I'm just- 'If I say another word; I will cry.

'What street signs do you see? What stores?'

I crane my neck to look. 'Obsession;' I say. I look for the closest mailbox.

'I'm at 9810 Obsession Road.'

'I'm on my way. Do you want me to stay on the phone with you?'

'No; that's okay.' I hang up and start to cry.

I don't know how long I've been sitting there crying when another car rolls up in front of me. I look up, and it's Marcel Kavinsky's black Audi with the tinted windows. One of them rolls down. 'Lara Jean? Are you okay?'

I nod my head yes and make a motion as he should just go. He rolls the window back up, and I think he's really going to drive off; but then he pulls over to the side and parks.

He climbs out and starts inspecting my car. 'You really messed it up;' he says. 'Did you get the other guy's insurance info?'

'No; his car was fine.' Furtively; I wipe my cheeks with my arm. 'It was my fault.'

'Do you have Triple A?' I nod.

'So; you called them already?'

'No. But someone's coming.'

Marcel sits down next to me. 'How long have you been sitting here crying by yourself?'

I turn my head and wipe my face again. 'I'm not crying.'

Marcel Kavinsky and I used to be friends; back before he was Kavinsky when he was Marcel K. There was a whole gang of us in middle school. The boys where

Marcel Kavinsky and John Ambrose McClaren and Trevor Pike. The girls were Genevieve and me and Allie Feldman who lived down the block and sometimes Chris. Growing up;

Genevieve lived two streets away from me. It's funny how much of childhood is about proximity. Like who your best friend is directly correlated to how close your houses are; who you sit next to in music is all about how close your names are in the alphabet. Such a game of chance.

In eighth grade- Genevieve moved to a different neighborhood, and we stayed friends a little while longer. She'd come back to the neighborhood to hang out, but something was different. By high school- Genevieve had eclipsed us. She was still friends with the boys, but the girls' crew was over. Allie and I stayed friends until she moved last year, but there was always something just a little bit humiliating about it like we were two leftover heels of bread and together we made a dry sandwich.

We're not friends anymore. Me and Genevieve or me and Marcel. Which is why it's so weird to be sitting next to him on somebody's curb as no time has passed.

His phone buzzes and he takes it out of his pocket. 'I've got to go.'

I sniffle. 'Where are you headed?'

'To Gen's.'

'You'd better get going then;' I say. 'Genevieve will be mad if you're late.'

Marcel makes a piffle sound, but he sure does get up fast. I wonder what it's like to have that much power over a boy. I don't think I'd want it; it's a lot of responsibility to hold a person's heart in your hands. He's getting into his car when; as an afterthought; he turns around and asks; 'Want me to call Triple-A for you?'

'No; that's okay;' I say. 'Thanks for stopping; though. That was really nice of you.'

Marcel grins. I remember that about Marcel- how much he likes positive reinforcement.

'Do you feel better now?'

I nod. I do; actually.

'Good;' he says.

He has the look of a Handsome Boy from a different time. He could be a dashing World War I soldier; handsome enough for a girl to wait years for him to come back from the war; so handsome she could wait forever. He could be wearing a red letterman's jacket; driving around in a Corvette with the top down; one arm on the steering wheel; on his way to pick up his girl for the sock hop. Marcel's kind of wholesome good looks feels more like yesterday than today. There's just something about him girls like.

He was my first kiss. It's so strange to think of it now. It feels like forever ago, but really it was just four years.

Josh shows up about a minute later; as I'm texting Chris that I'm not going to make it to the mall after all. I stand up. 'It took you long enough!'

'You told me in 9810. This is 8901!'

Confidently I say; 'No; I definitely said 8901.'

'No; you definitely said 9810. And why weren't you answering your phone?' Josh gets out of his car, and when he sees the side of my car; his jaw drops.

'Holy crap... Did you call Triple A yet?'

'No... can you?'

Josh does, and then we sit in his car in the air-conditioning while we wait. I almost get into the backseat; when I remember. Margot isn't here anymore. I've ridden in his car so many times, and I don't think I've ever once sat up front in the passenger seat.

'Um - you know Margot's going to kill you; right?'

I whip my head around so fast my hair slaps me in the face. 'Margot's not going to find out; so, don't you say a word!'

'When would I even talk to her? We're broken up; remember?'

I frown at him...

'I hate when people do that- when you ask them to keep something a secret and instead of saying yes or no; they say; 'Who would I tell?'

'I didn't say; 'Who would I tell?'

'Just say yes or no and mean it. Don't make it conditional.'

'I won't tell Margot anything,' he says. 'It'll just be between you and me. I promise... all right?'

‘All right;’ I say. And then it gets quiet with neither of us saying anything; there’s just the sound of cool air coming out of the A/C vents.

My stomach feels queasy thinking about how I’m going to tell my dad.

Maybe I should break the news to him with tears in my eyes; so, he feels sorry for me. Or I could say something like; I have good news and bad news. The good news is; I’m fine; not a scratch on me. The bad news is; the car is wrecked. Maybe ‘wrecked’ isn’t the right word.

I’m mulling over the right word choice in my head when Josh says; ‘So just because; Margot and I broke up; you’re not going to talk to me anymore either?’ Josh sounds jokingly bitter or bitterly joking if there is such a combination.

I look over at him in surprise. ‘Don’t be dumb. Of course; I’m still going to talk to you.

Just not in public.’ This is the role I play with him. The part of the pesky little sister. As if I am the same as Kellie. As if we aren’t only a year apart. Josh doesn’t crack a smile; he just looks glum; so, I bump my forehead against his. ‘That was a joke; dummy!’

‘Did she tell you she was going to do it? I mean; was it always her plan?’

When I hesitate; he says; ‘Come on. I know she tells you everything.’

‘Not really. Not this time anyway. Honestly; Josh. I didn’t know a thing about it. Promise.’ I cross my heart.

Josh absorbs this. Chewing on his bottom lip he says; ‘Maybe she’ll change her mind. That’s possible; right?’

I don’t know if it’s more heartless for me to say yes or no because he’ll be hurt either way. Because while I’m 99.9 percent sure that she will get back together with him; there’s that tiny chance she won’t, and I don’t want to get his hopes up. So-o I don’t say anything.

He swallows; his Adam’s apple bobbing up and down. ‘No; you’re right.

When Margot makes up her mind; she doesn’t go back on it.’

Please; please; please; don’t cry.

I rest my head on his shoulder and say; ‘You never know; Joshy.’

Josh stares straight ahead. A squirrel is darting up the big oak tree in the yard. Up and down and back up again. We both watch. ‘What time does she land?’

‘Not for hours...’

‘Is - is she coming home for Thanksgiving?’

‘No. They don’t get off for Thanksgiving. It’s Scotland; Josh. They don’t celebrate American holidays; hello!’ I’m teasing again, but my heart’s not in it.

‘That’s right;’ he says.

I say; ‘She’ll be home for Christmas; though;’ and we both sigh.

‘Can I still hang out with you guys?’ Josh asks me.

‘Me and Kellie?’

‘Your dad; too.’

‘We’re not going anywhere;’ I assure him.

Josh looks relieved. ‘Good. I’d hate to lose you; too.’

As soon as he says it; my heart does this pause, and I forget to breathe, and just for that one second; I’m dizzy. And then; just as quickly as it came; the feeling; the strange flutter in my chest; is gone, and the tow truck arrives.

When we pull into my driveway; he says; ‘Do you want me to be there when you tell your dad?’

I brighten up and then I remember how Margot said I’m in charge now. I’m pretty sure taking responsibility for one’s mistakes is part of being in charge.

DADDY ISN’T SO MAD After all. I go through my whole good news-bad news spiel and he just sighs and says; ‘As long as you’re all right.’

The car needs a special part that has to be flown in from Indiana or Idaho; I can't remember which. In the meantime; I'll have to share the car with Daddy and take the bus to school or ask Josh for rides; which was already my plan.

Margot calls later that night. Kellie and I are watching TV and I scream for Daddy to come quick. We sit on the couch and pass the phone around and take turns talking to her.

'Margot; guess what happened today!' Kellie shouts.

Frantically; I shake my head at her. Don't tell her about the car; I mouth. I give her warning eyes.

'Lara Jean got into -' Kellie pauses tantalizingly. 'A fight with Daddy.

Yeah; she was mean to me and Daddy told her to be nice; so, they had a fight.'

I grab the phone out of her hand. 'We didn't have a fight; Go-go. Kellie's just being annoying.'

'What did you guys have for dinner? Did you cook the chicken I defrosted last night?'

Margot asks. Her voice sounds so far away.

I push the volume up on the phone. 'Yes; but never mind about that. Are you settled in your room? Is it big? What's your roommate like?'

'She's nice. She's from London and she has a really fancy accent. Her name is Penelope St. George-Dixon.'

'Gosh; even her name sounds fancy;' I say. 'What about your room?'

'The room is about the same as that dorm we saw at UVA; it's just older.'

'What time is it over there?'

'It's almost midnight. We're five hours ahead; remember?'

We're five hours ahead like she's already considering Scotland her home, and she's only been gone a day; not even! 'We miss you already;' I tell her.

‘Miss; you too.’

After dinner; I text Chris to see if she wants to come over, but she doesn’t text back.

She’s probably out with one of the guys she hooks up with. Which is fine. I should catch up on my scrapbooking.

I was hoping to be done with Margot’s scrapbook before she left for college, but as anyone who’s ever scrapbooked knows; Rome wasn’t built in a day. You could spend a year or more working on one scrapbook.

I’ve got Motown girl-group music playing, and my supplies are laid out all around me in a semicircle. My heart hole punch; pages, and pages of scrapbook paper; pictures I’ve cut out of magazines; glue gun; my tape dispenser with all my different colored washi tapes.

Souvenirs like the playbill from when we saw Wicked in New York; receipts; pictures.

Ribbon; buttons; stickers; charms. A good scrapbook has texture. It’s thick and chunky and doesn’t close all the way.

I’m working on a Josh-and-Margot page. I don’t care what Margot says.

They’re getting back together; I know it. And even if they aren’t; not right away; it’s not like Margot can just erase him from her history. He was such a big part of her senior year.

And; like; her life. The only compromise I’m willing to make is I was saving my heart washi tape for this page, but I can just do a regular plaid tape instead. But then I put the plaid tape up against the pictures and the colors don’t look as good.

So; I go ahead and use the heat tape. And then; swaying to the music; I use my heart template to cut out a picture of the two of them at prom. Margot’s going to love this.

I’m carefully gluing a dried rose petal from Margot’s corsage when my dad raps on the door. ‘What are you up to tonight?’ he asks me.

‘This;’ I say; gluing another petal. ‘If I keep at it; it’ll probably be done by Christmas.’

‘Ah.’ My dad doesn’t move. He just hovers there in the doorway; watching me work.

‘Well; I’m going to watch that new Ken Burns documentary in a bit; if you want to join me.’

‘Maybe;’ I say; just to be nice. It’ll be too much of a pain to bring all my supplies downstairs and get set up again. I’m in a good rhythm right now. ‘Why don’t you get it started without me?’

‘All right. I’ll leave you to it; then.’ Daddy shuffles down the stairs.

It takes me most of the night, but I finish the Josh-and-Margot page, and it comes out really nice. Next is a sister page. For this one; I use flowered paper for the background, and I glue in a picture of the three of us from a long time ago. Mommy took it. We’re standing in front of the oak tree in front of our house in our church clothes.

We’re all wearing white dresses, and we have matching pink ribbons in our hair. The best thing about the picture is Margot and I are smiling sweetly and Kellie is picking her nose.

I smile to myself. Kellie’s going to pitch a fit when she sees this page. I can’t wait.

MARGOT SAYS THAT JUNIOR Years the most important year; the busiest year; a year so crucial that everything else in life hinges upon it. So; I figure I should get in all the pleasure reading I can before school starts next week and junior year officially begins. I’m sitting on my front steps; reading a 1980’s romantic British spy novel I got for seventy-five cents at the Friends of the Library sale.

I’m just getting to the good stuff (Cressida must seduce Nigel to gain access to the spy codes!) when Josh walks out of his house to get the mail. He sees me too; he lifts his hand like he’s just going to wave and not come over; but then he does.

‘Hey; nice onesie;’ he says as he makes his way across the driveway.

It’s faded light blue with sunflowers and it ties around the neck. I got it from the vintage store; 75 percent off. And it’s not a onesie. ‘This is a sunsuit;’ I tell- him; going back to my book. I try to subtly hide the cover with my hand. The last thing I need is Josh giving me a hard time for reading a trashy book when I’m just trying to enjoy a relaxing afternoon.

I can feel him looking at me; his arms crossed; waiting. I look up. ‘What?’

‘Want to see a movie tonight at the Bess? There’s a Pixar movie playing. We can take Kellie.’

‘Sure; texts me when you want to head over;’ I say; turning the page of my book. Nigel is unbuttoning Cressida’s blouse and she’s wondering when the sleeping pill she slipped in his Merlot will kick in; while simultaneously hoping it won’t kick in too soon because Nigel is actually quite a good kisser.

Josh reaches down and tries to get a closer look at my book. I slap his hand away, but not before he reads out loud; ‘Cressida’s heart raced as Nigel moved his hand along her stockinged thigh.’ Josh cracks up. ‘What the heck are you reading?’

My cheeks are burning. ‘Oh; be quiet.’

Chuckling; Josh backs away. ‘I’ll leave you to Cressida and Noel then.’

To his back; I call out; ‘For your information; it’s Nigel!’

Kellie’s over the moon about hanging out with Josh. When Josh asks the girl at the concession stand to layer the butter on the popcorn (bottom; middle; top); we both give an approving nod. Kellie sits in the middle of us, and at the funny parts; she laughs so hard she kicks her legs up in the air. She weighs so little that the seat keeps tipping up. Josh and I share smiles over her head.

Whenever Josh; Margot, and I went to the movies; Margot always sat in the middle too. It was so she could whisper to both of us. She never wanted me to feel left out because she had a boyfriend and I didn’t. She was so careful about this that it made me worry at first; that she sensed something from before. But she’s not someone to hold back or pretty up the truth. She’s just a really good big sister.

The best...

There were times; that I felt left out anyway. Not in a romantic way; but a friend way. Josh and I had always been friends. But those times when he’d put his arm around Margot when we were in line for popcorn; or in the car when they’d talk softly to each other and I felt like the kid in the backseat who can’t hear what the adults are talking about; it made me feel a little bit invisible. They made me wish I had someone to whisper to in the backseat.

It's strange to be the one in the front seat now. The view isn't so different from the backseat. In fact; everything feels good and normal and the same; which is a comfort.

Chris calls me later that night while I'm painting my toenails different colored pinks. It's so loud in the background she has to yell. 'Guess what!'

'What? I can barely hear you!' I'm doing my pinky toe a fruit-punch color called Hit Me with Your Best Shot.

'Hold up.' I can hear Chris moving rooms because it gets quieter. 'Can you hear me now?'

'Yes; much better.'

'Guess who broke up.'

I've moved on to a mod pink color that looks like White-Out with a drop of red in it.

'Who?'

'Gen and Kavinsky! She dumped his ass.'

My eyes got huge. 'Whoa! Why?'

'Apparently; she met some UVA guy at that hostessing job she had. I guarantee you she was cheating on Kavinsky the whole summer.' A guy calls Chris's name, and Chris says; 'I got to go. It's my turn at bocce.' Chris hangs up without saying goodbye; which is her way.

I actually met Chris through Genevieve. They're cousins- their moms are sisters. Chris used to come over sometimes when we were little, but she and Gen didn't get along even back then. They'd argue over whose Barbie had dibs on Ken because there was only one Ken. I didn't even try to fight for Ken; even though he was technically mine.

Well; Margot's. At school; some people don't even know Gen and Chris are cousins. They don't look alike; like at all- Gen is petite with fit arms and sunny blond hair the color of margarine. Chris is blond too, but peroxide blond, and she's taller and has broad swimmer's shoulders. Still; there is a sameness to them. Chris was pretty wild in our Shaddyman year. She went to every party; got drunk; hooked up with older boys. That year a junior guy from the lacrosse team told everyone that Chris had sex with him in the boys' locker room, and it wasn't even true.

Genevieve made Marcel threaten to kick his ass if he didn't tell everybody the truth. I thought it was a really nice thing Genevieve did for Chris, but Chris insisted that Gen had only done it; so, people wouldn't think she was related to a slut. After that Chris stopped hanging out and pretty much did her own thing; with people from another school. She still has that freshman-year reputation though. She acts like she doesn't care; but I know she does; at least a little.

ON SUNDAY; DADDY MAKES- lasagna. And he does- that thing where he puts black-bean salsa in it to jazz it up, and it sounds gross but it's actually good and you don't notice the beans. Josh comes over too, and he has three helpings; which Daddy loves. When Margot's name comes up over dinner; I look over at Josh and see how stiff he gets, and I feel sorry for him. Kellie must notice too because she changes the subject over to dessert; which is a batch of peanut-butter brownies I baked earlier in the afternoon. Since Daddy cooked; our kids have kitchen duty. He uses every pot in the kitchen when he makes lasagna; so, it's the worst cleanup; but worth it.

After; the three of us are relaxing in the TV room. It's Sunday night, but there's not that Sunday night feeling in the air because tomorrow is Labor Day and we have one last day before school starts. Kellie's working on her dog collage; Quelle surprise.

'What kind do you want most of all?' Josh asks her.

Kellie answers back lightning fast. 'An Akita.'

'Boy or girl?'

Again; her answer is prompt. 'Boy.'

'What'll you name him?'

Kellie hesitates, and I know why. I roll over and tickle Kellie's barefoot. 'I know what you'll name him;' I say in a singsong voice.

'Be quiet; Lara Jean!' she screeches.

I have Josh's full attention now. 'Come on; tell us;' Josh begs.

I look at Kellie and she is giving me evil glowing red eyes. 'Never mind;' I say; feeling nervous all of a sudden. Kellie might be the baby of the family, but she is not someone to trifle with.

Then Josh tugs on my ponytail and says; 'Aw; come on; Lara Jean! Don't leave us in suspense.'

I prop myself up on my elbows, and Kellie tries to put her hand over my mouth.

Giggling; I say; 'It's after a boy she likes.'

'Shut up; Lara Jean; shut up!'

Kellie kicks me, and in doing so she accidentally rips one of her dog pictures.

She lets out a cry and drops to her knees and examines it. Her face is red with the effort of not crying. I feel like such a jerk. I sit up and try to give her an I'm a sorry hug, but she twists away from me and kicks at my legs; so hard I yelped. I pick the picture up and try to tape it back, but before I can; Kellie snatches it out of my hands and gives it to Josh. 'Josh; fix it;' she says. 'Lara Jean ruined it.' 'Kellie; I was only teasing;' I say lamely. I wasn't going to say the name of the boy. I would never ever have said it.

She ignores me, and Josh smooths the paperback out with a coaster, and with the concentration of a surgeon; he tapes the two pieces together. He wipes his brow. 'Phew. I think this one will make it.'

I clap, and I try to catch Kellie's eye, but she won't look at me. I know I deserve it. The boy Kellie has a crush on- it's Josh.

Kellie whisks her college away from Josh. Stiffly she says; 'I'm going upstairs to work on this. Good night; Josh.'

'Night; Kellie;' Josh says.

Meekly; I say; 'Good night; Kellie;' but she's already running up the stairs, and she doesn't reply.

When we hear the sound of her bedroom door closing; Josh turns to me and says;
'You're in so much trouble.'

'I know;' I say. I've got a sick feeling in the pit of my stomach. Why did I do that?

Even as I was doing it; I knew it was wrong. Margot would never have done that to me.

That's not how big sisters are supposed to treat their little sisters; especially not when I'm so much older than Kellie.

'Who's this kid she likes?'

'Just a boy from school.'

Josh sighs. 'Is she really old enough to have crushes on boys? I feel like she's too young for all that.'

'I had crushes on boys when I was nine;' I tell him. I'm still thinking about Kellie. I wonder how I can make it; so, she isn't mad at me anymore. Somehow; I don't think snickerdoodles will cut it this time.

'Who?' Josh asks me.

'Who what?' Maybe if I can somehow convince Daddy to buy her a puppy.

'Who was your first crush?'

'Hmm. My first real crush?' I had kindergarten and first- and second-grade crushes aplenty, but they don't really count. 'Like the first one that really mattered?'

'Sure.'

'Well - I guess Marcel Kavinsky.'

Josh practically gags. 'Kavinsky? Are you kidding me? He's so obvious. I thought you'd be into someone more - I don't know; subtle. Marcel Kavinsky's such a cliché. He's like a cardboard cutout of a 'cool guy' in a movie about high school.'

I shrug. 'You asked.'

‘Wow;’ he says; shaking his head. ‘Just - wow.’

‘He used to be different. I mean; he was still very Marcel; but less so.’

When Josh looks unconvinced; I say; ‘You’re a boy; so, you can’t understand what I’m talking about.’

‘You’re right. I don’t understand!’

‘Hey; you’re the one who had a crush on Ms. Rossinchild!’

Josh turns red. ‘She was really pretty back then!’

‘Uh-huh.’ I give him a knowing look. ‘She was really ‘pretty.’ ‘Our across-the-street neighbor Ms. Rossinchild used to mow her lawn in terry-cloth short shorts and a string bikini top. The neighborhood boys would conveniently come and play in Josh’s yard on those days.

‘Anyway; Ms. Rossinchild wasn’t my first crush.’

‘She wasn’t?’

‘No... you were.’

It takes me a few seconds to process this. Even then; all I can manage is; ‘Huh?’

‘When I first moved here; before I knew your true personality.’ I kick him in the shin for that, and he yelps. ‘I was twelve and you were eleven. I let you ride my scooter; remember? That scooter was my pride and joy. I saved up for it for two birthdays. And I let you take it for a ride.’

‘I thought you were just being generous.’

‘You crashed it and you got a big scratch on the side;’ he continues.

Continued- 1

‘Remember that?’

‘Yeah; I remember you cried.’

‘I didn’t cry. I was justifiably upset. And that was the end of my little crush.’ Josh gets up to go and we walk to the foyer.

Before he opens the front door; Josh turns around and says to me; ‘I don’t know what I would’ve done if you hadn’t been around after - Margot dumped me.’ A blush blooms pink across his face; underneath each sweetly freckled cheek. ‘You’re keeping me going; Lara Jean.’ Josh looks at me and I feel it all; every memory; every moment we’ve ever shared. Then he gives me a quick; fierce hug and disappears into the night.

I’m standing there in the open door and the thought flies in my head; so quick; so unexpected; I can’t stop myself from thinking it- If you were mine; I would never have broken up with you; not in a million years.

THIS IS HOW WE MET josh. We were having a teddy-bear; tea-party picnic on the back lawn with real tea and muffins. It had to be in the backyard; so, no one would see. I was eleven; way too old for it, and Margot was thirteen; way; way too old. I got the idea in my head because- I read about it in a book. Because of Kellie I could pretend it was for her and persuade Margot into playing with us. Mommy had died the year before and ever since Margot rarely said no to anything if it was for Kellie.

We had everything spread out on Margot’s old baby blanket; which was blue and nubby with a squirrel print. I laid out a chipped tea set of Margot’s; mini muffins studded with blueberries and granules of sugar that I made Daddy buy at the grocery store and a teddy bear for each of us. We were all wearing hats because I insisted.

‘You have to wear a hat to a tea party;’ I kept saying until Margot finally put hers on just so; I’d stop. She had on Mommy’s straw gardening hat, and Kellie was wearing a tennis visor, and I’d fancied up an old fur hat of Grandma’s by pinning a few plastic flowers on top. I was pouring lukewarm tea out of the thermos and into cups when Josh climbed up on the fence and watched us. The month before; from the upstairs playroom; we’d watched Josh’s family moved in. We’d hoped for girls, but then we saw the movers unload a boy bike and we went back to playing.

Josh sat up on the fence; not saying anything, and Margot was really stiff and embarrassed; her cheeks were red, but she kept her hat on. Kellie was the one to call out to him. 'Hello; boy;' she said.

'Hi;' he said. His hair was shaggy, and he kept shaking it out of his eyes. He was wearing a red T-shirt with a hole in the shoulder.

Kellie asked him; 'What's your name?'

'Josh.'

'You should play with us; Josh;' Kellie commanded.

So- he did.

I didn't know it then; how important this boy would become to me and to the people I love the most. But even if I had known; what could I have done differently?

It was never going to be me and him. Even though.

I THOUGHT I WAS OVER him.

When I wrote my letter; when I said my goodbyes; I meant it; I swear I did.

It wasn't even that hard; not really. Not when I thought about how much Margot liked him; how much she cared. How could I begrudge Margot a first love? Margot; who'd sacrificed so much for all of us. She always; always put Kellie and me before herself.

Letting go of Josh was my way of putting Margot first.

But now; sitting here alone in my living room; with my sister four thousand miles away and Josh next door; all I can think is; Josh Sanderson; I liked you first. By all rights; you were mine. And if it had been me; I'd have packed you in my suitcase and taken you with me; or; you know what; I would have stayed. I would have never left you.

Not in a million years; not for anything.

Thinking these kinds of thoughts; feeling these kinds of feelings; it's more than disloyal. I know that. It's downright traitorous. It makes my soul feel dirty.

Margot's been gone less than a week and look at me; how fast I cave. How fast I covet. I'm a betrayer of the worst kind; because I'm betraying my own sister, and there's no greater betrayal than that. But what now? What am I supposed to do with all these feelings?

I suppose there's only one thing I can do. I'll write him another letter. A postscript with as many pages as it takes to X away whatever feelings I have left for him.

I'll put this whole thing to rest; once and for all.

I go to my room and I find my special writing pen; the one with the really smooth inky black ink. I take out my heavy writing paper, and I begin to write. P.S. I still love you.

I still love you and that's a really huge problem for me and it's also a really huge surprise. I swear I didn't know. All this time; I thought I was over it. How could I not be when it's Margot you love? It's always been; Margot- - when I'm done; I placed the message in my diary alternatively of in my hatbox. I have a feeling I'm not done-done yet; that there's still further I need to tell; I just haven't thought of it, nevertheless.

KELLIE'S STILL MAD AT ME- In the wake of the Josh revelation; I'd forgotten all about Kellie. She neglects me all daybreak, and when I ask if she wants me to take her to the store for class accumulations; she locks; 'With what car? You destroyed Margot's.'

Oops! 'I was going to take Daddy's when he comes back from Home Depot.' I back away from her; far enough away that she can't lash out at me with a kick or a hit.

'There's no need to be sarcastic; Katherine.'

Kellie practically growls; which is exactly the reaction I was hoping for. I hate when Kellie goes mad and silent. But then she flounces away, and with her back to me; she says; 'I'm not conversing with you.'

You yourself know what you did; consequently, don't bother attempting to get back on my good side.'

I follow her around; trying to provoke her into talking to me, but there's no use. I've stayed cleared.

So; I give up and go back to my room and put on the Mermaids soundtrack. I'm planning my first-week back-to-school outlay on my bed when I get a text from Josh. A little excitement runs up my spine to see his name on my phone, but I sternly remind myself of my pledge. He is still Margot's; not yours. It prepares things that they're broken up. He was hers first; which means he's hers always. Want to go for a bike ride on that trail by the park?

Biking is a Margot-type activity. She loves going on trails and hikes and bikes. Negative with me.

Josh knows it too. I don't even own my bike anymore, and Margot's is too big for me.

Kellie's is more my size.

I write back that I can't; I have to help my dad around the house. It's not a total lie.

My dad did ask me to help him report some of his plants. And I said only if he was making me and if I had no say in the matter; then sure.

What does he need help with?

What to say? I have to be careful about my excuses; Josh can easily look out the window and see if I'm home or not. I text back a vague Just some random chores.

Knowing Josh; he would show up with a shovel or a rake or whatever tool the chore entailed. And then he'd stay for dinner because he always stays for dinner.

He said I was keeping him going. Me; Lara Jean. I want to be that person for him; I want to be the one who keeps him going during this difficult time. I want to be his lighthouse keeper while we wait for Margot's return. But it's hard. Harder than I thought.

I WAKE UP HAPPY BECAUSE it's the first day of school. I've always loved the first day of school better than the last day of school. Firsts are best because they are beginnings.

While Daddy and Kellie are upstairs washing up; I make whole-wheat pancakes with sliced bananas; Kellie's favorite. First-day-of-school breakfast was always a big thing with my mom, and then Margot took over, and now I guess- it's my turn. The pancakes are a little dense; not quite as light and fluffy as Margot's. And the coffee - well; is coffee supposed to be light brown like cocoa? When Daddy comes down; he says in a merry voice; 'I smell coffee!' And then he drinks it and gives me a thumbs-up, but I notice he only has the one sip. I guess I'm a better baker than I am a cook.

'You look like a farm girl;' Kellie says with a touch of meanness, and I know she's still at least a little bit mad at me. 'Thank you;' I say. I'm wearing faded short-tails and a scoop-neck floral shirt. It does look farm-girlish, but I think pleasantly. Margot left her brown lace-up combat boots, and they're only a half size too big. With thick socks; they're a perfect fit. 'Will you braid my hair to the side?' I ask her. 'You don't deserve a braid from me;' Kellie says; licking her fork. 'Besides; a braid would take it too far.'

Kellie is only nine, but she has good fashion sense.

'Agreed;' my dad says; not looking up from his paper.

I put my plate in the sink and then put Kellie's bag lunch down next to her plate. It's got all her favorite things- a Brie sandwich; barbecue chips; rainbow cookies; a good kind of apple juice.

'Have a great first day;' my dad chirps. He pops out his cheek for a kiss, and I bend down and give him one. I try to give Kellie one too, but she turns her cheek.

'I got your favorite kind of apple juice and your favorite kind of Brie;' I tell her pleadingly. I don't want us to start the school year off on a bad note.

'Thank you;' she snuffles with a tissue.

Before she can stop me; I throw my arms around her and squeeze her so tight she yelps. Then I get my new floral back-to-school book bag and head out the front door. It's a new day; a new year. I have a feeling it's going to be a good one.

Josh is already in the car, and I run over and open the door and slide inside with him.

'You're on time;' Josh says. He lifts his hand for a hand bump, and when I slap his knuckles; our hands make a soft smack. 'That was a good one;' he says.

'An eight at least;' I agree. We zipped past the pool; the sign for our neighborhood; then past the Wendy's.

‘Do you think, Kellie, forgiven you yet for the other night?’

‘Not quite; but hopefully soon.’

‘Nobody can hold a grudge like Kellie;’ Josh says, and I nod wholeheartedly. I can never stay mad for long, but Kellie will nurse a hatred as her life depended on this. ‘I made her a good first-day-of-school lunch; so, I think that’ll help;’ I say. ‘You’re a good elder sibling.’

I pipe up with ‘As good as Margot?’ Furthermore, collectively we chorus; ‘Nobody’s as immeasurable as Margot.’

Nevaeh

Book: 25

Dollie

XXXO

SCHOOL HAS OFFICIALLY BEGUN AND found its own rhythm. The first couple of days of school are always throwaway days of handing out books and syllabuses and figuring out where you’re sitting and who you’re sitting with. Now is when school really begins.

For the gym; Coach White set us loose outside to enjoy the warm sun while we still have it. Chris and I are walking the track field. Chris is telling me about a party she went to over Labor Day weekend. ‘I almost got into a fight with this girl who kept saying I was wearing extensions.’

It's not my fault my hair is fabulous.' As we around the corner for our third lap; I catch Marcel Kavinsky looking at me. I thought I was imagining it at first; him staring in my direction, but this is the third time.

He's playing ultimate Frisbee with some of the guys. When we pass them; Marcel jogs over to us and says; 'Can I talk to you for a minute?'

Chris and I look at each other. 'Her or me?' she asks.

'Lara Jean.'

Chris puts her arm around my shoulder protectively. 'Go ahead. We're listening.'

Marcel rolls his eyes. 'I want to talk to her in private.'

'Fine;' she snaps, and she flounces away. Over her shoulder; she looks back at me with wide eyes; like What? I shrug back like I have no idea!

In a low; quiet voice; Marcel says; 'Just so you know; I don't have any STDs.'

What in the world? I stare at him; my mouth open. 'I never said you had an STD!'

His voice is still low but actually furious. 'I also don't always take the last piece of pizza.'

'What are you talking about?'

'That's what you said. In your letter. How I'm an egotistical guy who goes around giving girls STDs. Remember?'

'What letter? I never wrote you any letter!'

Wait- Yes; I did. I did write him a letter; about a million years ago. But that's not the letter he's talking about. It couldn't be.

'Yes. You. Did. It was addressed to me; from you.'

Oh; God. No. No. This isn't happening. This isn't reality. I'm dreaming. I'm in my room and I'm dreaming and Marcel Kavinsky is in my dream; glaring at me. I close my eyes. Am I dreaming? Is this real?

‘Lara Jean?’

I open my eyes. I’m not dreaming, and this is real. This is a nightmare.

Marcel Kavinsky is holding my letter in his hand? It’s my handwriting; my envelope; my everything. ‘How- how did you get that?’

‘It came in the mail yesterday.’ Marcel sighs. Gruffly he says; ‘Listen; it’s no big deal; I just hope you’re not going around telling people...’

‘It came in the mail? To your house?’

‘Yeah.’

I feel faint. I actually feel faint. Please let me faint right now; because if I faint, I will no longer be here; at this moment. It will be like in movies when a girl passes out from the horror of it all and the fighting happens while she is asleep, and she wakes up in a hospital bed with a bruise or two, but she’s missed all the bad stuff.

I wish that was my; life instead of this. I can feel myself start to sweat. Rapidly I say; ‘You should know that I wrote that letter a really long time ago.’

‘Okay.’

‘Like; years ago, years and years ago... I don’t even remember what I said.’

Up close; your face wasn’t so much handsome as beautiful. ‘Seriously; that letters from middle school. I don’t even know who would have sent it. Can I see it?’ I reach for the letter; trying to stay calm and not sound desperate. Just casual cool.

He hesitates and then grins his perfect Marcel grin. ‘Nah; I want to keep it. I never got a letter like this before.’ I leap forward, and quick like a cat I snatch it out of his hand. Marcel laughs and throws up his hands in surrender. ‘All right; fine; have it. Geez.’

‘Thanks.’ I start to back away from him. The paper is shaking my hand.

‘Wait.’ He hesitates. ‘Listen; I didn’t mean to steal your first kiss or whatever. I mean; that wasn’t my intention...’

I laugh a forced and fake laugh that sounds crazy even to my own ears.

People turn around and look at us. 'Apology accepted! Ancient history!' And then I bolt. I run faster than I've ever run. All the way to the girls' locker room.

How did this even happen?

I sink to the floor. I've had the going-to-school-naked dream before. I've had the going-to-school-naked-forgot-to-study-for-an-exam-in-a-class-I-never-signed-up-for combo; the naked-exam-somebody-trying-to-kill-me combo. This is all that times infinity.

And then; because there's nothing left for me to do; I take the letter out of the envelope and I read it.

Dear Marcel;

First of all; I refuse to call you Kavinsky. You think you're so cool; going by your last name all of a sudden. Just so you know; Kavinsky sounds like the name of an old man with a long white beard.

Did you know that when you kissed me; I would come to love you? Sometimes I think yes.

Definitely yes. You know why? Because you think EVERYONE loves you; Marcel. That's what I hate about you. Because everyone does love you. Including me. I did. Not anymore.

Here are all your worst qualities- You burp, and you don't say excuse me. You just assume everyone else will find it charming. And if they don't; who cares; right? Wrong! You do care. You care a lot about what people think of you. You always take the last piece of pizza. You never ask if anyone else wants it. That's rude. You're so good at everything.

Too good. You could've given other guys a chance to be good, but you never did. You kissed me for no reason. Even though I knew you liked Gen, and you knew you liked Gen, and Gen knew you liked Gen. But you still did it. Just because you could.

I really want to know- Why would you do that to me? My first kiss was supposed to be something special. I've read about it; what it's supposed to feel like- fireworks and lightning bolts and the sound of waves crashing in your ears. I didn't have any of that. Thanks to you it was as un-special as a kiss could be.

The worst part of it is; that stupid nothing kiss is what made me start liking you. I never did before. I never even thought about you before. Gen has always said that you are the best-looking boy in our grade, and I agreed; because sure, you are. But I still didn't see the allure of you.

Plenty of people are good-looking. That doesn't make them interesting or intriguing or cool.

Maybe that's why you kissed me. To do mind control on me; to make me see you that way. It worked. Your little trick worked. From then on; I saw you. Up close; your face wasn't so much handsome as beautiful. How many beautiful boys have you ever seen? For me; it was just one.

You. I think it's a lot to do with your lashes. You have really long lashes. Unfairly long.

Even though you don't deserve it; fine; I'll go into all the things I liked about you- One time in science; nobody wanted to be partners with Jeffrey Suttleman because he has BO, and you volunteered like it was no big deal. Suddenly everybody thought Jeffrey wasn't so bad.

You're still in the chorus; even though all the other boys take band and orchestra now. You even sing solos. And you dance, and you're not embarrassed.

You were the last boy to get tall. And now you're the tallest, but it's like you earned it. Also; when you were short; no one even cared that you were short- the girls still liked you and the boys still picked you first for basketball in the gym.

After you kissed me; I liked you for the rest of seventh grade and most of eighth. It hasn't been easy; watching you with Gen; holding hands and making out at the bus loop.

You probably make her feel very special. Because that's your talent; right? You're good at making people feel special.

Do you know what it's like to like someone so much you can't stand it and know that they'll never feel the same way? Probably not. People like you don't have to suffer through those kinds of things. It was easier after Gen moved and we stopped being friends. At least then I didn't have to hear about it. And now that the year is almost over; I know for sure that I am also over you.

I'm immune to you now; Marcel. I'm really proud to say that I'm the only girl in this school who has been immunized with the charms of Marcel Kavinsky. All because I had a really bad dose of you in seventh grade and most of eighth. Now I never ever have to worry about catching you again.

What a relief! I bet if I did ever kiss you again; I would definitely catch something, and it wouldn't be love. It would be an STD!

Lara Jean Song; IF I COULD CRAWL INTO a hole and burrow in it comfortably and live out the rest of my days in it; well; then that is what I would do.

Why did I have to bring up that kiss? Why?

I still remember everything about that day at John Ambrose McClaren's house. We were in the basement, and it smelled like mildew and laundry detergent. I was wearing white shorts and an embroidered blue-and-white halter top I stole out of Margot's closet.

I had on a strapless bra for the first time ever. It was one of Chris's, and I kept adjusting it because it felt unnatural.

It was one of our first boy-girl hangouts on a weekend and at night. That was a weird thing too because it felt purposeful. Not the same as going over to Allie's house after school and neighborhood boys are there hanging out with her twin brother.

Also- not the same as going to the arcade at the mall knowing we would probably run into boys. This was making a plan; getting dropped off; wearing a special bra; all on a Saturday night.

No parents around; just us in John's ultra-private basement. John's older brother was supposed to be watching us, but John paid him ten dollars to stay in his room. Not that anything exciting happened; for instance; an impromptu game of spin the bottle or seven minutes in heaven- two possibilities for which we girls had prepared for with gum and lip gloss. All that happened was the boys played video games and us girls watched and played on our phones and whispered to each other.

And then people's moms and dads were picking them up, and it was so anticlimactic after all that planning and anticipation. It was disappointing for me; not because I liked anyone; but because I liked romance and drama and I was hoping something exciting would happen to someone. Something did.

To me!

Marcel and I were downstairs alone; the last two people to be picked up. We were sitting on the couch. I kept texting my dad; where are you-u? Marcel was playing a game on his phone. And then; out of nowhere; he said; 'Your hair smells like coconuts.'

We weren't even sitting that close. I said; 'Really? You can smell it from there?'

He scooted closer and took a sniff; nodding. 'Yeah; it reminds me of Hawaii or something.'

'Thanks!' I said. I wasn't positive it was a compliment, but it seemed like enough of one to say thanks. 'I've been switching between this coconut one and my sister's baby shampoo; to do an experiment on which makes my hair softer.'

Then Marcel Kavinsky leaned right in and kissed me, and I was stunned.

I'd never thought of him any kind of way before that kiss. He was too pretty; too smooth. Not my type of boy at all. But after he kissed me; he was all I could think about for months after. What if Marcel is just the beginning? What if - what if my other letters somehow got sent too? To John Ambrose McClaren. Kenny from camp. Lucas Krapf.

Josh.

Oh my God; Josh.

I leap up from the floor. I've got to find that hatbox. I've got to find those letters.

I go back outside to the track. I don't see Chris anywhere; so, I guess she is smoking behind the field house. I go straight over to Coach; who is sitting on the bleachers with his phone.

'I can't stop throwing up;' I whimper. I double over and cradle my arms to my stomach. 'Can I please go to the nurse's office?'

Coach barely looks up from his phone. 'Sure.'

As soon as I'm out of his eye line; I make a run for it. The gym's my last period of the day, and my house is only a couple of miles from school. I run like the wind. I don't think I've ever run so hard or so fast in my life, and I likely never will again. I run so hard; a couple of times; I have to stop because I feel like I really am going to throw up.

-And-

Then; I remember the letters and Josh, and Up close; your face wasn't so much handsome as beautiful, and I'm off and running again. As soon as I get home; I dash upstairs and go into my closet for my hatbox. It's not sitting on the top shelf where it usually sits.

It's not on the floor; or behind my stack of board games. It's not anywhere. I get on my hands and knees and start rifling through piles of sweaters; shoe boxes; craft supplies. I look in places it could not possibly be because it's a hatbox and it's big, but I look anyway. My hatbox is nowhere.

I collapse onto the floor. This is a horror movie. My life has become a horror movie.

Next to me my phone buzzes. It's Josh. Where are you? Did you get a ride home with Chris?

I turn my phone off and go down to the kitchen and call Margot on the house phone.

It's still my first impulse; to go to her when things get bad. I'll just leave out the Josh part of it and focus on the Marcel part. She'll know what to do; she always knows what to do.

I'm all set to burst out; Gogo; I miss you so much and everything's a mess without you, but when she picks up the phone; she sounds sleepy, and I can tell that I've woken her up. 'Were you sleeping?' I ask.

‘No; I was just lying down;’ she lies.

‘Yes; you were sleeping! Gogo; it’s not even ten o’clock over there! Wait; is it? Did I calculate wrong again?’

‘No; you’re right. I’m just so tired. I’ve been up since five; because-’ Her voice trails off. ‘What’s wrong?’

I hesitate. Maybe it’s better not to burden Margot with all of this. I mean; she just got to college- this is what she’s worked for; this is her dream come true. She should be having fun and not worrying about how things are going back home without her. Besides; what would I even say? I wrote a bunch of love letters and they got sent out; including one I wrote to your boyfriend? ‘Nothing’s wrong;’ I say. I’m doing what Margot would do; which is figure it out on my own.

‘It definitely sounds like something’s wrong.’ Margot yawns. ‘Tell me.’

‘Go back to sleep; Gogo.’

‘Okay;’ she says; yawning again.

We hang up and I make myself an ice cream sundae right in the carton- chocolate sauce; whipped cream; chopped nuts. The works. I take it back up to my room and eat it lying down. I feed it to myself like medicine; until I’ve eaten the whole thing; every last bite.

A LITTLE WHILE LATER wakes up to Kellie standing at the foot of my bed. ‘You’ve got ice cream on your sheets;’ she informs me.

I groan and turn over to my side. ‘Kellie; that’s the least of my problems today.’

‘Daddy wants to know if you want chicken for dinner or hamburgers. My vote is chicken.’

I sit straight up. Daddy’s home! Maybe he knows something. He was on that cleaning binge; throwing things away. Maybe he’s spirited my hatbox away somewhere safe, and the Marcel letter was just an unfortunate fluke! I jump out of bed and run downstairs; my heart thumping hard in my chest.

My dad's in his study; wearing his glasses and reading a thick book on Audubon paintings.

All in one breath I ask; 'Daddy-have-you-seen-my-hatbox?'

He looks up; his face is hazy, and I can tell he is still with Audubon's birds and not at all focused on my frenzied state. 'What box?'

'My teal hatbox Mommy gave me!'

'Oh; that-;' he says; still looking confused. He takes off his glasses. 'I don't know. It might have gone the way of your roller skates.'

'What does that mean? What are you even saying?'

'Goodwill... There's a slight possibility I took them to Goodwill.'

When I gasp; my dad says defensively; 'Those roller skates don't even fit you anymore. They were just taking up space!'

I sink to the floor. 'They were pink, and they were vintage, and I was saving them for Kellie - and that's not even the point. I don't care about the roller skates. I care about my hatbox! Daddy; you don't even know what you've done.' My dad gets up and tries to pull me off the floor. I resist him and flop onto my back like a goldfish.

'Lara Jean; I don't even know that I got rid of it. Come on; let's have a look around the house; all right? Don't let's panic yet.'

'There's only one place it could be, and it's not there. It's gone.'

'Then I'll check Goodwill tomorrow on my way to work;' he says; squatting down next to me. He's giving me that look- sympathetic but also exasperated and mystified; like How; is it possible that my sane and reasonable DNA created such a crazy daughter?

'It's too late. It's too late. There's no point.'

'What was in that box that's so important?'

I can feel my ice cream sundae curdling in my stomach. For the second time; today I feel like I'm going to be sick. 'Only everything.'

He grimaces... 'I really didn't realize your mother had given it to you or that it was so important.' As he retreats off to the kitchen; he says; 'Hey; how about an ice cream sundae before dinner? Will; that cheers you up?'

Continued- 2

As if dessert before dinner would be the thing that cheers me up as if I am Kellie's age and not sixteen going on seventeen. I don't even bother dignifying it with an answer. I just lie there on the floor; my cheek against the cool hardwood. Besides; there isn't any ice cream left anyway, but he'll find that out soon enough.

I don't even want to think about Josh reading that letter. I don't even want to think about it.

It's too terrible.

After dinner (chicken; per Kellie's request); I'm in the kitchen doing dishes when I hear the doorbell ring. Daddy opens the door, and I hear Josh's voice. 'Hey; Dr. Covey. Is Lara Jean around?'

Oh; no! No- no-no-no. I can't see Josh. I know I have to at some point; but not today.

Not right this second. I can't. I just can't.

I drop the plate back into the sink and make a run for it; out the back door; down the porch steps; across the backyard to the Pearces' yard. I scramble up the wooden ladder and into Carolyn Pearce's old treehouse. I haven't been to this treehouse since middle school. We used to hang out up here sometimes; at night. Chris and Genevieve and Allie and me; the boys a couple of times.

I peek through the wooden slats; crouched in a ball; waiting until I see Josh walk back to his house. When I'm sure he's inside; I climb down the ladder and run back to mine. I sure have been doing a lot of running today. I'm exhausted; now that I think of it.

I WAKE UP THE NEXT morning renewed. I am a girl with a plan. I'm just going to have to avoid Josh forever. It's as simple as that. And if not forever; then at least until this dies-a-down and he forgets about my letter. There's still the tiny chance he never even got it.

Perhaps whoever mailed Marcel's only sent the one! You never know.

My mom always said optimism was my best trait. Both Chris and Margot have said it's annoying, but to that; I say looking on the bright side of life never killed anybody.

When I get downstairs; Daddy and Kellie are already at the table eating toast.

I make myself a bowl of cereal and sit down with them.

'I'm going to stop by Goodwill on my way to work;' my dad says; crunching on his toast from behind his newspaper. 'I'm sure the hatbox will turn up there.'

'Your hatbox is missing?' Kellie asks me. 'The one Mommy gave you?'

I nod and shovel cereal into my mouth. I have to leave soon or else I'll risk running into Josh on my way out.

'What was in the box; anyway?' Kellie asks.

'That's private;' I say. 'All you need to know is the contents are precious to me.'

'Will you be mad at Daddy if you never get the hatbox back?' Kellie answers her own question before I can. 'I doubt it. You never stay mad for long.'

This is true. I never can stay mad for long.

Peering over his newspaper; he asks Kellie; 'What in the world was in that hatbox?'

Kellie shrugs. Her mouth full of toast; she says; 'Probably more French berets?'

'No; not more berets.' I give them both a mean look. 'Now if you'll excuse me; I don't want to be late for school.'

'Aren't you leaving a little early?'

‘I’m taking the bus today;’ I say. And probably every day until Margot’s car is fixed, but they don’t need to know that.

THE WAY IT HAPPENS IS a strange sort of serendipity. A slow-motion train wreck...

For something to go this colossally wrong; everything must intersect and collide at the exact right; or in this case; wrong; moment.

If the bus driver hadn’t had trouble backing out of the cul-de-sac; taking four extra minutes to get to school; I never would have run into Josh.

If Josh’s car had started up and he hadn’t had to get a jump from his dad; he wouldn’t have been walking by my locker.

And if Marcel hadn’t had to meet Ms. Wooten in the guidance office; he would not have been walking down the hallway ten seconds later. And maybe this whole thing would not have happened. But it did.

I’m at my locker; the door is jammed, and I’m trying to yank it open. I finally get the door loose and there’s Josh; standing right there.

‘Lara Jean -’ He has this shell-shocked; confused expression on his face.

‘I’ve been trying to talk to you since last night. I came by, and nobody could find you...’ He holds out my letter. ‘I don’t understand. What is this?’

‘I don’t know;’ I hear myself say. My voice feels far away. It’s like I’m floating above myself; watching it all unfold.

‘I mean; it’s from you; right?’

‘Oh; wow.’ I take a breath and accept the letter. I fight the urge to tear it up.

‘Where did you even get this?’

‘It got sent to me in the mail.’ Josh jams his hands into his pockets. ‘When did you write this?’

‘Like; a long time ago;’ I say. I let out a fake little laugh. ‘I don’t even remember when. It might have been middle school.’ Good job; Lara Jean. Keep it up.

Slowly he says; ‘Right - but you mention going to the movies with Margot and Mike and Ben that time. That was a couple of years ago.’

I bite my bottom lip. ‘Right. I mean; it was kind of a long time ago. In the grand scheme of things.’ I can feel tears coming on so close that if I break concentration even for a second; if I waver; I will cry and that will make everything worse if such a thing is possible. I must be cool and breezy and nonchalant now. Tears would ruin that.

Josh is staring at me so hard I have to look away. ‘So then - Do you - or did you have feelings for me or...?’

‘I mean; yes; sure; I did have a crush on you at one point; before you and Margot ever started dating. A million years ago.’

‘Why didn’t you ever say anything? Because of Lara Jean - God. I don’t know.’ His eyes are on me, and they’re confused, but there’s something else; too. ‘This is crazy. I feel kind of blindsided.’

The way he’s looking at me now; I’m suddenly in a time warp back to a summer day when I was fourteen and he was fifteen, and we were walking home from somewhere.

He was looking at me so intently I was sure he was going to try to kiss me. I got nervous; so, I picked a fight with him and he never looked at me like that again.

Until this moment.

Don’t. Just please; don’t.

Whatever he’s thinking; whatever he wants to say; I don’t want to hear it. I will do anything; literally anything; not to hear it.

Before he can; I say; ‘I’m dating someone.’

Josh’s jaw goes slack. ‘What?’

What?

‘Yup, I’m dating someone; someone I really- really like; so please don’t worry about this.’ I wave the letter like it’s just paper; trash; like once, upon a time I didn’t literally pour my heart on this page. I stuff it into my bag. ‘I was really confused when I wrote this; I don’t even know how it got sent out. Honestly; it’s not worth talking about.

CHAPTER ONE

The Bellboys snickered at me. Tom impersonated Noah, making his voice high-pitched. ‘Leave off. Don’t talk to my girlfriend- he said all snotty.’ ‘Yeah- you heard me, off leave- yah-ow, I said in my English way of speaking.’ Harry yelped. ‘Otherwise, I’ll beat you up with my dollie.’ Rallie started toward the Bell house, head downward. Abundant, Noah’s beliefs and feelings. As usual, he’d made it not as good as-. ‘Da- Don’t go yet,’ Harper shouted to Rallie, pay no attention to her pain in the romp brothers. ‘Call home and just see if you can spend the night.’

‘I personally better not- not so- do,’ Rallie said. ‘I’ve just got to get my knapsack from inside.’ ‘Ah- hey- what up for me,’ Noah said, clutching Jann. He headed for the canopy way door and got there just as it shut in his face. ‘You overlooked... no?’ Inside of Harper’s house was always a mess. Discarded clothes, half-empty cups, and sports apparatus covered most surfaces. Her parents seemed to have given up on the house around the same time they gave up on trying to administer any rules about dinners and bedtimes and fighting-around Harper’s eighth birthday when one of her brothers threw her cake with its still-lit birthday candles at her older sister.

Now there were no more birthday parties. There weren’t even family meals, just packages of canned ravioli top with macaroni and cheese, and tins of sardines in the pantry so-o, that the kids could feed themselves long before their mother and father would come home from work and fell, exhausted, into their bed. They were old-bought from Salvation army-with big shiny heads, different-colored tails, and frizzy hair. HARPER SET DOWN ONE OF THE MERMAID DOLLIES CLOSE to the stretch of asphalt road, that represented the Murkiest Sea. They'd crash the ship against the shallows if they could, lure the crew into the sea, and eat the pirates with their jagged teeth.

Their silly plastic smiles, hiding their lethal intentions Noah- Ethan could almost imagine- their flippers lashing back, and forth as they waited for the boat to get closer. Noah rummaged through his bag of action figures. He pulled out the pirate with the two cutlasses and placed him gently at the center of the boat-shaped paper they'd considered down with the passageway of the shingle. Without gravel, the Neptune's Pearl was likely to blow away in the early autumn wind. He could almost believe he wasn't on the scrubby pasture in front of Harper's ramshackle house with the sagging siding, but aboard a real ship, with salt spray stinging his face, on his way to the voyage. Noah had a different way of speaking for each of his figures. He wasn't sure that anyone but him could tell his voices apart, but he felt different when he talked to them. 'We're going to have to lash ourselves to the mast,' Noah said, as Tommy sings the Blade, captain of the Neptune's Pearl. 'You think Jon's guards will be waiting for us in Blue falls?' Rallie made Girl Jann ask. She was loud and wild, almost nothing like Rallie, who chafed under the thumb of her overprotective grandmother, but did it quietly.

Rallies braids spilled in front of her amber eyes as she moved a hand covered wood doll- Jann figures closer to the center of the boat. Girl Jann was a thief who'd begun traveling with Tommy sings the Blade after she'd been unsuccessful in picking his pocket. It was something he never wanted to give up. He'd rather go on playing like this constantly, no matter how old they got, although he didn't see how that was possible.

It was already hard sometimes. That was why Noah loved playing: those moments where it seemed like he was retrieving some other world, one that felt real as anything. 'He might catch us,' said Noah, grinning at her. 'But he'll never hold us. Nothing will. We're on a mission for the Great Princess and we won't be stopped.' He hadn't expected to say those words until they came out of his mouth, but they felt right. They felt like Tommesings's true thoughts.

CHAPTER TWO

'You can knot ropes to keep you safe, but no boat can pass through these waters unless a sacrifice is given to the deep,' Harper made one of the mermaids say. 'Freely or reluctantly. If one of your crew doesn't spring into the sea, the sea will pick her own sacrifice. That's the mermaid's jinx.' It was said... Harper tucked windblown strands of red hair behind her ears and regarded Noah and Rallie very seriously.

She was insignificant and violent, with speckles thick enough to remind Noah of the stars at night. She adored nothing better than being in charge of the story and had a sense of how to make a moment melodramatic. That was why she was the finest at playing anti-heroes. Rallie and Noah exchanged a look. Were the mermaids telling the truth? Really, Harper wasn't supposed to make up rules like that-ones that no one else had agreed to-but Noah objected only when he didn't like them. A curse seemed like it could be fun. 'But just then,' said Harper ominously, moving one of the mermaids to the edge of the ship, 'webbed fingers grab Girl Jann's ankle, and the mermaid pulls her over the side of the boat. She's gone.'

'We'll all go down together before we lose a single member of this crew,' he fake-shouted in Tommesings's voice. 'We're on a mission for the Great Princess, and we fear her curse more than yours.' 'You can't do that!' Rallie said. 'I was lashed to the mast.' Rallie groaned, as though Harper was being especially annoying. Which she kind of was. 'Well, Girl Jann was in the middle of the boat. Even if she wasn't lashed, a mermaid couldn't get to her without crawling on board.' 'You didn't specify that you were,' Harper told her. 'Tommesings suggested it, but you didn't say whether or not you did it.'

'If Jann gets pulled over the side, I'm going after her,' Noah said, plunging Tommesings into the gravel water. 'I meant it when I said no one gets left behind.'

'I didn't get pulled over the side,' Rallie insisted.

As they sustained arguing two of Harper's brothers walked out of the house, letting the screen door slam behind them. They observed over and started to snicker. The older of the two, Tom, pointed directly at Noah and said something under his breath. His younger brother laughed.

Noah felt his expression heat. He didn't the reason they knew anyone at his middle school, but still. If any of his colleagues found out that, at twelve, he was still playing with action figures, basketball would become a lot less fun. School might get bad too.

'Close your eyes to them,' Harper declared loudly. 'They're BUTTS.'

'All we were going to say is that Rallie's grandma called,' Tom said, his face a parody of hangdog incorruptibility.

He and Harry had the same tomato-red hair as their sister, but they weren't much like her in any other way that Noah might understand.

They, along with their firstborn sister, were always in trouble-fighting, cutting school, smoking, and other stuff.

The Bell kids were considered hoodlums in town and, Harper aside, they seemed intent on doing what they could to uphold that character.

'Old magnates says that you need to be home before shadowy, and for us to be sure to tell you not to forget or make excuses.

She seems rough, Rallie.' The words were supposed to be nice, but you could tell from the sickly-sweet way Tom talked that he wasn't being nice at all.

Rallie stood up and fleecy off her skirt. The orange glow of the setting sun-bronzed her skin and turned her glossy box braids metallic.

Her eyes narrowed some. Her appearance wavered between confused and angry.

Boys had been harassing her ever since she'd hit ten, gotten bends, and started looking a lot older than she was.

Noah hated the way Tom talked to her like he was making fun of her without really saying anything bad, but he never knew what to say to stop it either.

'Leave off,' Noah told them.

Noah felt envious every time he thought of that kind of self-determination, and Rallie loved it even more than he did. She spent as many nights there as her grandmother permissible. Harper's parents didn't seem to notice, which worked out pretty flawlessly.

He undone and pushed open the screen door and went inside.

Rallie was standing in front of the dusty, old, locked display cabinet in the corner of the Bell living room, peering in at all the things Harper's mother had forbidden Harper, on pain of death and possible dismemberment, from touching.

That was where the dollie they called the Great Princess of all their realms was surrounded, next to a blown-glass vase from Savers that had turned out to be vintage something-or-other. The Princess had been picked up by Harper's mother at a tag sale, and she insisted that one day she was going to go on Antiques Live broadcast, sell it, and move them all to Sam.

The Princess was a bone china dollie of a child with straw-gold curls and paper-white skin- and the soul of a young girl within. Her eyes were closed, lashes a fair-haired fringe against her cheek. She wore a long gown, the thin fabric dotted with something dark that might be a fungus. Noah couldn't remember when exactly they'd decided that she was the Great Princess, only that they'd all felt like she was inspecting them, even though her eyes were closed, and that Harper's sister had been terrified of her.

Seemingly, one time, Harper had woken in the middle of the night and found her sister with whom she shared a room- sitting upright in bed. 'If she gets out of the case, she'll come for us,' her sister had said, unqualified-faced, before slumping back down on her pillow. No amount of calling to the other side of the room had seemed to stir her. Harper had tossed and turned, unable to sleep for the rest of the night. But in the morning, her sister had told her that she didn't recollect saying whatsoever, that it must have been a terrifying dream, and that their mother really needed to get rid of that dollie. I felt like I could not sleep with that dollie looking right through me as if she was alive and wanting me in some creepy way- she was feeling me... and I was feeling uncommentable... by it all. Subsequently, that, to escape being entirely frightened, Noah, Harper, and Rallie had added the dollie to their game of play. Conferring to the legend they'd created, the Princess ruled over the whole enchilada from her beautiful glass tower high up. She had the influence to put her mark on anyone who refuses to comply with her guidelines. When that occurred, nothing would go right for them until they regained her kindness. They'd be convicted of crimes they didn't commit. Their friends and family would sicken and de cease. Ships would sink, and squalls would strike.

The one thing the Princess couldn't do, though, was an escape. 'Are- you all right?' Noah asked Rallie. She seemed fascinated by the case, staring into it as though she could see approximately- Noah couldn't. Lastly, Rallie turned around, her eyes shining. 'My grandmother wants to know where I am every second. She wants to pick out my clothes for me and grumbles about my braids all the time. I just am so-o over it. Besides yours truly don't know if she's going to let me be in the play this year, even though yours truly got a good part- but...? Uh? She can't see so well after twilight, and she doesn't want to drive me home. I'm just so tired of all her rules, as well as it's like the older I myself get, the poorer she gets.'

Noah had heard most of that before, but usually, Rallie just sounded resigned to it. 'What about your aunt? Could you ask her to pick you up after rehearsals?'

Rallie snorted. 'She's never forgiven Aunt Linda for trying to get custody of me way back when. Brings it up at every holiday. It's made her super paranoid.'

Mrs. Mag Harry grew up in the Philippines and was fond of telling anyone who would listen to how different things were over there. According to her, Filipino teenagers worked hard, never talked back, and didn't draw on their hands with ink pens or want to be actresses, like Rallie did. They didn't get as tall as Rallie was getting either.

Rallie laughed. 'Yeah, okay. Made her extra-super paranoid.'

'Made her super paranoid?' Noah asked. 'Hey.' Harper came into the living room from outside, holding the rest of their figures. 'Are you sure you can't stay over, Rallie?' Rallie shook her head, plucked Girl Jann out of Noah's hand, and went down the hallway to Harper's room. 'I was just getting my stuff.'

'Her grandmother,' he said, with a shrug. 'You know.' Harper turned impatiently to Noah for an explanation. She never liked it when she wasn't part of a conversation and hated the idea that her friends had kept any secrets from her, even stupid ones. 'Otherwise, maybe she'll just make him do another quest.' He thought about it a moment and grinned. 'Maybe she wants him to get skilled adequate with a blade to break her out of that cabinet.'

Harper exhaled and beheld at the cabinet. After a moment, she spoke. 'If you finish this quest, the Princess will probably lift the curse on Tommesings. He could go home and finally solve the mystery of where he came from.' They walked down the hall to Harper's room just as Rallie came out, backpack over the left shoulder. 'Don't even think about it,' Harper alleged, only half-joking.

'Come on.'

'See you tomorrow then,' she said as she slid past them. She didn't look happy, but Noah thought she might just be upset that she was leaving early and that they were going to be hanging out without her. He and Harper didn't usually play the game when Rallie wasn't there. But lately, Rallie seemed to be more bothered by him and Harper spending time alone together, which he didn't understand.

An odds and ends of her sister's old Barbies were on top of a bookshelf, waiting for Harper to try to fix their melted arms and chopped hair. The bookshelves were overfull with make-believe paperbacks and overdue library books, some of them on Greek myths, some on mermaids, and a few on homegrown hauntings. Noah thought about drawing a map of their kingdoms-one with the seas, and the islands and the whole kit and caboodle-and wondered where he could get a gigantic enough piece of paper.

Noah walked into Harper's room and flopped down on her gray-sh shag rug. Harper used to share the room with her younger sister, and piles of her sister's outgrown clothes still endured spread out in meanings, along with an assemblage of used makeup and notebooks covered in stickers, plus indecipherable with lyrics.

He ran down the steps, cutting her off in mid- reproach. 'Where's my carrier- bag? The action figures. The models and early made cars. All of them. They're not upstairs.'

'Noah?' she called up from down the stairs. 'That's the second time you've banged -'

'Nope, Mom, they're gone.' Noah looked over at his father and was surprised to see the expression on his dad's face-an appearance he wasn't sure how to understand.

'I didn't take anything out of your room. I bet it's underneath one of the element-size piles of laundry up there.' She smiled as she got down a stack of plates, but he didn't smile back at me. Why...? 'Clean your room, and I bet the bag turns up.'

She followed Noah's gaze, turning to Noah's father, her voice very quiet. 'Evelyn?'

'Where are they?' Noah asked, a hazardous edge to his voice.

'He's twelve years old, playing with a bunch of crap,' he said; getting up from the sofa, and raising his hands in a pacifying way. 'He's got to grow up. It was time he got rid of them. He should be absorbed with friends, listening to music, goofing off. Noah, trust me when I say this to you-you won't miss them.'

'Those figures were mine- I tell ya!' Noah was so angry about this- he could hardly think about it really. His voice shook with anger and frustration. 'They were mine- MINE.'

'Forget it- shit, they're gone,' his pop said. 'There's no point in throwing a hissy fit.'

'Somebody's- like- needs to get you ready for the real world, kid...' said his father, his face flushing red. 'Be mad all you want, but it's done. Done... Do you comprehend me? It's time you grew up. End of discussion.'

'Evelyn, what were you thinking?' Noah's mother demanded. 'You can't just go making decisions without talking-'

'Oh, don't be so melodramatic,' his dad said.

'Where are they?' Noah snarled at him with the look of hate. He had never talked to his father this way, never talked to an adult this way. 'What did you do with all of the stuff?'

'Evelyn!' His mother's voice was threatening.

His father stopped for an instant, his expression was suddenly undefined. 'I threw them out... okay- out- I'm sorry about it- but- o-well. I didn't think you'd be this upset. They're just plastic-'

'GIVE THEM BACK NOW- NOW!' Noah roared. He was out of the switch, and he didn't care about looking like a little baby about it.

'In the garbage they are?' Noah ran dashing out the door, and down the old worn steps. Two big dented metal garbage cans were at the end of the yard by the driveway, resting on the fence tipped some. He pulled off the lid of one with numb fingers, then threw it against the road with a clang and it rolled down the hill. GO after that - NO!

Please, he thought. Please- please- pretty please.

It felt like a punch to the gut. Tommy sings the Allyson and Jasper and all the others were dead. Without them, all their stories would be dead too. He wiped his face against the sleeve of his shirt.

But the inside of the can was unfilled. The trash truck had previously come and gone. Then he twisted back to the house. His father was silhouetted in the entranceway.

'Hey, I'm sorry,' he said.

'Don't bother trying to be my father any longer,' Noah said, strolling up the front steps and past him. 'It's too late for that, it was too late- like years ago- it was- so-o.'

'Noah,' his mother said, her hand accomplishment out to touch his shoulder, but he walked past her.

His father just stared at him, his face troubled.

In his room, Noah looked up at the ceiling, trying to noiseless the feelings inside him. He didn't complete his homework. He didn't eat dinner, even though his mother carried up a plate of food for him, and set it down on his desk- he left it to sit being a brat. He didn't change out of his clothes into his pajamas he just sat there in his undies. He didn't cry- he just looked miserable.

She took another sip of coffee... now do stars... 'He called the dump, too. Asked them if there was any way to get your toys back. He even obtainable to drive over there and look for them himself- but there was no way. I'm sorry. I know that he did a stupid thing, but he honestly tried to fix it, sweetheart.'

Noah tossed and turned, concentrating on the glooms moving across the ceiling and on the anger that seemed to grow instead of lessening. He was angry. At his father, for destroying the game. At his mother, for letting his father back into their lives. And that anger coagulated inside his belly and crawled up his throat until it felt like it might choke him. Until he was sure that there was no way he could ever tell anyone what had happened without all of his anger spilling out and engulfing everything.

At Harper and Rallie, who hadn't lost anything. And at himself, for acting like a little kid, just like his dad had said, and for caring about Tommy sings the Blade and a bunch of plastic toys as though they were real people.

And the only way not to tell anyone was to end the game.

CHAPTER THREE

THE NEXT MORNING, NOAH PUSHED HIS LIMP CEREAL around in a bowl of milk as his mom poured herself a second cup of coffee. Light filtered in through the dirty windowpane to make the scarred wood on the kitchen table show the pale watermarks from wet mugs and the greenish smudge where Noah had once drawn a spaceship in permanent marker. He traced the faint outline of it with a finger.

'Your father called the trash company last night,' his mother said.

Noah blinked and looked up at her.

Noah felt weirdly numb, as though everything that happened was on a slight delay. He knew what she was saying was supposed to be important, but somehow he couldn't make it matter. He felt tired, too, as though he hadn't slept at all, even though he'd actually slept so deeply that the ringing of his alarm had seemed to bring him up from the bottom of something deep and dark. He'd had to fight through his dreams to wake.

'Okay,' he said because there was nothing else to say.

'Tonight we're going to sit down and have a family discussion. Your dad was brought up by a very strict man and, as much as he hates it, he acts like his father sometimes. It's what he knows, honey.'

Noah shrugged and put a scoop of soggy cereal in his mouth to keep from telling her that he'd rather be hung upside down by his toes over a blazing fire than talk to his father. Still chewing, he grabbed his backpack and started for school.

'We can discuss later,' his mother said with false cheer, moments before he slammed his way out the door.

But this morning he hurried along the side of the street, glad to be alone. He kept his head down as he stalked along, kicking rocks and chunks of loose asphalt into the road. When he saw the school building in the distance, he wondered what would happen if he just kept going, the same way his father had left them three years ago. If he just kept walking until he came to a new place where no one knew him, lied about his age and got a job delivering newspapers or something... The cold air felt like a slap in the face. He was relieved not to see Harper and Rallie on the sidewalk. They all lived close enough that sometimes they ran into each other on the way to school, and they usually walked home together.

Well, he didn't know quite what he would do after that.

If a story idea came to him, he concentrated on something else until it went away.

By the time he made up his mind to go to school, he was late. Mr. Lockwood glowered at him as he slunk into class just after the bell. He sat at his desk and drew nothing in the margins of his notebook.

At lunch, his sandwich tasted like cardboard. He threw out his apple.

After school, he told the coach he was too sick to go to practice, but really, it was just that he didn't want to. He didn't much want to do anything

A few minutes later Rallie caught up with him, the slap of her shoes on the pavement heralding her approach. He felt like an idiot for taking the same old route and not expecting to see any of his friends. He started walking home, thinking he could sit in front of the television until Mom got home from work, then tell her the same thing he told the coach. She was wearing a Jon T-shirt with a creature on it that appeared to be half brontosaurus, half kitten. Her braids were pulled back into a headband, and little feather earrings hung from her ears. 'Noah?' Rallie asked, out of breath from running.

But that seemed forever ago, and so much had happened since. He almost didn't feel like the same person.

He had no idea what to say to her. He wanted to ask her about the day before when she was giggling with her friends-he wanted to know why she hadn't talked to him.

He was like a random generator of weirdness. 'Hey,' he said. 'Harper wanted me to tell you to walk slow. She's getting a book from the librarian.'

A kid named Aubrey waved to them, walking in their direction. He had big glasses and was always saying crazy things.

Then one of them would ask, 'Want to play?' like always. And he would have to say something. 'Oh,' Noah said, feeling doomed. He knew what would happen next. One by one the mass of kids who walked home together would gather and then peel away into clumps headed in different directions until it was just Harper and Rallie and him.

'You okay?' Rallie asked.

'Yeah,' said Aubrey. 'You don't look so good, Noah. Somebody walk over your grave?'

He blinked a couple of times. At least Aubrey was acting like his normal crazy self. That was one thing that wasn't going to change. 'What?'

'No,' Noah said. His foot sent a few leaves spiraling up into the air. Talking about graves made him think about walking home the night before when he'd thought he heard the wind howling at his heels. He shivered. 'So, my grave is going to be in front of Thomas Peebles Middle School? That's so-o lame.'

'That's what my grandpa always said. You never heard that?'

Rallie rolled her eyes. 'It's a saying. It means somewhere someone is stepping on the place where you're going to be buried.' 'It doesn't mean that you're going to be buried here.'

'So, it could be any old place?' Noah asked, shaking his head. 'How does that help to know?'

'It's not supposed to help,' Aubrey said. 'It's just supposed to be true.'

Her hair was in coppery pigtails, and her eyeliner looked smudged on one eye like maybe she'd forgotten it was there and rubbed over it. 'What are you guys talking about?' Harper asked, bounding up to them. She had on a black sweater and was bouncing on her Jon Chucks, one of the pink laces untied and dragging muddily behind her.

Harper looked over at Rallie and raised her eyebrows. 'Nothing like nothing or nothing like something?'

'Nothing,' Noah said with a shrug.

He was pretty sure that they used to all speak the same language a year ago. Rallie shook her head and smiled, but then turned her smile down at the pavement like she was embarrassed. Noah had no idea what was going on. He wondered if it had to do with yesterday and the giggling, but couldn't think of how to ask. Sometimes it seemed to him that girls spoke a different language, but he couldn't figure out when they'd learned it.

'We're talking about superstitions,' said Aubrey. 'Like how stepping where someone's grave is going to make them shudder involuntarily.'

He always talked with big words, like a textbook. Superstitions. Shudder. Involuntarily. Some kids said it was because his mother was a part-time teacher over at the college, but Noah thought that was just how Aubrey was.

Wait, no, I do remember! Harry pushed me in the backyard, and I whipped a branch at him. The branch got him good, right above the eye. He was bleeding like crazy, so-o even though he started it, I was the one who got in trouble.

I stomped on cracks all up and down the block. And the next day, she slipped into the garden and sprained her ankle.' 'Like stepping on a crack is supposed to break your mother's back?' Harper asked. 'I tried that when I was really little. I was so mad at Mom, but I don't even remember why now.'

Harper laughed. 'It's not like she actually broke her back. I mean, it was just a coincidence that she fell. But it scared me at the time. I thought I was some kind of powerful enchanter or something.'

Noah could see him mentally filing that away with all his other oddball stories. 'No way,' Aubrey said.

'And you avoided cracks for years after,' Rallie said. 'Remember that? You would be crazy careful, always putting your feet sideways and going up on your tiptoes and stuff. You swerved around like a dumb butt.'

Dumb butt- Noah said automatically. For some reason, words were funnier smashed together. Rallie echoed, spinning on one toe and then stumbling a little. 'Exactly.'

They passed the old Episcopalian church with the big spire as they headed down Main Street.

'That's a good portmanteau,' said Aubrey. Noah nodded, the way he usually did when he had no idea what Aubrey was talking about.

This was the town he'd grown up in, and even though it was small and a lot of the stores on Main Street were closed, even though windows were boarded up and rentals went unrented, Noah was used to the place.

They walked past the barbershop, the pizza place where Noah had birthday parties when he was little, the bus station next to the post office, and the big old graveyard on the hill. Noah had followed this exact route many times... his fingers curled in his mother's when he was little and then gripping the handlebars of his bike when he was older, and now on foot to and from school.

He couldn't imagine living anywhere else, which was a real stumbling block in imagining running away. 'For a while, my parents moved us around a lot, and there was this one apartment we lived in that was haunted. I swear-when the ghost was in the room, the air would get really cold, even in the middle of summer.

'That stuff is real,' Aubrey said. And there was one spot that was always ice-cold. You could put a space heater on top of it, and it wouldn't warm up. That's where somebody died. The land-Girl even said so.'

'Did you ever actually see the ghost?' Rallie asked. Her cheeks were pink from the wind, and her eyes were bright. 'Have you ever heard this one? When you drive past a cemetery, you have to hold your breath. If you don't, the spirits of the newly dead can get in your body through your mouth and then they can possess you.'

Aubrey shook his head. 'No, but sometimes he would move things. Like my mom's keys. Mom would yell for the ghost to give them back, and then, nine times out of ten, she'd find them right after. Mom says you have to know how to talk to ghosts or they'll walk all over you.'

Harper smiled like she did when she was anticipating revealing something exciting-a twist to a story, a shocking turn, a villain's big move.

Noah shivered, the hairs on his neck rising. Without meaning to, he imagined the taste of a ghost, like an acrid mouthful of smoke. He spat in the dirt, trying to untaste the idea.

Noah thought again about the night before and the feeling of something right behind him, breathing on his neck, something that was about to reach out and grasp for him with its cold fingers.

'Ugh,' Rallie said into the silence that followed the end of Harper's story. 'You made me hold my breath! I was totally just trying not to inhale. Anyway, we already passed the graveyard-shouldn't you have told us the story before we passed it? Unless you wanted us to get possessed.'

The story was like that, grabbing hold of him and promising that he'd think about it every time he was near a graveyard.

'Maybe I'm not Harper anymore. Maybe I didn't know to hold my breath and I learned the hard way. Maybe a spirit possessed me and now it's warning you because it's too late. The spirits are already inside you- 'Harper kept smiling. She made her eyes really wide and spoke in a flat, affectless tone. 'That's why it's a scary story. Because you can't do the one thing that would protect you-you'll never know if you held your breath long enough or let it out too soon. And you can't hold your breath forever.'

'Come on, stop,' Rallie said, shoving Harper's shoulder. They both began to laugh.

'The smiling was creepy,' said Noah. 'Anyone tell you that you have a creepy smile, Harper?' Aubrey laughed nervously along with them.

She looked very pleased with herself.

They walked a few blocks more and then came to the place where Aubrey split off for home. He waved goodbye and headed off, cutting across a big lawn toward a trailer park.

CHAPTER FOUR

Then it was just Rallie and Harper and Noah walking the few blocks to the development where their houses were clustered, all three nearly identical from the outside. His heart started to speed up again and his legs turned to lead because there was no way to avoid the conversation that was coming, even though he wanted to with all his might.

He thought of the folded-up Questions, still in his backpack, and of how he'd said Tommesings's nightmare was being buried alive. THE AIR WAS COOL, THE TREES BRIGHT WITH YELLOW and red leaves, and lawns thick with a wilted carpet of brown. A gust of air shook the branches above Noah and blew his bangs over his eyes. He pushed them back impatiently and looked up at the cloudless sky. He thought of all of them-all his characters, stuck in the duffel bag, rats chewing at the edges. He thought of bugs crawling over them and trash dumped on top of them.

'I can't,' Noah said quickly. He'd planned out a whole speech the night before, lying on his back, staring up at the ceiling of his room, but he couldn't remember any of it now. 'Hey,' said Rallie. 'Do you guys want to meet up? I have an idea for what might-' He took a deep breath and blurted out the only thing he could think to say. 'I don't want to play anymore.'

Harper frowned in confusion. 'What are you talking about?'

'I've been really busy with school and basketball and everything,' he said instead, his voice low. 'I mean; you guys can keep playing or whatever.'

For a moment, it seemed possible to take the words back, to tell Harper and Rallie what had really happened. He could explain what his dad had done and how angry he was and how he had no idea what to do now except be angry. He could tell them how he didn't want all the stories to remain unfinished. He could tell them how he felt like pieces of himself were gone, like part of him had been thrown out with his action figures.

'It's just that we're in the middle of something big. We came all the way through the Gray Country and to the Blackest Sea. Couldn't we just finish this part?'

'You mean ever? Like you don't want to play ever again?' When Harper got upset, her neck would flush a blotchy red. He could see it coloring, as pink as her wind-whipped cheeks. She launched into a slightly desperate negotiation.

He'd been looking forward to crossing swords with the leader of the mermaids, who knew the way to an ancient underwater city full of secrets-including the secret to completing the Princess's quest and lifting her curse-plus there was the promise of fighting sharks. There were even hints that they might find a clue to Tommy sings the Blade's parentage, plus the treasure of the Shark Prince-piles of gold and jewels so vast that Girl Jann had been questing after it since she had first heard the story as an orphan beggar child. Remembering how awesome it was going to be made every new thought about playing hurt like the back of a shoe rubbing against a burst blister.

Rallie looked stricken.

'We're too old anyway, don't you think?' he made himself say.

'We were,' Noah said 'That's stupid,' Harper said. 'We weren't too old the day before yesterday.'

'It's because of your friends on the team, isn't it?' Rallie glanced over at Harper like maybe they'd had this conversation before. 'You think they're going to find out and hassle you.'

'You don't mean that,' Harper said.

'I don't think anything.' Noah sighed. 'I just don't want to play anymore.'

He forced the words out. 'I do.'

'Maybe we could just take a break,' Rallie said slowly. 'Do something else for a while.'

'And then maybe if you change your mind...'

'Sure,' he said with a shrug.

Before Girl Jann, Rallie's favorite character had been a Barbie named Aurora who had been raised by a herd of carnivorous horses. But on Monday morning, on the walk to school, Rallie explained that she'd repainted an action figure from a thrift store over the weekend. She wanted to play somebody new. Noah thought about the time that Rallie had first brought her Girl Jann dollie to a game-three month back.

Jann was different, all right. She was a thief who'd grown up on the streets of the biggest city in all their kingdoms, called Haven. And she didn't care about anything except for what she could steal and what fun she could have along the way.

Tommy sings had to bail her out of the situation after situation, until he finally got her to agree to stay aboard the Neptune's Pearl. Jann was crazy. She got a ride on Tommesings's ship because she wanted a ride to the Shark Prince's treasure, but every time he docked, Girl Jann kept stealing from people, so they'd been banned from landing in at least five different places.

'I'm not going to change my mind,' Noah said numbly.

Rallie's descriptions of Girl Jann's antics had made Noah laugh so hard that his stomach hurt. His stomach hurt now, too, but for a different reason.

Except then she wound up doing things like climbing the mast with a blindfold on, just to show off.

We're in the middle of a scene. What happens to everyone else? What happens to Girl Jann? Even if she gets away from the mermaids, what then? What about the crew?' 'But it doesn't make any sense,' Harper said, not willing to let him off that easily. 'You can't just stop.

'Maybe one of your people can take over as captain.' Noah hated the idea, but the Neptune's Pearl wasn't a particular toy that one of them owned. It was just a cutout piece of paper, and there was no reason for him to hang on to it.

Tommy sings had promised Girl Jann that he'd take her to the place marked on the map as the lair of the Shark Prince. He'd sworn it on his honor and on the Neptune's Pearl.

'You figure it out. I don't care anymore.'

'Maybe they'll make her walk the plank,' said Harper.

'I don't care what happens,' Noah said, and all the simmering anger at his father, at this conversation, and at everything bled into his voice then, turning it cruel.

Rallie wasn't allowed there, so it was a generous offer.

'Okay,' Rallie said, holding up her hands like she was surrendering. 'How about we walk over to the dirt mall? Whatever. See what's at the used bookstore and play the arcade games in the movie theater lobby. Like I said, a break.'

Or bike over.

'I don't really feel like it today,' Noah said. 'But thanks.' They were almost to his street, almost home. He picked up his pace.

'Did you finish the Questions?' Harper asked him.

He hitched his backpack higher on his shoulder and shook his head. The note was folded and tucked away in the front zippered pocket, scribbled on and illustrated, full of proof that he did care. He couldn't give it to her.

She held out her hand.

'I didn't answer them,' he said. 'What do you want?'

'Give me the paperback anyway. Maybe I'll make up my own answers.'

He frowned. 'I don't have them anymore. I lost them.'

'They're probably just in your bag, right?' Rallie said. 'You could look.'

'You lost them?' Harper yelled. He wondered if she was afraid of someone finding out what she'd asked. He would have been.

'What happened?' Harper asked, grabbing his arm. 'What's so different all of a sudden? Why are you so different?'

'Sorry,' Noah mumbled. 'As I said, I don't know where they are.'

He turned to look at her. He had to get away before he said something that he couldn't take back. 'I don't know. I don't want to play, that's all.'

'Fine,' Harper said. 'Just bring your people over one last time. One final time. So that they can say goodbye to our people.'

'I can't,' he said. 'I just can't, Harper.'

'They're not real, you know.' He knew he was being a jerk, but it felt good to lash out, even if was at the wrong person. 'They're not real, and they can't want anything. Stop being such a loser. You can't play pretend forever.'

'I just want to say good-bye.' The hurt on Harper's face was raw and so much like his own that it was hard to look at her. 'They would want that. They'll miss Rose and Girl Jann and Aeryn and Lysander, even if you don't.'

Rallie sucked in her breath. The red blotches on Harper's neck had moved to her cheeks. She looked like she was about to cry or hit him; Noah wasn't sure which. With her blessing, all his crimes might be forgiven, his curse lifted, and Tommesings would be allowed to dock the Neptune's Pearl anywhere he wanted.

Noah hesitated. The Great Princess, who ruled over the Blue Hills, the Gray Country, the Land of the Witches, and the whole Blackest Sea. She would have information about Tommy sings the Blade's father.

The dollie was very, very old, and according to Harper's mother-worth a lot of money. She'd be worth a lot less if they touched her papery cotton dress or pawed at her brittle straw-gold curls. And if the Princess was freed from her cage, then who knew what that meant for the world. It was a big thing for Harper to promise-especially because her mother would be furious if Harper actually took the dollie out from the cabinet.

When she spoke, though, her voice was flat and grim. 'The Princess-what if I take her out of the cabinet? I know where my mom keeps the key. I'll play her. She knows all the secrets, and she'll give you whatever you want. Everything. If you come tomorrow, you can have everything you want.'

For a moment, he'd forgotten that there was no more game. It was an unpleasant shock to remember. No matter how tempting it was, Noah couldn't play. There were no Tommy sings the Blade anymore.

'Sorry,' he said, turning toward his house with a shrug.

Harper made a strangled sound. Rallie said something under her breath.

Noah bent his head, closed his eyes, and kept walking.

'Your mother pointed out to me that if I want you to start acting like a grown-up, I can't keep treating you like a kid,' his father was saying, sounding overly sincere. 'She's right. I shouldn't have tossed out your stuff, because it's my job to guide you toward the right choices, not make all those choices for you.'

THAT NIGHT, AT the kitchen table, Noah poked at his baked chicken. He wasn't hungry.

The tone of his father's voice made Noah think of last year when he'd gotten into a fight at school. His mother had made him sit in the principal's office until he was ready to tell Grayson Fatter that he was sorry for punching him, even though Noah hadn't been sorry at all. Noah's father's apology sounded as forced as he had been.

'I know that it's hard to adjust to us being back together,' Mom said. 'But we're going to keep working on it. Noah, do you have anything you want to say?'

'Nope,' Noah said.

Finally, Noah nodded, because he did understand his father. He understood his wanting to make Mom happy. He understood not being sorry. It just didn't make Noah forgive him.

'That's okay,' said his dad, getting up from the table and clapping Noah on the shoulder. 'We understand each other, don't we?'

An awkward silence stretched between them.

He tried not to think about the story, which would go on without him, flowing around the empty spaces where his characters used to be until they were swallowed up and forgotten. The next day,

Noah went to practice and tried to blot out thoughts of Harper and Rallie and his father by playing ball so aggressively that he got lectured by his coach and benched for the rest of practice.

He thought again about running away, but the more time passed, the more he'd realized that he had nowhere to go.

In the morning Noah asked her to drive him to school, and that afternoon he went home with Alex Rios. They played video games in Alex's finished basement on a bigger television than Noah had seen outside of a store.

Since his father was at the restaurant that night, his mother lets him eat ravioli from a can on the couch in front of the television. They didn't talk much, although he caught her shooting him worried looks.

'Shut up,' Noah said, shoving Jack Lewis since he was standing closest.

'What?' Jack said. 'I didn't say anything.'

The day after that, Rallie walked up to Noah while he was shooting baskets at recess and pressed a note into his hand. A couple of the other guys yelled 'Go ask Rallie!' and 'Somebody's got a girlfriend!' as she walked off, which made her hunch her shoulders like she was braced against a hard wind.

The note was folded up in a square this time, with his name carefully printed in Jon ink. When he opened it, there were only three short sentences on the lined paper:

It's nothing, Noah told himself.

Something happened with the Princess. Go to the hermit's place by the Blue Hills after school. It's important.

Important was underlined three times.

He thought of the Princess's fluttering lashes and the feeling of her closed eyes following him as he walked through the room.

This was just Harper and Rallie attempting to get him to show up so they could all have the same fight over again. They wanted him to play and he couldn't. There was nothing he could do except explaining why it was over, and he couldn't bring himself to do that.

The Princess wasn't real, though, so nothing important could have happened with her.

'What did the note say?' Alex asked. 'She tells you that she wants your skinny body?'

Noah tore it in half and then in half again. 'Nah. She just wants my math homework.'

There was no practice after school that day, but he stayed late anyway, pretending there was. He managed to talk the coach into letting him shoot hoops in the gym, which he did methodically, alone, letting himself drown in the thump of the ball, the squeak of his sneakers, and the familiar smell of fresh floor wax and old sweat.

CHAPTER FIVE

The moon was high enough to give the room an eerie blue glow. He could make out the familiar shapes of his furniture. His black cat was uncurling and stretching her long sleek body, claws digging into the coverlet. She padded up to him, her yellow eyes full of reflected light.

NOAH WOKE IN THE DARKNESS OF HIS BEDROOM. He wasn't sure why, but his heart raced, adrenaline pumping through his body, as though something had activated his body's fight-or-flight response. He blinked in the dark, letting his eyes adjust.

'What's up?' he whispered to The Party, reaching out to pet her soft triangular head and press his thumb against her ear, folding it down and rubbing it. She butted against him and started to purr.

Bang- Tap-tap!

He jumped. The cat hissed, her white teeth flashing in the moonlight, and she jumped off the bed. Something small and hard had struck the window.

A sudden gust of wind made the branches outside shake and jitter. He couldn't help imagining the long, bony fingers of the trees scraping against the glass.

This was no echo of a dream, no made-up story. Something really had hit the glass, smacking against one of the panes he couldn't see, one of the lower ones, hidden behind Jon half-curtains.

Then one night-quite randomly-he fell asleep with his head above the covers like a normal person, and no monster got him. Over time he got spottier about observing his safety precautions until he routinely slept with an arm dangling off the side of his bed and his feet kicked free of the sheets.

When he was a little kid, he'd had a firm belief in universally observed monster rules. He'd been sure, for example, that if he kept all parts of himself on the mattress and shrouded beneath blankets if he kept his eyes closed, and if he pretended to be asleep, then he'd be safe. He didn't know where he'd gotten the idea from. He did remember his mother saying he'd smother himself if he kept sleeping with his head under the comforter.

But right then, at the sound of the wind, for one panicky moment, all he wanted was to burrow under the blankets and never come out.

Tap- Tap - bang.

The thing hitting the window was just a branch, he told himself.

Or a neighbor cat trying to pick a fight with The Party.

Or an insomniac squirrel rattling around in the gutters.

Tap- Tap.

He was never going to be able to go back to sleep if he didn't look. Noah slid out of bed, his bare feet padding over the carpet. Steeling himself and taking a deep breath, he pushed aside the curtain.

He was too surprised to shout. They had windblown hair and upturned faces and, for a moment, he didn't know them. But then he realized it was only Harper and Rallie, not zombie girls or witches or ghosts. Rallie lifted her hand in a shy wave. Harper had another handful of pebbles and looked ready to throw them at him.

There were a few scattered pebbles on the roof tiles in front of his window. That was the first thing he noticed. The second was that when he looked past the roof, he saw two dark figures looking up at him from the moonlit lawn.

He let out his breath and waved back a little unsteadily. His hammering heart started to slow.

Harper beckoned to him. Come down, she was signaling.

Noah backed away from the window. Quietly he went to the closet and pushed his feet into a pair of sneakers. He pulled a sweater over his T-shirt and crept downstairs in his alligator pajama bottoms.

He thought of the note that Rallie had passed him and the way she'd underlined important, but he couldn't think of anything so important that it would lead them to sneak out of their houses on a Friday night. Rallie's grandmother would ground her for the rest of forever if she found out.

The under-cabinet lights in the kitchen were bright enough to stumble through, and he managed to find his coat on a hook in the entranceway. The microwave showed the time in blinking green numbers: three minutes past midnight. Noah shouldered his coat on and went outside, closing the door before the cat could slip through.

Harper and Rallie were waiting for him. The Party followed, mewling plaintively, probably hoping to be fed. 'Hey,' he whispered into the dark. 'What's going on? What happened?'

'Sh-h-h-h a,' Harper said. 'You'll wake up everyone. Come on.'

'Where to?' He asked, looking back at his house. There was a light on in his parents' bedroom upstairs. Sometimes his mother stayed up late to read; sometimes she fell asleep with the light on. If she was still awake, the sound of them talking might carry up to her, but he wanted to know something before he just followed Rallie and Harper into the night.

'The Blue Hills,' Rallie said.

That was a junkyard that specialized in metal about half a mile from their houses. The owner bought everything from car parts to tin cans and, although no one was sure what he did with them other than let them rust in huge mounds on his property, they were a pretty impressive sight. The stripped rods, machine parts, and batteries gleamed like mountains of blue, so that's why they'd started calling it the Blue Hills. They'd come up with a whole storyline, including dwarves and trolls and a princess dollie that Harper had painted blue.

Noah jogged behind Harper and Rallie, the wind cutting through his thin pajamas, making him feel both cold and sort of ridiculous. After a few minutes, Harper pulled a flashlight out of her jacket and clicked it on. It illuminated only a narrow patch of grass and dirt, so she had to swing it back and forth to see much.

There was the same old high chain-link fence around the property that Noah remembered. And there was the same old abandoned shed that they'd found a few summers ago and used as a clubhouse until Rallie's grandmother had found out about it and given them a speech about tetanus and how it led to something she called lockjaw. Noah wasn't sure lockjaw was a real thing, but he thought about it every time his neck felt stiff.

They hadn't been there since—or at least, he hadn't. He wondered if Harper and Rallie snuck out to the shed without him. They seemed full of secrets tonight. The only secret he had was one he wished he didn't.

Rallie opened the creaky old door and went inside. He followed nervously.

'So, are you going to tell me what's going on?' Noah asked, sitting down across from Harper. The wood planks were cold under his pajama pants, and he shifted, trying to get comfortable.

Harper sat down on the splintery floor, cross-legged, setting the flashlight against her sneakers, so it lit her face. Then she unhooked her backpack from one shoulder, pulling it around onto her lap.

She unzipped her bag. 'You're going to laugh,' she said. 'But you shouldn't.'

He tried to suppress a shudder. Ghosts weren't something you talked about in an abandoned shed at night. 'You're just trying to freak me out. This is some kind of stupid—'

He glanced over at Rallie. She was leaning against one wall of the shed. 'Harper saw a ghost,' she said.

Harper carefully took the bone china dollie from her backpack. Noah drew in his breath and went silent. The Princess's dull black eyes were open, her gaze boring into his own. He'd always thought she was creepy-looking, but in the reflected beam of the flashlight, she seemed demonic.

'The Princess,' Noah said unsteadily, forcing a sneer into his voice to cover his rising fear. 'So what? You brought me all the way out here to see a dollie?'

Harper touched the doll's face. It was pure white, like a dinner plate. Hair, dry as brush bristles, was threaded into her scalp, and her cheeks and lips were rouged a faint pink. When she was tilted onto her back, her eyes stayed open instead of closing the way they should have, as though she was still watching Noah. There was a tear at the shoulder of her thin, brittle gown and tiny pinholes through the discolored fabric. It hadn't aged as well as the rest of the dollie-and the ride in Harper's backpack probably hadn't helped.

'Just listen,' Rallie said. 'Try not to be the huge jerk you've turned into.'

'I know you told us you weren't going to come over the other day, but I thought you might anyway,' Harper said, talking fast. 'And I couldn't just go in the cabinet and get the Princess if Mom was there.'

Rallie never said stuff like that, especially not to him. It stung.

So, I took the dollie out of the case that night when we had the argument and moved around some of Mom's other stuff to hide what I'd done. But that night-well, I saw the dead girl.'

'You mean you had a nightmare,' Noah said.

'Just shut up a minute,' said Rallie.

It reminded Noah of the way Harper talked when she played villains or even the Princess herself. 'It wasn't like dreaming at all. She was sitting on the end of my bed. Her hair was blond, like the dollies, but it was tangled and dirty. She was wearing a nightdress smeared with mud. She told me I had to bury her. She said she couldn't rest until her bones were in her own grave, and if I didn't help her, she would make me sorry.' 'It wasn't like a regular dream,' Harper said, her fingers smoothing back the Princess's curls and her voice changing, going soft and chill as the night air.

Rallie shifted uncomfortably. Noah was silent for a long moment, arrested by the images Harper had conjured. He could almost see the girl in her stained nightgown.

Harper paused, as though she was expecting him to say something sarcastic.

'Her bones?' he finally echoed.

'Did you know that bone china has real bones in it?' Harper said, tapping a porcelain cheek. 'Her clay was made from human bones. Little-girl bones. That hair threaded through the scalp is the little girl's hair. And the body of the dollie is filled with her leftover ashes.'

What's the punch line? Did one of you rig a sheet outside to flutter from a tree or something?

A shiver ran up his spine. He closed his eyes to keep from looking at the dollie in Harper's lap. 'Okay, this is your idea of a funny prank. I get it. You're mad at me for not playing the game anymore, so you made up this story to scare me.

'I told you,' Rallie said to Harper, under her breath.

'No, idiot,' said Rallie. 'I told her that you wouldn't believe us and that you wouldn't want to help.'

'You really did rig a sheet?' Noah frowned, looking out at the trees and the mounds of cans and metal.

He threw up his hands in confusion. 'Help with what? Help you bury a dollie? Why would you need to wake me up in the middle of the night to help you do that?'

Harper pulled the dollie to her chest, and one of the eyes closed and opened, as though it was winking at him. 'Skylar Stella is real. That's the dollie-girl's name. She told me about herself. Her father was some kind of worker for a china manufacturer, designing and decorating pottery, and when Skylar died, her dad went totally crazy. He couldn't bear to put her in the ground, so he took her body back to the kilns at his job, chopped her up, and cremated her. 'She told you that?' It was too easy to imagine the dollie moving on her own, fluttering her painted eyelids and turning toward him. Maybe opening her tiny rosebud of a mouth to scream. He ground up to her burnt bones and used them to make a batch of bone china, then poured it into a mold cast from one of Skylar's favorite dollies. So, her grave stayed empty.' Noah tried to swallow, although his throat suddenly felt very dry.

'She's not going to rest until we bury her. And she's not going to let us rest either. She promised to make us miserable unless we help her.' 'Each night she told me a little bit more of her story.' Illuminated by the flashlight, Harper's face had become strange.

And I'm still not totally sure, but show him the thing. It's pretty convincing.' He looked at Rallie. 'And you believe it? You believe all of this?' 'I never believed in ghosts, so not at first,' Rallie said. 'No offense, Harper, but it's a crazy story.'

'Show me what?'

Harper pulled the dollie's head sharply up from the body. Noah gasped at the sudden violence of it, but all that it revealed was a string-and-rusty-metal-hook apparatus. With a twist, the Princess's head came entirely off, leaving the hook still attached to the neck, hanging from the cord. Harper slid her fingers into the body of the dollie, feeling around like she was trying to reach something.

Harper drew out an old burlap bag from the neck cavity. 'Here, take this and look inside.' 'What are you doing?' He stared at the disembodied head resting on Harper's knee. The eyes were closed now. The bag was full, but Noah couldn't tell what it was full of. He took the rough cloth as she turned the beam of the flashlight on it, revealing letters and dates in blocky print.

'Eaton?' he read out loud. He had a vague memory of the place from some late-night British rock documentary his mom had been watching. 'That's where the Beatles are from-in Eaton. There's no way we can go there. I guess we're going to have to find out if ghost girls really can curse people, because-'

So, we could get on a bus and be there by morning.' She paused. 'And we are. We're going. Tonight. Well, technically, it's morning, so we're going in the morning.' 'That's what I thought at first,' Rallie said and pointed to the markings. 'But look again. It says, East Eaton. In Ohio.'

He looked from the dollie to Rallie and then to Harper. 'This is why you brought me out here?'

'We tried to explain yesterday,' Rallie said. 'I told you it was important.'

Harper reached down and turned the flashlight beam on her watch, then shone it at him. 'There's a bus stopping in town at two fifteen in the morning. It's coming from Philadelphia and going to Youngstown. One of the stops is East Eaton. Rallie said she'd come if you would too.'

Was she trying to play a different kind of game? A game that she was making out of their real lives? But Harper didn't look gleeful, the way she did when she had a thrilling idea. She looked pale and nervous like she hadn't been sleeping well. Noah thought about the ghost story that Harper had told on their last walk home, the one about holding your breath when you passed a cemetery.

Rallie shrugged.

'You'll really go?' he asked finally, looking at Rallie. Her grandmother wouldn't like a single thing about this: not the ghost, not the bus, definitely not Rallie being out at two in the morning with a boy-even if the boy was just him.

Noah's parents wouldn't like him going either, but that was a point in favor of the plan, as far as he was concerned. And if he decided that he never wanted to come back, well, at least he'd have some company while he figured out where he was going. In real life, he wasn't sure there were any equivalent jobs. In stories, orphan boys became assistant pig keepers and magician's apprentices.

'You still haven't looked in the bag,' Rallie said, pointing to the burlap sack he was holding. 'It's pretty weird.'

Harper handed Rallie the flashlight. She held it up high, pointing it down at him. With trepidation, he pulled the drawstrings so that he could peer inside.

Of course. The leftover ashes. The remains of a ghost. Of a girl. Of the Princess.

For a moment, Noah didn't know what he was seeing. The bag seemed to be full of something that looked a little bit like dark sand with chunks of shells in it. Then he realized that the bag was full of gray ash, and what he'd thought were shells were actually sharp, pale pieces of bone.

A nameless primal terror washed over him. He wanted to drop the bag, wanted to race out of the shed and go back to bed where he could shiver under his own covers. But he didn't move. His hands started to shake, and he drew the strings tight so he didn't have to look anymore.

Despite her words, Rallie's voice grew a little uncertain. Noah wondered if she'd balked at first before she'd apparently promised Harper that if he went, she would go too.

'Harper thinks we can catch a bus back in the afternoon and be home by dinnertime. It's only a three-hour ride, but there aren't a lot of buses from here to there-just this one early in the morning, and another in the afternoon that gets in too late for us to ride back in time. We left a note for her parents.'

'If these bones are real,' he began, 'shouldn't we tell someone? A girl died. Maybe Skylar's father murdered her. Maybe it's some kind of cold-case file.'

'No one's going to care about some old story,' Harper said. 'And even if they did, they'd just take the dollie away from us-put her in a museum or display her somewhere-and then her spirit would be angry.'

He paused, considering everything she'd said and also what she hadn't said. 'Did you find the ashes before or after you dreamed about Skylar Stella?'

'I'm going whether you both come or not,' Harper said, snatching the burlap bag out of his hand. He guessed that meant she'd found the ashes first. 'Whether you believe me or not, I'm going to bury her as she wants.'

Getting on a bus in the middle of the night to a place they'd never been was daunting. It also seemed a little bit like an adventure.

'Okay,' he said. 'Fine. I'll come.'

Rallie looked at him in wide-eyed surprise. He wondered for the first time if she'd been planning on him saying no and hadn't considered the possibility that he'd say yes. If so, she probably should have told him.

Okay? No more hassling me about it.'

'I'll come,' he continued, 'so long as you both promise not to ask me about the game or why I don't want to play. 'Okay,' said Harper.

'Okay,' said Noah.

'Okay,' said Rallie.

'You need to get ready fast,' Harper said. 'And leave a note so your parents don't freak out. Just tell them you got up early and that you'll be back tonight.'

'Yes,' Harper said. 'I planned it all out. Just bring food and supplies, okay, Noah? We'll meet at the mailbox in twenty minutes.'

'And you're sure the bus will get us back in time?' Rallie asked. 'You're positive?'

She switched off the flashlight and, for a moment, the shed was plunged into darkness.

By the time they did, Harper had put away the Princess, so at least her terrible head with its winking eye was hidden. Noah blinked, willing his eyes to adjust.

There was a kind of quiet that hung over the world in the middle of the night, as though there was no one else awake anywhere. It felt ripe with magic and endless possibility. Noah walked home through the hushed streets, his sneakers wet with dew from the frosted grass.

He did find a can of orange soda, a package of saltine crackers, three oranges, red Twizzlers, and a jar of peanut butter, all of which he stuffed into his backpack.

His mother didn't have either of those things nor did she have elven limbs, which had kept Joseph and Samantha from starving on the way to Mount Doom and always made him think of matzoth (which his mom also didn't have).

He snuck back into his house and stood for a long moment in the dark kitchen, a feeling of great daring swelling his heart. When he finally went to the cabinets, he felt as though he was provisioning himself for one of those epic fantasy quests-the kind that required a lot of jerky or something called hardtack that he'd read about soldiers eating during the Civil War and which he thought might be a kind of bread.

In his room, Noah changed into jeans, switched out his sweater for a zip-up sweatshirt, and packed a few other random things he thought he might need: twenty-three dollars (twenty of which had come from his aunt in a card for his birthday), a book identifying poisonous plants (in case they needed to live in the wild and eat berries, which admittedly seemed like a remote possibility), and a sleeping bag that was a little too small for him but worked okay as a blanket when completely unzipped. In the hall closet, he found a flashlight, and he picked up a garden spade from beside the back door.

Before he left, he wrote out the note and propped it up on his bed. It read:

Got up early. Gone to play basketball. Might not be back for dinner.

Might not be back forever, he thought but didn't write.

As he left the house, closing the door quietly behind him, he wondered, for a moment, again, if this was a trick. A lie. Harper's attempt at one last game.

Nonetheless, the ashes had seemed real, he reminded himself.

In the end, he wasn't sure if he went because he half believed in the ghost already or because he was used to following Harper's lead in a story or simply because leaving allowed him to run away and still believe he could come back.

If he wanted.

CHAPTER SIX

Noah's mother's parents, now living permanently in Florida, would tell stories about how things used to be. About how the big Victorian houses-the ones built by some famous architect, the ones that were in the center of town used to be owned by single families and not divided into run-down apartments.

NOAH WAS USED TO STORIES WITHOUT HAPPY Endings. His dad called where they lived West of Nowhere, Pennsylvania, claiming it bordered Better Off Forgotten, West Virginia, and Already Forgotten, Ohio. When Noah was little, those had seemed like magical place names, before he realized they were just sarcasm. Noah's mother had gone to school to be an art therapist, but the only place she could get work was in a juvenile detention center. If she wanted the kids there to do art, she had to bring the supplies and collect them after each session because her supervisor was afraid of the kids jabbing each other's eyes out with markers.

His grandmother told stories about the people she'd known when she was a little girl, people who got out of town and made it elsewhere. The happiest the stories got was when his parents talked about how things were going to get better, although neither one of them really seemed to believe it, and Noah didn't believe it anymore either.

That was all. It was as if the town had some kind of gravitational influence on the people who lived there. But even as Noah thought that he knew it was just another story. Dad was back because he hadn't been able to hack it in the city.

When Noah's dad left three years ago, he said he was going to run his own restaurant in Philadelphia and he was going to Italy to study how pasta was really made and he was getting a late-night spot on a local cable channel and would parlay that into a fortune. But two months later, he moved back and into one of the crappy apartments in the biggest and worst-kept Victorian and drifted in and out of Noah's life, until he finally drifted back to their house.

He wondered whether growing up was learning that most stories turned out to be lies.

Rallie was in a big shapeless red coat. Both of them had backpacks slung over their shoulders. The bus stop was cold enough that Noah's breath clouded in the air. The wind had picked up. It washed over them as they huddled together against the brick exterior of the post office. In the flickering streetlight, Noah could see the girls better. Harper had pulled back her coppery hair into a ponytail and was wearing a dark-green sweater with jeans and tall brown boots.

He felt his gaze going to Harper's backpack, knowing the Princess was inside and knowing, without knowing how he knew, that her eyes were open. He felt the weight of her stare on his back when he turned away. The hairs on the back of his neck stuck up, tickling his skin and making him shiver.

A while back they'd seen a police car from a way off and had pressed themselves against the wall of the building. As they hid, Harper muttered the whole time about the vividness of Rallie's coat giving them away and Rallie muttered back about how she'd just packed for a sleepover because she hadn't thought they were taking off somewhere harebrained that very night. But the police car had turned onto Main Street and away from them. And the next car that passed was a truck. It didn't even slow.

The bus was already fifteen minutes late, and there was no sign of it or any other vehicle on the road.

Rallie yawned. 'Maybe we should go back. It doesn't look like the bus is coming.'

Noah, impelled by the impulse that makes yawns catch, yawned too.

'Stop,' Harper said. 'We just have to wait a little longer.'

'You can't be mad at us for being tired,' Noah said.

Harper was clearly still upset, but she didn't argue with him. 'We'll sleep on the bus.'

Rallie bit her lip and looked hopefully at the stretch of empty road. She looked happier the longer they waited. Noah was pretty sure she was betting on the bus not coming and the three of them going back to their beds, having had a nice little middle-of-the-night adventure. He could tell Rallie didn't want to be the one who chickened out, but she obviously also didn't want to go. If Rallie's grandmother found out about any of this, there would be no more play practice, no more sleepovers, no more chance of hanging out with Noah or Harper. Ever.

Noah understood all that and he felt bad for her, but not bad enough to say anything. Selfishly, he wanted her along.

'Two more minutes,' said Rallie, 'and then we go back. I'm freezing.'

Harper didn't reply.

Looking at the bus stop sign, Noah thought about what it would be like to get off at a place like this in a different town, one he had no idea how to navigate. 'When we get to East Eaton, you know where we're supposed to go, right? What cemetery Skylar is supposed to be buried in and how to find the grave. You know all that, right?'

'One minute, fifty-nine seconds,' Rallie said. 'One minute, fifty-eight seconds.'

Harper opened her mouth and hesitated over the answer. Just then a bus turned the corner three blocks away, washing them with its headlights. He didn't realize how worried Harper had been that it wasn't coming until he saw how relieved she looked as the bus drew closer. Rallie's face froze in an expression of dread.

'No,' she said, looking back down the street, away from the bus, and sighing. 'It's not that. I'm just tired. Anyway, if I snuck back into my house when I'm supposed to be sleeping at Harper's, Grandma would have a lot of questions.'

'You don't have to go,' he whispered to her, deciding he could be only so much of a jerk.

Somehow the parent who was giving them a ride didn't come on time, or maybe it took too long to drop everybody off, but Rallie wound up home a half-hour late. That was all it took. Boom. She was in mega-trouble. No phone calls. No Internet. No nothing.

The last time Rallie had gotten busted for staying out after curfew, she'd get grounded for a solid month. She'd been to the movie version of one of her favorite musicals, along with some of her theater the door opened with a creak of gears. An old man with a short white beard looked down at them. A small gold hoop hung from one of his ears, and he had a face that reminded Noah of a gruff and unfriendly wizard. 'Well, get on if you're getting on.' friends and Harper.

So even though he knew that she wasn't telling the whole truth about wanting to go, given that she was likely to get in trouble, either way, he figured she might as well have an adventure and hope for the best.

Harper, Noah, and Rallie climbed the steps, each feeding cash into a machine beside the driver. It printed three tickets and dispensed change into a bowl with a clatter. Noah shuffled down the aisle, past a knitting woman and three college-age guys asleep in their seats, past a guy muttering to himself and looking out the window.

Noah went all the way to the back of the bus, following Harper. They sat in the long last seat. A moment later Rallie joined them, squeezing in next to the window.

Noah looked at Harper's backpack resting on the floor and wondered whether Harper had reattached the Princess's head or whether it would roll around in the bottom of her bag when the bus turned corners. He thought he could see a few threads of her blond hair peeking out from where the zipper wasn't fully closed.

'See,' Harper said, pulling her legs up so that she was sitting on her feet in a weird yoga pose. 'Everything's going according to plan.'

'I can't believe the bus actually came,' Rallie said faintly.

The bus lurched forward, pulling away from the bus stop, and despite everything, Noah started to grin.

'You never really answered me before,' Noah said. 'Do you know where the cemetery is? Do you know where we're going, Harper?'

They were left home by themselves-going on a real adventure, the kind that changed you. He felt a thrill run through him.

'The grave is under a willow tree. Skylar will tell us the rest.'

'Skylar will tell us?' He asked in a quiet, urgent voice.

'She told me this much, didn't she?' Harper answered, and then in that way she had, where Noah was sure she wasn't right yet somehow, she seemed right, she added neatly and unanswerable, 'If you didn't believe me, why did you come?'

Rallie leaned against the window and pulled her legs up onto the seat, resting one shoe against Noah's leg. She looked exhausted, but no longer unhappy. 'I'm going to try to sleep.' Exasperated, he mimed banging his head against the back of the seat. Harper ignored him.

He rested a hand on her ankle so it wouldn't slip.

'We should take shifts,' Harper said. 'Keep watch. Like you're supposed to on a quest. So, we don't miss our stop.'

'Okay,' Noah said, sticking out a fisted hand. 'Rock, paper, scissors.'

She still beat him, throwing a rock to his scissors. He stuck with scissors and tricked Harper, who threw paper, expecting him to change moves. And then Rallie beat Harper, sticking Harper with first watch, Noah with second, and Rallie, third. Noah rested his head against his own backpack and closed his eyes.

Rallie held out her hand and blinked muzzily like she was trying to stay awake.

He didn't think he'd be able to go to sleep, but he must have dozed off because it seemed like moments later, he awoke to Harper's sharp yelp.

He sat up. The old guy who'd been talking to himself had moved to the seat in front of them. He was leaning close to Harper and just letting go of a strand of her hair.

'I was just kidding you. Come on, you're a cute little thing. Ain't you used to be teased?' His bad breath washed over Noah, bringing with it a molding smell, like wet clothes left in the washing machine overnight and sneakers after a long game. His hair was wild tangled curls, shot through with gray, and he had a scraggly beard hiding half of his windblown face. Nicotine stains darkened the ends of his pale fingers. 'That your brother? Don't he tease you?'

'Yes, he's my brother,' Harper lied quickly. 'And he doesn't like it if I talk to strangers.'

He sounded teasing all right but in a bad way. A scary way. 'That bus driver-you can't trust him. He's senile as a moose. And sometimes he gets aliens in him.'

He cackled, revealing a black gap where a few bottom teeth should have been. He turned his attention to Noah. 'I was just telling your smart-mouth little sister here that you can't be sure this bus is going to take you where you want to go.'

Rallie shifted and opened her eyes, blinking away dreams. When she saw the old guy, her eyes went wide and she grabbed her bag. 'What's going on?'

His father would say that as the boy, it was his responsibility to protect the girls. That made him even more scared because he was afraid, he'd let them down. 'Thanks for the advice.'

'Okay,' Noah told the man, leaning forward, trying to get between him and Harper.

The old guy's grin widened. 'Oh, the little man is going to give Kanth Jones the brush-off. Do you want to fight? Do you want to show off for the girls? And who is that one over there? She's no sister of yours. Just what is it that you three are doing, anyway? Running off from home?' Rallie leaned forward. 'We're not doing anything.'

'Look, we appreciate you coming over and talking with us,' Harper said placatingly. 'But if that's all-'

'Crazy as anything. Sometimes he gets a little lost. Sometimes he just parks and gets out of the bus, wanders around for a while. And sometimes he has meetings with them-them things. In their shiny spaceship. You can see the lights. Just leaves us out here for as long as it takes him to communicate.'

'Senile as all get out.' Kanth tapped his head and made a swirly motion with his finger, returning to what seemed to be his favorite subject-the bus driver.

Rallie elbowed Noah and raised her eyebrows, eyes wide.

'Okay,' Harper said. 'We'll watch out for that.'

'You've got really pretty hair too,' Kanth Jones said, turning to Rallie with a sly grin. His fingers darted out to tug at one of her braids. 'Like little ropes.'

Rallie jerked back.

'Don't touch her,' Noah said.

'Oh, possessive, huh? Well then, what if I talk to your sister and leave the two of you alone?' Kanth grabbed Harper's arm. She pushed herself back against the cushion and out of the range of his hand before he could touch her.

Well, I'm not going to talk to the blonde, so you better forget that idea. I don't like the way she's looking at me. She's going to tell you that she'd never hurt anybody, but don't you listen. She'd hurt you, all right. She'd hurt you and she'd like it.' The man laughed. 'You all are really jumpy; you know that? Real paranoid.'

'Hey!' Noah said.

None of them were blond. In fact, as far as Noah could tell, no one on the bus was blond. He wondered what it was like to be so crazy that you actually saw things that weren't there. He wondered if when you hallucinated, the stuff you were imagining was just as clear as the regular stuff, or if it was hazy at the edges so that if you really concentrated, you could tell.

'It's time for you to sit somewhere else,' Rallie told him, drawing herself up impressively as she did on stage at the school play. 'I might not look like it, but I am their sister. I'm adopted. And I don't want you to talk to my brother like that anymore.'

'Aw, C'mon,' he said, reaching into his front breast pocket and coming out with a small paper bag-wrapped bottle. 'I have a black belt. You'll need me when the aliens come.'

'You wait and see. Those drivers going to roll on out of this bus and leave all of us alone, and when he comes back, he's going to have a new face. The aliens ride around in his skin. So, when he does that, who are you going to tell?'

The bus turned a corner and started to slow. There was a brightly lit bus station up the road. Noah let out a sigh of relief.

The rest of the bus was quiet and dark, the only lights in two strips down the center aisle and near the front, where the knitting Girl sat. It seemed like a vast distance. There was only the click of her needles and the sound of the man's voice.

In just a couple of minutes, they would be able to get off the bus, but what then? It was too soon for this to be East Eaton. This was just a random stop in a random town they didn't know.

'You be careful,' Kanth Jones said, looking right at Noah. 'You better not let them get taken. That's your job as a brother. You the man in the family, and you got to fight to make sure the aliens don't steal their faces. Aliens like red hair. They take you down in the diamond ghost caves and you never come out again.'

'But aliens don't live underground,' Rallie said, completely incapable of not pointing out when something didn't make sense. 'They live in the sky. In spaceships.'

The bus stopped, its engine grinding. The door opened and the overhead lights came on, making Kanth's skin look sallow. He took a swig from the paper-bag-covered bottle. Then he stood up.

Noah widened his eyes, trying to signal her not to say anything that would agitate Kanth Jones.

They looked at one another.

Shows what you know. No, the safest thing is for you all to stay right here on the bus.'

'I've got to use the bathroom,' Noah said.

'What if we need to protect him?' Rallie asked, standing up.

'Then you go,' Kanth Jones said. 'I'll protect these ladies and make sure you got the same face you left with.'

Kanth Jones shook his head. 'You can't go where he's going.'

And if he took this route, he must have harassed passengers before. The bus driver would come back, say a few things, and Kanth Jones would go back to his seat. Everything would work out.

For a horrible moment, Noah worried that Kanth Jones was going to block the aisle and make it impossible for them to exit. But then the bus driver stood up and turned his head toward them. Noah let out a sigh of relief.

If Kanth Jones knew the driver well enough to complain about him constantly stopping for aliens, he must take this route a lot.

But the driver just took a long look at Noah, Harper, and Rallie and got off the bus. He didn't say or do a single thing to help them.

Kanth Jones wore a smirk on his face as he'd known all along he wasn't going to get in trouble.

Kanth Jones grabbed for Rallie, and she gave a single, blood-curdling shriek, loud enough for the frat boys to wake up and the knitting Girl to turn around in her seat. Loud enough for Kanth to let Rallie go in surprise.

Harper shoved past him with a suddenness that got her through before he could react. While Kanth Jones gaped at her, Noah charged down the aisle, catching Rallie's hand and pulling her with him.

'Don't come crying to me when the aliens take your faces!' he yelled after them.

There were benches and vending machines and bright fluorescent lights. Rallie collapsed onto a bench, her eyes a little wet. She looked as freaked out as Noah felt.

The bus driver was smoking a cigarette, talking to two station employees, when they charged past him and into the building.

'This was your plan,' Noah said, and then regretted it. He knew he wasn't being fair, but he was tired and upset and had no idea what to do himself. He felt useless. Noah took Harper's arm. 'Right now. Come. Go.'

'What are we going to do?' Harper asked, pacing back and forth, backpack over one shoulder.

'We can't get back on that bus,' said Rallie.

'Maybe we could tell someone-like a cop. There has to be a cop around a late-night bus station, right?'

Noah looked over at the bus driver. One station employee was speaking into a walkie-talkie. The other was watching the three of them.

'Yeah, and they'll ask us how old we are.' Rallie shook her head. 'And call our families. No.'

'I think we have to get out of here,' Noah said.

'Why?' asked Rallie. Then she noticed the three men standing together and got up quickly, swinging her bag onto her shoulder.

'But we didn't do anything,' Harper said, walking along with him. 'Why would they be after us? Why not do something about that guy? He's the one-'

'Because we're kids,' Noah whispered, cutting her off.

'We're being too obvious,' Rallie said under her breath. 'Harper, we should go into the girls' room and sneak out from there. Noah, meet us outside. Get something from the vending machine.'

Everyone, go slow.'

Noah took a deep breath and then spoke loudly and as casually as he could, 'I'll meet you guys back on the bus.'

Rallie smiled and nodded exaggeratedly, playing casual too now. Harper tried to follow her lead.

One of the bus station employees had peeled away from the others and was heading in Noah's direction, his shoe falls echoing in the mostly empty space. He wasn't rushing, but he had too much purpose in the way he moved to be just strolling. Noah started toward the door, deliberately not running despite wanting to. He paused a minute to look at the vending machine. In its reflection, he saw the station guy drawing closer, his Jon uniform making him seem ominously authoritative.

Noah moved toward the door.

'Hey you, there,' the station guy called to him.

But Noah was out through the doors and turning a corner of the building and seeing Rallie lowering herself from the girls' bathroom window. Harper jumped out after her and they were off and running into the darkness of an unknown town.

CHAPTER SEVEN

'Where are we?' Rallie asked finally, her breath clouding in the air.

All the adrenaline Noah had felt back in the station burned off of him, and he felt tired down to the marrow of his bones. Eye-droopingly exhausted. He leaned against the brick wall and wondered if it was possible to fall asleep standing up.

'And how are you going to get out of here?' asked Noah, pushing off from the wall. 'We don't even know what town we're in.'

THEY HUDDLED IN THE DARK BEHIND A TATTOO PARLOR and watched as the bus pulled out of the station in a cloud of exhaust, taking with it both the crazy guy and their chances of getting to East Eaton by morning.

Harper followed. 'There are only two buses to East Eaton that take this route, and if we wait to take the next one-in the afternoon-then we won't have enough time to take the bus back by tonight.'

'Forget East Eaton. We've got to get home,' Rallie said, digging out the cell phone that she was only allowed to use for emergencies.

'Sure,' Noah said. 'But we can't do that, either, can we?'

Rallie took the bus schedule and opened it, studying the names of stations as though she were going to be able to figure out where they were just by finding a name that struck her as feeling like the right one.

'Hold on,' Noah said, walking the other way down the alley so that he could see the front of the bus station. He walked back again. 'East Rochester. There's a sign that says so-but where is that?'

Harper pulled the bus schedule from one of her pockets, along with a raggedy map. 'You can look at this stuff if you want, but it's not going to tell you anything I haven't already told you.'

Harper crowded next to Rallie, so they were squinting together at the schedule in the dim moonlight. 'There were only two more stops before East Eaton,' Harper said finally. 'We almost made it.'

'We're not even out of Pennsylvania yet,' said Rallie. 'We didn't almost make anything.'

Rallie pulled her coat more tightly around her, sitting down on the back steps of a building. Dumpsters loomed to one side of her. 'Can you call Tom and see if he'll pick us up?' Her voice sounded on the verge of panic. Calm, but not likely to stay that way.

Harper unfolded the map and tapped it grandly. 'Look, that says Ohio.' Then she shook her head. 'Oh, it says Ohio River.'

Harper just looked at her. 'My brother will never come all the way here. Not in that junker car of his.'

Harper shook her head. 'She broke her phone and hasn't gotten a new one yet. I couldn't get ahold of her if I wanted to.'

'Your sister, then?' Rallie asked, chewing on the end of one of her braids.

Rallie looked at the face of her phone, frowning. 'I guess I could call my aunt Linda. She'd be mad, but she'd come.'

'Would she tell your grandmother?' Noah asked.

Noah tried to imagine a single thing they could tell Rallie's grandmother to try and make sense of what they'd done. She wouldn't want to hear about a creepy, possibly-still-headless dollie, a ghost, and a curse that, more likely than not, didn't even exist.

Rallie sighed heavily, a little shudder going across her shoulders. 'Probably. And then I'll get grounded forever and have to quit the play and be totally miserable. But what else are we going to do?'

'I won't go back,' Harper said, sitting on the steps next to Rallie. 'I'm going to wait for the next bus and keep going.'

'But you said that the next bus wasn't coming until the afternoon, so you won't make it home before Sunday,' Rallie said. 'Where would you sleep?'

Harper took a deep but unsteady breath. Noah could see that the idea of Rallie leaving her made Harper feel a lot less daring. He didn't want Rallie to go either; she was good at making crazy ideas actually work. If Rallie is right. We can bury the Princess next weekend or the weekend after that,' Noah said. 'What's the difference?'

Harper came up with the idea that they needed an ancient temple under the waves, Rallie was the one who would actually find the discarded chunks of concrete to build it. Her going home would pretty much signal that they were doing something dumb.

You guys will make excuses and I'll chicken out and Skylar will find someone else to haunt because I won't be interesting enough to have a ghost talk to me. I don't deserve to be the hero of a story, and I won't be one.'

Harper's shoulders hunched forward as she got tenser. 'If we don't keep going now, we'll never do it. We just won't.

'Everyone has a story,' Rallie murmured. 'Everyone's the hero of their story. That's what Ms. Evans said in English.'

'No,' Harper said, her low voice very fierce. 'There are people who do things and people who never do-who say they will someday, but they just don't. I want to go on a quest. I've always wanted to go on a quest. And now that I have one, I'm not backing down from it. I'm not going home until it's complete.'

And he decided that even if it was dumb, he wanted to be the kind of person who was interesting enough to have a ghost talk to him. Even if the idea of the Princess being made of bones and filled with human ash grew more frightening the farther, they got from home. Noah thought she might be right. He thought of his dad, who wanted to do things and then didn't.

Rallie laughed a little, uncomfortably, like what Harper said about being a hero had hit a little close to home for her, too.

Leaving in the middle of the night and escaping from the bus station already seemed like the kinds of things that happened on quests, so from that perspective, they were doing really well. And thinking that made his tired brain slip into playing mode, which led to thinking like Tommesings.

'What if we don't go back right away?' he asked suddenly. 'If we don't call anyone, we don't get in trouble, right? No one will know what happened. So, if you take the bus back tonight-not the one to East Eaton, the one back home-then your grandmother will never know anything. Or maybe we could even make it to East Eaton and take the bus back from there. There's got to be a way for us to get there-we could walk if we have to. It can't be that many miles up the river. And the quest would be completed, despite some slight setbacks.'

'In the dark?' Rallie asked.

'We might as well try,' Harper said, brightening. 'And you don't want to get in trouble, right?'

'I'm tired and it's the middle of the night,' said Rallie. 'I don't feel like trying to follow some stupid map with a dying flashlight and the compass on my phone.'

The North Star was the brightest of the Little Dipper stars and the one at the very end of the Little Dipper's handle. Noah thought about Tommy sings the Blade, steering his ship by the North Star, and blinked up into the night sky. You were supposed to be able to find it by looking for the Big Dipper and then use that to find the Little Dipper.

That's the Polaris, he thought. If we can see that, we can't get lost.

'We'll find our way.' When he spoke, he could feel Tommesings's voice creeping into his own voice, which was strange because Tommesings was gone. 'And figure out a place to make camp.'

'Make camp?' Harper asked.

Heck, he liked trouble. 'We'll eat the provisions we brought. Look, even according to the tiny map on the bus schedule, if we just follow the river, it should take us to East Eaton. Our quest could still be completed.' 'Until the break of day.' Maybe it was exhaustion, but it wasn't that hard to think of what Tommesings would say. Tommy sings always got into scrapes, so they didn't bother him.

'You want us to walk?' Rallie said. 'Both of you have gone crazy.'

'My Girl, I want us to rest,' Noah replied, offering her his arm. For once, he didn't feel uncertain. 'I want us to take our meager supplies and turn them into a feast. She laughed tiredly and looped her arm with his. 'Fine. But I am going to want to go home upon the morrow, so plan on that happening.'

I want us to make a fire and warm our bones. Then, in the morning, we can decide what to do from there. Should you, fair maid, wish to return home upon the morrow, then we shall entertain your arguments.'

'See, you missed the game.' Harper's mouth lifted in a triumphant smile. 'You missed us playing. Admit it.'

Harper took a step back. Noah stopped abruptly, whirling on her, the spell broken. 'I told you not to talk about that, and you said you wouldn't.' His voice came out harsher than he'd intended, almost a growl.

'Okay,' Rallie said, grabbing his shoulder and propelling him down the alley. 'So long as we're not freezing, I won't call home. If we can make camp, get warm, and sleep for a while, then let's do that and try not to get in more trouble than we're already in.'

'Girl Jann would be good at surviving on the streets,' Harper said innocently.

Noah glared.

'What? I was talking to Rallie, not you. I'm allowed to talk to Rallie about the game, aren't I? You didn't make any rules about that.'

'We should keep off big roads,' Noah warned, pointing toward a narrow street up ahead. 'If someone sees us with the map and the flashlight, they're going to guess we're lost kids or runaways or something. We already had those people at the bus station after us.'

Rallie sighed. 'I don't even know what you two are fighting about. You both want to stay on this crazy adventure, and that's what we're doing.'

'We still don't know if they were really chasing us,' Harper said. 'Maybe they wanted to apologize about the crazy guy. Maybe they were afraid we were going to miss the bus. Or maybe they were aliens trying to take our faces.'

Noah raised his eyebrows and started walking.

'Oh fine, yeah, let's use the dark scary road,' Rallie said, but she followed him anyway. 'Let me see the map.'

Harper handed it over along with the flashlight. There was a strange quiet in the air, as though everyone and everything was asleep. The echo of their footsteps was the loudest sound for several blocks. It felt both eerie and kind of exciting to Noah. It seemed to him that the whole world had become theirs for a little while.

The asphalt of the alley was cracked, and they had to be careful not to stumble as they headed down it, passing heaped mounds of garbage and the back doors of restaurants.

'There's a stretch of woods,' Rallie said, waving the map. 'Close to the water. We'd have to cross the highway to get there, but we're not too far.'

'Is it a lot of woods?'

'Not really. But it's a park. Like a small, protected-area park looking out on the water, not a kid park with swings. Too small for a fire to be hidden, but probably big enough that we're not going to be seen from the road.'

Noah nodded and let her direct them. He didn't know how to make a fire anyway. It had just seemed like something that you did when you made camp, along with making stews and playing lutes and swigging from jugs of cider.

They passed a supermarket with trucks pulled up to the back-unloading flats of cardboard boxes. They passed a donut shop, closed, but with a light on inside. It gave off a warm waft of fresh dough and melting sugar. Noah's stomach growled, and he fished a Twizzler out of the pack. In comparison to the delicious smell, the candy tasted like sweet rubber.

'This was such a terrible idea,' Rallie muttered as they walked. 'How did you convince me this was a good idea? This was a terrible, terrible, terrible idea.'

He dug around and took out enough to give Rallie and Harper a couple of Twizzlers each, in case they were hungry too.

'Thank you, kind sir,' said Harper, with a little bow.

Harper looked crestfallen, which was stupid because she'd been needling him a minute ago about playing. He didn't know why she was upset over something she started. If she hadn't pointed out that he was playing, he wouldn't have had to stop.

'I am not doing that with you,' Noah said, biting the Twizzler savagely.

'Will you two quit it?' Rallie said, aiming the beam of the flashlight at the sidewalk. She had the red candy hanging out of one side of her mouth and was chomping on it like it was a cartoon cigar.

Noah started to say something about how it was her fault that they were tired when he realized saying that might actually prove her point that he was cranky.

Harper looked at her feet. 'We're cranky because we're tired, that's all.'

The highway was a long stretch of lanes, with an even wider overpass, but at half-past four in the morning, they saw only a single truck, headlights lighting up the street so brightly that it almost seemed like a day.

Once it zoomed by, Polly and Rallie held hands and raced for the median. They climbed the concrete block quickly; Noah's long legs made it easy for him to hop over. Then they ran across the lanes on the other side, even though there were no cars coming from either direction.

They could still see the lights of East Rochester on one side and could just glimpse the glimmering, rippling surface of the Ohio River stretching out on the other. But after a few minutes of walking, Noah felt pretty hidden from the road. The edge of the woods was scrubby and sloped down at a steep angle. They tripped over sticks and uneven patches of earth. Long roping tendrils of bushes scraped at their legs.

CHAPTER EIGHT

'Well, THIS IS IT,' RALLIE SAID, SHADING THE Flashlight with her hand. 'You really think we can sleep out here?'

Noah knelt down. The ground was wet-the kind of wet that seeps up and soaks through clothes. He leaned against a tree, and despair washed over him. He liked the idea of an adventure-but what did he really know about having one? He wasn't used to roughing it. He wasn't used to bugs and dirt and all the stuff soldiers and pirates had to deal with. The only time he'd done anything even sort of like camping was when he'd set up his grandfather's old tent in his backyard; it had turned out to be full of spiders, and he'd ripped the old canvas trying to escape from them.

Even though they were close to the highway, the branches swinging overhead and the smell of leaf mold rising up from the forest floor made Noah feel a million miles away from the world he knew. Like maybe they really were in some fantasy land where dragons flew overhead and magic was possible.

Harper sat down on the root of a tree. 'Ugh, it's kind of damp and cold on my butt-ular region. We're going to need a hammock or something.'

Pushing away from the tree, he unzipped his backpack and pulled out his sleeping bag. It was waterproof on one side, so if he opened it fully and spread it out like a picnic blanket, it would be big enough for all of them to sit on. Maybe keep them dry.

'That was smart, bringing that,' Rallie said, helping him to spread it out. 'All I have is a change of clothes, toothpaste, and cookies that we got from Harper's.'

'You couldn't sneak back into your house,' Harper reminded her, crawling onto the sleeping bag, flopping down, and rooting around in her own pack. 'And I didn't exactly give you advance notice.'

The lolling head and closed eyes combined to make the Princess look as tired as they were, which was oddly reassuring. Harper set the dollie down and smoothed out her dress, then turned back to the bag. She tugged out a thin-looking coverlet, some safety pins, and Band-Aids, a bar of chocolate that had gotten slightly mashed, a package of baby carrots, a bruised apple, a sweater, a pair of socks, a notebook, and one of her mermaid dollies.

Which, from Harper, was almost an apology.

She took the Princess out of her bag. The dollie's eyes were open, but as Harper leaned her one way and then another, her eyes closed. Noah was glad to see that Harper had reattached the Princess's head, although it lolled slightly like maybe Harper had done it in a hurry and it wasn't on exactly right.

'This is what I bought,' she said. 'To share, if you want any.'

'We should take turns keeping watch,' Noah said, 'as we did on the bus.' He took out his jar of peanut butter, a package of crackers, oranges, and orange soda and put everything but the soda with the other supplies. Thirsty, he popped the tab on the drink. Fizzy foam bubbled up, and he quickly shifted the can over a mound of grass so the spraying liquid could spill onto the dirt. Then he took a long swig.

He thought about how he'd met them both when they were all little kids. Harper had been riding her bike up and down the block when she saw Noah sitting on his front steps, reading a beat-up old copy of James and the Giant Peach. She stopped to tell him that she'd read the book and it was good, but not as good as The Witches, and had he read The Twits? She was the one who'd met Rallie, too, picking her up at a carnival, where they'd been the only two girls who had their faces painted like Batgirl instead of fairies and cats and clowns. The first time the three of them had hung out, they'd dangled upside down from the jungle gym until the blood rushed to their heads, trying to get their brains to work better so that they'd be able to move things with the combined power of their minds.

The bubbles hit the back of his throat in a satisfying way.

It seemed like such a long time ago.

'Watch? For what?' Rallie said, reaching out her hand for the soda. 'It's not like there are going to be marauding orcs or bears or wolves or creepy, crazy old bus riders. We're in a tiny strip of park.'

'We'll sleep better if someone's on watch,' said Noah, glancing at the dollie's creepy, almost sleeping face. He wanted someone making sure she didn't wake up and move around while their eyes were closed. 'Or I will, anyway.'

'Not me,' said Rallie, yawning.

'I'll go second,' Noah said. 'Kick me if you get tired sooner.'

'I can stay up,' Harper said. 'How about I wake one of you in an hour?'

She nodded. He finished off his orange soda in another two gulps. Rallie had her enormous red coat off and was quickly layering her change of clothes-jeans and a Jon hoodie with cat ears on the hood-on along with the gray dress she was wearing. Then she curled up like a bug under her coat, closed her eyes, and seemed to fall almost instantly into slumber.

Harper had her thin blanket wrapped around her like a cape and was sitting with her back against the trunk of the tree, looking out at the water. Noah's eyes had adjusted enough to the moonlight that he could see the determined set of her jaw.

Harper's hand rested absently on the thing's chest like she was holding it still. As Noah looked, his imagination fed him a horrible image: The Princess staggering across the uneven ground toward him, her chubby arms reaching for him. He wondered if he could convince Harper to put the Princess back in her bag. On her lap was the Princess, eyes open now as though she was on watch with Harper, staring at nothing, the bone-white of the dollie's face seeming to glow in the gloom.

Harper tilted her head, her gaze going to where he was sitting. 'What?' she whispered.

He pointed to the dollie-that was once AVA's passed down, now with part of the soul of Nevaeh inside, and inside the mind was the minds of the mother and the 4 girls that had her stolen, realizing he'd been staring. He kept his voice low. 'This whole thing. Is it a game? Just tell me.'

She narrowed her eyes. 'It's real, Noah.'

'Okay,' he said, too tired to fight, lying down on the open sleeping bag and pillowing his head on one arm. 'Wake me when it's my turn to be on the watch.'

HE DREAMED ABOUT a big building near a river billowing smoke from its towers. And then, his dream vision swooping forward, he saw a yellow-haired girl watching as her father spun beautiful things from bone china. Teapots were so thin and white that they seemed to glow from inside, covered in paper-fine china roses and lilies and leaves. Vases were so fine that it seemed like a breath would shatter them, painted with lots of real gold.

She grunted a yes. He closed his eyes.

Skylar.

At the thought of her name, she seemed to turn toward him, her large black eyes widening like she was the one who saw a ghost.

His vision seemed smeared, and he was in front of a big, drafty house, welcoming a skinny and pinch-nosed woman. He knew, without knowing how, that he was looking at Skylar's aunt and that she'd come down from the city to take care of Skylar after Skylar's mother had died six months past and it became clear that her father had no plans to remarry.

Children break things, her aunt said, and took away the dollies her father had made for her with spare clay, telling her they were too precious for her to keep.

Children are dirty, her aunt said, and forbade her from playing outside. She gave her chores instead, making her wash the windows and sweep the floors and move the furniture around.

Noah watched as Skylar swept the floors, polished the blue, and hid things under her bed. Clothespins that she marked with ink so it seemed they had eyes. A pillowcase tied with string so it seemed like it had a neck and head. In the dark of her room at night, when her father and her aunt had gone to their beds, she took them out and played with them, whispering to herself, calling them by the same names as her old dollies.

The aunt displayed them, along with less successful bone china pieces Skylar's father brought home from the factory. There was the bone china coffeepot wound with a vine that didn't curve quite right, resting on the sideboard in the dining room. There were sets of too-small teacups and a bowl with alligator feet that were too frightening and no one liked. There were countless vases marred by mistakes, that listed a little to one side or had gold paint that had smeared or blistered before they were fired or had three-dimensional flowers that had broken coming out of the kiln. Soon several mistakes rested on every side table, forcing Skylar to tiptoe through the parlor to avoid breaking any.

NOAH WOKE, BLINKING, to Jon sky overhead, dotted with puffs of clouds.

Sunlight filtered through the canopy of green and brown leaves, dappling the ground with bright spots and shadow. He heard a sound that reminded him of the ocean. He'd gone to stay with his grandparents one summer after his dad left, and they'd stayed in a house by the beach. He'd woken up with the crash of the waves in his head every morning.

But this wasn't the ocean, he knew, and a moment later he realized it wasn't the Ohio River, either. It was the sound of the highway, of cars and trucks, whooshing past the woods, that sounded like breaking surf.

Noah sat up, blinking, stretching out his stiff limbs and looking around him. Rallie was asleep on the sleeping bag, wrapped in her coat, braids falling in her face, a few pieces of white fuzz or feathers dusting her skin. Harper was asleep too, her head lolling back against the tree. She'd fallen asleep on watch, Noah realized.

Now that it was daytime, he could see that the glass orbs were slightly too small for her eye sockets, leaving gaps in the corners. An ant crawled out from one of them, marching across her eye and up over her forehead into the thicket of her hair. Noah sprang up and scuttled away from her, his heart racing.

Turning, he saw the Princess resting in the dirt right behind his head, far from where she'd been the night before. Her black eyes were wide open, leering down at him.

There was more of the white stuff settling on the grass. It looked almost like snow, but then he realized what he was looking at. It was the inside of the sleeping bag. Something had ripped it, cutting the fabric and pulling out the lining, and scattered that, along with all their food.

Crackers were crumbled over the ground, and the chocolate bar was torn in half, pieces of gold foil scattered like confetti. He wondered who'd done this and then looked over at the dollie's empty eyes, the ant on her bone-white cheek.

Baby carrots were tossed around in the dirt. The peanut butter was smeared on the bark of a nearby tree, the jar resting against a rock as if it had rolled there.

As he stared a squirrel ran up to the open jar of peanut butter and stuck its furry body inside.

It didn't seem possible that they'd spent the night in a tiny stretch of woods in a town he didn't know. Looking back at the night before, at Harper and Rallie waking him up in the middle of the night, the story about the Princess, the walk to the bus station, and making camp in the dark—all of those things felt distant like they'd happened to someone in a book.

Turning back to where the dollie rested, outside the circle of Harper's arms, he wondered about other impossible things. Had a ghost really trashed their campsite? Was Skylar watching him out of the Princess's glass eyes? A chill shivered up his spine.

Out in the middle of nowhere with an angry ghost and no idea how to get to her grave.

Oh yeah, they were in trouble.

CHAPTER NINE

'Five more minutes,' she mumbled.

'Stranded in East Rochester, Pennsylvania,' Noah said with a shrug, hoping that gesture would somehow convey that he shared her feeling that everything had gotten pretty weird.

'Rallie,' he said quietly, poking her upper arm. 'Something happened. Come on. Get up. You have to see this.'

NOAH WOKE RALLIE BY SHAKING HER SHOULDER UNTIL she groaned and rolled over. Her braids spread out on the slashed sleeping bag and more white stuffing got caught in her hair.

She opened her eyes and seemed surprised to see him there. 'Where...?' 'Whom...?'

Then, as she took in the state of their campsite, she turned back to him with her brow furrowed in further puzzlement.

He jerked his head toward Harper and then the dollie. 'Do you believe in ghosts?' he asked, keeping his voice low. 'Because I think I do now. For real and for sure.'

'It could have been raccoons,' Rallie said. Her expression grew more horrified as she looked around. 'I thought one of us was supposed to stay awake. Isn't that what you said last night?'

'Raccoons? Really?'

Rallie nodded slowly like maybe she wasn't so sure anymore. 'Or Harper did it. She was on watch.'

'She's not crazy,' Noah said. 'And she'd have to be totally crazy to do this. Anyway, I thought you believed her about the ghost.'

Rallie pushed herself to her feet and walked around the woods, shivering. 'This is too much. I don't believe this. Maybe animals ransacked the camp, or maybe Harper was mad at us for wanting to go back and was trying to convince us to keep going. Either way, it wasn't a ghost.' I do- I do...

'I did. I don't know. It was fun to play along.'

Noah said, but as he said it, he realized that it still did feel like an adventure-maybe even more than it had before-just not the same kind of adventure. He was scared. Little hairs were standing up along his arms, and he thought that maybe Rallie was scared too. That was probably why she didn't want to believe in ghosts anymore. 'It seemed like an adventure last night, right?'

But Noah wanted them to be real, wanted that desperately.

If they were real, then maybe the world was big enough to have magic in it. And if there was magic-even bad magic, and Noah knew it was more likely that there was bad magic than any good kind-then maybe not everyone had to have a story like his father's, a story like the kind all the adults he knew told, one about giving up and growing bitter. He might have been embarrassed to wish for magic back home, but there in the woods, it seemed possible. He looked over at the cruel, glassy eyes of the dollie, so close that she could have touched his face.

He thought about what Harper had said-about how if they didn't go on the quest right then, they never would. How if they faltered, they'd never come back.

Anything was better than no magic at all.

And he thought about his dream.

'I think it was Skylar,' Noah said. 'Maybe her spirit's angry that we aren't taking this quest seriously enough. Maybe she's mad that we got off the bus before we got to the right stop. Or maybe she's mad that you want to go home.'

'I bet Harper got that story about Skylar and the bones from one of her library books. I'm not trying to be mean. Harper makes everything more interesting, but sometimes she gets carried away, you know?'

'I'm sticking with the raccoon explanation,' Rallie said, picking up her coat and shouldering it on over her layers.

Harper, who'd been the last one awake and who wanted to convince them both to stay on the quest. Who might have thought it was funny to put the Princess so close to him, knowing it would freak him out? 'What about the ashes? Those were real. 'He thought about that, turning the words over in his mind. Rallie was saying raccoons, but the rest of what she said pointed to Harper.

Rallie nodded, but not in a way that was agreeing. 'I keep thinking about them. Maybe she took some ash from a grill and mixed in pieces of chicken bone. It was dark when we both looked at it. People fake that kind of thing on stage all the time.'

He'd just dreamed about what Harper described, like the way that after you see a movie, you sometimes dream yourself into it. He had no way to know if any of it was true or if it was just his brain regurgitating stuff.

He remembered that he'd wondered the same thing the night before, about whether it was all a trick, but somewhere along the way he'd become convinced, and he didn't want to give that feeling up. He wanted to tell Rallie about his dream and insist it meant that she was wrong, but he realized it didn't prove anything.

'Nope,' he said. 'I don't think so.'

Any food?'

Rallie seemed to have lost interest anyway, unzipping the front part of Noah's backpack and sticking her hand inside, fishing around. 'Do we have anything left?

Her hand came out of his backpack, her fingers clutching a folded-up square of paper. She began to unfold it. He knew exactly what she was holding.

'What's this?' she asked, distracted by her discovery. 'A note? What's in here? Secret boy stuff?'

'Give it to me,' Noah said, grabbing the paper.

Rallie stood up, still reading, the smile sliding off her face. It was replaced with an expression of astonishment. Noah could see the scrawl of his own handwriting across the page and doodles decorating the margins. 'These are the Questions Harper gave you. You answered them. You told her you didn't, but you did.'

'I guess I did. Can I have them back now?' He stood too, starting toward her. He lunged forward to grab the note from her hand.

She danced out of his way. 'But why would you answer them when you were going to-?'

Rallie never got to finish because at that moment Harper jumped up from the sleeping bag with a shriek. She was crouching, blinking in the sunlight, her hands outstretched like she was ready to fight. It was a move of surprising awesomeness.

'Harper?' Noah asked.

To his relief, Rallie folded the note twice and shoved it into the pocket of her coat, then walked over to Harper. They sat back down together. Noah could see that Harper was still breathing hard.

'I dreamed that I was Skylar. I fell-' Harper said, pressing her hands against her face.

Noah didn't speak for a long moment. He wondered if he was a bad person if he didn't say anything about his dream. He wondered if Rallie would think he was ridiculous if he did. The leaves overhead rustled. 'I think you better look around,' he said finally. 'Did she seem angry? Because it looks like something trashed our camp.'

Harper stood up and dusted herself off, going over to the Princess and lifting her up. The dollie's eyes moved to half-open, which made it appear as though she was watching them, the way his cat did when she was pretending to sleep.

'You think a ghost did this?' Harper asked finally, turning back toward them.

'It's classic poltergeist stuff, isn't it?' Noah asked.

'I don't,' Rallie said. 'I think it was raccoons. But I thought that you'd say it was a ghost.'

'She's not a poltergeist,' Harper said, as though Noah had suggested her brand-new box set of Doctor Who DVDs were bootlegs. 'And why would she toss out our food? Ruin the only thing we've got to sleep on? She wants us to take her to East Eaton. She's not going to make it harder for us.'

Noah thought he detected a note of uncertainty in her voice, though.

'Okay, whatever,' he said. 'You think it was raccoons too?'

Harper looked around and sucked in her breath. 'I don't know. What if it was Kanth Jones? What if he followed us?'

A shiver went up against Noah's back, ending with a twitch between his shoulder blades. He could too easily imagine that weathered, smirking face watching them from the darkness. But there was no reason for Kanth to have gotten off the bus, followed them, waited for them to fall asleep, then tossed around their stuff. No reason at all. They didn't have anything he wanted. He probably thought they'd all been grabbed by aliens and gotten their faces stolen.

But Skylar had plenty of reasons to be mad at Rallie and was probably frustrated that she wasn't already in her grave.

'Look, I want to figure out what happened as much as you do,' said Rallie, looking between them like she wasn't sure which side she was on just then-maybe neither of theirs. 'But can we please get out of here first? The woods are creepy and I have to pee and I'm hungry.'

'We passed that donut shop last night,' Noah said.

There wasn't much to pack up, so they didn't. The sleeping bag had been ruined along with the rest of their supplies, the long gashes making puffs of white stuffing well up with every gust of wind. The best they could do was gather up everything, roll up the wounded sleeping bag, and dump it all in one of the trash cans along the river.

Rallie nodded. 'Perfect. So long as they have a bathroom.'

No one else was there, but that didn't mean that no one else had been.

They walked back along the highway and managed to find a spot to cross that was less crazy than jumping over the median. Then they walked quietly, heads bent against the chill air. Noah could smell the melting sugar and rising dough of the shop blocks before he could see it. By the time he got to the door, he was practically drooling.

'How much money do we all have?' Harper asked.

'I've got fifteen dollars and fifty cents.' Noah had started with twenty-three dollars, but the bus ticket had cost him seven-fifty and it would be another seven-fifty to get back. Of the fifteen fifty he had, that left him with only eight dollars he could actually spend.

'I have twenty,' said Rallie.

'Eleven and a bunch of pennies,' said Harper. 'We should save something for later. For lunch and the trip back.'

There were cinnamon cider donuts, Boston cream and jelly crullers, chocolate sprinkle, rainbow sprinkle, maple cream, sour cream, old-fashioned, June-berry, toasted coconut, bear claws, and apple fritters. And then beneath the glass of the counter, stranger flavors-Froot Loops, peanut butter, ketchup, pickle juice, mandarin orange, honeycomb, lox and cream cheese, lobster, cheeseburger, fried chicken, wasabi, acorn flour, bubblegum, Pop Rocks, and spelled.

But as they opened the door, Noah's stomach growled, and saving money was the last thing on his mind. There were rows and rows of baskets along the back wall, each of them filled with a different flavor of the donut, their frostings bright under the lights.

The man behind the counter had a thick, wild head of black hair. It stuck up as though he'd been electrocuted, except where it crawled down his cheeks into sideburns. 'Get your kids something?' he asked as the bell on the door rang. 'The wasabi donuts just came out of the fryer. They're still hot.'

They were also a muted green color and smelled spicy, like hot peppers.

'Uh,' Noah said, glancing at the menu. 'Can I have hot chocolate? A big one.'

He took his warm cup with its spirals of whipped cream to one of the small plastic tables. Rallie headed to the bathroom in the back while Harper ordered two more hot chocolates. They sat for a while, letting the heat of the paper cups warm their fingers.

Then they each ordered a donut. Noah got Pop Rocks, Rallie got maple cream, and Harper got Froot Loops. The crumbling cake was delicious, and there were real Pop Rocks inside that fizzed against Noah's tongue. He licked his fingers when he was done, forgetting that he hadn't washed his hands in a very long time.

The hot chocolates had been two-fifty apiece and the donuts were a dollar twenty-five, costing them each three seventy-five and leaving Noah with four twenty-five that he could spend for the whole rest of the trip. Harper had even less. He hoped she had at least twenty-five pennies, or she wasn't going to be able to pay her bus fare home.

Harper sat the Princess on a nearby chair. The dollie slumped, her head twisted on an angle, her hair ruffled as though she'd really been sleeping on it. Her half-closed eyes were bright with reflected light.

'If you died,' Harper said, keeping her voice low. 'Do you think you'd want to be a ghost?'

'Get revenge by doing what?' Rallie asked, laughing. 'You would be a disembodied spirit. What are you going to do? Yell 'boo!' at them? Try to convince them to go on a stupid road trip?'

'If I was murdered, then yeah, definitely,' Noah said. 'So, I could haunt my killer and get revenge.'

'I could throw stuff around,' Noah reminded her.

'Maybe,' Rallie said. 'I'd do it if I could be me, but see-through. The whole world would be like my television. I could visit the people I loved. But not if I had to repeat the same thing over and over again, like haunting some stretch of road or going up and downstairs.'

'Even if you couldn't talk to anyone?' Noah asked.

Rallie looked briefly uncomfortable. 'I'd definitely want there to be a ghost society with ghost friends.'

Harper pushed her hair back. 'Well, what if you decided you wanted to come back from the dead and then changed your mind, but you were stuck?'

Noah thought he'd better interrupt that line of conversation. 'Would you want to be a ghost, Harper?'

'You mean like how I'm stuck here in East Rochester?' said Rallie, and then she took a big swallow of hot chocolate.

I had something really important to tell him. Up there, I could see for what seemed to be miles-I could see the river and boats and the iceman's truck in front of a house down the street-but I kept slipping and catching myself on the copper gutters. And I heard this woman's voice from behind me, whispering to me, telling me I better get inside or she was going to make me sorry. She had a broom, and she was sticking it out the window, trying to hit me.'

She shrugged. 'I don't know. Lingered around, whooshing past people who'd never see me? It's scary to imagine things happening and me not being able to affect them. I keep thinking about the dream I had. It was like I was really her-I was climbing around on the slate tiles of the roof of this giant house, trying to keep away from the windows while I waited for my father to get home.'

Noah thought about his own dream of the pinch-faced woman and the big Victorian house of flawed pottery. He wanted to tell her about the dream, but he felt a little silly about it. When he'd woken, it had seemed so obvious that the dream was real, that it had been given to him by their ghost. But now, in the warmth of the donut shop, after Rallie being so certain there was no ghost, he was unsure about everything.

'Do you think that was really what happened?' Harper asked, leaning forward eagerly like there was only one possible right answer. 'Do you think she's trying to tell us about her death? Imagine that the whole time she was in the cabinet, she was just waiting for one of us to take her out.'

Noah opened his mouth to describe his dream, but it seemed as though not telling Harper and Rallie what had happened to his action figures or why he didn't want to play made it hard to tell about other things too. It felt like everything was all mixed up together, weighing down his tongue.

The man moved behind the counter, dumping a fresh batch of peach muffins into a tissue-lined bin. 'No problem,' he called to them.

'Your blond friend sounds pretty hungry,' he said, coming out from behind the counter with a pink-glazed donut on a paper plate. He placed it down in front of the dollie. 'Here. On the house. It's Pepto-Bismol flavored. We're trying it out to see if it gets on the regular menu.'

'What?' Noah asked, confused.

As the man walked back into the kitchen, Noah could only stare at him. 'Did he-?' Noah whispered.

'It was just a joke,' Rallie said quickly, but she looked nervous. 'You know because we had a dollie. He was pretending it was real.'

'Because he thinks he's being some kind of cool adult.' Rallie took another sip of her hot chocolate and then pushed it away as it had burnt her. She shuddered. Noah thought uncomfortably about what Aubrey had said on the walk home from school way back when. Somebody walk over your grave?

'Why would he do that?' Harper asked.

Your blond friend. There was something familiar about the words, though, something that snagged in Noah's mind. 'No, wait. Kanth. That's what he said on the bus- 'I'm not going to talk to the blonde.' Because he didn't like the way she was looking at him. Remember?'

'I remember that,' said Rallie. Harper nodded.

'Do you think he was talking about the dollie too?' Noah felt cold, and the food he'd eaten churned in his stomach. He'd wanted the ghost to be real, but the more real Skylar seemed, the more scared he was. He tried not to look over at the Princess. He tried not to think about what it meant that she sounded hungry. He tried not to notice that her cheeks seemed a little rosier today like she was feeding on something other than donuts.

They had to bury her, and they had to bury her soon.

'Okay, well...' Rallie said. She checked the face of her cell phone, then took out the map. It was ripped down the middle, but she rested it on the table so all the streets lined up. 'It's ten forty-three now, and the next bus isn't until four-thirty. There's time and all, but I really have to be on that bus.'

'East Eaton isn't that far,' said Harper. 'Noah said so last night. We could still make it. On foot... Like real adventurers.'

They were all quiet for a long moment.

'I'm going,' Harper said, picking up the dollie and cradling it in her lap. Her cheek rested against its pale bone china brow. Its eyes seemed more open than before. Pale milk glass with a black center. 'With or without you guys.' Her voice was small, though.

Noah thought about all the food thrown around the woods, about the slashed sleeping bag. And he wondered what else a ghost could do.

Have you ever heard this one? When you drive past a cemetery, you have to hold your breath. If you don't, the spirits of the newly dead can get in your body through your mouth and possess you.

But he'd already decided. He wasn't turning back. 'I'm still up for an adventure,' he said with a nod. 'I'm in.'

So-o I am not going to be late. Okay?' Her voice got louder, and the words came out faster as she spoke, and when she finished there was a long silence. Rallie slapped her hands down on the table like she was calling a meeting to order. 'I'm not a coward. I care about adventures too, okay? It's not that. But I need to get home by tonight or my grandmother is going to lose her mind. She's going to call the cops. She'll make sure I don't go anywhere for months, and she'll remind me of what I did whenever I ask for permission to do anything for the rest of my life. Forever.

'Okay,' Harper said finally.

'So-o, look, I want to go, but I want you to promise we'll get back home today. The bus leaves here at four-thirty, and I want you to promise we're not going to miss it. Promise that we'll turn around in time if we have to. Promise me that you'll get on it with me.'

'But what if we're almost there and-' Harper started.

'No way,' Rallie said. 'We still have to get to the graveyard and bury the Princess and find the bus station before the bus from East Eaton leaves-at three forty-five. If we make it to East Eaton and there's time, great, but remember that the bus leaves earlier from there. I'll come with you, but if it doesn't look like we'll make it, we all come back together.'

'Then I'm going to the bus station now,' Rallie said, pushing back her chair and standing. 'You and Noah can adventure by yourselves. I'm not going with you.'

Harper looked reluctant. 'I'm not going back without finishing this quest.'

'Wait,' Noah said, standing too and reaching for her. 'We started this together. We need to stay together. We can make it to East Eaton and still get home.'

'Harper,' Noah said.

Rallie folded her arms over her chest.

Noah put out his hand to pull Harper to her feet. 'We're already up. We're waiting for you.'

She sighed. 'Fine. But if we're going to make it by Rallie's deadline, we have to go now. And we have to go fast.'

Harper stood without letting him help, holding the Princess under her arm. 'You believe me now, don't you? About the dream. About the ghost. You believe me, right?'

Noah opened his mouth to tell her that he'd dreamed about Skylar too. But just then, Rallie said, 'Sure we do,' and the moment passed.

The frosting was sickly sweet, but it was the bitter taste underneath that stayed on his tongue.

Instead, he picked up the Pepto-Bismol donut and bit into it.

CHAPTER TEN

First, he'd pictured himself with a loyal steed that would have done most of the walking, so he hadn't anticipated the blister forming on his left heel or the tiny pebble that seemed to have worked its way under his sock so that even when he stripped off his sneaker he couldn't find it. ADVENTURING TURNED OUT TO BE BORING. NOAH thought back to all the fantasy books he'd read where a team of questers traveled overland and realized a few things.

He hadn't thought about how hot the sun would be either. When he put together his bunch of provisions, he never thought about bringing sunblock. Aragorn never wore sunblock. Sam never wore sunblock. Percy never wore sunblock. But despite all that precedent for going without, he was pretty sure his nose would be lobster-red the next time he looked in the mirror.

He was thirsty, too, something that happened a lot in books, but his dry throat bothered him more than it had ever seemed to bother any character.

And, unlike in books where random brigands and monsters jumped out just when things got unbearably dull, there was nothing to fight except for clouds of gnats, several of which Noah was pretty sure he'd accidentally swallowed.

Also, it wasn't like they were walking through the awesome vistas of Middle Earth-a forest full of Ent's or elves, a mountain pass brimming with orcs and ice-they were mostly walking past industrial buildings and a bowling alley. Eventually, the warehouses thinned out until it was just highway on one side and water on the other. They kept heading along the road, pausing occasionally to kick rocks or adjust their backpacks.

Rallie was walking ahead, with Noah behind her. She had a blade of grass and was trying to turn it into a whistle, a trick she claimed her uncle could do. So far all she'd managed was to make a lot of spitting noises.

'I had an idea,' Harper said, speeding her pace to draw even with Noah. She was still carrying the Princess, the dollie settled against her hip like it was a child. He tried to keep his gaze from going to it. 'About Tommesings. About who his father is.'

'You promised not to talk about the game.' He was tempted to, though. He wanted to know how the story would have ended since he'd never get to play it. And he was bored.

'No,' Harper said with a trickster's smile. 'I agreed not to ask why you stopped playing. And I didn't.'

Noah sighed. He was arguing because he thought he should, not because his heart was really in it. 'I guess I had some ideas too,' he admitted.

Harper looked at him with astonishment. 'You did?'

'He's my character, after all. But even if his father is the king of the whole Gray Country, he's going to stay a pirate. He's happy where he is, on the Neptune's Pearl. No dad is going to change that.'

Harper was looking at him oddly like she wanted desperately to ask why he thought about any of this stuff since he'd said he didn't want to play anymore. But for once, she was smart and didn't. 'Even if his father was the Jon of Deep winter Barrow?'

They didn't have a dollie to represent him, but Jon was a bad guy, through and through. They'd loved making up his crimes. He'd been raising a zombie army of broken dollies to march over the rest of the lands. He'd chopped off the heads of his enemies and abducted an evil priestess to be his duchess. Another action figure that Noah used to play had fought them over by the Blue Hills and nearly died. He was being healed by one of Rallie's dollies, in a temple, she'd made from a shoebox.

'That would be pretty good,' Noah said.

Harper looked flustered. She was good at making up stories, but she wasn't always good at accepting the stuff he and Rallie made up, no matter how awesome it was. It took her a little while to accept a universe she didn't have total control over.

'If Tommesings was Jon's son, then he could get close enough to assassinate him. Or maybe he could say that he was Jon's son-maybe he's really someone else's kid entirely. Maybe someone even better. Like an ancient pirate lord or some kind of monster.'

Rallie halted abruptly.

The path had ended. Up ahead, another big fat river flowed into Ohio, making it impossible to go farther. Two bridges spanned the river, but he could see that they were useless to three kids on foot. One was a railway bridge, rusted and abandoned, with large gaps where metal rails had fallen off. The other was a massive concrete three-lane highway, with a toll booth on one side and no room for walking on the shoulder.

'Well, that's that,' Rallie said. She had a strange expression on her face, half relief, and half disappointment.

If this was a book or a movie, they would meet a mysterious figure with a boat and that person would ferry them across. Like Charon. Probably try to trick them too-but if they were clever, they could make it. And if he was Tommy sings, he wouldn't need to be ferried across because he'd have the Neptune's Pearl-his two-masted schooner-and all his crew. Noah sighed, gazing up along the waterway. There were shabby-looking marinas on either side of the big unknown river.

But in real life, those things didn't matter. He was suddenly aware of how tired he was.

'Let's go ask,' Harper said. 'Maybe there's a ferry?'

It was only a little afternoon, so they walked down to the marina. The few buildings-an oversized boat storage area, a lean-to, and an office-sat beside three long docks, with an array of boats separated by berms. Two little kids were leaning over the side of piling with a fishing net, watching something in the water.

'You want to split up?' Noah asked. 'See if we can find somebody who might know how to cross?'

'Okay,' said Rallie, glancing toward the office. 'Let's meet back here in five minutes.'

'I'm going to talk to those kids,' Harper said, turning to head in their direction.

As he wandered, he spotted an old rowboat, pulled up to one side of the dry dock and leaned against some pilings. The paint was chipped along the sides, and he didn't see any oars, but for a moment, he imagined them ferrying themselves across. As he got closer, though, he saw the hull had enough rot damage to keep it from being seaworthy. He didn't need to know much about boats to know it would leak like crazy if he put it in the water.

He walked a little way, inhaling the smell of diesel and river and tar baking in the sun. The day had turned warm, and Noah wondered if it would be possible to swim across. He wondered if Rallie had had the right idea, going into the main building. There was probably air-conditioning and maybe even a water fountain up there.

Despite reading tons about pirates and drawing the Neptune's Pearl in such detail that he'd figured out most of the rigging, and even building model ships, Noah had never been on a boat.

With a sigh, he studied the sleek motorboats, shaped like long cigars, and the towering, multilevel fishing vessels with tall antennae shooting off of them like whiskers on a cat. He couldn't imagine the sort of people who owned boats like that, but he was pretty sure that they didn't give kids rides just for asking.

He took another look at the rowboat and wondered if it might be possible to patch it. Maybe he could find some nails and wood glue and tar. And if that didn't work, then maybe they could boil water faster than the boat could sink?

'Noah!'

He turned at the sound of his name being shouted. Harper was standing next to the two kids with the net and waving him over.

'Brian's dad is trying to sell a dinghy,' she said when Noah stepped onto the dock. It dipped underneath him and he steadied himself, lamenting his lack of sea legs.

'Uh-huh,' he said warily. They had maybe fifteen dollars before they were dipping into the funds for the way back. 'How much does he want for it?'

'Twenty-five.' Harper glanced at Noah's watch and raised her eyebrows. 'But Brian said that maybe we could trade if we had anything he wanted. And he'll throw in oars.'

'There's no other way across?'

She shook her head, making her red hair flying around her. The sun had pinked her nose and deepened her freckles. 'There's another bridge, but it's more than a mile away. If we're on the water, Brian says we can make it to East Eaton in a half hour. Easy.'

Brian nodded. 'We go up that way to fish sometimes. It's not far,' the other kid said.

'Okay,' Noah said. 'Let's see this thing.'

Brian pointed to the one on the end, painted a slate gray. It was beat-up, but afloat, with no visible leaks. A lot better than the rotted-out one Noah had found near the dry dock.

Brian led them down to the end of the dock, where a few small dinghies and rowboats were moored. Three rowboats rocked gently beside one another, buffered by plastic fenders.

'Can you give us a second to talk it over?' Noah asked.

Brian shrugged and headed back to where his friend was manning the net, trailing it through the water like he was going to catch something by sheer accident. As Noah watched the kid go, he saw Rallie crossing the gravel-covered yard toward them.

Her coat was tied around her waist. She looked determined and sweaty and a little bit hopeful. Her angular face and thin eyebrows were utterly familiar, but he realized for the first time that she looked like one of those older, mysterious girls he wondered at sometimes in the mall, and that made her strange to him.

It was interesting watching her when she didn't notice herself being observed.

'I'll trade that, though.'

'All I've got is a necklace,' Harper said, touching the thin blue chain around her neck protectively. She wore a tiny typewriter key charm on it. He hadn't seen her without it since she'd gotten it from her father on her birthday.

'I've got my watch and a flashlight,' Noah said. 'And a book I'm pretty sure they don't want.'

I know you're going to be mad, but he said it was impossible, Harper.' She sighed. 'I'm sorry.' Rallie walked up to them, pushing back her braids impatiently. 'Hey, look, guys, I talked to an old guy up at the marina office. He said there was no way to walk to East Eaton.

'What if we don't go on foot?' Harper said, pointing to the gray-sh boat.

'Do we even know which way the current of the river runs?' Rallie asked. 'Or anything about boats?'

Noah itched to be on the water, even in the little dinghy.

Harper looked momentarily thrown, then she frowned. 'What's to know? We just row harder if the current is against us.'

'You promised we'd go back,' Rallie said. 'Both of you said that if we couldn't get to East Eaton in time to get the bus, we'd go back to East Rochester. Well, it's time to turn around.'

'Seriously?' Rallie asked them. 'You're really going to break your promises?'

Harper hesitated, and Noah stayed silent far too long.

'It's not that,' Noah said, looking longingly at the water. 'It's just that I think we can still make it.'

'Yeah?' he said, trying to sound like he didn't care-like he didn't even know what she was going to threaten him with. He did know, though, and he did care.

Rallie's expression hardened into a tight, unfriendly smile. Her eyes shone like chips of glass. 'Oh no, you have to come back with me,' she told Noah. 'Even if Harper doesn't come with us.' 'Tell me?' Harper asked. 'Wait, what do you mean? Tell me what?'

'I'll tell her,' Rallie said. 'That you lied, and what you lied about.'

'Nothing,' Noah said, stepping back from them. He took a deep breath of diesel and river muck. He couldn't think-all he knew was that if Harper found out about the Questions, she would never stop picking at his reasons for lying about them until the whole story came out. Imagining that filled him with nameless panic. 'Rallie is right about us promising. If she wants to go back, then-'

He remembered, too late, how much Harper hated her friends keeping secrets from her.

Harper interrupted him, looking at Noah like if she stared hard enough, she could read his mind. 'What don't you want me to find out?'

'It's nothing,' Noah insisted.

'Then tell me,' Harper said. She hesitated a moment, then looked at Rallie. 'Tell me.'

'No way,' said Harper. 'I could tell Noah something that I bet you don't want him to know, Rallie. I know a secret too.'

'Come on,' Rallie said. 'Give up. The game's over. We're going back. Let's all just go back. It was still fun. It was still a quest.'

Maybe Rallie had talked about how much she hated him or said that he smelled or how stupid he was. Maybe she had made fun of him to Harper, snickering behind his back.

Rallie's whole face changed. He wondered if he'd been so transparent if it had been as clear when he'd figured out just what he had to lose. And he understood, right then, why Harper was so upset about Noah and Rallie not telling Harper things. Because whatever Rallie didn't want Harper to say had to be pretty bad.

'You wouldn't do that,' Rallie said, her voice hushed. 'You're my best friend. That's a secret.'

'Just tell me,' Noah said. 'Come on. Whatever it is, I won't be mad. At least I don't think I'll be mad.'

Harper laughed, and Noah thought he saw a strange dancing light in the glass eyes of the dollie, as though the Princess was laughing too. When Harper spoke, her voice was different. 'She's not going to tell you. I win at blackmail. Rallie has to come, and since you apparently have to do what she wants, you have to come too. So come on, let's buy this boat.' She could be mean sometimes, but never before did she seem gleeful about being cruel.

'I don't care. You didn't care about me, and now I don't care about you either,' said Harper.

'You don't understand how much trouble I'm going to get in,' Rallie said, running her fingers through her braids.

'But you promised!' Rallie said, her voice anguished.

'I don't care,' Harper repeated.

Noah paced down the dock, too angry at everyone to be ready to give in to anyone, especially those kids with their fishing net who were going to try and talk him out of all the cash they had. And he looked back at the three rowboats and the dinghy, which, now, under his resentful gaze, looked increasingly shabby. He glanced at Rallie, who was staring at the water in an agony of indecision.

None of it was right. This wasn't how their quest was supposed to go.

He had read lots of stories where heroes succeeded in spite of long odds, where they accomplished a task that everyone else had failed. He wondered for the first time about all the people who'd gone before those heroes, about whether they'd been heroic too or whether they'd been at each other's throats before everything had gone wrong.

At the very end of the dock, Noah stopped. He drew in his breath.

He wondered if there was a point where they realized they weren't going to make it, weren't going to beat those long odds-that in the legend that would follow, they were going to be the nameless people that failed.

In front of him was a tiny sailboat, low and slim, only a little bigger than the dinghy, but made from fiberglass. A black-and-white striped sail was folded loosely around the boom, the symbol of a sunfish visible on the Dacron cloth. Someone must have just left it, intending to come right back, because the centerboard was pulled out and there were two life jackets piled together in the cockpit.

Across the stern was one word in a curling script: PEARL.

Noah jumped down onto the hull, his sneakers hitting the curved deck. The boat rocked wildly underneath him, and he had to pinwheel his arms and grab the mast to steady himself. With a grin breaking across his face, he looked up at Rallie and Harper.

'We're not buying anything,' he said. 'We're pirates, remember?'

Their twin expressions of disbelief only made his smile wider.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

The boat rocked lightly. When her foot touched the edge of the deck, though, it tipped dangerously toward her. Noah threw his weight hard to the other side, hoping to balance it out. Harper staggered, falling on her knees with a yelp. After a few moments of wobbling, the boat settled. HARPER NEARLY CAPSIZED THE BOAT GETTING INTO IT. Noah sat in the center, fingers splayed against the hull, with his legs in the shallow cockpit as she climbed down rungs drilled into one of the pilings. First, she handed him her backpack, which he dumped next to his, in a small cavity under the centerboard.

'You're next,' Noah called up to Rallie. 'If Harper goes to the prow and I stay in the center, it won't be as hard for you to come aboard. At least I think it won't be hard.'

'Wow,' she said, trailing her fingers through the water and lifting them up like it was marvelous to be so close to the river and not swimming in it. 'We're actually doing this thing.'

'Let me cast off the lines first,' Rallie said, beginning to untie the boat from the pilings.

'I don't know if that's such a good idea,' Noah said. 'We can untie them from here and leave the ropes.'

Starboard was to the right and port was to the left. The boom was the other metal part that the sail attached to, making the L shape that swung the sail where it was supposed to be to catch the wind. And the rudder was the part that you steered with. But that was just vocabulary, and none of it would help him at all if he couldn't recall the principles.

Noah tried to remember everything he'd ever read about sailing, which was a lot. The prow was the point of the boat and the aft was the back end—he was pretty sure about that. And the stern was another word for the back end. The mast was the big thing sticking up from the center of the boat.

Rallie put her hand on her hip. 'What if we have to dock in East Eaton? We can't dock without a rope.'

At first, the Pearl swung closer to the piling, one of the boat's fenders bumping against the floats holding up the dock. But while Rallie scampered down the piling, the Pearl began to drift away from the dock.

He couldn't argue with that, but he could worry as the boat, no longer held by a line at its bow, began to angle more sharply in its berth. Then Rallie untied the aft line.

In books, Noah remembered, there was some kind of pole that you used to cast off, hooking on to the dock to hold the boat in place once the ropes were released, and pushing off with the pole when everyone was on. He didn't have anything like that. He scrambled to grab hold of piling, but it was too late.

'Jump!' Noah yelled to Rallie. 'Now!'

They were moving. They'd pirated a boat.

And she did. She pushed herself off the piling and half fell into the cockpit, making Noah have to crouch low to keep his balance. The boat sat lower in the river with a third person weighing it down, water sloshing up over the edges of the hull, but it didn't tip over. As Noah pushed off the far piling that marked the outer edge of the berth, he realized that they'd done it.

For better or for worse, they were on Beaver River, the current swinging them toward Ohio. The wind overhead gusted with the promise of good sailing.

And despite the fact that Rallie hadn't even wanted to come, she was laughing. You just let out the sail-Noah remembered that term and that it involved letting the sail billow, which must be done with one of the three ropes attached to the deck, although he wasn't exactly sure which one-and the sail filled with lots of air, which propelled the boat straightforward.

Sailing was supposed to be simple, so long as the wind was right behind you.

At least that was how all the books said it was supposed to work. But reading about it and doing it were completely different. He understood the theory, the ropes, the figuring out the wind, and the positioning yourself on the boat, but he couldn't seem to make the Sunfish actually sail. They sat in the water, pushed around by the current, spinning slowly.

But if the wind was coming from the side-which it usually was-then things was harder. You still caught the wind, but because of the keel on the bottom of the boat, instead of just moving away from where the wind was blowing, you mostly went straight. Mostly.

Harper was strapping herself into one of the life vests, while Noah flailed around, overwhelmed, pretending to know what he was doing, pulling on ropes and testing things out. She offered the other vest to Rallie, who took it grudgingly. Although Rallie seemed to have accepted that they were continuing on the quest, she clearly hadn't come close to forgiving Harper. It was a very tiny boat, but Rallie managed to sit as far from Harper as was possible.

Noah wanted to say something to them, to make them talk to each other, but it was hard to concentrate on that while he was pulling on lines to lift the sail. They were coming up on the two bridges. The first one was high enough not to present much of a problem, but the second had more pylons underneath it, and Noah wanted to be sure they steered wide of those.

He suddenly remembered that he hadn't dropped the rudder. Crawling to the stern of the boat, he pushed it down and grabbed the tiller so he could start to steer. Rallie started working on the sail. It billowed wildly, flapping back and forth, the boom swinging to the right.

'Tighten it,' he yelled, and she did, pulling the rope until the wrinkles went out of the sail. And suddenly they were moving. Spray splashed up off the water and wet their hair and faces like raindrops. The wind ruffled Noah's hair.

Starboard, some part of his brain reminded him.

Despite the fear of Harper finding out about the Questions and the weirdness of Harper and Rallie having some secret, at that moment he felt pretty happy. He loved the feeling of the river beneath them and ahead of them and behind them. He was the captain of a real ship; a real ship really called the Pearl. It was almost too much magic to bear, but for once he didn't question it. He threw back his head and grinned up into the Jon of the sky.

'We're going to flip!' Harper yelled. On either side the banks were green, occasionally punctuated with oil tanks and industrial buildings and a few stretches of houses. Rallie let out the sail more, and the boat sped, tilting starboard, the port side rising up and making them lean against it with their feet balanced against the edge of the cockpit, trying to flatten things out. They were cutting through the water, faster and faster.

'Hold on,' said Rallie.

Harper scrambled into the cockpit and got the Princess from her pack, zipping the dollie beneath her hoodie. 'In case we flip,' she said. 'I'm afraid of her going overboard.'

Noah pushed the tiller so that they moved to the left, and they slowed a little, flattening. The sail began to luff, flapping noisily, and Rallie tightened it to their new, slower speed. That had been exhilarating but also scary.

'Obviously, I don't,' Harper told him.

'Don't you think she'd be safer where she was?' Noah asked.

It took a while to get used to what made the boat move faster when to let out the sailor tighten it, what to do when the wind changed slightly (which it seemed to do every ten minutes), and how to stay out of the way of other boats.

Rallie raised both her eyebrows as if to remind Noah that Harper was crazy.

They sailed for what seemed like hours but was really only a single hour. Usually, when Noah was doing something, even walking, he could kind of zone out and think about other things. But handling the boat was like playing basketball-it demanded every bit of his attention. Maybe if he'd been more experienced at it, things would have been different, but half the time he was terrified that the boat was going to topple over because it was zooming along at such a steep angle. The other half of the time, the sail hung slack, and he barely could get it to move.

'Do you think Pearl's owner has noticed their boat's gone?' Harper asked as they passed a rocky island rising up on the right-hand curve of the river. A few scrub trees grew on it.

Occasionally, a massive barge would pass by, sending a wake that forced them to grip on to anything they could as the sailboat careened from side to side, nearly throwing them off like a bull at a rodeo.

Noah shifted uncomfortably. When he'd played Tommy sings the Blade robbing people, he was always able to find a good excuse-mostly that that was bad guys-but in real life, excuses felt different. 'When we dock in East Eaton, we'll call the marina and tell them where the Pearl is. The owners will be able to pick up the boat, so hopefully, they won't worry for too long.'

Rallie pointed to the island, clearly not listening to Noah and Harper. 'It seems like anything could be there, doesn't it? I bet no one has ever stepped foot on the shore. Imagine if there was a gateway next to one of those rocks and no one knew it because everything that goes there disappears.'

Noah looked at the island as they sailed past, imagining.

Around the curve was an industrialized stretch of river with houses along the eastern shore and pipes, tanks, and barges along with the other. Many were docked, and a few powerboats raced between them, making the water choppy. The constant rocking of the boat made it hard to steer. Noah's muscles were sore from leaning hard in one direction, and his clothes were soaked through with spray.

Rallie checked her phone.

'What time is it?' Noah asked her.

'About two forty,' she said. 'We've got an hour to get there and find the bus station.'

Harper looked over nervously. Even though this had started out as her plan, Noah thought that she looked as worried as the rest of them.

'This is taking longer than we thought,' Harper said finally. 'Longer than those boys said.' He and Rallie had gotten good at sailing the little boat. They were going faster, catching the wind and skimming through the water like a bike speeding downhill.

Noah was tempted to point out that it would have taken a lot longer if they were rowing, but he didn't. Even though they didn't have much time, he was still feeling pleased.

Noah leaned back and watched the shoreline, watched the woods turn to town and highway and then back to woods again, watched the few houses built close enough to the river that he could spot them. In other places, houses on the river would have been big estates with their own private docks and vast lawns, but there were regular houses like it was no big deal to live on the water.

The city beyond them reminded him a little of a more sprawling version of his town—a couple of nice Victorian houses with boarded-up windows and a sluggish central square. There was a small metal bridge, which the boat was about to pass beneath. He could hear the rattle of cars across its metal supports. Up ahead, the river curved south.

Then they passed more industrial buildings, these a lot older-looking, with crumbling chimneys reaching into the sky.

'Wait,' Harper said, pointing back at the town they'd just passed. 'You've got to turn around. That's East Eaton. That's the old pottery factory. Look.'

Noah half stood; he was so surprised. 'Turn around? Do you understand that the current is running the way we've been sailing? And the wind—if we turn about, we're going against the wind.'

'But we've got to go back.' Harper's eyes were wide. 'We missed it.'

'Okay,' he said. 'So, you swing the boom, and I'll pull the tiller.'

He looked at Rallie and he could see the blank terror in her face. She had no more idea how to turn a sailboat around than he did.

Rallie nodded. Noah steered toward the sandy bank to give them plenty of room to come about. 'When the sail shifts, we're going to have to change sides too,' he told Harper. 'So, get ready.'

The water was shockingly cold, and the impact of it rattled him down to his bones. He grabbed the side of the boat.

He pulled on the tiller, and Rallie pulled in the rope so that the sail tightened and swung. The boat turned in a single graceful movement, and then, with the wind and the current coming at them the wrong way and almost no idea what they were doing, the boat listed to one side and went over, dumping them all into the river.

Rallie sputtered to the surface. Harper was treading water, holding on to the mast and the sail.

Noah swam to the keel, which rose from the hull like a shark's fin. 'Get clear for a second.'

Noah threw his weight against the hull, and it righted itself, its sail lifting up off the water. He scrambled to pull himself on board.

Harper kicked away from the boat, dog-paddling toward Rallie.

Rallie lunged at Harper. 'This is enough. The end. Enough with the creepy dollie and the lying and the trying to make this true.' With those words, her hand darted out and snatched the dollie from where it was half zipped inside Harper's wet hoodie.

Rallie heaved herself onto the deck, and then both of them grabbed for Harper, who kept one arm pressed across her chest to hold the dollie in place even as she was hauled onto the boat. Another barge was passing to their left, creating a rippling wake that made their boat rock wildly again. And Noah could see that two barges followed it. For a moment they just drifted farther in the wrong direction, sail slack, holding on.

Harper screeched, and Noah gasped, but it was too late. Rallie threw it overhand, up and out toward the barge and the deep water.

Everything froze for a long moment. The Princess hit the waves with barely a splash, the water seeming to soak her dress in slow motion, drawing it down. Her hair spread in a golden wave, and her dull black eyes looked up at them as she bobbed for a moment before sinking in a froth of bubbles.

CHAPTER TWELVE

NOAH DIDN'T THINK ABOUT IT, THE DOVE.

He kicked now, over and over, toward the Princess, reaching for her, opening his eyes in the murky brown river.

When he was a little kid, his mom had taken him to swimming classes at the YMCA. He remembered the bleachy smell of the chlorine and the feel of the orange swimming inflated too tightly against his upper arms and the way all the kids' shouting bounced off the ceiling to echo. And he remembered how to kick like a frog.

His fingers closed on a scrap of her dress. Striking his other hand out hard, he caught her arm and hauled her to him. For a moment the cold deadweight of her small china body seemed warm against his. Before he could think too much about that, he was swimming toward the surface. His head broke through the waves, and he sucked in a grateful lungful of air.

His whole body was shaking with cold. His teeth chattered. His toes had gone numb. Behind him, Harper and Rallie were fighting, but it was hard to focus on their words.

The sailboat was at a strange angle, closer to shore. The waves had carried it to shallower water, where the keel caught in the mud. The Pearl had run aground.

Then the wake of the barge hit, the waves sending him under again, this time without him holding his breath. He came up choking.

They were shouting at each other, but Noah didn't pay attention. The water was too cold, and it took too much energy for him to do anything but put his head down and swim.

The girls were wading through the shallow water.

He kicked and kicked and kicked.

Harper was sitting on a fallen tree trunk, looking bedraggled and miserable. Her lips were Jon with cold. Rallie had sloughed off her coat somewhere and had her arms around herself like she was trying to physically restrain herself from shivering.

Clutching the Princess to his chest, leaving only a single free arm with which to paddle, reaching the shore seemed to take forever. And when he finally got there, the bank of the Ohio River was muddy, sucking at his feet, making wading ashore even harder than swimming had been.

'The backpacks are gone,' Rallie said. 'They must have fallen out when the boat rolled the first time.'

He hadn't even thought about it. He didn't even remember deciding. He'd just known that if he didn't, he would lose something he wasn't ready to give up.

Noah sank down on the sandy, muddy bank and looked at the dollie in his arms. The Princess's dress was torn, and it seemed ready to disintegrate further as it dried. One of her arms had been pulled free from the socket and was hanging limply from a dirty string. He stared down at her and wondered why he'd been willing to jump back into a freezing river to get her.

'What time is it?' Rallie asked. 'My phone's dead.'

He looked at his watch. The center of the crystal face had fogged up, but even if it had stopped, it couldn't be too far off. 'Three twenty.'

'We've got to get moving,' Rallie said, clearly panicked. 'Get up. We've got to go.'

As the Princess's dull black eyes rolled up at him, he remembered what Harper had said about breathing in the dead. Maybe when he'd opened up her bag of ashes, he'd inhaled some by accident. And if that was true, then maybe she could possess him anytime she wanted, just like the dead people who possessed you when you passed by graveyards. He wanted to drop her on the riverbank, but his hands wouldn't obey him.

Noah's feet felt like they were filled with lead. 'Rallie...' We're not going to make it, he wanted to tell her. There's no way. We don't even know where we're going. But he could see in her face that she already knew all those things. That she'd figured them out on the boat before she'd hurled the Princess into the waves.

Rallie walked with determination, and although Noah wasn't sure she knew where she was going, he and Harper followed her.

'How could you-?' Harper said to her but then bit off the end of the sentence as Rallie stalked off. Harper pulled the dollie from Noah's hands silently. He let her take it.

They stumbled through the woods and then along the side of an empty stretch of road, past a raggedy wire fence that looked like it was keeping zombies back after an apocalypse rather than cows. As they tripped over rocks and stumps, wet hair sticking to their faces and necks, soaked socks squelching in their shoes, the silence stretched between them, making him even more panicked. Noah kept looking at his watch, which wasn't running entirely right anymore but still seemed to be ticking along faster than he wanted.

At three fifty-four, when the bus was well and truly gone, she whirled on Harper.

They were all shivering. Rallie kept asking what time it was in a smaller and smaller voice. At three-thirty, she kept marching with grim determination. At three thirty-four, she sped up to a near run. At three thirty-seven, she started to cry, quietly and to herself. He reached out a hand toward her, but she gave him such a terrible look that he pulled back and let her alone. At three forty-three, she set her jaw and kept going.

'I thought maybe if she was gone, you'd go back to normal,' Rallie said. 'I know you're just making all this up. Stop acting like it's so important like you actually believe in it. Maybe you have Noah fooled, but you don't fool me.'

'You promised this wouldn't happen!' she shouted. 'You promised, and then you broke your promises over and over again, and now my whole life is going to be ruined because of you!'

'You never cared about the quest!' Harper shouted back. 'You threw Skylar into the water. You threw her away like she was garbage.'

'I don't-'

'Is that what you're mad about? About Noah?'

Harper whirled on Noah. 'She looooooves you. That's her big secret. She wants you to be her boyfriend and go to the movies with her and make kissy faces. That's the only reason she even came with us.'

Noah took a step back, glancing over at Rallie, expecting her to deny it.

And it didn't matter anyway. They were all cold and miserable, and he had to do something before the fight they'd been having all along bubbled over into something so bad that it couldn't be taken back.

Her trembling hands went to cover her face. She and Harper were both shivering as hard as he was. But she didn't deny anything and he didn't have room in his brain to know how to process that. He felt a little embarrassed and a lot shocked.

Now I know why Noah is sick of you. He answered those Questions you gave him; you know. He obviously cares about the game, even if he's lying about it. He still wants to play.

He just doesn't want to play with you anymore. And you know what? I don't either. He hates you, and I hate you too.'

'Rallie-' he started, not quite sure what he was going to say, but hoping he'd figure it out as he spoke.

She shook her head, keeping her eyes on Harper. 'Of course, you would say that. You're horrible.

Then, as Harper stared at her, stunned, her skin flushed in that blotchy way it got, Rallie turned and ran from both of them. She pushed her way into the tangled brush of the woods.

'I don't hate you,' Noah told Harper. He hesitated a moment and then raced after Rallie.

He'd been hurt and mad and afraid of letting anyone see how he felt. But he'd thought they would go on being Harper and Rallie, playing the same game, being best friends, sleeping over at each other's houses.

He knew he'd been the bad friend, the liar, the one that had started everybody fighting.

He'd taken it for granted that he'd be able to go back to being friends later if he wanted, and everything would be the way he'd left it. He'd counted on that.

It didn't take long to find Rallie. She was sitting with her back against a tree, head tipped forward so that her wet braids hung in her face. He thought that maybe she'd been crying again, but he wasn't sure. The skin around her eyes was red and swollen.

But maybe he'd messed up everything.

'You didn't have to go looking for me,' she said.

He went over and sat beside her. 'Why did you say all that stuff?'

'You were really good on the boat. At sailing.' Which sounded lame now that he heard the words out loud, although it had made sense in his head.

She shook her head, not looking up. 'I don't know.'

Noah had no idea how to make things better. He wanted to ask her if it was true that she liked him, but he didn't want to make her more upset-and since she'd gotten pretty upset already, it probably was true. But he wasn't sure why she'd been willing to follow Harper onto the boat just to keep Noah from finding out. It wasn't an insult or anything. It was kind of a compliment.

She shrugged.

Noah hadn't really thought about asking a girl out in any kind of real way, but if he was going to ask a girl out to get pizza or play video games, he'd want her to be like Rallie.

The silence stretched until, unexpectedly, she broke it. 'It was fun.' She smiled lopsidedly. 'Sailing. Even if we capsized. And I can't believe you stole that boat.'

She didn't reply, and he didn't want another moment of awkwardness. He gathered his courage. 'I'm sorry about everything. We should have gone back before. You were right. I'll tell your grandmother it was all our fault.'

'We'll call the marina,' he said, only a little defensively. 'So, it'll only be stolen for a little while.' 'It doesn't matter. That's not even what I'm really mad about.' Rallie leaned her head against the tree. 'I mean, I am, but there's more.'

He waited, unsure of what she was going to say next.

Noah nodded... 'There was all that stuff with the donut guy and the crazy bus guy seeming to see her, and there was the camp getting messed up, and-and I had a dream about Skylar last night in the woods. Just like Harper. It wasn't the same dream, but it was kind of the same.'

'Do you think there's a ghost that talks to Harper?' Rallie asked. 'I'm not asking if you believe in ghosts. I'm asking if you believe in this ghost.'

'You did...?' Rallie didn't look happy to hear it.

'I should have said something before,' he told her.

'It's just-' Rallie looked down at her hands. She clenched them. 'I don't want to believe in Skylar. I don't want there to be a ghost that's talking to Harper-and now, to you.'

'You can't really be jealous-'

She cut him off, talking very fast. 'You don't understand. There can't be a ghost, a real ghost. Because if there is, then some random dead girl wants to haunt Harper, but my own dead parents can't be bothered to come back and haunt me.'

Rallie wiped her eyes with the back of one hand. They were wet and glittering with all the tears she was holding back. 'What if we bury the Princess and Skylar is really gone? What if we actually put her to rest? What if it's real? Does that mean that my parents didn't even care enough to say goodbye? I didn't even get a single stupid dream. Not one.' He felt like a jerk for not even considering it. Now that he had, he wasn't sure there was anything he could say to Rallie that wouldn't make him a bigger jerk. He was helpless.

Everything seemed to pause, as though the universe had taken a moment to draw its breath.

He remembered Rallie's parents only vaguely. He recalled sitting on a linoleum floor, playing Matchbox cars with Rallie in a sunny yellow kitchen while her mother made them toast with jam, her father wearing crazy ties to his job at the courthouse-and, of course, Noah remembered that they'd died. But he didn't think of them as dead, the way ghosts were dead. And he'd never thought about how it would be to go on a quest to dig a grave when your parents were already in one.

'Maybe after we die, we don't get choices like that.' He crouched down next to her. 'And it probably sucks to be a ghost.'

Snapping twigs made them both look up. Noah stood. Harper was walking toward them, wearing an uncomfortable expression, half relief, and half dismay.

'I think I found the way to town,' she said.

Rallie snorted, the corner of her mouth lifting. 'Maybe,' she said.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Noah and Harper and Rallie walked past him, still trailing water, their shoes making squelching sounds. Harper hugged the Princess to her chest, the dollie's face turned so that he couldn't see if her cheeks had grown even rosier. Next, they passed a gaming store with a few bikes leaned against the pavement and a couple more chained to a nearby STOP sign. And finally, they came to a diner, the only restaurant they'd seen that was open.

They stopped to gaze at the menu on the door.

'I have four dollars and twenty-five cents-aside from the bus fare home,' Noah said. 'How much do you guys have?'

ALTHOUGH THE MAIN STREET OF EAST EATON was full of big store windows and shops, many were no longer open at all. There was a place called Pants Unlimited that was covered in flyers advertising FINAL SALE! on everything, since they were going out of business, but by the aged look of the flyers, they might have been going out of business for years. The store owner stood in the doorway, smoking a cigarette.

'That I can spend?' said Harper. 'Zero.'

'Eight seventy-five,' said Rallie, pushing up her dress to rifle through the pockets of the jeans she had on underneath.

'So, not much before we start dipping into our bus fare home,' Harper said... 'But something...'

Rallie looked grim at the mention of the bus, but didn't say anything, which was good, but also made Noah nervous. All the way from the woods, the three of them had only said things having to do with figuring out where they were going. He couldn't decide if the girls didn't want to fight anymore or if they were gearing up for an even bigger fight that was about to come.

Somehow, he'd become at the center of their conflict, and he could tell it was just a matter of time before they figured out that they didn't have to be mad at each other-he was the one they should both be mad at. He was the one who had messed up the game, the one who had hidden the Questions, the one who Rallie-the one who Rallie liked, which was weird too? It wasn't like he hadn't thought about girls or even as he'd never thought about Rallie like that. He had. But actually, asking her out? The idea was paralyzing.

'Okay,' Noah said, pushing open the door to the diner. 'Let's go in.'

A woman standing behind the register, her white hair in short beauty-parlor curls, looked them up and down skeptically, as though she was trying to decide if they were trouble. 'You can't track mud all over the place,' she said finally.

The dinner was warm, with a round display of desserts near the register that turned, showing huge cakes and pies piled with icing and oozing filling. There were little glass dishes of Jell-O and others of rice pudding studded with raisins, each one covered in plastic wrap.

Noah could smell something frying in the back, and his stomach lurched with hunger.

'Sorry,' said Rallie, taking a step forward, putting on her best-acting face. 'We were out racing our sailboat and got really into it. A little too much, I guess. We just wanted to get something warm to eat before we go back. The water was really cold.'

The woman behind the register smiled, like the idea of healthy outdoor activity had made their mud-stained appearance wholesome. Or maybe she figured that kids with sailboats had money, however bad they looked. 'Well, okay, but you go dry off in the back first. Table for four?'

'Three,' Rallie said, and the woman blinked in confusion.

Noah narrowed his eyes at the dollie, hanging limply in Harper's arms.

'Come on.' Harper took Rallie's arm and hauled her toward the bathrooms. As she walked, she looked back at the white-haired woman at the register. 'Table for four is fine.'

Noah went into the men's bathroom. There was a row of three urinals and a single stall, all in baby-Jon tile, with paintings of the Ohio River in the olden days hanging high on the walls. He walked over to the sinks, took off his shoes, and rinsed them off. Then he took off his jeans, wiped dirt and bits of grass from the cuffs, and tried to dry them the best he could with a combination of paper towels and a hand dryer.

They stuck to his legs, damp and chill. He looked back into the mirror, seeing a slightly sunburnt boy looking back at him, older than he remembered himself, with a familiar mess of brown-black hair and black eyes that seemed to say: I hope you know what you're doing.

Finally, he wrung out his shirt over one of the sinks, hand-combed his wet hair, and put his jeans back on.

When he left the bathroom, Rallie and Harper were already sitting in a banquette. They waved in his direction, and he slid in just as their waitress arrived.

She was only a little older than they were, with pink lipstick, blunt-cut black hair, and a nose ring. Handing over the menus, she paused to stare at the Princess, lolling beside Harper.

'Super scary.'

'Your dollie?'

The waitress said, pointing. Dirt from the riverbed was in the grooves of her nose and mouth and was turning her blond ringlets into thick clumps.

'Oh, yeah,' said Rallie, with a dark look in Harper's direction. 'The scariest.'

The waitress smiled, handed them the menus, and walked off. Noah was just glad that it seemed like she was seeing a dollie, instead of whatever Kanth Jones, the donut guy, and the Girl at the register had seen. He pushed the thought out of his mind and studied the menu. They had twelve seventy-five that they could spend and still get home-and that was budgeting on loaning Harper a quarter for her bus fare.

There were biscuits and eggs in white sausage gravy with hash browns, maybe big enough for them to split two plates three ways, for five dollars. But there was also a turkey bacon club sandwich that came with fries and slaw for a little more than seven dollars, and if they got water with that instead of sodas, and figured on a tip of a dollar, they would still have money left over. And there were the three eggs with hash browns and toast for three ninety-five-just enough that they couldn't afford it all around.

There was a bowl of chili for two ninety-five that seemed promising. You could get a side of fries for another two-fifty. Maybe if they got three orders of chili and one side of fries?

Thinking about what they could afford to eat was making his mouth water. If they didn't figure out something soon, he was going to order it all and have no way home.

'Be right back,' Rallie said, and headed off toward the counter, leaving him alone at the table with Harper.

'Maybe you should go after her,' Noah said. 'Talk.'

'Maybe you should go after her,' Harper told him, pushing loose strands of wet hair behind her ears.

Noah sighed. 'Don't be like that.'

'Don't be like what?' She stared at him unblinkingly. 'Are you going to tell me why you answered all those questions and then lied about it? Why you wouldn't play even one more time?'

'That doesn't make any sense.' She folded her arms and balanced her chin on them, watching him. 'I couldn't,' Noah said.

'I know,' he said miserably. 'I thought it would be easier-'

He broke off as Rallie came back to the table, holding a bottle of ketchup and another bottle of hot sauce. She opened her menu, scanning the prices.

'There are free refills on the sodas,' she said. 'We could get one and share it.'

'I asked about the bus, too,' Rallie said, not looking at any of them. 'Next one comes tomorrow, same time as today. I got directions to the stop. It's a couple of miles from here.'

'And be out a dollar seventy-five,' Noah said.

Harper was silent, worrying her lower lip with her teeth. The Princess's dark eyes shone in her mud-streaked face, and Noah couldn't help thinking that everything was going exactly the way she wanted it to, even if he had no proof of that.

Noah wondered if it was closer to where they'd fallen into the river, whether they'd gone the wrong way, whether they could have made it after all, but he didn't ask.

Noah felt better, having eaten something since the donut. Harper and Rallie must have felt better too because they were able to agree on the chili and fries, which they devoured down to the last little burnt, ketchup-and-hot-sauce-covered crisp of fry.

They were still studying the menu when the waitress came back around to take their drink order (tap water) and placed a basket of bread and margarine on the table. They fell on it, ripping apart the rolls, spreading them with margarine, and stuffing them into their mouths.

'I'm so tired,' Rallie said, putting her head down on the table. 'All the walking and the swimming and the being cold and miserable. I could go to sleep right here. Seriously, under this table. It would be more comfortable than sleeping on the ground was.'

'I know,' Rallie said, groaning. 'I'm stuck here, so I'm in for finishing the quest. But are we seriously going to a cemetery at night and digging a grave?'

'We're almost done,' Harper said softly. 'We've almost made it.'

Noah looked out the window at the street. The sun was still in the sky, but it wouldn't be for long. Rallie was right. By the time they figured out where they were going and actually got there, it would probably be pretty late.

'If we are going to go tonight, we need to get supplies,' said Noah. 'Something to dig with and a flashlight. All that stuff was in our backpacks, and now it's at the bottom of the Ohio River.'

Rallie inhaled sharply, and Noah followed her gaze. She was staring at the dollie. Its head was turned like it was looking out the window. Harper was looking in the same direction, mirroring the dollie's pose perfectly.

'Harper,' he said. 'Stop messing around.'

She turned back to look at them like she was oblivious. He hadn't seen her turn the Princess's head toward the window, but she must have. The dollie didn't move on its own-had never left the case, needed them to bring it to the grave. It didn't move. 'What...?'

Except for that time in the woods.

He really hoped it didn't move.

'You know where we're going, right? You know which cemetery we're going to, right?' He thought back to the moment before they got on the bus back home and how he'd asked her almost the sapphire thing. The grave is under a willow tree. Skylar will tell us the rest.

Rallie looked about to say something scathing.

Harper nodded, not looking at either of them. 'Yeah.'

'You do, right?' Rallie asked.

'Of course,' Harper said, meeting their eyes, looking from Noah to Rallie. 'I just need a map.'

They paid the check with everything but the bus fare home, dumping the grimy pennies from the bottom of their pockets on the other coins and bills. The waitress smiled at them on the way out, and Noah smiled back, even though he knew they were completely broke.

Noah would have liked her to seem more confident, but then he would have liked her to stop being so crazy about the Princess and also maybe to stop acting like she might be occasionally possessed. Noah would have liked a lot of things.

'Hey,' Rallie said, reaching down past circulars and coupon flyers near the door to pick up a crude tourist map. It didn't have any graveyards on it, but it did have the pottery museum, a few antique pottery stores, and the Carnegie Library. 'Is this any good?'

'The library,' Noah said. 'They'll have really detailed maps. We could use this to get there.'

They walked down a few blocks until the library came into view, its stately front looking out onto the water. It was domed on top, with red stone making up the body and carved white stone trim on the windows.

According to the tourist map, the library wasn't far. Now that she was a bit drier and had eaten something, Rallie seemed almost cheerful. He guessed that at this point there was no way she wasn't getting in trouble, so maybe she'd just stopped worrying about it. She took the lead, Harper trailing behind Noah, holding the Princess as though the dollie had become very heavy.

'Who closes a library on the weekend?' Harper said, kicking one of the steps softly with the toe of her shoe.

It looked out of place, too grand for what surrounded it. It was also closed. It had been closed since one in the afternoon and wasn't due to open again until Monday morning.

Noah shrugged, then turned to see what Rallie thought. She was crouched near a basement window, pushing on the glass.

The window slid up a little way, and Rallie wedged her boot into the open space, scrambling to push it higher. It seemed stuck; probably the wood had swollen from changes in temperature and is unopened for years. 'What does it look like?' She said.

'What are you doing?' he whispered.

'Breaking into a government-owned building that we could get arrested for being inside of.'

'Well,' Harper said. 'Okay then.'

'Yup,' she said as the window slid up abruptly with a squeal. 'That's exactly what I'm doing.'

Rallie shimmied inside, hesitating once she was perched on the inner sill. The room was too shadowed for them to see what she was about to drop down onto.

'Rallie!' Harper yelled.

She jumped... There was a crash and a sound like something metal hitting the floor.

'Rallie,' Noah said warningly.

'Sh-h-h-h-h,' Rallie called back from the darkness, smugness filling her voice. 'See, I'm not so bad at quests after all.'

'That was amazing,' Noah said. 'Exactly what Girl Jann would do.'

'Well, come on then, Tommy sings.' Rallie's voice, from the dark, was eerily changed. It was like he was talking to Rallie and the character she played at the same time. For a moment he wasn't sure who that made him. And at that moment he wasn't sure who he wanted to be either, but he was grinning like an idiot.

He glanced back at Harper. She looked crushed like she was on the outside of glass looking in at something she wanted desperately. For a moment he felt bad, but he was too happy to feel that way for long. It was fun to act like Tommesings with Rallie, and it was fun to sneak into a building in the middle of the day when even scary things weren't that frightening. They were playing, and he could tell she knew that if she tried to play too, he'd stop. 'Desk,' she said. 'Wait a second.'

'What did you land on?' He called to Rallie, moving to slide his legs through.

He heard rustling and something else tip over, crashing and hitting the floor. Then the lights flickered to life, revealing a room filled with metal desks and filing cabinets, their surfaces covered in mounds of paper. Some kind of administrative storage area.

'Wow, what is all this stuff?' he asked, walking through space. Books were piled up next to lamps and old black-and-white photographs of the town in tidy black frames with engraved plates. Noah kicked off the wall, jumping wide of the desk that Rallie had probably hit; the paper was scattered around it, and one of its desk lamps was lying just above the floor, dangling from a cord. He landed near a tall filing cabinet, nearly stumbling into it as he tried not to lose his balance.

A bookshelf had been shoved against the back wall, and one of the shelves was filled with old pottery.

It was exhilarating to be somewhere they weren't supposed to be. Like being on the boat. A real adventure, like Tommesings and Girl Jann, would have had.

'Hey! Come take Skylar,' Harper called, holding out the dollie as she shimmied down through the window.

He did, putting the Princess on top of one of the cabinets. Lying on her side, the dollie's eyes watched Noah accusingly as he helped Harper down. As he did, a gust of cold wind blew through the room, scattering papers.

'We're not going to be able to close that without a ladder,' Rallie said, pointing at the window.

'It's too high up.'

Noah bumped his arm against Rallie's as they followed her. 'I guess you're not going to loot the place, huh, Jann?'

'We won't be here long,' said Harper, picking up the Princess and walking toward the door. 'Let's wait and see what we find upstairs,' she told him, grinning, as they stepped into the darkened hall.

The basement of the library was warm and smelled like wood polish and old paper.

Plus, there was so much to see. They explored the conference room, the bathrooms, and two more storage rooms on the basement level. There was an exhibit of china vases behind glass, and the whole cabinet shook gently as they ran past. Noah inhaled deeply. He felt like he could relax for the first time since they'd gotten on the bus.

They weren't cold and exposed as they'd been outside, and they weren't in front of people who could get them in trouble, the way they had been in the donut shop and at the dinner, or hanging on for their lives as they'd been on the boat.

Then they jogged up the steps and saw the vaulted ceilings, iron railings, and marble of the main floor. According to a legend on the wall, Carnegie was a famous philanthropist who'd been born super poor in a small Scottish town, made money in steel and used it to build libraries on the East Coast, among other good-deed-type things. In the picture, he looked like an angry old man with a short beard.

He didn't look like the kind of guy who liked stories, but Noah thought he must have had to, to have built so many libraries.

'Hey,' Harper said, calling to him from the second floor, where there was a rotunda that looked down on the reference desk on the first floor. 'Come check this out!'

He grinned and ran for the stairs, quest forgotten.

There was something about being alone in an empty building. There was something about racing up the stairs and hanging over the balcony, your shout bouncing off the walls. Noah and Harper and Rallie dashed through the upstairs gallery, through the big rooms. And without really ever saying so, they started playing. Not their old game, which was still contentious, although Rallie and Noah slipping into those characters on the way in made it easier to slip into new ones.

First Harper and Noah pretended to be monsters hiding in their library lair when Rallie as the monster hunter came in. When they got tired of that, they went behind the back of the reference desk and rifled through the drawers, finding-in addition to pens, pencils, a flash drive, and a bunch of rubber bands-a pair of blue hoop earrings, a mystery novel with the cover ripped off, and an eraser in the shape of a delete key. At the desk, Noah was even able to call the marina and leave the promised message about the boat while Harper looked on.

She chased them around for a while, trying to slay them, before they ganged up and chased her back, threatening to turn her into a monster too. They slid across the floor in their stocking feet, hiding behind stacks and riding on the book carts, shrieking as they went.

Rallie found a break room with a small kitchenette. There was a coffeepot, tea bags and sugar packets, and a refrigerator that contained five slightly wrinkly apples, a low-fat yogurt, a dry-looking hunk of cheddar, and a nearly full package of Oreos. Four folding chairs surrounded a table covered in review copies of books that hadn't been released yet.

'Look at this!' Harper held up a book they'd all been waiting for one that wasn't due out for months.

'And no one's going to be in until Monday,' Noah said, sitting in one of the chairs and stretching out, dumping his damp jacket onto the table. 'We can sleep here tonight. We are going to be warm and dry, and it's going to be amazing.'

'We still have to go to the graveyard, remember?' Harper stood, all the giddy joy draining out of her. 'We can't get comfortable.'

Rallie snickered. He smiled up at the ceiling stupidly.

He sighed. It was true that he didn't want to go out into the cold either. And now that the end of the quest was so close, some part of him didn't want it to be over. He didn't want to go out into the graveyard and find out there wasn't any magic after all. It seemed easier to goof around in the stacks and worry about burying the Princess in the morning.

And just like that, all the fun of running around the library was over. Rallie's mouth pressed into a thin, resentful line as Harper stalked off toward the main room. Their feud was back on.

Rallie looked after Harper, scowling.

Noah stood up, pacing the small room. 'You guys have to make up. You're friends. You're supposed to be friends. You can't just talk, or talk in the weird not-talking way you've both been.'

Rallie shook her head. 'You don't understand. It's just-it's easy for Harper. She wants this one thing, and I better want it too. Either I'm with her or against her, you know? And she's like that about everything.'

'I don't think it's easy for her,' Noah said.

Rallie sighed. 'If she wants to be friends, then she can say so. I get that the quest is important, but it seems like maybe it's the only important thing.'

He found Harper at a long table, where she'd spread out several maps, an atlas, and a guidebook. She was standing on a chair, looking down on all of it. The Princess was resting at one end, lying on her side, limp arms outstretched.

Noah sighed again and opened the door to the main room of the library.

'Did you find it?' Noah asked.

She turned with a start. She must not have heard him come in.

'Here,' she said, stepping onto the table and walking over to one of the maps, where she crouched down and pointed. 'Spring Grove Cemetery.'

'You're sure?' asked Rallie, and it was Noah's turn to be surprised. He hadn't expected that she would follow him.

'I didn't have an aerial view in my dreams, but it looks right,' Harper said. 'We should go to tonight. There might be streetlights down there, and the moon is pretty full. Even without a flashlight, I think we can find her grave. And then it's over. I promise.'

'I'll copy the map,' Harper said.

Rallie rolled her eyes.

'Okay,' said Noah. 'Get me when you're ready.' He picked up a book of local history that Harper must have pulled from the stacks, and walked off toward a couple of couches he'd spotted near the picture-book section.

Flopping down, he flipped through the book, skimming over the section on local folklore. And there was a girl who got stood up on her wedding day and was found, weeks later, dead in her wedding gown. Legend had it that her bleached white skeleton ran around playing in traffic and grabbing people.

When Noah got bored, he slipped pieces of paper, on which he'd written cryptic words, between the pages. There wasn't any mention of a Skylar Stella or a haunted dollie, but there was a story about a Dutch girl who haunted a canal lock and a creepy little boy who hung himself.

A little while later he heard the quiet murmur of voices and hoped that meant that Harper and Rallie were making up. He thought that maybe he would just close his eyes for a second.

After all, they were going to be digging up a grave, and they were going to have to do it with scissors or sticks or whatever other tools they could find. THIS TIME HE dreamed that he was lying on a lawn, looking up at a big house. He couldn't get his legs to move. There was something wrong with his vision. It was darkening at the edges, but he could see enough to notice that there were shattered remains of porcelain dollies all around him.

It was going to be hard work. But it was going to get done; Noah was sure about that. So, he needed to rest a little. He leaned back on the couch, turning his cheek against the crook of his arm.

And then he heard a voice, which he knew to be Skylar's father. 'She looks just like one of them. She looks just like a broken dollie.'

WHEN HE WOKE up, a woman he didn't know was standing over him. She looked like she was about to scream, but he beat her to it.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

THE WOMAN BROUGHT HER THIN ARMS UP Defensively, as though his shouting was some kind of attack. He scrambled up onto the couch and then over it, landing on the other side. She blinked owlishly behind her bright-green glasses. She was about his mother's age, with short, curly, bright-pink hair.

Above her, light streamed in from the windows. It was Sunday morning. He'd slept through the whole night.

'Who are you?' Noah asked the woman.

Looking around, he spotted Harper and Rallie lying on the other couch, heads pillowed on opposite sides. They were both opening their eyes. Harper pushed herself up.

'I work here,' she said. 'I'm a librarian. I came in on the weekend like I always do I have to do my orders for new books, and it's easier when there aren't any patrons. Now, do you want to tell me what you three are doing here? And are you alone? I thought I heard something downstairs.' 'It's just us,' said Rallie, rubbing her face. 'We left the window open. You probably heard the wind.'

'Um,' Noah said, still dazed from sleep. Answers deserted him.

The librarian peered at the three of them more closely. 'You're lucky I didn't immediately call the police. How old are you?'

She turned to Rallie and Harper. 'Where exactly do your parents think you are?'

His brain was finally catching up to what was going on, and he realized just how much trouble they were in. 'Twelve,' he said.

Rallie shrugged.

'Well, we're going to go into the office and we're going to call them right now, okay? And you better not have vandalized this place, or I'm going to change my mind and call the cops after all.'

'We didn't mess up anything,' Harper said. 'Look around and see if we're telling the truth, and then if we are, you can let us go. We won't be any more trouble.'

Harper didn't seem to be holding her, which was unusual. He thought about the last time he'd woken up and found the Princess not where she'd been the night before, but when he glanced around the library, nothing else seemed amiss. The couches hadn't been ripped; there was no scattered stuffing and no tossed packages of food from the break room.

Adrenaline spiked through Noah. He considered running. If they all sprinted for the doors, he was pretty certain they'd make it. Rallie's shoes were off, which was a problem, but maybe she could grab them. And then there was the dollie.

'It's either we call your parents,' the pink-haired librarian said, 'or we call the police.'

'Come on in the back and I'll make you a cup of tea,' the pink-haired librarian said. 'You all look like you could use it.'

By that point, though, he'd lost his chance. The librarian was waving them up off the couches, and he couldn't catch either girl's eye, so if he ran, he wasn't sure they'd follow.

They must have seemed pretty scruffy as they shuffled to the break room in the same clothes they'd been wearing for a day and two nights. The cat ears on Rallie's hoodie were bent at odd angles, and there was ink smeared across Harper's cheek like maybe one of the pens she'd been using had started to bleed. Noah wondered if the librarian thought they were homeless kids. He wondered if telling her they were would make her let them go.

'You don't know?' Noah asked. He looked around again, as though somehow the dollie was going to materialize out of the ether.

Halfway across the library floor, Harper stopped. 'Wait, where's the Princess?' Her voice was high-pitched, panicked.

'A dollie,' Noah said. 'She's really old. Harper must have lost her.'

The librarian raised her eyebrows, as though waiting for an explanation.

'Well, where did you have her last?' Rallie asked Harper.

'Before that, she was on the map table,' Noah put in. 'Maybe you forgot-'

'I brought her with me when I went to the couch,' she said. 'I know I did. She was right there next to me when I went to sleep.'

'I saw the dollie,' Rallie interrupted, 'when we went to sleep. Someone must have gotten up and moved her.'

Harper started to go look when the librarian caught her arm.

'All of you,' she said with an impressive firmness. 'You will go into the break room, and then we'll deal with the missing dollie and your parents and everything else. The library is closed. If the dollie is here, we'll find it. Meanwhile, it's not going anywhere. Now, let's go.'

Noah really hoped the dollie wasn't going anywhere.

'I'm Jatherner Rausse,' she said. 'You may call me Miss Jatherner. Not Kathy, Jatherner.'

They sat down on folding chairs around the break-room table as the librarian put on the electric kettle. She looked through the cabinets until she found a package of Fig Newtons, which she ripped open and put in front of them.

'I'm Harper,' Harper said. 'Harper Bell. And this is Rallie Magnaye and Noah Ethan.'

Steam rose from each, along with the comforting smell of bruised leaves. 'We don't have milk, but I'll put the sugar on the table. Now, I am going to call my director and inform her of what's going on. I am going to lock this door, but I will be right back, so if you need to use the bathroom or anything, I promise that I will take you as soon as I return.'

'Very melodic names,' said the librarian, pulling mugs out of a cupboard. The water had heated quickly, so she was able to take out tea bags, drop one in each mug, and fill them with boiling water.

She went out, leaving them alone, the click of the latch signaling that she wasn't kidding about locking them inside.

Noah had no idea how they were going to get out of the break room. No idea how they were going to find the Princess. No idea how they were going to do anything but go home in disgrace, their quest forever undone. The idea of stopping now, though, when they were so close, grated on Noah. It drove him nuts that if they'd just gone to the graveyard last night-if he'd just been less lazy- the quest might be over and done.

Harper peered at her mug. Then, abruptly, she wiped her eyes with the back of one hand. 'I'm sorry,' she said.

Rallie sighed. 'It's not your fault. I'm the one who broke in.'

'And I'm the one who fell asleep,' Noah said. 'You're the one who kept reminding us, Harper. It's not your fault-'

Harper cut him off. 'That's not what I mean. I thought that we could do this thing, and when it was over we'd have something that no one else had an experience that would keep us together. 'You're going to be too busy thinking about boys and trying out for school plays and whatever to remember. It's like you're both forgetting everything. You're forgetting who you are. I thought this would remind you. And I'm sorry because it was stupid. I was stupid.' I can see you changing.' She turned to Noah. 'You're going to be one of those guys who hang out with their teammates and dates cheerleaders and don't remember what it was like to make up stuff. And you-' She whirled on Rallie.

'That's not fair,' Rallie said.

'Yeah, I didn't forget,' said Noah. Harper sounded just like his dad, except in reverse. He didn't want to forget, and he wanted everyone to stop talking like it was inevitable, like it would happen whether he wanted it to or not.

Rallie rolled her eyes. 'We're not zombies just because we like the stuff you don't.'

'No, you're right,' Harper said, her voice speeding up and getting louder like she was afraid she was going to be cut off before she got it all out. 'It's not fair. We had a story, and our story was important. And I hate that both of you can just walk away and take part of my story with you and not even care. I hate that you can do what you're supposed to do and I can't. Noah and Rallie were quiet for a long moment.

I hate that you're going to leave me behind. I hate that everyone calls it growing up, but it seems like dying. It feels like each of you is being possessed and I'm next.'

There was a long silence.

Before they could speak, the door opened and Miss Jatherner came in. Her glasses were hanging around her neck from a chain, and she looked a little nervous. 'I am going to assume that means we're going with the original plan.' She nodded to herself, her pink curls bouncing as she did. 'Now, who wants to call home first?'

'Well,' she said, 'the director wants me to tell you that if there's something wrong at home, we can call social services instead of your parents.'

Rallie stood up, pushing her chair back. 'I'll go. My grandmother's probably worried.'

'You sure?' Harper said. 'I can call first if you want.'

Rallie gave her a withering look. 'No, that's okay. Don't do me any favors.'

When they were gone, Noah drank his tea and ate five Fig Newtons, although they tasted like nothing in his mouth. He chewed and swallowed automatically.

'Are you mad at me?' Harper asked.

'How much trouble do you think she's going to get in?' Harper asked him.

'No,' Noah said. Then, after considering it a little more, 'Maybe.'

She slumped at the table and rested her head in a gesture that mirrored his. He thought about the way they'd all been friends for so long that they even shared mannerisms. He thought about how they'd met, years ago.

'Lots,' he said, putting his head down on his arms.

He thought about what Harper had said about growing up and losing themselves.

And how bad it would be if Rallie got in so much trouble that they could never see her again.

And how awful it would be if Rallie and Harper never made up.

He thought about what his mother and father were going to say when he called, and what he could possibly say back.

He was still thinking about those things when the door opened and Rallie came back in, wearing shoes. She looked grim.

He thought about the stories, all the stories. The ones they'd made up and the ones they never had.

'How was it?' Noah asked Rallie after a long moment. She had been fiddling with the electric kettle switch, turning it on and then off again, seeming lost in thought.

'Okay, Harper,' Miss Jatherner said. 'Your turn.'

Harper stood up and went out with only a single glance back.

'Oh,' she said. 'Weird... My aunt Linda was there. Grandma had called her. She'd wanted to go out looking for me yesterday after I didn't come back, but she knew she couldn't see very well at night. She was mad, but I don't know, she sounded different. Like she realized she was old for the first time.'

'You think you're going to be grounded forever?' Noah asked.

He didn't want to never see Rallie again. Before he chickened out, he blurted out the words. 'So, if I asked you to go to the movies with me or something-'

'Oh, yeah,' Rallie said. 'Forever and a day. Even if she lets Aunt Linda help out more.'

She leaned against the counter, glancing over at him, a smile lifting one corner of her mouth. 'Are you asking me out?'

'Yeah,' he said, wiping his hands on his jeans. His palms had started to sweat. 'Yes. Will you-'

'Yes,' she cut him off, saying the word very quickly, not looking at him. He wondered if she felt as awkward as he did. He was glad he asked and he was glad she said yes, but he was also glad she was grounded, so it wouldn't be happening soon.

The door opened, and they both jumped. Harper came in and threw herself into one of the folding chairs. She looked, if anything, even more, upset than Rallie had.

'You okay?' Noah asked.

'I need a ride,' Harper mumbled, putting her head in her hands again.

'What?' Rallie asked.

He stood and walked toward the door. As he was going out, he looked back at Harper. Rallie was standing behind her chair, hand on her shoulder. And at that moment he realized that he didn't want them to have to go back never having completed the quest. He wanted them to finish this thing the way Harper had imagined: together.

'I couldn't get my dad, and my mom's working until late. She asked if one of your folks could drive me.'

Miss Jatherner topped up her cup with more hot water. 'Noah, it's your turn.'

He watched as the librarian locked the break-room door. Then he followed her through the library to an office on the third floor, where there was a small desk, piled with more review copies of books and papers, scattered with pens. A folding chair with a padded seat rested in front of it and a cloth chair on wheels behind it.

'Have a seat,' she said, sitting down behind the desk. She picked up the phone and handed it over to him. 'You dial the number, but I need to talk to your parents. I'll tell them where you are, and then I'll hand you the phone. I'll go outside to give you some privacy unless you want me to stay here, okay?'

He nodded.

He reminded himself that he wouldn't care if they were upset. He was still mad about what his dad had done and how little his mother had cared. If he kept that in the front of his thoughts, then nothing they could say would bother him. He just wouldn't care.

The librarian took the receiver and started explaining how she'd found Noah sleeping on the couch in the Carnegie Public Library in East Eaton-yes, East Eaton, Ohio-and yes, he was fine, he had two friends with him, and they were fine too. She gave the address of the library and some abbreviated directions.

Then she held out the phone to him.

He wiped his hands against his jeans and hoped it was true. He dialed and handed the phone over.

Noah took it and brought it slowly to his ear as Miss Jatherner went out the door, closing it softly behind her. 'Mom?' Noah said.

'It's me,' said his father. 'You all right?'

Noah's heart sped. 'Yeah, like she said. I'm fine.'

'I never meant to make you feel like you had to run away,' Noah's dad said softly. As soon as his father had picked up, Noah had expected a lot of shouting and the phone getting slammed in its cradle. But his father didn't sound angry. Noah wasn't sure why, but more than anything else, his dad sounded scared.

'That's not what I was doing,' he said. 'I was on a quest. I was going to come back to when I was finished.' Once Noah said the words, he knew they were true. He would have gone back. He'd just needed a little break.

There was a long pause on the other end of the line, as though his father was not quite sure how to respond. 'So, this quest,' he said finally, tentatively. 'Are you done with it now?'

'Not yet,' said Noah. 'I thought I was, but I don't think that I am.'

'We're going to get in the car, and we're going to be there in two and a half hours. Do you think you'll be finished then?'

'I don't know.'

'Your mother's been really worried. You want to talk to her?'

Noah wanted to tell her that everything was okay, that he was fine, but he didn't want to hear her voice and realize how much he'd upset her. 'No,' he said after a moment. 'See you when you get here.'

His father gave a heavy sigh. 'You know I don't understand you.'

'You don't have to.' Noah just wanted the conversation over, before either of them said something awful.

'I want to,' his father said.

Noah snorted.

There was a long silence on the other end of the line. 'I'm not good at this kind of thing, but even though I don't always get things and your mother tells me I don't know how to talk, I wanted to tell you that I've been thinking about what I did with those toys ever since it happened. It was a mean thing to do. I grew up mean, and I don't want you to have to grow up mean too.'

Noah was silent. He'd never heard his father talk that way before.

'When I saw you with those figures, I pictured you getting hassled at school. I thought you needed to be tougher. But I've been thinking that protecting somebody by hurting them before someone else gets the chance isn't the kind of protection that anybody wants.'

'So, I'll see you soon,' his father told him. 'Good luck with the quest.' He said the word as though it was a strange, unfamiliar shape in his mouth, but he said it.

'Yeah,' Noah said. It was all he could bring himself to say. He had no idea his father thought about anything like this. All the anger had drained out of him, leaving him feeling as fragile as one of those paper-thin china cups.

'Bye, Dad,' said Noah, and hung up the phone.

He sat there for a long moment, breathing hard. Something had shifted, something seismic, and he needed to be still long enough to have it settle inside of him. Then he stood up and went out the door.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Noah looked under the sofa the girls had slept on and then under the one where he'd fallen asleep-after all, the last time he'd woken up, the dollie was resting right next to his head.

He knelt down with a shudder at the thought of her lying directly underneath where he'd slept, as though she might reach up to her tiny porcelain hands and drag him down through the couch cushions. She wasn't there, though.

The Princess wasn't under the table, either. She wasn't in any of the chairs, nor anywhere obvious on the rug. She wasn't anywhere he could see.

MISS JATHERNER WAS SHELVING A FEW BOOKS NEARBY and put them back on the cart when he emerged from the office. Her pink hair was as bright as the synthetic mane of a plastic horse.

'Everything okay?' She asked him.

'They're coming,' Noah said, trying to put the strangeness of his father's words behind him. 'Did you see Harper's dollie?'

She shook her head. 'I walked by the table where you left all those maps, but there was nothing else there. Do you want to take a look at yourself?'

Noah nodded and followed her to the couches. He noticed her shoes for the first time, bright yellow with bows. She didn't look like any librarian he'd ever seen before. In fact, she didn't look like an adult he'd met before.

He didn't feel her either, didn't sense the gaze of her dull eyes watching him from some corner of the room, the way he had when she was in the cabinet in Harper's living room.

While he searched, Miss Jatherner started gathering up the books and maps Harper had left on the table the night before.

'What was it that your kids were trying to find?' the librarian asked, frowning at him. He could tell that Miss Jatherner didn't know what to make of the story about the dollie. He wasn't sure that she even believed there was a dollie. If not, he wondered what she thought he was looking for.

He shrugged. 'Nothing.'

'It looks like someone was doing research on a cemetery near here,' said Miss Jatherner gently. 'Spring Grove? I saw a few pieces of copy paper with directions drawn on them and scratched out. What's in Spring Grove Cemetery? You can tell me, Noah. I promise that I'll try to understand.'

That felt a little too real, there is a potter with a grisly story.

'Downstairs?' Noah took a few steps across the library floor before Miss Jatherner cleared her throat.

'I don't think so,' Miss Jatherner said. 'I let you look around, but enough is-a enough. Come on.'

'Have you ever heard a story, a ghost story, about a girl who jumped off her roof?' He hesitated, pressing the front of his sneaker against one of the legs of the table. He wanted to trust her, but he knew he couldn't trust her too much-she'd never believed him if he told her everything. 'Like under mysterious circumstances? Maybe one named Skylar Stella.'

Miss Jatherner shook her head. 'The only Stella I can think of was a fancy worker-a very well-known potter locally. We even have a display of his work downstairs, courtesy of the museum. There was a grisly story about him, but I don't know about any Skylar Stella.'

Noah remembered the wall of fragile-looking vases he'd seen in the basement. He'd run past them, not really looking at them, and now he was itching to know what he'd missed. He had to get down there. He had to. His heart started to pound with renewed hope. Maybe there was a secret there-a secret that might not help them to finish the quest but would prove that it was a real one. A real quest for a real ghost.

He concentrated on that as the librarian led him back to the break room and opened the door with the key sticking out of the lock. Inside, the girls were sitting at opposite ends of the table wearing near-identical expressions of worry.

'I am going to call the director back,' Miss Jatherner said, with a bright smile that might have been forced. 'Let her know that everything's been resolved. Then we'll figure out some lunch for your kids. It's almost noon.'

'Thank you,' Rallie said quietly.

'Thank you,' Harper and Noah echoed automatically.

The librarian went out, and Noah waited until he heard the turn of the key in the lock. Then he put both his hand's palm down on the table like he was going to give a speech.

'Okay,' he said, looking from one friend to the other. 'We need a plan. We need to break out of this room before the librarian comes back.'

Rallie stood up, looking a little confused, but hopeful. 'How?'

'It doesn't matter,' Harper said, staying seated. 'We don't have the Princess anymore. Even if we get out of here and I have no idea how we could do that we can't finish the quest without her.'

'We'll find her,' said Noah. 'I looked around where we were sleeping, and she wasn't there, but that doesn't mean anything. We can find her. We can do this. Are you sure you didn't bring her with you anywhere else? Anywhere?'

Harper shook her head. It seemed to Noah that giving them that speak about all the stuff she hated had drained away from the part of her that had driven her this far. Or maybe it was losing the Princess. Either way, Harper looked more defeated than he'd ever seen her. 'No. When I sat down on the couch, she was with me. I was worried about rolling over on her since she's so fragile, so I put her on the floor and hung my hand down to keep touching her. I would have known if someone moved her.'

'Creepy,' Rallie said. 'What is it with you and the Princess? You're always holding her and touching her. Don't you find the whole she-was-made-from-human-bones thing even a little bit, like, scary?'

Harper gave her a look.

'I don't mean it like that,' said Rallie. 'Not like you're being weird. Are you sure she's not doing something for you? Making you act like what she wants?'

'Oh, so now you believe in the possibility of a ghost,' Harper sneered.

He leaned against the wall, folding his arms and trying to concentrate. They could tell Miss Jatherner they had to go to use the bathroom all of them at the same time and then sneak out the window. The only problem was that Miss Jatherner probably wouldn't let them all use the bathroom at once. Well, that and the fact that the windows in the basement were really far up the wall; they'd had to drop down during the climb in. And just one more problem-he wasn't sure there was a window in the girls' bathroom.

'We'll find the Princess,' Noah insisted, interrupting before they started fighting again. 'Just as soon as we figure a way out of this room. Which we will. In just a second an idea is going to come to me, and it's going to be a good one.'

Rallie stared up at the ceiling. Then she stepped onto one of the folding chairs, and from there onto the table.

'What are you doing?' Harper asked.

Rallie went up on her toes and shoved at one of the ceiling tiles. It moved over, showing the metal grid that suspended it. Beyond was only darkness, like the gap left by a missing tooth. 'I have an idea,' she said. 'Look at how low the ceiling is in here. And look at the door-it's different from the others; the knob is really shiny.'

'So?' Noah said, walking over and frowning at what she was doing.

'Everything else in the building is old, but here everything's new. This was built recently. I bet the drop ceiling hides an older, high ceiling, and there might be some venting or something to crawl through in the new wall.'

'You're really going to go up there?' Noah asked.

'Brace the table and I will,' Rallie said. 'It'll be just like climbing the monkey bars on the playground back in elementary.'

Noah stared at her in awed amazement. 'Do you even think this will work?' He asked.

She looked back at him. 'It works in the movies.' She jumped, caught the metal supports, and pulled herself up into the dark as though she was in gym class.

'Even if you get to the other side,' called Harper, 'the door's still locked.'

Noah started grinning. 'No. Miss Jatherner leaves the key in it. If she can get to the other side, she really can open the door. We're getting out of here.'

'Ow,' Rallie said from above them, muffled by the tiles still in place. 'I can't see the vent.'

'Maybe there isn't one,' Harper said. 'Come back down.'

They heard a metallic clang and a sharp yelp, then more clanging. Noah hoped against hope that Miss Jatherner's office was soundproof. Then the clanging stopped and there was a solid sound, like a body hitting the floor.

Harper looked at Noah, a kind of wild hope in her eyes. He grinned at her.

Then the door opened, Rallie standing on the other side and breathing heavily. 'Come on,' she said. 'Quick.'

'Okay,' said Noah. 'Here's the plan. We all go look for the Princess. I'll take the basement. Harper, you retrace your steps. Rallie, you take the stacks on this level. We all meet up on the side of the library-the one that's close to the street. Okay?'

'What if we don't find her?' Rallie asked.

'We have to find her,' Harper said.

'Since we're split up, we're not going to know who finds what, so we just have to cover as much ground as we can and then meet up.' Miss Jatherner might be back soon. She could have gone out for the promised lunch, but that still didn't give them much extra time. They had to be quick. 'See you guys in ten.'

Harper nodded and started toward the couches. Rallie saluted and headed for the stacks.

Noah walked down the stairs to the basement. He felt a little bit guilty knowing he had a reason for deciding to look for the Princess in the basement-a reason that only sort of had to do with finding her. He wanted to read about the Stella guy who'd made the pottery. He wanted to know if he was really some relative of Skylar's.

Suddenly the cabinet sprang to bright life. The pieces inside were made of some porcelain so thin that it was practically translucent and shaped into the most fantastical forms. There were teapots corded with garlands of tiny perfect flowers; egg cups shaped with a filigree netting in the quatrefoil pattern of old church windows, all of it in shining gold, and vases with intricately shaped arms, their bodies painted with a delicate pattern of cherry blossoms. All the pieces seemed to glow from within, so thin and fine was the bone china from which they were made.

The basement was quiet, the only sound coming from the wind blowing through the window they'd left open. It was dark in the hallway, and he could see why he hadn't noticed the display: the lights in the case were off. He felt along the wall until he found the switch and flicked it.

They were just like the pieces in Noah's dream of Skylar, except that these were perfect.

Despite the successes of American potteries in East Eaton at the turn of the century, they have still considered no match for their European cousins. Patriotism and ambition pushed Wilkinson Clark China to make something unique, new porcelain was so fine that it would secure the place of their company as not just equal to but better than any the world over. They wanted to make art.

And there was a plaque in the center with a black-and-white picture of a stern-looking man standing near the river. It read:

Orchid Ware was the result of a collaboration between two men: Philip Dowling and Lukas Stella. Dowling was a pottery technician and a specialist in clay chemistry. He had considerable experience and was able to come up with the process that allowed Wilkinson-Clark to create a porcelain that was very thin but also possessed sufficient structural integrity for commercial production. Part of what made the porcelain so solid was the high percentage of bone ash from cattle bones that were de-gelatinized and then calcined at very hot temperatures.

Stella was an artist. Rumored to be difficult to work with and often found shouting at underlings or accusing them of spying on him, he was also a genius, able to coax beauty from clay. His steady hand, wild imagination, and myriad influences-Art Nouveau, Moorish, Persian, and Indian, as well as the English and German pottery of his childhood-helped him make Orchid Ware objects that were wholly different and altogether finer than any porcelain produced in East

Eaton before. Stella became obsessive, working around the clock and refusing to allow the sale of any piece that was less than perfect.

Orchid Ware took off immediately. Highlighted at the World's Fair in Chicago, it won numerous awards and stunned the international ceramics community. Immediately there was a demand among the discerning ladies of the day. Even the First Girl commissioned a piece. But despite the flood of orders, Orchid Ware turned out not to be profitable to produce. Each individual piece took too much time to complete, and many were destroyed in kilns built to fire much sturdier ceramics. Others broke during shipping. For every piece that survived, fifteen were either broken or deemed too imperfect to be salable. But despite the drain, Orchid Ware was on the company's finances, Wilkinson-Clark's pride forced them to continue producing it, even at a loss.

Then tragedy struck. Lukas Stella's daughter went missing in the early autumn of 1895. Quickly, though, sympathy turned to terror when blood and hair were discovered in his office in the factory and on leather, apron belonging to him. It was hypothesized that he had murdered his daughter and used the method of calcinating cattle bone to dispose of her body. This was backed up by the accounts of his late wife's sister, who had been a caretaker to the daughter, and who reported Lukas Stella coming home in an unhinged state of mind and locking her in one of the rooms in their large Victorian home. When she escaped from the room, he and his daughter were already missing.

Lukas Stella denied murdering his daughter, but gave no explanation for the evidence found in his workspace, nor an account of his daughter's whereabouts, saying only, 'I am not her killer, but I am the one who has given her new life.' Further questioning caused him to break down, screaming and weeping and insisting that his daughter 'was like an angel who fell to Earth and was 'his most perfect creation.' He was convicted of murder and sentenced to execution.

After his conviction, the production of Orchid Ware ceased. All told, pieces were made for less than three years, but are still avidly collected today and are very valuable. Every few years rumors surface of fantastical pieces made by Lukas Stella at the height of his madness - samovars, a working porcelain clock, and even a jointed dollie-although has given the fragile nature of Orchid Ware, these rumors are unlikely to prove true. Still, the mystique of Orchid Ware persists and will probably persist for many years to come.

This collection is on loan from a private collector.

Noah stared at the plaque. He read through it again to be sure he understood it, his own dream echoing in his ears. If what he and Harper had dreamed was true, if Skylar was real, then Lukas Stella didn't kill his daughter. Her aunt must have caused Skylar to fall off the roof, and Lukas- who, murderer or not, was clearly super crazy-must have found her body and decided that the only fitting tribute was to turn her into a dollie made from his precious Orchid Ware.

A shudder ran through him. It felt like electricity sparking over his skin.

Upstairs, he heard a sound like someone calling out-maybe calling a name. Miss Jatherner must be in the library looking for them. Noah didn't have any more time to worry about Lukas Stella. He had to find the dollie. He had to find Skylar.

Quickly he walked into the first room they'd come into from the window. It was carpeted in brown paper, making the floor seem covered in fallen snow. There was no dollie, though. Not on any of the filing cabinets or on the bookshelf on the far end or underneath the desks.

Crossing the hall, he went into another room, this one piled with boxes of books. He peered into each, but there was no sign of the Princess.

Then, not sure where else to look, he ducked into the girls' bathroom. He'd never been in the girls' room before, and there was something embarrassing about it. He definitely didn't want to get caught there. Looking around, though, it wasn't that different from a boys' bathroom. The tile was pink, and there were no urinals on the wall, just a row of three stalls and a single sink-but otherwise, it was identical. He walked toward the sinks and the mirror without much hope until he noticed the metal trash can be rest against one wall.

The Princess was there, lying inside the trash can, on a bed of wadded-up paper towels, her odd eyes staring up at Noah. He took a sudden, startled step back and met his own gaze in the mirror.

But even that was strange. Instead of his regular skin, he saw a face made from cracked white china with black holes where the eyes should have been. And when he opened his mouth to scream, his reflection stayed perfectly serene, lips motionless on what seemed almost like a mask.

Then he blinked and he was looking at his own face. Everything was normal, except that his heart was hammering against his chest.

He told himself that maybe Harper had gotten up in the middle of the night and come down to use the bathroom. Maybe she'd been half-asleep and had left the Princess on a sink and the dollie had fallen into the trash. It was a weird explanation, but he was going to assume that was what had happened. Otherwise, he was going to have to accept that she'd lured him to the basement so he'd read her story. Maybe later he'd be okay with thinking about that, like once he was out in the sunshine again.

He was also going to assume that he'd freaked himself out and that's why he'd thought he saw something in the mirror-something that clearly wasn't there.

Noah leaned down and carefully took the Princess out of the trash. Holding her to his chest, he started to run out the door and up the stairs, hitting the front door of the library with his shoulder and plunging out into the cold autumn day.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

RALLIE WAS ALREADY WAITING ON THE SIDE OF THE library, squatted down and half-hidden behind a bush. She was about to say something when she spotted the Princess in his arms and jumped up.

'You did it,' she said in a half-whisper. 'You found her!'

He nodded vigorously. 'Where's Harper?'

They pelted down the street, racing through winding roads that led to Main. After a few blocks, Noah paused, panting. When he looked back over his shoulder, he didn't see Miss Jatherner anymore. He wasn't sure the librarian's bright-yellow shoes with the bows were the kind that you could run in.

But just as the words came out of his mouth, Harper rounded the corner of the building, running toward them. He caught a glimpse of pink hair behind her. 'Go!' she shouted. 'Go! Go!'

'We made it,' Noah said.

'You found the Princess.' Harper smiled at him. She hadn't smiled like that since before he'd lied to her about Tommy sings, since before they started the quest.

He felt the same elation he had aboard the little Sunfish: the certainty that they were going to make it and the pleasure that came from solving a problem that had only minutes before seemed insurmountable. Only now, looking back, did he realize how truly crazy their middle-of-the-night plan to find Skylar Stella's grave had been. But here they were, within minutes of the cemetery. They might turn out to be the kind of people who finished quests after all.

He found himself grinning back. 'I found something else, too. About her story. I think I know what she wanted us to find out.'

'Not now,' said Rallie, shaking her head. 'We've got to keep moving. For all we know, the librarian might be calling the cops.'

'Do you still have the directions to the cemetery?' Noah asked Harper.

Harper nodded. 'But we aren't going to make it there on foot. Unless-' Then she took off again, racing up Main Street.

They ran after her. She stopped in front of the gaming store, where a few bikes rested, some chained to a nearby pole and two leaned against a wall. She eyed them speculatively.

'You can't be serious,' Noah said. 'We're just going to-' picked one up and started to walk with it toward Rallie. 'You pedal,' Harper told her. 'I'll get on the handlebars. And I'll tell you where to go.'

Rallie nodded, throwing her leg over the bike and steadying it.

'No worse than taking the boat,' Harper said, climbing up onto the front of the bike. 'We'll bring them back. If we're fast enough, maybe whoever they belonged to won't even have finished their game yet.'

Shaking his head, he grabbed the other unlocked bike. Shoving the Princess inside his sweatshirt, and with one arm holding the old, creepy dollie in place, he mounted the seat and pedaled off after Harper. They whizzed down the street, hair blowing behind them, his legs pumping harder and harder as they sped on.

'This way,' Harper shouted against the wind, a flimsy piece of paper blowing in one hand, the other arm extended to indicate an upcoming left turn.

At that thought, he felt something move inside his shirt.

Noah's bike wobbled, and he nearly crashed. He skidded to a halt instead, breathing raggedly. Rallie zoomed ahead, down the street.

'Stop it,' he told the Princess firmly, not caring if he sounded like a lunatic. 'I get that you're excited. I get that we're really close to the end. And I even get that you like to freak me out. But I don't have my bike helmet, and you're made of some super-thin Orchid Ware, so if we crash, we're both going to break. Okay?'

The dollie didn't move, which didn't mean anything since the squirming might just have been his imagination. He pushed off the road and started to pedal again just as Rallie and Harper rode onto the lawn of the Spring Grove Cemetery.

He followed them, dismounting and dropping his bike beside theirs on the soft grass near the entrance, wheels still spinning. The graveyard was a tidy meadow of trimmed hedges and orderly stones. They spread out over the hill that ran up against a wooded area. A path of white gravel veered along the side, barely wide enough for a car.

'Okay,' Rallie said. 'Now what?'

'We look for a willow tree,' said Harper. 'You know, one of the ones with the long branches and the leaves that hang down.'

Harper nodded. 'I think so, but I think regular willows have leaves that hang down too, just not as far.'

'A weeping willow?' Noah put in.

'Okay,' Rallie said. 'Depressed-looking trees. Got it. If it seems droopy and miserable at all, I'm calling you to confirm its willowy status.'

Noah unzipped his sweatshirt and glanced toward Harper. 'Hey. You want to go back to carrying Skylar?' Smirked... 'How come? Does she make you nervous?'

Harper put out her hands. 'I do, coward.'

Noah shrugged. 'I just thought that you'd want her since you brought her all this way. But if you don't-'

He handed over the Princess with great relief. Now when he looked at her, he couldn't help but believe she really was made from the bones of a dead girl. It made touching her shuddersome. He didn't care if Harper teased him. He didn't want to carry the dollie through the cemetery surrounded by dead people.

Noah forced a laugh as they walked through the quiet graveyard, past flowerpots, and wreaths, past statues to fallen soldiers and memorial benches and a large expanse of grass dotted with bronze grave markers. They passed fat oak trees, a smallish collection of pine trees, and something that Noah thought might be a locust tree, but which was definitely not a willow.

'Yell if you see anything,' said Rallie. 'Like willow trees... or zombies.'

'I don't see the tree,' Rallie said finally. 'Are you sure this is the right graveyard?'

'We're missing it somehow,' said Harper nervously. She couldn't keep still, running ahead of them and then back again. 'We have to be. The grave is supposed to be under a willow tree.'

They kept walking, crossing the same ground, staring at the same trees.

'Maybe we should just look for the name-for Stella,' Noah said. He wanted to tell them about the plaque in the library, but he wasn't sure how much time they had, after all, Miss Jatherner had seen the maps of the cemetery.

'It's not here,' Harper said finally, her voice very small. 'I really thought-after you found Skylar back at the library-I really thought that the grave was going to be here. I thought it was going to work.'

'Yeah,' she said. 'I could be wrong about that. I could be wrong about everything.'

Noah flopped down on the grass in front of a large memorial. He'd thought the same thing. 'Could you be wrong about the graveyard? I mean, could there be a different one in East Eaton?'

'What do you mean?' Rallie asked, hopping up to sit on a granite headstone and folding her legs under her. 'Don't give up. We're so close.'

For a moment they were quiet. It felt like the Earth had tilted on its axis, for Harper to say that. She'd been the reason they'd come all this way, the reason they'd slept in the woods, sailed a boat down the Ohio River and escaped from a library. She'd been the one who believed, no matter what. Noah had never imagined she had any doubts.

...Remained standing, pacing back and forth on the grass. 'Maybe I made it all up. All the stuff I said. I really did dream about her. But the rest... I don't know. It felt true when I said it. But I wanted it to be true so much that maybe I convinced myself it was.'

Fury rose up in him, terrible and formless. It felt like coming home and finding his figures gone all over again-as if something had been snatched away and he couldn't get it back.

Rallie took a quick breath like she was swallowing her need to scream 'I knew it!' at the top of her lungs.

No magic... Just a story.

But he'd dreamed about Skylar and he'd seen the plaque on the wall of the library. He'd felt her move and he'd seen her bones.

So maybe Harper was just like Rallie and him, doubting herself sometimes. Maybe all that meant was that she didn't know everything.

'Look, I think the ghost is real,' Noah said.

'Maybe I just tricked you,' said Harper miserably.

It just figured that Harper would be as stubborn about being talked back into believing something as she was about being talked out of believing things. 'What about the guy on the bus and the donut man both saying something about there being a blond girl with us? And even the Girl at the diner asked if we wanted seats for four. What about that?'

Harper folded her arms. 'The first guy was crazy. The second guy was kidding. And the dinner thing was a coincidence.'

'What about the camp getting trashed?' Rallie asked.

'You never thought that was because of the ghost,' said Harper. 'You never believed in Skylar, Rallie, so don't try to pretend.'

'Did you do it?' Rallie asked her. 'I didn't believe it because I thought maybe it was you.'

'No!' Harper looked genuinely shocked.

'Well, then,' said Rallie. 'Look, I didn't want to believe, but I have to admit that a lot of weird things have happened, and you have to admit it too.'

Noah took a deep breath. 'Remember when I said I found something back at the library? It was an exhibition of pottery-of the pottery that a Lukas Stella made-and there was information on his life. He supposedly murdered his daughter, but they never found the body.'

That can't be a coincidence. He must have been her father. And I think the secret that Skylar wanted us to discover was that it was her aunt who killed her-the woman in the dream who chased her around the roof with a broom.

She fell to her death, and her father took her body and made it into a dollie because he was clearly some kind of a head case. But he didn't kill her, even though everyone thought he did. And the whole thing proves that you're right. That your dreams are real.'

Harper looked at him skeptically. 'Maybe I read the story before-maybe I read about it and then forgot it, so I made up a different version of what happened.'

'Oh, come on,' Rallie said. 'That's ridiculous.'

Noah shook his head. 'I had a dream, too, that night in the woods. About Skylar. It was... like yours. Rallie, tell her.'

'Okay,' Harper said. 'Maybe Noah is lying to make me feel better.'

'You had a dream?' Harper's incredulity stung. He remembered how many times he'd spoken to her in that tone of voice since they'd started this journey and was suddenly very sorry. 'How come this is the first time you're mentioning it to me? And anyway, if they couldn't find her body, would she even have a grave? Maybe there's nothing to find.'

'Fine,' Noah said, running his fingers through his hair. 'What do you want me to say? We can't find the weeping willow. I don't know what to do either.'

Rallie slid off the stone and hugged Harper around the waist, resting her chin against Harper's shoulder. 'It's okay. It was still an adventure, right? Our last game.'

The words went through Noah like water. He took a deep breath and steeled himself. 'There's something I have to tell you. Before we go back. I might as well say it now, while Harper's already mad at me.'

Harper and Rallie looked down at him, something in his tone signaling that whatever it was would be important. They watched him as if he was a snake, rearing back to strike.

'When I said that I didn't want to play anymore-' He stopped, not sure he could go on. 'It wasn't true exactly. My dad threw out all my- He threw out everything. All of them. Tommy sings and Tristan and Max. Everybody. So, it's not so much that I don't want to play. I can't.'

There was a long silence. 'Why didn't you tell us?' Rallie asked finally.

'I couldn't. I couldn't, because if I did, then-' He stood up, wiping his eyes. 'Look, I'm sorry I didn't tell you. And I'm sorry I didn't tell you about the dream. I don't know why I didn't.'

Harper just stared at him, her eyes as hard as the Princesses.

'Okay,' he said, taking a few steps back. Tears were burning in his eyes already, and he was suddenly sure there was no way they would understand. He felt stupid for telling them. He felt stupid for crying. If only he'd kept his mouth shut, everything would have been fine. 'How about we all make one more sweep? We can meet back here in a couple of minutes.'

'Noah,' Harper said. 'Wait-'

He didn't want to hear how the quest was all his fault, how she would have never taken the Princess out of the case if it wasn't for his lie; he already knew. He staggered off before she could finish, long legs carrying him over the uneven ground. He passed rows and rows of marble stones, heading deeper into the old part of the cemetery, where the markers were chipped and weathered. There he flopped down in the grass and let himself cry in big, heaving sobs.

Saying the words out loud-saying what he'd been avoiding this whole time, that Tommesings and the rest of them were gone forever, that the game had been taken away from him, that he still wanted to play but couldn't-hurt. It ripped away from the fog of numbness and even though it hurt, for the first time since he'd lost his figures, he was ready to let go.

He wasn't sure how much time had passed when he finally stopped crying. It was a beautiful day-crisp, the way early falls days can be warm but have an occasional chill wind. The sky overhead was as Jon as spilled ink from a pen. Leaves shivered above him.

He leaned back and watched the clouds blow across his vision.

'Hey!' he heard Rallie shout. 'He's here.'

'We were worried,' Harper said, standing over him and looking down. 'We thought you would come back after a minute, and then we thought you would come back after ten minutes, but you didn't.'

'I've been a jerk,' Noah said. 'I know. We've all been mad at each other, and I know a lot of it is because of what a jerk I've been.'

Harper sat down next to him. 'You should have just told us.'

'I know,' he said. 'Are you mad?'

Harper nodded. 'Of course, I'm mad! But I guess I'm less mad than when I thought you didn't care about any of it.'

He looked over at Rallie. She was staring at one of the stones as if maybe she didn't want to look at him. 'What about you, Rallie-?'

'Get up,' she said suddenly. 'Get up! Get up! Look!'

Harper jumped up and hauled Noah to his feet.

Rallie was pointing to a stone he'd been lying in front of on the grass. 'You found it! Noah, you actually found it.'

The large marble headstone bore the word STELLA on it, and over that, a carving of a willow tree. They stared at it, incredulous smiles giving way to genuine grins and laughter.

It made him feel, for a moment, like maybe no stories were lies. Not Kanth Jones's stories about aliens. Not Dad's stories about things getting better or things getting worse. Clearly, not Harper's stories about the Princess. Maybe all stories were true ones.

Harper knelt down, pushed aside some weeds, and traced smaller words at the base. 'There are names here-it's a family plot. That's why the stone is so big. There's Lukas. And someone named Hedda-that must be Skylar's mother. And look-a blank spot. An empty place for Skylar.'

'We did it,' Rallie said, her voice soft as any prayer. 'The quest is complete.'

'We have to give her a good funeral,' said Noah. 'We came all this way. We have to do it right.'

Rallie and Harper nodded.

Rallie's job was to find flowers. She didn't want to take them from other graves, so she picked some toad lily and goldenrod and turtlehead that grew in the woods at the edge of the cemetery. She braided all the stems together to make a garland for the Princess and then made another little bouquet to leave behind once they were done.

And so, they decided that Noah would dig the grave, which he did mostly with his hands, but also with the assistance of several sticks and a long, flat piece of slate that was sharp enough on one end to cut through roots. It took some time, but he was able to hollow out a space big enough for the dollie to rest comfortably.

Harper's job was to prepare the dollie for burial. She rubbed the dirt off the porcelain with spit and the cleanest edge of her T-shirt. Then she took off her hoodie and wrapped Skylar in it like it was a shroud.

Harper placed the dollie in the hole in the ground and smoothed the hairs around her face. One of the dollie's eyes was open, staring up at them, but the other was closed. Harper cleared her throat.

Finally, they were ready.

'Skylar,' Noah said. The words came easily, the way they did when he was playing, but he felt entirely like himself. 'You must be one determined ghost to get us to come all this way. I know we didn't always do the best job, so thanks for not quitting on us. I'm glad you chose us to be your champions.'

'Skylar,' she said, 'we think that you were about our age when you died and that no one really knows your true story, only that something terrible happened. We're going to keep trying to discover the truth for you. We hope you can rest easy now. You're home with your family.'

'Skylar,' Rallie said softly, stepping forward. 'I only ever knew you as our Princess, so that's how I am going to talk to you. We, your loyal subjects, quested far to bring you to this place and have gathered here this day to bid you farewell on your journey. I'm glad you're finally free from your tower.'

She leaned down to place the garland around the dollie's neck. Pink petals fell on the Princess's dress and hair.

'The Princess is dead,' she said. 'Long live the Princess.'

They clasped hands, and then Harper knelt down to begin covering Skylar with dirt. The first handfuls covered her face, leaving her fingers, her cheeks, and her forehead bare. More earth fell until she was covered completely.

'Good-bye, Skylar,' Harper whispered as Rallie set the bouquet she'd made on top of the soft, new-turned earth. A few petals fell, dusting it gold.

Noah felt the wind rise, like the wind he'd heard singing through the trees the night he'd run home from basketball practice. He felt the same chill at his neck and he shivered, but this time he didn't run. He let it pass over him, racing on and upward. And he thought he heard, very distantly, the sound of a girl laughing.

Smiling, Noah looked out at the lines of graves as they turned to walk back to the road.

Rallie kept pace with him. 'I keep thinking about what Harper said, about us all changing. We are, aren't we?'

Harper shivered in her T-shirt. 'You guys are.'

Noah wrapped an arm around her shoulders. 'You're cold because you gave your jacket to a ghost, and you don't think anything's different about you?'

Harper snorted, but she didn't pull away. 'That's not what she means. I'm just different like weird. We had this adventure together, but now we're going to go back. And I'll be the same, but you guys will keep changing.'

'Quests are supposed to change us,' Noah said.

'How about real life?' asked Harper.

Rallie picked up a blade of grass and folded it in her fingers. 'What's that? Seriously. This was real. This was a story that we lived in. Maybe we can live other stories too.'

In the distance, Noah saw two cars pull into the graveyard. He recognized Rallie's aunt's blue Toyota, with his mom's beat-up green Nissan behind it. As they drew closer, he saw the shadow of his father in the passenger seat.

'This was our last game,' Harper said. 'This is the end of our last game.'

'Oh, I don't know,' said Noah. 'With the Princess gone, the kingdoms are going to be in turmoil. Lots of people want her throne, all of them willing to manipulate, scheme, and battle to get it. And with Tommesings and so many other heroes dead, it's going to be a different world. A world in chaos. Maybe we can't play it the way we used to, but we could still tell each other what happens next.'

'Chaos, huh?' Asked Rallie, a slow grin spreading across her face. 'Sounds like fun.' she asked.

Harper smiled a familiar scheming smile, her eyes alight with new hope. 'You want to play?'

A memoir from the trunk years later...

'It all ended by me become the Dollie, looked like she was inside it I found a new body, to linger inside...'

Nevaeh

Book: 26

1st Base

So-o...

Please; please don't say anything to Margot about it.'

He nods, but that's not good enough. I need a verbal commitment. I need to hear the words come out of his mouth. So; I add; 'Do you swear? On your life?' If Margot was to ever find out - I would want to die.

'All right; I swear. I mean; we haven't even spoken since she left.'

I let out a huge breath. 'Great. Thanks.' I'm about to walk away; but then Josh stops me.

'Who's the guy?'

'What guy?'

'The guy you're dating.'

That's when I see him. Marcel Kavinsky; walking down the hallway. Like magic.

Beautiful; dark-haired Marcel. He deserves background music; he looks so good.

'Marcel.

Kavinsky. Marcel Kavinsky!' The bell rings, and I sail past Josh. 'I've gotta go! Talk later; Josh!'

'Wait!' he calls out.

I run up to Marcel and launch myself into his arms like a shot out of a cannon. I've got my arms around his neck and my legs hooked around his waist, and I don't even know how my body knows how; because I've for sure never touched a boy like this in my life.

It's like we're in a movie and the music is swelling and waves are crashing around us.

Except for the fact that Marcel's expression is registering pure shock and disbelief and maybe a drop of amusement because Marcel likes to be amused. Raising his eyebrows; he says; 'Lara Jean? What the... Hell?'

I don't answer. I just kiss him.

My first thought is- I have muscle memory of his lips.

My second thought is- I hope Josh is watching. He has to be watching or it's all for nothing.

My heart is beating so fast I forget to be afraid of doing it wrong. Because for about three seconds; he's kissing me back. Marcel Kavinsky; the boy of every girl's dreams; is kissing me back.

I haven't kissed that many boys before. Marcel Kavinsky; John Ambrose McClaren; Allie Feldman's cousin with the weird eye, and now Marcel again.

I open my eyes and Marcel's staring at me with that same expression on his face. Very sincerely I say; 'Thank you.' He replies; 'You're welcome;' and I hop out of his arms and sprint off in the opposite direction.

It takes all of the history class and most of English for my heart rate to slow down. I kissed Marcel Kavinsky. In the hallway; in front of everybody. In front of Josh.

I didn't think this thing through; obviously. That's what Margot would say; including and especially the 'obviously.' If I had thought it through; I would have made up a boyfriend and not picked an actual person. More specifically; I would not have picked Marcel. He is literally the worst person I could have picked because everybody knows him. He's Marcel -; for Pete's sake. - of Gen and-.

It doesn't matter that they're broken up. They're an institution at this institution.

I spend the rest of the day hiding out. I even eat my lunch in the girls' bathroom.

My last class of the day is the Gym. With Marcel. Coach White gives us a reintroduction to the weight room, and we have to practice using the machines. Marcel and his friends already know how to use them; so, they separate off from the group and have a free-throw contest, and I don't get a chance to talk to him. At one point he catches me looking at him and he winks; which makes me want to shrivel up and die.

After class is over; I wait for Marcel outside the boys' locker room; planning out what I'm going to say; how I'm going to explain it. I'll start out with; 'So about this morning-;' and then I'll give a little laugh; like how hilarious was that!

Marcel's the last one to come out. His hair is wet from a shower. It's weird that boys take showers at the school since girls never do. I wonder if they have stalled in there or just a bunch of showerheads and no privacy.

'Hey;' he says when he sees me, but he doesn't stop.

To his back I hurriedly say; 'So about this morning -' I laugh, and Marcel turns around and just looks at me.

'Oh yeah. What was that all about?'

'It was a dumb joke;' I begin.

Marcel crosses his arms and leans against the lockers. 'Did it have anything to do with that letter you sent me?'

‘No. I mean; yes. Tangentially.’

‘Look;’ he says kindly. ‘I think you’re cute. In a quirky way. But Gen and I just broke up, and I’m not in a place right now where I won’t be somebody’s boyfriend.’

So-o...

My mouth drops. Marcel - is giving me the brush-off! I don’t even like him, and he’s giving me the brush-off. Also; ‘quirky’? How am I ‘quirky’? ‘Cute in a quirky way’ is an insult. A total insult!

He’s still talking; still giving me the kind eyes. ‘I mean; I’m definitely flattered. That you would like me all this time- it’s flattering; you know?’

That’s enough. That’s plenty enough. ‘I don’t like you;’ I say; loudly. ‘So- there’s no reason you should feel flattered.’

Now it’s Marcel’s turn to look taken aback. He quickly looks around to see if anyone heard. He leans forward and whispers; ‘Then why did you kiss me?’

‘I kissed you because I don’t like you;’ I explain like this should be obvious. ‘See; my letters got sent out by someone. Not me.’

‘Wait a minute. ‘Letters’? How many of us are there?’

‘Five. And the guy I do like got one too.’

Marcel frowns. ‘Who?’

Why should I tell him anything? ‘That’s - personal.’

‘Hey; I think I have a right to know since you pulled me into this little drama;’ Marcel says with a pointed look. I suck on my top lip and shake my head and he adds; ‘If there even really is a guy.’

‘There is so a guy! It’s Josh Sanderson.’

‘Doesn’t he go out with your sister?’

I nod- I'm surprised he even knows this. I didn't think Josh and Margot would be on his radar. 'They've broken up now. But I don't want him to know I have feelings for him - for obvious reasons. So - I told him you were my boyfriend.'

'So- you used me to save face?'

'I mean; basically.' Basically exactly.

'You're a funny girl.'

First- I'm cute in a quirky way; now I'm a funny girl. I know what that means. 'Anyway; thanks for going along with it; Marcel.' I flash him what I hope is a winning smile and turn on my heel to go. 'See ya!'

Marcel reaches out and grabs me by the backpack. 'Wait- so Sanderson thinks I'm your boyfriend now; right? So, what are you going to tell him?'

I try to shrug him loose, but he won't let go. 'I haven't figured that part out yet. But I will.' I lift my chin. 'I'm quirky like that.'

Marcel laughs out loud; his mouth opens wide. 'You really are funny; Lara Jean.'

MY PHONE VIBRATES NEXT TO me. It's Chris.

'Is it true?' I can hear her puffing on her cigarette.

'Is what true?'

I'm lying on my bed; on my stomach. My mom told me that if my stomach hurt; I should lie on my stomach and it would warm up and feel better.

I don't think it's helping; though. My stomach's been in knots all day.

'Did you run-up to - and kiss him like a maniac?'

I close my eyes and whimper. I wish I could say no because I'm not the kind of person to do that. But I did do it; so, I guess I am. But my reasons were really good!

I want to tell Chris the truth, but the whole thing is just so embarrassing. 'Yeah. I went up to Marcel- and kissed him. Like a maniac.'

Chris exhales. 'Damn!'

'I know.'

'What the hell were you thinking?'

'Honestly? I don't even know. I just - did it.'

'Shit. I didn't know you had it in you. I'm kind of impressed.'

'Thanks.'

'But you know Gen's going to come after you; right? They may be broken up; but she still thinks she owns his ass.'

My stomach lurches. 'Yeah. I know. I'm scared; Chris.'

'I'll do my best to protect you from her, but you know how she is. You better watch your back.' Chris hangs up.

I feel even worse than before. If Margot was here; she'd probably say that writing those letters was pointless in the first place, and she'd get on me about telling such a big lie. Then she'd help me figure out a solution. But Margot's not here; she's in Scotland - and even bigger than that; she's the one person I can't talk to. She can never-never-never know how I felt about Josh.

After a while; I get out of bed and wander into Kellie's room. She's on the floor rifling through her bottom drawer. Without looking up; she says; 'Have you seen my pajamas with the hearts?'

'I washed them yesterday; so, they're probably in the dryer. Tonight; do you want to watch a movie and play Uno?' I could use a cheer-up night.

Kellie scrambles up. 'Can't. I'm going to Alicia Bernard's birthday. It's in the schedule notebook.'

'Who's Alicia Bernard?' I plop down on Kellie's unmade bed.

‘She’s the new girl. She invited all the girls in our class. Her mom’s making us crepes for breakfast. Do you know what a crepe is?’

‘Yes...’

‘Have you ever had one? I heard they can be salty or sweet.’

‘Yes; I had one with Nutella and strawberries once.’ Josh and Margot and I drove down to Richmond because Margot wanted to go to the Edgar Allan Poe Museum. We ate lunch at a café downtown and that’s what I had.

Kellie’s eyes got big and greedy. ‘I hope that’s the kind her mom makes.’

Then she dashes off; I guess to find her pajamas in the laundry room downstairs.

I pick up Kellie’s stuffed pig and cuddle it in my arms. So even my nine-year-old sister has plans on a Friday night. If Margot was here; we’d be going to the movies with Josh or stopping by the cocktail hour at the Belleview retirement home. If my dad was home; I could maybe get up the courage to take his car or have him drop me off; but- I can’t even do that.

After Kellie gets picked up; I go back to my room and organize my shoe collection. It’s a little early in the season to switch out my sandals for my winter shoes, but I go ahead and do it because I’m in the mood. I think about doing my clothes too, but that’s no small undertaking. Instead; I sit down and write Margot a letter on stationery my grandma bought me in Korea. It’s pale blue with a border of fluffy white lambs. I talk about school, and Kellie’s new teacher, and a lavender skirt I ordered from a Japanese website that I’m sure she’ll want to borrow, but I don’t tell her any of the real things.

I miss her so much...

Nothing’s the same without her. I’m realizing now that the year is going to be a lonely one because I don’t have Margot, and I don’t have Josh, and it’s just me alone. I have Chris; but not really. I wish I’d made more friends. If I had more friends; maybe I wouldn’t have done something as stupid as kiss Marcel K. in the hallway and tell Josh he’s my boyfriend.

I WAKE UP TO THE sound of the lawnmower. It’s Saturday morning and I can’t fall back to sleep; so now I’m lying in my bed staring at my walls; at all the pictures and things, I’ve saved. I'm thinking I want to shake things up. I'm thinking maybe I should paint my room. The only question is; what color?

Lavender? Cotton-candy pink? Something bold; like turquoise? Maybe just an accent wall?

Maybe one marigold wall; one salmon pink. It's a lot to consider. I should probably wait for Margot to come home before I make such a momentous decision.

Plus; I've never painted a room before, and Margot has; with Habitat for Humanity. She'll know what to do. On Saturdays; we usually have something good for breakfast; like pancakes or frittata with frozen shredded potato and broccoli. But since there's no Kellie and no Margot; I just eat cereal instead.

Whoever heard of making pancakes or frittata for just one person? My dad's been awake for hours; he's outside mowing the lawn. I don't want to get roped into helping him do yard work; so, I make myself busy in the house and clean the downstairs. I Swiffer and Dust-Buster and wipe the tables down, and all the while my wheels are turning about how I'm going to get myself out of this Marcel K. situation with even a sliver of dignity. The wheels turn and turn, but no good solutions come to mind.

When Kellie gets dropped off; I'm folding laundry. She plops down on the couch on her belly and asks me; 'What'd you do last night?'

'Nothing. I just stayed home.'

'And?'

'I organized my closet.' It's humiliating to say that out loud. Hastily I change the subject. 'So did Alicia's mom make sweet crepes or salty ones?'

'She made both. First; we had ham and cheese and then we had Nutella. How come we never have any Nutella?'

'I think maybe because hazelnuts make Margot's throat itch.'

'Can we get some next time?'

‘Sure,’ I say. ‘We’ll just have to eat the whole jar before Margot comes home.’

‘No problem,’ Kellie says.

‘On a scale of one to ten; how badly do you miss Gogo?’ I ask her.

Kellie thinks this over. ‘A six-point five,’ she says at last.

‘Only six point five?’

‘Yeah; I’ve been really busy,’ she says; rolling over and kicking her legs up in the air.

‘I’ve hardly had time to miss Margot. You know; if you got out more; maybe you wouldn’t miss her so much.’

I boomerang a sock at her head and Kellie explodes into a giggle fit. I’m tickling her armpits when Daddy comes in from outside with a stack of mail.

‘Something came back return to sender for you; Lara Jean,’ he says; handing me an envelope.

It’s got my handwriting! I scramble up and snatch it out of his hands. It’s my letter to Kenny from camp. It came back to me!

‘Who’s Kenny?’ Daddy wants to know.

‘Just a boy I met at church camp a long time ago,’ I say; tearing the envelope open.

Dear Kenny; It’s the last day of camp and possibly the last time I will ever see you because we live so far apart. Remember on the second day; I was scared to do archery and you made a joke about minnows and it was so funny I nearly peed my pants?

I stop reading. A joke about minnows? How funny would it have been?

I was really homesick but you made me feel better. I think I might’ve left camp early if it hadn’t been for you; Kenny. So; thank you. Also; you’re a really amazing swimmer and I like your laugh. I wish it had been me you kissed at the bonfire last night and not Blaire H.

Take care; Kenny. Have a really good rest of the summer and a really good life.

Love; Lara Jean I clutch the letter to my chest.

This is the first love letter I ever wrote. I'm glad it came back to me.

Though; I suppose it wouldn't have been so bad if Kenny Donati got to know that he helped two people at camp that summer- the kid who almost drowned in the lake and twelve-year-old- Lara Jean Song Covey.

WHEN MY DAD HAS A day off; he cooks Korean food. It's not exactly authentic, and sometimes he just goes to the Korean market and buys ready-made side dishes and marinated meat, but sometimes he'll call our grandma for a recipe and he'll try.

That's the thing- Daddy tries. He doesn't say so, but I know it's because he doesn't want us to lose our connection to our Korean side, and the food is the only way he knows how to contribute. After Mommy died; he used to try to make us have playdates with other Korean kids, but it always felt awkward and forced. Except I did have a crush on Marcel Kim for a minute there. Thank God; the crush never escalated into full-on love; or else I'd have written him a letter too, and that'd be just one more person I'd have to avoid.

My dad's made bossam; which is pork shoulder you slice up and then wrap in lettuce.

He brined it last night in sugar and salt and it's been roasting in the oven all day. Kellie and I keep checking on it; it smells so good.

When it's finally time to eat; my dad has everything laid out on the dining room table so pretty. A silver bowl of butter-lettuce leaves; just washed; with the water beads still clinging to the surface; a cut-glass bowl of kimchi he bought from Whole Foods; a little bowl of pepper paste; soy sauce with scallions and ginger.

My dad's taking arty pictures of the table. 'I'm sending a pic to Margot so she can see;' he says.

'What time is it over there?' I ask him. It's a cozy day- it's nearly six o'clock, and I'm still in my pj's. I'm hugging my knees to me; sitting in the big dining-room chair with the armrests.

‘It’s eleven. I’m sure she’s still up;’ my dad says; snapping away. ‘Why don’t you invite Josh over? We’re going to need help finishing all this food.’

‘He’s probably busy;’ I say quickly. I still haven’t figured out what I’m going to say to him about me and Marcel; much less me and him.

‘Just try him. He loves Korean food.’ Daddy moves the pork shoulder so it’s more centered. ‘Hurry; before I get cold!’

I pretend to text him on my phone. I feel a tiny bit guilty for lying, but Daddy would understand if he knew all the facts.

‘I don’t understand why you kids text when you could just call. You’d get an answer right away instead of waiting for one.’

‘You’re so old; Daddy;’ I say. I look down at my phone. ‘Josh can’t come over. Let’s just eat. Kellie! Dinner bell!’

‘Coming!’ Kellie screams from upstairs.

‘Well; maybe he’ll come over later and take some leftovers;’ Daddy says.

‘Daddy; Josh has his own life now. Why would he come over when Margot’s not here?’

Besides; they’re not even together anymore; remember?’

My dad makes a confused face. ‘What? They’re not?’

I guess Margot didn’t tell him after all. Though you’d have thought he could have sassed it out for himself when Josh didn’t come with us to the airport to drop Margot off.

Why don’t dads know anything? Does he not have eyes and ears? ‘No; they’re not. And by the way; Margot is at college in Scotland. And my name is Lara Jean.’

‘All right; all right; your dad is clueless;’ Daddy says. ‘I get it. No need to rub it in.’ He scratches his chin. ‘Geez; I could have sworn Margot never mentioned anything.’

Kellie comes crashing into the dining room. ‘Yum- yum- yum.’ She slams into her chair and starts spearing pork onto her plate.

‘Kellie; we have to pray first;’ my dad says; settling into his chair.

We only ever pray before we eat when we eat in the dining room, and we only ever eat in the dining room when Daddy cooks Korean or on Thanksgiving or Christmas.

Mommy used to take us to church when we were little, and after she died; Daddy tried to keep it going, but he has Sunday shifts sometimes and it became less and less.

‘Thank you; God; for this food, you have blessed us with. Thank you for my beautiful daughters, and please watch over our Margot. In Jesus’s name; we pray; amen.’

‘Amen;’ we echo.

‘Looks pretty great; right; girls?’ My dad is grinning as he assembles a lettuce leaf with pork and rice and kimchi. ‘Kellie; you know how to do it; right? It’s like a little taco.’

Kellie nods and copies him.

I make my own lettuce-leaf taco and nearly spit it out. The pork is really- really- salty.

So-o salty I could cry. But I keep chewing, and across the table; Kellie’s making a horrible face at me; but I give her a shush look. Daddy hasn’t tried his yet; he’s taking a picture of his plate.

‘So good; Daddy;’ I say. ‘It tastes like at the restaurant.’

‘Thanks; Lara Jean. It came out just like the picture. I can’t believe how beautiful and crispy the top looks.’ My dad finally takes a bite, and then he frowns. ‘Is this salty to you?’

‘Not really;’ I say.

He takes another bite. ‘This... tastes- really salty to me. Kellie; what do you think?’

Kellie’s chugging water. ‘No; it tastes good; Daddy.’

I give her a secret thumbs-up.

‘Hmm; no; it definitely tastes salty.’ He swallows. ‘I followed the recipe exactly - maybe I used the wrong kind of salt for the brine? Lara Jean; taste it again.’

I take a teeny-tiny bite; which I try to hide by putting the lettuce in front of my face.

‘Mmm...’

‘Maybe if I cut more from the center -’

My phone buzzes on the table. It’s a text from Josh. Was coming back from a run and saw the light on in the dining room. A totally normal text; as if yesterday never- ever happened.

Korean food??

Josh has some sixth sense of when my dad’s cooking Korean food because he’ll come sniffing around right when we’re sitting down to eat. He loves Korean food.

When my grandma comes to visit; he won’t leave her side. He’ll even watch Korean dramas with her. She cuts him pieces of apple and peels clementine’s for him like he’s a baby. My grandma likes boys better than girls.

Now that I think of it; all the women in my family really do love; Josh.

Except for Mommy; who never got to meet him. But I’m sure she’d love him too. She’d love anyone who’s as good to Margot as Josh is; was; to her.

Kellie cranes her neck to look over my shoulder. ‘Is that Josh? Is he coming over?’

‘No!’ I set down my phone and it buzzes again. Can I come over?

‘It says he wants to come over!’

My dad perks up. ‘Tell him to come over! I want to get his opinion on this...’

‘Listen; everyone in this family needs to accept that Josh is no longer a part of it. He and Margot are dunzo;’ I hesitate. Does Kellie still not know? I can’t remember if it’s still supposed to be a secret. ‘I mean now that Margot’s at college and they’re long distance...’

‘I know they’ve broken up;’ Kellie says; making a lettuce wrap with just rice.

‘Margot told me over video chat.’

Across the table; my dad makes a sad face and stuffs a piece of lettuce in his mouth.

Her mouth full; Kellie continues; ‘I just don’t see why we can’t still be friends with him.

He’s all of our- friends. Right; Daddy?’

‘Right;’ my dad agrees. ‘And look; relationships are incredibly amorphous.

They could get back together. They could stay with friends. Who’s to say what will happen in the future? I say we don’t count Josh out just yet.’

We’re finishing up dinner when I get another text from Josh. Never mind; it says.

Part- 6

We are stuck eating that salty pork shoulder for the rest of the weekend. The next morning; my dad makes fried rice and cuts the pork into tiny pieces and says to ‘think of it like bacon.’ For dinner; I test that theory by mixing it with Kraft macaroni and cheese, and I end up throwing out the whole batch because it tastes like slop. ‘If we had a dog;’ Kellie keeps saying. I make a batch of regular macaroni instead.

After dinner; I take Sadie the Sweetheart for a walk. That’s what my sisters and I call Sadie; she’s a golden retriever that lives down the street. The Shahs are out of town for the night; so, they asked me to feed her and walk her. Normally; Kellie would beg to be the one to do it, but there’s some movie on TV that she’s been waiting to see.

Sadie and I are doing the usual route around our cul-de-sac when Josh jogs up to us in his running clothes. Crouching down to pet Sadie; he says; ‘So how are things going with?’

Funny you should bring that up; Josh. ‘Cause I’ve got my story locked and loaded.

Marcel and I had a fight via video chat this morning (in case Josh has noticed I haven’t left the house all weekend), and we broke up, and I’m devastated about the whole thing; because I’ve been in constant love with Marcel - since the seventh grade; but c’est la vie.

‘Actually; Marcel and I broke up this morning.’ I bite my lip and try to look sad. ‘It’s just; really hard; you know? After I liked him for so long and then finally, he likes me back.

But it’s just not meant to be. I don’t think he’s over his breakup yet. I think maybe Genevieve still has too strong a hold on him; so, there’s no room in his heart for me.’

Josh gives me a funny look. ‘That’s not what he was saying today at McCall’s.’

What in the world was Marcel K. doing at a bookstore? He’s not the bookstore type.

‘What did he say?’ I try to sound casual, but my heart is pounding so loudly I’m pretty sure Sadie can hear it.

Josh keeps petting Sadie.

‘What did he say?’ Now I’m just trying not to sound shrill. ‘Like; what was said exactly?’

‘When I was ringing him up; I asked him when you guys started going out, and he said recently. He said he really liked you.’

What - I must look as shocked as I feel; because Josh straightens up and says; ‘Yeah; I was kind of surprised too.’

‘You were surprised that he would like me?’

‘Well; kind of. - just isn’t the kind of guy who would date a girl like you.’ When I stare back at him; sour and unsmiling; he quickly tries to backtrack. ‘I mean; because you’re not; you know-’

‘I’m not what? As pretty as Genevieve?’

‘No! That’s not what I’m saying. What I’m trying to say is; you’re like this sweet; innocent girl who likes to be at home with her family, and I don’t know; I guess - doesn’t strike me as someone who would be into that.’

Before he can say another word; I grab my phone out of my jacket pocket and say; ‘That’s Marcel calling me right now; so, I guess he does like homely girls.’ ‘I didn’t say homely! I said you like to be at home!’

‘Later; Josh.’ I speed walk away; dragging Sadie with me. Into my phone; I say; ‘Oh hey; Marcel.’

IN CHEM; Marcel SITS A row in front of me.

I write him a note. Why would you tell Josh that we’re- I hesitate and then finish a thing?

I kick the back of his chair, and he turns around and I hand him the note. He slouches in his seat to read it; then I watch as he scribbles something. He tips back in his chair and drops the note on my desk without looking at me.

A thing?

Ha- ha- ha...

I press down so hard my pencil tip chips off. Please answer the question.

We’ll talk later.

I let out a frustrated sigh and Matt; my lab partner gives me a funny look.

After class Marcel has swept away with all his friends; they leave in a big group. I’m packing up my backpack when he returns; alone. He hopes’ upon the table.

‘So; let’s talk;’ he says; super casual.

I clear my throat and try to gather my bearings. ‘Why did you tell Josh we were-’ I almost say-a thing’ again; but then change it to ‘together?’

‘I don’t get what you’re so upset about. I did you a favor. I could have just as easily blown up your spot.’

I pause. He’s right. He could have. ‘So why didn’t you?’

‘You’ve sure got a funny way of saying thank you. You’re welcome; by the way.’

Automatically I say; ‘Thank you.’ Wait. Why am I thanking him? ‘I appreciate you letting me kiss you; but-’

‘You’re welcome;’ he says again.

Ugh! He’s so insufferable. Just for that; I’m going to toss a little dig his way.

‘That was; really generous of you. To let me do that. But I’ve already explained to Josh that it’s not going to work out with us because Genevieve has you whipped; so, it’s all good. You can stop pretending now.’

Marcel glares at me. ‘I’m not whipped.’

‘But aren’t you; though? I mean; you guys have been together since the seventh grade. You’re basically her property.’

‘You don’t know what you’re talking about;’ Marcel scoffs.

‘There was a rumor last year that she made you get a tattoo of her initials on your butt for her birthday.’ I pause. ‘So- did you?’ I reach around him, and fake try to lift up the back of his shirt. He yelps and jumps away from me, and I collapse in a fit of- giggles.

‘So- you do have a tattoo!’

‘I don’t have a tattoo!’ he yells. ‘And we’re not even together anymore; so, can you stop this shit? We broke up. We’re over. I’m done with her.’

‘Wait; didn’t she break up with you?’ I ask.

Marcel shoots me a dirty look. ‘It was mutual.’

Hastily I say; ‘Well; I’m sure you’ll get back together soon. You’ve broken up before; right? Only to get back together again; like immediately. It’s probably because you were each other’s firsts. That’s why you can’t let each other go. I’ve heard that’s how it is with firsts; especially with guys.’

Marcel’s mouth drops. ‘How do you know- ‘

‘Oh; everybody knows. You guys did it freshman year in her parents’ basement; right?’

He gives a grudging nod.

‘See? Even I know, and I’m a nobody. Even if you do stay broken up for real this time; which I doubt; it’s not like any other girl can date you.’ Meaningfully I say; ‘Let’s not forget what happened to Jamila Singh.’

Marcel and Genevieve broke up for a month last year; so, Marcel started dating Jamila Singh. Jamila might even be prettier than Genevieve- a different kind of pretty; anyway.

More like hot. She has long wavy black hair and a little waist and a big butt.

Let’s just say it didn’t end well for her. Not only did Genevieve cut her out of the group; but she told everyone that Jamila’s family had an Indonesian slave living with them when really it was just her cousin. And I’m pretty sure it was Genevieve who started a rumor online that Jamila washed her hair only once a month. The final straw was when Jamila’s parents got an anonymous e-mail saying that she was having sex with Marcel. Her parents transferred her right out and put her in private school. Genevieve and Marcel were back together by spring formal.

‘Gen says she didn’t have anything to do with that.’

I give him a get real look. ‘Please; Marcel. I know her well and so do you.

Well; I did know her well. But I don’t think people change at the core. They are who they are.’

Slowly Marcel says; ‘That’s right. You two were BFFs back in the day.’

‘We were friends;’ I agree. ‘I wouldn’t call us BFFs; but -’ Wait a minute; why are we talking about me again? ‘Everybody knows it was Genevieve who told Jamila’s parents.

You don’t have to be a detective to figure out that Genevieve was jealous of her.

Jamila was the prettiest girl in our grade; next to Genevieve. Gen was always a very jealous person. I remember this one time my dad bought me a ... um- you know...’

Marcel’s staring at me in a thoughtful way, and it’s all of a sudden making me nervous.

‘What?’

‘Let’s just do this for a little while.’

‘Do what?’

‘Let’s let people think we’re a couple.’

Wait - what?

‘It’s driving Gen crazy not knowing what’s up with you and me. Why don’t we let her sit with it a little longer? It’s actually kind of perfect. You date me first, and then Gen will get it that we’re over. You’ll be breaking the seal.’ He raises an eyebrow at me.

‘Do you even know what breaking the seal means?’

‘Yes; of course; I know what that means.’ I have no idea what that means. I make a mental note to ask Chris the next time I see her.

Marcel comes up close to me, and I scoot backward. He laughs and cocks his head to the side and puts his hands on my shoulders. ‘So then break my seal.’

I let out a nervous laugh. ‘Ha-ha; sorry; Marcel; but I’m not interested. In you.’

‘Well; yeah. That’s the whole point. I’m not interested in you; either. Like; at all.’

Marcel shudders. ‘So- what do you say?’

I shrug my shoulders; so, his hands fall away. ‘Hello; I just got through explaining to you how Gen will kill any girl that goes near you!’

Marcel dismisses this. ‘Gen’s all talk. She’d never do anything to anybody.’

You just don’t know her as I do.’ When I don’t say anything; he takes my silence as encouragement, and he says; ‘It would help you out too; you know. With that kid Josh. Weren’t you so worried about losing face in front of him? This could save you from more humiliation.

Because; why? Why- would you be with him when you could be with me? Well; pretend to be with me. Strictly business; though. I can’t have you falling in love with me; too.’

It gives me great pleasure to look up into his Handsome Boy face and sweetly say; ‘Marcel; I don’t even want to be your pretend girlfriend; much less your real one.’

He blinks. ‘Why not?’

‘You read my letter. You’re not my type. Nobody would ever believe I would like you.’

‘It’s up to you. I’m just trying to do us both a favor.’ Then he shrugs and looks over my shoulder like he’s bored with this conversation. ‘But Josh definitely believed it.’

In a flash; without even thinking; I say; ‘Okay. Let’s do it.’

Hours later; I’m lying in bed that night still marveling about it all. What people will say when they see me walking down the hall with Marcel.

THE NEXT MORNING; Marcel was sitting in the parking lot for me when I get off the bus.

‘Hey;’ he says. ‘Are you seriously taking the bus every day?’

‘My car is being fixed; remember? My accident?’

He sighs like this is somehow offensive to him; me taking the bus to school.

Then he grabs my hand and holds it as we walk into school together.

This is the first time I’ve walked down the school hallway holding hands with a boy.

It should feel momentous; special, but it doesn’t because it’s not real. Honestly; it feels like nothing.

Emily Nussbaum does a double-take when she sees us. Emily is Gen’s best friend.

She’s staring so hard I’m surprised she doesn’t take a quick pic on her phone to send to Gen.

Marcel keeps stopping to say hi to people, and I stand there smiling like it’s the most natural thing in the world. Me and Marcel.

At one point I try to let go of his hand because mine is starting to feel sweaty, but he tightens his grip. ‘Your hand is too hot;’ I hiss.

Through clenched teeth; he says; ‘No; your hand is.’

I'm sure Genevieve's hands are never sweaty. She could probably hold hands for days without getting overheated.

When we get to my locker; we finally drop hands; so, I can dump my books inside. I'm shutting my locker door when Marcel leans in and tries to kiss me on the mouth. I'm so startled I turn my head, and we hit foreheads.

'Ow!' Marcel rubs his forehead and glares at me.

'Well; don't just sneak up on me like that!' My forehead hurts too. We really banged them hard; like cymbals. If I looked up right now; I would see a blue cartoon- birdies.

'Lower your voice; dummy;' he says through clenched teeth.

'Don't you call me a dummy; you dummy;' I whisper back.

Marcel heaves a big sigh like he's really annoyed with me. I'm about to snap at him that it's his fault; not mine when I catch a glimpse of Genevieve gliding down the hallway.

'Gotta go;' I say, and I dart off in the opposite direction.

'Wait!' Marcel calls out.

But- I keep darting.

I'm lying on my bed with my pillow over my face reliving the horrible kiss that- wasn't. I keep trying to block it out, but it just keeps coming back.

I put my hand to my forehead. I don't think I can do this. It's all so - I mean; the kissing; the sweaty hands; everybody looking. It's too much.

I'm just going to have to tell him I changed my mind, and I don't want to do this anymore, and that'll be that. I don't have his number, and I don't want to say any of this in an e-mail; either. I'll have to go to his house. It's not far; I still remember the way.

I run downstairs; passing Kellie; who is balancing a plate of Oreos and a glass of milk on a tray. 'I'm borrowing your bike!' I yell as I fly past her.

'I'll be back soon!'

‘You better not let anything happen to it!’ Kellie yells back.

I grab her helmet and the bike and tear out of the yard; pedaling as fast as I can. My knees hit my chest a little; but I’m not that much taller than Kellie; so, it isn’t so bad.

Marcel-

lives two neighborhoods away. It takes me less than twenty minutes to get there.

When I do; there aren’t any cars in the driveway. Marcel’s not home. My heart sinks to the pavement. What do I do now? Sit and wait for him on the front porch like some kind of stalker? What if his mom comes home first?

I take off my helmet and sit for a minute so I can rest. My hair is damp and sweaty from the ride over, and I’m exhausted. I try to run my fingers through my hair; smooth it out. It’s a lost cause.

As I’m contemplating texting Chris and seeing if she can come to get me; Marcel’s car comes roaring down the street and up the driveway. I drop my phone and then scramble to pick it up.

Marcel climbs out of his car and raises his eyebrows at me. ‘Look who’s here. My adoring girlfriend.’

I stand up and wave at him. ‘Can I talk to you for a minute?’

He slings his backpack over his shoulder and takes his time sauntering over.

He sits down on the front step like a prince on his throne, and I stand in front of him; my helmet in one hand and my phone in the other. ‘So-o what’s up?’ he drawls. ‘Let me guess. You’re here to back out on me; am I right?’

He’s so smug; so sure, of himself. I don’t want to give him the satisfaction of being right.

‘I just wanted to go over our game plan with you;’ I say; sitting down. ‘Get our story straight before people start asking questions.’

He raises his eyebrows. ‘Oh. Okay. Makes sense. So how did we get together?’

I clasp my hands in my lap and recite; ‘When I got in that car accident last week; you happened to be driving by, and you waited for Triple-A with me and then you drove me home. You were really nervous the whole time because you’ve actually had kind of a thing for me since middle school. It was your first kiss. So- this was your big chance-’

‘You were my first kiss?’ he interrupts. ‘How about I was your first kiss. That’s a lot more believable.’

I ignore him and continue on. ‘This was your big chance. So- you took it.

You asked me out that very day and we’ve been hanging out ever since and now we’re basically a couple.’

‘I don’t think Gen’s going to buy this;’ he says; shaking his head.

‘Marcel;’ I say in my most patient voice; ‘the most believable lies are the ones that are at least a little bit true. I did get into a car accident; you did stop and sit with me; we did kiss in middle school.’

‘It’s not that.’

‘Then what?’

‘Gen and I hooked up that day after I saw you.’

I sigh... ‘Okay... Spare me the details. My story still works; though. After the car accident; you couldn’t get me out of your mind; so, you asked me out as soon as Genevieve dumped - I mean; as soon as you guys broke up.’ I clear my throat. ‘Since we’re on the topic; I’d also like to set some ground rules.’

‘What kind of ground rules?’ he asks; leaning back.

I press my lips together and take a breath. ‘Well - I don’t want you trying to kiss me again.’

Marcel curls his lip at me. ‘Trust me; I don’t want to do it either. My forehead still hurts from this morning. I think I have a bruise.’ He pushes his hair off his forehead. ‘Do you see a bruise?’

‘No; but I see a receding hairline.’

‘What?’

Ha... I knew that would get him. Marcel’s so vain. ‘Calm down; I’m only kidding. Do you have a piece of paper and a pen?’ ‘You’re going to write this down?’

Primly I say; ‘It’ll help us remember.’

Rolling his eyes; Marcel reaches into his backpack; pulls out a notebook, and hands it to me. I turn to a clean page and write at the top; Contract. Then I write No kissing.

‘Are people really going to buy it if we never touch each other in public?’ Marcel asks; looking skeptical.

‘I don’t think relationships are just about physicality. There are ways to show you care about someone; not just using your lips.’ Marcel’s smiling, and he looks like he’s about to crack a joke; so, I swiftly add; ‘Or any other body part.’

He groans. ‘You’ve got to give me something here; Lara Jean. I have a reputation to uphold. None of my friends will believe I suddenly turned into a monk to date you. How about at least a hand in your back-jean pocket? Trust me; it’ll be strictly professional.’

I don’t say what I’m thinking; which is that he cares way too much what people think about him. I just nod and write down; Marcel is allowed to put a hand in Lara Jean’s back jean pocket.

‘But no more kissing;’ I say; keeping my head down so he can’t see me blush.

‘You’re the one who started it;’ he reminds me. ‘And also; I don’t have any STDs; so, you can get that out of your head.’

‘I don’t think you have any STDs.’ I look back up at him. ‘The thing is - I’ve never had a boyfriend before. I’ve never been on a real date before, or held hands walking down the hallway. This is all new for me; so, I’m sorry about the forehead thing this morning. I just - wish all of these firsts were happening for real and not with you.’

Marcel seems to be thinking this over. He says; ‘Huh. Okay. Let’s just save some stuff; then.’

‘Yeah?’

‘Sure... We’ll save some stuff for you to do when it’s the real thing and not for show.’

I’m touched. Who knew Marcel could be so thoughtful and generous?

‘Like; I won’t pay for stuff. I’ll save that for a guy who really likes you.’

My smile fades. ‘I wasn’t expecting you to pay for anything!’

Marcel’s on a roll. ‘And I won’t walk you to class or buy you flowers.’

‘I get the picture.’ It seems to me like Marcel’s less concerned about me and more concerned about his wallet. He sure is cheap. ‘So; when you were with Genevieve; what kinds of things did she like you to do?’

I’m afraid he’s going to take this opportunity to make a joke; but instead; he stares off into space and says; ‘She was always bitching at me to write her notes.’

‘Notes?’

‘Yeah; at school. I didn’t get why I couldn’t just text her. It’s immediate; it’s efficient.

Why not use the technology that’s available to us?’

This I understand perfectly. Genevieve didn’t want notes. She wanted letters.

Real letters were written in his handwriting on actual paper that she could hold and keep and read whenever the mood struck her. They were proof; solid and tangible; that someone was thinking about her.

‘I’ll write you a note a day;’ Marcel says suddenly; with gusto. ‘That’ll drive her ass crazy.’

I write down; Marcel will write Lara Jean one note- every day.

Marcel leans in. ‘Write down what you have to go to some parties with me.

And write down no romcoms.'

'Who said anything about romcoms? Not every girl wants to watch romcoms.'

'I can just tell that you're the kind of girl who does.'

I'm annoyed that he has this perception of me, and even more annoyed that he's right.

I write; NO DUMB ACTION MOVIES.

'Then what does that leave us with?' Marcel demands.

'Superhero movies; horror movies; period films; documentaries; foreign films-'

Marcel makes a face; grabs the pen and paper from me, and writes down; NO FOREIGN FILMS. He also writes; Lara Jean will make Marcel's picture her phone wallpaper. 'And vice versa!' I say. I point my phone at him. 'Smile.'

Marcel smiles, and ugh; it's annoying how handsome he is. Then he reaches for his phone and I stop him. 'Not right now. My hair looks sweaty and gross.' 'Good point;' he says, and I want to punch him.

'Can you also write down that under no circumstances can either of us tell anyone the truth?' I ask him.

'The first rule of Fight Club;' Marcel says knowingly.

'I've never seen that movie.'

'Of course; you haven't;' he says, and I make a face at him. Also- mental note; watch Fight Club.

Marcel writes it down, and then I sit next to him and take the pen and underline 'under no circumstances' twice. 'What about an end date?' I ask suddenly.

'What do you mean...?'

'I mean; how long are we going to do this for? Like; two weeks? A month...?'

Marcel shrugs. 'For as long as we feel it.'

‘But- don’t you think we should have something set-’

He cuts me off. ‘You need to relax; Lara Jean. Life doesn’t have to be so planned. Just roll with it and let it happen.’

I sigh and say; ‘Words of wisdom from the great -;’ and Marcel wiggles his eyebrows at me. ‘Just as long as it’s over by the time my sister comes back for Christmas break. She can always tell when I’m lying.’

‘Oh; we’ll definitely be done by then;’ he says.

‘Good;’ I say, and then I sign the paper, and so, does he, and we have our contract.

I’m too proud to ask for a ride, and Marcel doesn’t offer; so, I put my helmet back on and ride Kellie’s bike back home. I’m halfway there when I realize we never exchanged phone numbers. I don’t even know my own supposed boyfriend’s phone number.

I’m AT McCalls BOOKSTORE; PICKING up a copy of The Glass Menagerie for English and scanning the store for Josh. Now that Marcel and I have everything worked out; I can triumphantly crow all about it. That’ll show him for thinking I’m just a homebody no boy would want to date.

I spot him setting up a display of new books in the nonfiction section. He doesn’t see me; so, I sneak up behind and yell; ‘Boo!’

He jumps and drops a book on the floor. ‘You scared the crap out of me!’

‘That was the point; Joshy!’ I’m having a giggle fit. The look on his face! I wonder; why is it so deliciously funny to sneak up on people?

‘All right; all right. Quit laughing. What are you here for?’

I hold up my book and wave it in his face. ‘I have Mr. Radnor for English. You had him; right?’

‘Yeah; he’s good. He’s strict but fair. I still have my notes if you want them.’

‘Thanks;’ I say. Brightly I add; ‘So guess what. Marcel and I haven’t broken up after all.

It was just a misunderstanding.'

'Oh yeah...?' Josh starts stacking books into a column.

'Mm-hmm. I saw him yesterday and we talked and talked; for hours. I feel like I could talk to him about anything; you know? He just really gets me.'

Josh's forehead wrinkles. 'What do you guys talk about?'

'Oh; everything. Movies; books; the usual stuff.'

'Huh. I never saw him as the reading type.' He squints and looks over my shoulder.

'Hey; I've got to go help Janice out at the counter. When you're ready to check out; come to my register so I can give you my discount.'

Hmm; this isn't exactly the reaction I was hoping for. I barely even got a chance to grow. 'Sounds good;' I say, but he's already walking away.

I hug my book to my chest. Now that Josh knows I'm not in love with him anymore and I'm with Marcel; I guess everything will slide right back into place and be normal again.

Like my letter never- ever happened.

'MARGOT CALLED WHEN YOU were out today;' my dad says over dinner.

Dinner is just salad. Salad for me and Daddy and cereal for Kellie. There were supposed to be chicken breasts, but I forgot to take them out of the freezer this morning; so, there's just lettuce and carrot with balsamic dressing. Daddy's supplementing him with two boiled eggs, and I have a piece of buttered toast. Some dinner. Cereal and lettuce. I need to get to the grocery store stat.

Since Margot left; I've only spoken to her twice, and once was over video chat with all of us crowded around my laptop. I didn't get to ask her about the good stuff- the real deal; all the adventures she's been going on and the people she's been meeting.

I think I heard that British people drink absinthe at pubs. I wonder if she's tried it by now. I've emailed Margot so many times and have only gotten back one e-mail in return so far.

I understand that she is busy, but the least she can do is e-mail back once a day. For all she knows; I could be dead in a ditch. ‘What did she say?’ I ask as I cut my carrot into tiny pieces.

‘She’s thinking about trying out for the shinty club team;’ my dad says; wiping salad dressing off his chin.

‘What’s shinty?’ Kellie asks me, and I shrug.

‘It’s a Scottish sport that’s similar to field hockey;’ Daddy explains. ‘It started out as a safe swordfight practice in medieval Scotland.’

Boring. Before Daddy can get started on telling us more about medieval Scotland; I say; ‘Let’s send Gogo a care package! The stuff she can’t get over there.’ ‘Yeah!’ Kellie cheers.

‘What should we send?’ I ask. ‘I say we all contribute something.’

Daddy chews and taps his finger to his chin. ‘I’ll send gummy vitamins;’ he says. ‘And Advil. I think she only took a small bottle of Advil, and you know how she gets migraines sometimes.’

‘I approve.’ I point my fork at Kellie. ‘And what about you?’

‘I’ve got something I could send;’ Kellie says. ‘Should I go get it?’

Daddy and I look at each other and shrug. ‘Sure.’

Kellie comes running back with a picture she’s drawn of Margot. Petting a dog. The exact breed of dog Kellie wants. Akita. I have to laugh.

Kellie frowns. ‘What’s so funny?’

‘Nothing;’ I say.

‘Do you think it’s good enough?’ Kellie asks me. ‘Good enough to hang up on her wall?’

‘Definitely;’ I say.

‘No; I want you to really look at it;’ she says. ‘Critique it. I can always do better.’

Margot won't want it if it's not my best work.'

'Kellie; it definitely is;' I say. 'Why would I lie?'

She sighs. 'I just don't know if it's finished yet.'

'Only the artist knows;' Daddy says with a sage nod.

'What do you think about the dog?' she asks him. 'Isn't it cute?'

Daddy takes the picture from me and looks at it closely. 'Yes; the dog is undeniably a good-looking dog.'

'I'm Asian too;' she says. Kellie sits back down and takes a bite of cereal and tries not to smile. She is doing her inception thing. Planting positive associations about dogs in Daddy's head. The kid never rests. She always has an angle.

'What else is going in the care package?' Kellie wants to know.

I start ticking off with my fingers. 'Tampons because I don't know if they have our brand in Scotland; flannel pj's; thick socks; Girl Scout cookies-'

'Where are we going to get Girl Scout cookies this time of year?' Daddy asks.

'I have a box of Thin Mints hidden in the freezer;' I say.

He gives me a hurt look. 'Hidden from who?'

Thin Mints are his favorite. If there are Thin Mints in the house; forget about it. Daddy is a Thin Mint Monster.

I give an enigmatic shrug. 'Also- I'm sending Margot's favorite kind of roller-ball pen, and - I think that's it.'

'Don't forget her brown boots;' my dad reminds me. 'She specifically requested we send her brown boots with the laces.'

'Did she?' I was hoping Margot hadn't noticed she'd left them behind.

'When did she say that?'

‘She emailed me yesterday.’

‘I’ll see if I can find them.’

My dad says; ‘weren’t you are wearing them this weekend?’ and at the same time; Kellie says; ‘They’re in your closet.’

I throw up my hands. ‘All right; all right!’

‘If you get the box together tonight; I can drop it off at the post office tomorrow morning on my way to work;’ Daddy offers.

I shake my head. ‘I want to send the scarf I’ve been knitting, and it won’t be ready in time. Maybe in another week or two?’

Slurping her milk; Kellie waves a hand at me and advises; ‘Just give up on the scarf already. Knitting isn’t your thing.’

I open my mouth to argue and then close it. Maybe she’s right. If we wait for my scarf to be done to send the care package; Margot will probably be out of college already. ‘All right;’ I say. ‘We’ll send the care package sans scarf. I’m not saying I’m giving up on knitting; though. I’ll keep chugging along on it and have it ready for you for your Christmas gift; Kellie.’ I smile at her sweetly. ‘It’s pink. You’re favorite.’

Kellie’s eyes go wide with horror. ‘Or Margot. You could also give it to Margot.’

Kellie slides a piece of paper under my door that night. It’s her Christmas list. It’s only September- Christmas is still months away! ‘Puppy’ is written at the top in capital block letters. She also wants an ant farm and a skateboard and a TV in her room. Yeah; that

The TV’s not going to happen. I could buy her the ant farm; though. Or maybe I could talk to Daddy about the puppy. She hasn’t said so, but I think she misses Margot a lot. In a way; Margot is the only mother she’s known. It must be hard for Kellie having her so far away.

I’ll just have to remind myself to be more patient with her; more attentive. She needs me now.

I go to her room and climb into her bed. She's just turned the lights off but is already halfway to sleep. 'What if we got a kitten?' I whisper...

Her eyes fly open. 'No way in heck!'

'Don't you think we're more of a kitten family?' Dreamily I say; 'A fluffy gray-and-white kitten with a bushy tail. We could name him Prince if it's a boy. Ooh; or Gandalf the Gray! Wouldn't that be cute? Or if it's a girl; maybe Agatha. Or Tilly. Or Boss. It really depends on her personality.'

'Quit it;' Kellie warns. 'We're not getting a cat. Cats are blah. They're also very manipulative.'

Impressed; I say; 'Where'd you learn that word?'

'TV!'

'A puppy is a lot of work. Who's going to feed him and walk him and house-train him?'

'I'll do it. I'll do it all. I'm responsible enough to take care of it on my own.'

I snuggle closer to her. I love the way Kellie's head smells after she's had a bath. 'Ha! You don't even do the dishes ever. And you never clean your room. And when have you ever helped fold laundry even once in your life? I mean; really; if you don't do any of those things; how you can be responsible for another living creature?'

Kellie shoves me off. 'Then I'll help more!'

'I'll believe it when I see it.'

'If I help out more; will you help me convince Daddy about the puppy?'

'If you help out more;' I agree. 'If you can prove to me; you're not a baby anymore.'

Kellie will be ten in January. That's plenty old enough to help out around the house.

Margot babies her too much; I think. 'I'm putting you in charge of emptying the upstairs trash cans once a week. And helping with the laundry.'

‘So - would I get a raise in my allowance?’

‘No. The incentive is me helping you convince Daddy to get a dog, and also, you not being so babyish anymore.’ I fluff up my pillow. ‘By the way; I’m sleeping in here tonight.’

Kellie gives me a swift kick and I almost fall out of the bed. ‘You’re the babyish one; not me; Lara Jean.’

‘Just let me sleep in here one night!’

‘You take up all the covers.’

Kellie tries to kick me again, but I make my body heavy and pretend I’m already asleep.

Soon we both fall asleep for real.

Sunday night I’m doing my homework in bed when I get a call from a number I don’t recognize. ‘Hello?’

‘Hey. What are you doing?’ ‘Um - sorry; but who’s this?’

‘It’s Marcel!’

‘Oh. How did you get my number?’

‘Don’t worry about it.’

There’s a longish silence. It’s agonizing; every millisecond that ticks by with neither of us talking; but I don’t know what to say. ‘So; what did you want?’

Marcel laughs. ‘You so ask; Covey. Your car’s in the shop; right? So how about I pick you up from school?’ ‘Okay.’

‘Seven-thirty.’

‘Okay.’

‘Okay-’

‘Bye;’ I say, and I hang up.

THE NEXT MORNING; I WAKE Kellie up early; so, she can braid my hair.

‘Leave me alone,’ she says; rolling on to her other side. ‘I’m sleeping.’

‘Please; please; please can I get a braid crown?’ I ask her; squatting in front of her bed.

‘No. You can have a side braid and that’s it.’

Swiftly Kellie braids my braid, and then she falls right back to sleep and I’m on my way to figure out clothes. Now that Marcel and I are official; people will be noticing me more; so, I should wear something good. I try on a polka-dot puffy-sleeved dress with tights; but- it doesn’t look right. Neither does my favorite heart sweater with the little pom-poms.

Everything looks so kiddish all of a sudden. I finally settle on a floral baby-doll dress I ordered off a Japanese street fashion site; with ankle boots. Sort of a seventies London look.

When I run downstairs at seven twenty-five; Kellie is sitting at the kitchen table with her jean jacket on waiting for me. ‘Why are you downstairs already?’ I ask her. Her bus doesn’t come until eight.

‘I have my field trip today; so, I have to go to school early. Remember?’

I run and look at the calendar on the refrigerator. There it is; in my handwriting- Kellie’s Field Trip. Shoot.

I was supposed to drive her, but that was before my car accident. Daddy had an overnight shift at the hospital and he’s not home yet; so, I don’t have a car.

‘Can one of the Caceool moms come to get you?’

‘It’s too late. The bus leaves at seven forty.’ Kellie’s face is getting splotchy and her chin is starting to quiver. ‘I can’t miss the bus; Lara Jean!’

‘Okay; okay. Don’t get upset. I’ve got a ride coming for us right now. Don’t worry; okay?’ I pluck a greenish banana from the banana hammock.

‘Let’s go- outside and wait for him.’

‘Who?’

‘Just hurry.’

Kellie and I are waiting on the front steps sharing the greenish banana. We both prefer an unripe; greenish banana to a brown speckled one. It’s Margot who likes the speckled ones. I’ll try to save them for banana bread, but Margot gobbles them up; mushy bruised parts and all. I shudder to even think of it.

There’s a chill in the air; even though it’s still September and therefore practically still summer. Kellie rubs her legs to keep warm. She says she’ll wear shorts all the way to October; that’s her plan.

It’s past seven-thirty now and no Marcel yet. I’m starting to get nervous, but I don’t want Kellie to worry. I decided that if he’s not here in exactly two minutes; I’ll go next door to Josh’s and ask him to run Kellie over to the school.

Across the street; our neighbor Ms. Rossinchild waves at us as she locks her front door; a big coffee thermos in her hand. She dashes toward her car.

‘Good morning; Ms. Rossinchild;’ we chorus. I elbow Kellie and say; ‘Five; four; three-’

‘Damn it!’ Ms. Rossinchild shrieks. Ms. Rossinchild has spilled coffee on her hand. She does this at least twice a week. I don’t know why she doesn’t just slow down or maybe just put the top of the thermos or not fill it up so high.

Just then Marcel drives up, and his black Audi is even shinier in the daylight. I get up and say; ‘Come on Kellie;’ and she trails behind me.

‘Who’s that?’ I hear her whisper.

His windows are down. I come up close to the passenger side and stick my head in.

‘Is it okay if we drop my little sister off at the elementary school?’ I ask.

‘She has to be there early today for a field trip.’

Marcel looks annoyed. ‘Why didn’t you mention it yesterday?’

‘I didn’t know about it yesterday!’ Behind me; I can feel rather than hear Kellie fidgeting.

‘This is a two-seater;’ Marcel says as if I can’t see with my own two eyes.

‘I know that. I’ll just put Kellie in my lap and the seat belt over us.’ Which my dad would kill me for if he knew; but I’m not telling, and neither will Kellie.

‘Yeah; because that sounds really safe.’ He’s being sarcastic. I hate it when people are sarcastic. It’s so cheap.

‘It’s two miles!’

He sighs. ‘Fine. Get in.’

I open the door and slide in; laying my bag at my feet. ‘Come on; Kellie.’ I make space for her between my legs, and she climbs in. I strap us in tight; my arms around her.

‘Don’t tell Daddy;’ I say.

‘Duh;’ she says.

‘Hey. What’s your name?’ Marcel asks her.

Kellie hesitates. More and more this happens. With new people; she has to decide if she’ll be Kellie or Katherine.

‘Katherine.’

‘But everyone calls you Kellie?’

‘Everyone who knows me;’ Kellie says. ‘You can call me Katherine.’

Marcel’s eyes light up. ‘You’re tough;’ he says admiringly; which Kellie ignores, but she keeps sneaking peeks at him. He has that effect on people. On girls. Women; even.

We drive through the neighborhood in silence. At last; Kellie says; ‘So who are you?’

I look over at him and he’s looking straight ahead. ‘I’m Marcel. Your sister’s; um; boyfriend.’

My mouth drops. We never said anything about lying to our families! I thought this was going to be an at-school-only thing.

Kellie goes completely still in my arms. Then she twists around to look at me and shrieks; 'He's your boyfriend? Since when?'

'Since last week.' At least that much is the truth. Sort of.

'But you never said anything! Not one frigging word; Lara Jean!'

Automatically I say; 'Don't say 'frig.'

'Not one frigging word;' Kellie repeats with a shake of her head.

Marcel cracks up, and I give him a dirty look. 'It all happened really fast,' he offers.

'There was barely time to tell anybody-'

'Was I talking to you?' Kellie snaps. 'No; I don't think so. I was talking to my sister.'

Marcel's eyes widen, and I can see him trying to keep a straight face.

'Does Margot know?' she asks me.

'Not yet, and don't you go mentioning it to her before I have a chance to.'

'Hmph.' This seems to appease Kellie a tiny bit. Knowing something first; before Margot is a big deal.

Then we're at the elementary school and thank God; the bus is still there in the parking lot. All the kids are lined up in front of it. I let out the breath I've been holding the whole way over, and Kellie is already untangling herself from me and bounding out of the car. 'Have a good time on the field trip!' I call out.

She spins back around and points an accusing finger at me. 'I want to hear the whole story when I get home!' With that decree; she's off running for the bus loop.

I re-buckle my seat belt. 'Um; I don't remember us deciding to tell our families that we're boyfriend-girlfriend.'

‘She was going to have to find out at some point; with me chauffeuring you and her around town.’

‘You didn’t have to say ‘boyfriend.’ You could’ve just said ‘friend.’

We’re getting close to school now; just two more lights. I give my side braid a nervous tug.

‘Um; so, have you talked to Genevieve at all?’

Marcel frowns. ‘No.’

‘She hasn’t said a word to you about it?’

‘Nope. But I’m sure she will soon.’

Marcel speeds into the parking lot and zooms into space. When we get out of the car and head for the entrance; Marcel’s fingers lace through mine. I think he’s going to drop me off at my locker as he did before, but he leads us in the opposite direction.

‘Where are we going?’ I ask him.

‘Cafeteria...’

I’m about to protest, but before I can; he says firmly; ‘We need to start hanging out in public more. The caf- is where we’ll get the most bang for our buck.’

Josh won’t be in the cafeteria- that’s for popular people- but I know who will most certainly be there- Genevieve.

When we walk in; she’s holding court at their lunch table- her and Emily Nussbaum- and Gabe and Darrell from the lacrosse team. They’re all eating breakfast and drinking coffee. She must have a sixth sense where Marcel is concerned because she beams lasers at us immediately. I start slowing down; which Marcel doesn’t seem to notice.

Marcel makes a beeline for the table, but at the last second; I chicken out. I tug on his hand and say; ‘Let’s sit over here;’ and point to an empty table in their line of vision.

‘Why...?’

‘Just- please.’ I think fast. ‘Because you see; it would be too blatantly jerky of you to- bring a girl to the table after you’ve only been broken up for; like; a minute. And this way Genevieve can watch from afar and wonder for just a little bit longer.’ And also; I’m terrified.

As I drag Marcel over to the table; he waves to his friends; shrugging his shoulders like- Wha-d-d-are-you-gonna-do? I sit down, and Marcel sits down next to me. He pulls my chair closer to his. Raising his eyebrows; he asks; ‘Are you that afraid of her?’ ‘No.’ Yes.

‘You’re going to have to face her some time.’ Marcel leans forward and grabs my hand again and starts tracing the lines on my palm.

‘Quit;’ I say. ‘You’re creeping me out.’

He flashes me a hurt look. ‘Girls love it when I do that.’

‘No; Genevieve loves it. Or she pretends to love it. You know; now that I think of it; you actually don’t have that much experience when it comes to girls. Just one girl.’ I take my hand away from his and perch it on the table. ‘I mean; everybody thinks you’re this big ladies’ man when in reality you’ve only ever been with Genevieve and then Jamila for like a month-’

‘Okay; okay. I get it. Enough already. They’re watching us.’

‘Who is? Your table?’

Marcel shrugs. ‘Everyone...’

I do a quick look around. He’s right. Everyone is watching us. Marcel’s so used to people watching him, but I’m not. It feels funny; like a new sweater that makes my skin feel itchy. Because no one ever watches me. It’s like being on stage. And the funny thing; the really strange thing is; it’s not an altogether unpleasant feeling.

I’m pondering this when my eyes meet Genevieve’s. There’s this very brief moment of recognition between us like I know you. Then she looks away and whispers something to Emily.

Genevieve is looking at me like I am a tasty morsel and she is going to eat me alive and then spit out my bones. And then; just as quickly; the look is gone and she’s smiling.

I shiver. The truth is; Genevieve; scared me even when we were kids. One time I was playing at her house, and Margot called looking for me to come home for lunch, and Genevieve told her I wasn't there. She wouldn't let me leave because she wanted to keep playing dollhouse. She kept blocking the door. I had to call her mom.

The clock reads five minutes past eight. The bell's going to ring soon. 'We should get going;' I say, and when I stand up; my knees feel shaky. 'Ready?'

He's distracted because he was looking over at his table of friends. 'Yeah; sure.' Marcel gets up and propels me toward the door; he keeps one hand on the small of my back.

With his other hand; he waves at his friends. 'Smile;' he whispers to me; so, I do.

I have to admit; it's not a bad feeling; having a boy sweep you along; usher you through crowds. It's the feeling of being cared for. It's kind of like walking in a dream. I'm still me and Marcel's still Marcel, but everything around me feels fuzzy and unreal; like the time Margot and I snuck champagne on New Year's Eve.

I never knew it before, but I think maybe all this time I've been invisible.

Just someone who was there. Now that people think I'm Marcel -'s girlfriend; they're wondering about me. Like; why? What about me made Marcel like me? What do I have? What makes me so special? I would be wondering too.

I am now a Mysterious Girl. Before I was just a Quiet Girl. But becoming Marcel's girlfriend has elevated me to Mysterious Girl.

I take the bus home from school because Marcel has to go to lacrosse practice. I sit in the front the way I've been doing, but today people have questions for me.

Underclassmen; mostly; because hardly any upperclassmen take the bus.

'What's with you and-?' A sophomore girl named Manda asks me.

I pretend like I don't hear her.

Instead; I sink lower into my seat and open up the note Marcel left for me in my locker.

Dear Lara Jean;

Good job today.

Marcel-

I start to smile and then I hear Manda whisper to her friend; 'It's so weird that - would like her. I mean - look at her and then look at Genevieve.' I can feel myself shrink. Is that what everyone thinks? Maybe it's not that I'm a Mysterious Girl.

Maybe it's that I'm a Not Good Enough Girl.

When I get home; I go straight to my room; put on a soft nightgown, and release my braid. It's sweet relief to let it out. My scalp is tingling with gratitude. Then I lie in my bed and stare out the window until it gets dark. My phone keeps buzzing, and I'm sure it's Chris, but I don't lift my head to look.

Kellie barges in at one point and says; 'Are you sick? Why are you still lying in bed like you have cancer like Brielle's mom did?'

'I need peace;' I say; closing my eyes. 'I need to replenish myself with peace.'

'Well - then what are we eating for dinner?'

I open my eyes. That's right. It's Monday. I'm in charge of dinner on Mondays now.

Ugh; Margot; where are you? It's dark already; there's not enough time to defrost anything. Maybe Mondays should be pizza nights. I eye her. 'Do you have any money?'

We both get an allowance- Kellie gets five dollars a week and I get twenty, but Kellie always has more money than me. She saves everything like a wily squirrel. I don't know where she keeps it because she locks the door whenever she goes to take any out of her stash.

-And-

She'll lend it, but she charges interest. Margot has a credit card that she's allowed to use for groceries and gas, but she took that with her. I should probably ask Daddy about getting me one too; now that I'm the oldest sister.

'Why do you need money?'

‘Because I want to order a pizza for dinner.’ Kellie opens her mouth to negotiate; but before she can get a word in; I say; ‘Daddy will pay you back when he gets home; so, don’t even think about charging me interest. The pizzas for you; too; you know. Twenty oughts to do it.’

Kellie crosses her arms. ‘I’ll give you the money, but first; you have to tell me about that boy from this morning. Your boyfriend.’

I groan. ‘What do you want to know?’

‘I want to know how you got together.’

‘We used to be friends back in middle school; remember? We’d all hang out in the Pearces’ treehouse sometimes.’ Kellie gives me a blank shrug. ‘Well; remember that day I got in a car accident?’ Kellie nods. ‘Well; Marcel was driving by, and he stopped and helped me. And we just - reconnected. It was fate.’ Actually; this is good practice; telling Kellie this story. I’ll tell Chris the same story tonight.

‘That’s it? That’s the whole story?’

‘Hey; that’s a pretty good story;’ I say. ‘I mean; a car accident is very dramatic; plus, our history together.’

Kellie just says; ‘Hmm;’ and she leaves it at that.

We have sausage and mushroom pizza for dinner, and when I broach the idea of Pizza Mondays; Daddy is quick to agree. I think he’s remembering my mac and cheese.

It’s a relief that Kellie spends most of dinner talking about her field trip and all I have to do is chew on my pizza. I’m still thinking about what Manda said and wondering if maybe this wasn’t such a good idea after all.

When Kellie pauses to inhale her slice; Daddy turns to me and says; ‘Did anything interesting happen to you today?’

I swallow my mouthful of pizza. ‘Um - not really.’

Later that night I fix myself a bubble bath and soak in the tub for so long Kellie bangs on the door twice to check if I’ve fallen asleep. Once I almost do.

I've just drifted off when my phone buzzes. It's Chris. I hit ignore, but then it keeps buzzing, and buzzing, and buzzing. I finally just pick up.

'Is it true?' She screams.

I hold the phone away from my ear. 'Yes.'

'Oh my god. Tell me everything.'

'Tomorrow; Chris. I'll tell you everything tomorrow. Good night.'

'Wait-'

'Night!'

THAT FRIDAY I GO TO my first ever football game. I've never had even the tiniest bit of interest in it before, and I still don't. I'm sitting high in the stands with Marcel and his friends, and as far as I can tell; there's not a lot to see. It just seems like a lot of waiting and huddling and not a lot of action. Nothing at all like football games in the movies and on TV shows.

By nine-thirty the game's almost over; I hope, and I'm yawning into my coat when Marcel suddenly throws his arm around me. I nearly choke on my yawn.

Down below; Genevieve is cheering with the rest of the squad. She is shimmying and shaking her pom-poms. She looks up in the stands, and when she sees us; she stops for just a half-second before launching into a new cheer; eyes blazing.

I glance at Marcel; who has a satisfied smirk on. When Genevieve's back on the sidelines; he drops his arm and suddenly seems to remember I'm there. He says; 'Eli's having people over tonight. Want to go?'

I don't even know who Eli is. I yawn again; a big one for the show. 'Um - I'm really tired. So - no. No; thank you. Can you just drop me off on the way there?'

Marcel gives me a look, but he doesn't argue.

On the way home; we pass by the diner and Marcel suddenly says; 'I'm hungry. Do you want to stop and get something?' Pointedly he adds; 'Or are you too tired?'

I ignore the dig and say; 'Sure; I can eat.'

So; Marcel turns the car around and we go to the diner. We get a booth upfront.

Whenever I used to come here with Margot and Josh; we would always sit in the back near the jukebox; so, we could put coins in. Half the time the jukebox was broken, but we still liked sitting near it. It's weird to be here without them. We have so many traditions here.

The three of us would get two grilled-cheese sandwiches and cut them up into squares, and we'd order a bowl of tomato soup to dip the squares in, and then Josh and I would share a waffle with extra whipped cream for dessert and Margot would have a bowl of tapioca pudding. Gross; I know. I'm pretty sure only grandmas like tapioca pudding.

Our waitress is Kelly; who's a student at the college. She was gone all summer, and I guess now she's back. She eyes Marcel as she sets down our waters. 'Where are your friends tonight?' she asks me.

I say; 'Margot's left for Scotland, and Josh - isn't here.' Which Marcel rolls his eyes at.

Then Marcel orders blueberry pancakes and bacon and scrambled eggs. I get a grilled cheese with fries on the side and a black cherry soda.

When Kelly leaves to put in our orders; I ask him; 'Why do you hate Josh so much?'

'I don't hate him;' Marcel scoffs. 'I barely know the guy.'

'Well; you certainly don't like him.'

Marcel scowls at me. 'What's to like? That kid turned me in once for cheating in seventh grade.'

Did Marcel cheat? My stomach twists a little. 'What kind of cheating was it? Like; homework?'

'No; a Spanish test. I wrote down the answers in my calculator, and Josh freaking told on me. Who does that?'

I search his face for some sign of embarrassment or shame at having cheated, but I don't see even an iota. 'What are you so high and mighty for? You're the one who cheated!'

‘It was seventh grade!’

‘Well; do you still cheat?’

‘No. Hardly ever. I mean; I have.’ He frowns at me. ‘Would you quit looking at me like that?’

‘Like what?’

‘With judged eyes. Look; I’m going to school on a lacrosse scholarship anyway; so, what does it matter?’

I have a sudden revelation. I lower my voice and say; ‘Wait - can you read?’

He bursts out laughing. ‘Yes; I can read! Geez; Lara Jean. Not everything has a story behind it; okay? I’m just lazy.’ He snorts. ‘Can I read? I’ve written you multiple notes! You’re hilarious.’

I can feel my face get flushed. ‘It wasn’t that funny.’ I squint at him. ‘Is everything a joke to you?’

‘Not everything; but most things; sure.’

I drop my chin. ‘Then maybe that’s a character flaw that you should work on;’ I say.

‘Because some things are serious, and they should be taken seriously. Sorry if you think that’s me being judged.’

‘Yup; I think that’s judged. I think you’re judged in general. That’s a character flaw that you should work on. I also think you need to learn how to kick back and have fun.’

I’m listing off all the ways I have fun- biking (which I hate;) baking; reading; I consider saying knitting but I’m pretty sure he’ll only make fun of me- when Kelly drops off our food and I stop so I can bite into my grilled cheese while it’s still oozy.

Marcel steals one of my French fries. ‘So- who else?’ ‘Who else what?’ With his mouth full; he says; ‘Who else got letters?’

‘Um; that’s really private.’ I shake my head at him; like Wow; how rude.

‘What? I’m just curious.’ Marcel dips another fry into my little ramekin of ketchup.

Smirking; he says; ‘Come on; don’t be shy. You can tell me. I know I’m number one; obviously. But I want to hear who else made the cut.’

He’s practically flexing; he’s so sure of himself. Fine; if he wants to know so bad; I’ll tell him. ‘Josh; you- ‘

‘Obviously...’

‘Kenny...’

Marcel snorts. ‘Kenny? Who’s he?’

I prop my elbows up on the table and rest my chin on my hands. ‘A boy I met at church camp. He was the best swimmer on the whole boys’ side. He saved a drowning kid once. He swam out to the middle of the lake before the lifeguards even noticed anything was wrong.’

‘So- what’d he say- when he got the letter?’

‘Nothing. It was sent back return to sender.’

‘Okay; who’s next?’

I take a bite of a sandwich. ‘Lucas Krapf.’

‘He’s gay;’ Marcel says.

‘He’s not gay!’

‘Dude quit dreaming. The kid is gay. He wore an ascot to school yesterday.’

‘I’m sure he was wearing it ironically. Besides; wearing an ascot doesn’t make someone gay.’ I give him a look like Wow; so homophobic.

‘Hey; don’t give me that look;’ the objects. ‘My favorite uncle’s gay as hell.

I bet you fifty bucks that if I showed my uncle Eddie a picture of Lucas; he’d confirm it in half a second.’

‘Just because Lucas appreciates fashion; that doesn’t make him gay.’

Marcel opens his mouth to argue but I lift up a hand to quiet him. 'All it means is he's more of a city guy in the midst of all this-this boring suburbia. I bet you he ends up going to NYU or some other place in New York. He could be a TV actor. He's got that look; you know. Svelte with fine-boned features. Very sensitive features. He looks like - like an angel.'

'So- what did Angel Boy say about the letter; then?'

'Nothing - I'm sure because he's a gentleman and didn't want to embarrass me by bringing it up.' I give him a meaningful look. Unlike some people is what I'm saying with my eyes.

Marcel rolls his eyes. 'All right; all right. Whatever; I don't care.' He leans back in his seat and stretches his arm out on the back of the empty seat next to him.

'That's only four. Who's the fifth?'

I'm surprised he's been keeping count. 'John Ambrose McClaren.'

Marcel's eyes widen. 'McClaren? When did you like him?'

'Eighth grade.'

'I thought you liked me in eighth grade!'

'There may have been a little bit of overlap;' I admit. Stirring my straw; I say; 'There was this one time; in the gym - he and I had to pick up all the soccer balls, and it started to rain -' I sigh. 'It was probably the most romantic thing that ever happened to me.'

'What is it with girls and rain?' Marcel wonders.

'I don't know - I guess maybe because everything feels more dramatic in the rain;' I say with a shrug.

'Did anything actually happen with you two; or where you just standing out in the rain picking up soccer balls?'

'You wouldn't understand.' Someone like Marcel could never understand. Marcel rolls his eyes. 'So did McClaren's letter gets sent to his old house?' he prompts.

‘I think so. I never heard anything back from him.’ I take a long sip of my soda.

‘Why do you sound so sad about it?’

‘I’m not!’

Maybe I am; a little. Besides Josh; I think John Ambrose McClaren matters the most to me of all the boys I’ve loved. There was just something so sweet about him.

It was the promise of maybe; maybe one day. I think John Ambrose McClaren must be The One That Got Away. Out loud I say; ‘I mean; either he never got my letter, or he did, and-’ I- shrug. ‘I just always wondered how he turned out. If he’s still the same. I bet he is.’

‘You know what; I think maybe he mentioned you once.’ Slowly he says; ‘Yeah; he definitely did. He said he thought you were the prettiest girl in our grade. He said his one regret from middle school was not asking you to the eighth-grade formal.’

My whole body goes still- and I think I even stop breathing. ‘For real?’ I whisper.

Marcel busts up laughing. ‘Dude! You’re so gullible!’

My stomach squeezes. Blinking; I say; ‘That was really mean. Why would you say that?’

Marcel stops laughing and says; ‘Hey; I’m sorry. I was just kidding-’

I reach across the table and punch him in the shoulder; hard. ‘You’re a jerk.’

He rubs his shoulder and cries out; ‘Ow! That hurt!’

‘Well; you deserved it.’

‘Sorry;’ he says again. But there’s still a trace of laughter in his eyes; so, I turn my head away from him. ‘Hey; come on. Don’t be mad. Who knows? Maybe he did like you.

Let’s call him and find out.’

My head snaps up. ‘You have his phone number? You have John Ambrose McClaren’s number?’

Marcel pulls out his cell phone. 'Sure. Let's call him right now.'

'No!' I try to grab his phone away from him, but he's too quick. He holds his phone above my head and I can't reach. 'Don't you dare call him!'

'Why not? I thought you were so curious about whatever happened to him.' I shake my head fervently.

'What are you so afraid of? That he doesn't remember you?' Something changes in his face; some dawning realization about me. 'Or that he does?'

I shake my head...

'That's it.' Marcel nods to himself; he tips back in his chair; his hands linked around his head.

I don't like the way he's looking at me. Like he thinks he's figured me out. I hold my palm out to him. 'Give me your phone.'

Marcel's jaw drops. 'You're going to call him? Right now?'

I like that I've surprised him. It makes me feel like I've won something back... I think throwing Marcel off guard could be a fun hobby for me. In a commanding voice; I've only- ever used with Kellie; I say; 'Just give me your phone.' Marcel hands me his phone, and I copy John's number into mine. 'I'll call him when I feel like it; not because you feel like it.'

Marcel gives me a look of grudging respect. Of course- I'm never going to call John, but Marcel K. doesn't need to know that.

That night; I'm lying in bed still thinking about John. It's fun to think of the what-if. Scary; but fun. It's like; I thought this door was closed before, but here it is open just the tiniest crack. What if? What would that be like; me and John Ambrose McClaren?

If I close my eyes; I can almost picture it.

MARGOT AND I ARE ON the phone; it's Saturday afternoon here and Saturday night there.

'Have you lined up an internship for the spring?'

‘Not yet-’

Margot lets out a sigh. ‘I thought you were going to try and do something at Montpelier. I know they need help in the archives... Do you want me to call Donna for you?’

Margot did an internship at Montpelier for two summers and she loved it.

She was there for some important dig where they found a shard of Dolley Madison’s china plate, and you’d have thought they found diamonds or a dinosaur bone. Everybody loves Margot over there. When she left; they gave her a plaque for all her hard work.

Daddy hung it up in the living room.

‘Montpelier’s too far of a drive;’ I say.

‘What about volunteering at the hospital?’ she suggests. ‘You could get a ride with Daddy on the days you have to go in.’

‘You know I don’t like the hospital.’ ‘Then the library! You like the library.’

‘I’ve already filled out an application;’ I lie.

‘Have you really?’

‘Or I was just about to...’

‘I shouldn’t have to push you to want things. You should want them for yourself. You need to take the initiative. I’m not always going to be beside you to push you.’

‘I know that...’

‘I mean; do you realize how important this year is; Lara Jean? It’s kind of everything.

You don’t get a do-over- this is the junior year.’

I can feel tears and panic building up inside me. If she asks me another question; it will be too much, and I’ll cry.

‘Hello...?’ I say.

‘I’m still here.’ My voice comes out tiny, and I know Margot knows how close I am to crying.

She pauses... ‘Look; you still have time; okay? I just don’t want you to wait too long and have all the good placements go to other people; I’m just worried about you is all. But everything’s fine; you’re still okay.’

‘Okay.’ Even just that one little word is an effort.

‘How’s everything else?’

I started out this conversation wishing I could tell her about Marcel and everything that’s been going on with me, but now I’m just feeling relieved that there are all these miles between us and she can’t see what I’m up to. ‘Everything’s good;’ I say.

‘How’s Josh? Have you talked to him lately?’

‘Not really;’ I say. Which I haven’t. I’ve been so busy with Marcel I haven’t really had a chance.

KELLIE AND I ARE ON the front steps. She’s drinking her Korean yogurt drink and I’m working on that scarf for Margot while I wait for Marcel. Kellie’s waiting for Daddy to come out. He’s dropping her off at school today.

Ms. Rossinchild hasn’t come outside yet. Maybe she’s sick today or maybe she’s running even later than usual.

We’ve got our eyes locked on her front door when a minivan drives down our street and slows in front of our house. I squint my eyes. It’s Marcel.

Driving a tan minivan. He ducks his head out the window. ‘Are you coming or not?’

‘Why are you driving that?’ Kellie calls out.

‘Never mind that; Katherine;’ Marcel calls back. ‘Just get in...’

Kellie and I look at each other. ‘Me too?’ Kellie asks me.

I shrug. Then I lean back and open the front door and yell out; 'Kellie's getting a ride with me; Daddy!'

'Okay!' he yells back.

We stand up, but just then Ms. Rossinchild comes dashing out of the house in her navy-blue suit; briefcase in one hand; coffee in the other. Kellie and I look at each other gleefully. 'Five; four; three-'

'Damn it...!!!'

Giggling; we hurl ourselves toward Marcel's minivan. I hop into the passenger seat and Kellie climbs into the back. 'What were you guys laughing about?' He asks.

I'm about to tell him when Josh walks out of his house. He stops and stares at us for a second before he waves. I wave back and Kellie hangs her head out the window and yells;

'Hi; Josh...!'

'What up;' Marcel calls out; leaning over me.

'Hey;' Josh says back. Then he gets in his car.

Marcel pokes me in the side and grins and puts the car in reverse. 'Tell me why you guys were laughing.'

Clicking on my seat belt; I say; 'At least once a week; Ms. Rossinchild runs out to her car and spills hot coffee all over herself.'

Kellie pipes up; 'It's the funniest thing in the world.'

Marcel snorts. 'You guys are sadistic.'

'What's sadistic?' Kellie wants to know. She puts her head between us.

I push her back and say; 'Put your seat belt on.'

Marcel puts the car in reverse. 'It means seeing other people in pain makes you happy.'

'Oh.' She repeats it to herself softly. 'Sadistic.'

‘Don’t teach her weird stuff;’ I say.

‘I like weird stuff;’ Kellie protests.

Marcel says; ‘See? The kid likes weird stuff.’ Without turning around; he lifts his hand up for a high five and Kellie leans forward and slaps it heartily. ‘Hey; gimme a sip of whatever it is you’re drinking back there.’

‘It’s almost gone; so, you can have the rest;’ she says.

Kellie hands it over, and Marcel tips back the plastic container in his mouth.

‘This is good;’ he says.

‘It’s from the Korean grocery store;’ Kellie tells him. ‘They come in a pack and you can put them in the freezer and if you pack it for lunch; it’ll be icy and cold when you drink it.’

‘Sounds good to me. Lara Jean; bring me one of these tomorrow mornings; will you...?’

For services rendered.’

I shoot him a dirty look and Marcel says; ‘I mean the rides! Geez.’

‘I’ll bring you one; Marcel;’ Kellie says.

‘That’s my girl.’

‘As long as you give me a ride to school tomorrow; too;’ Kellie finishes, and Marcel hoots.

BEFORE the FOURTH PERIOD; IM AT my locker; trying to refine my milkmaid braid in the little mirror hanging from the door.

‘Lara Jean?’

‘Yes?’

I peek around the door and it’s Lucas Krapf; wearing a thin V-neck sweater in brilliant blue and stone-colored khakis. ‘I’ve had this for a while now - I wasn’t going to say anything, but then I thought maybe you'd want it back.' He puts a pink envelope in my hand. It's my letter. So; Lucas got his; too.

I drop it into my locker; make a yikes face at myself in the mirror, and then close the door. 'So; you're probably wondering what this is all about;' I begin...

-And-

Then; I immediately falter. 'It's um; well; I wrote it a long time ago, and-'

'You don't have to explain.' 'Really? You're not curious?'

'No. It was just really nice to get a letter like that. I was actually pretty honored.'

I let out a relieved sigh and sag against my locker. Why is Lucas Krapf just so exactly right? He knows how to say the perfect thing.

And then Lucas gives me a half grimace; half-smile. 'But the thing is-'

He lowers his voice. 'You know I'm gay; right?'

'Oh; right; totally;' I say; trying not to sound disappointed. 'No; I totally knew.' So-Marcel was right after all.

Lucas smiles. 'You're so cute;' he says, and I perk up again. Then he says; 'Listen; can you not tell anybody; though? I mean; I'm out, but I'm not out-out yet. You know what I mean?'

'Totally;' I say; super confident.

'For instance; my mom knows but my dad the only kind of knows. I haven't outright told him.'

'Got it...!'

'I just let people believe what they please. I don't feel like it's my responsibility to quantify myself for them. I mean; you get what I'm talking about. As a biracial person; I'm sure people are always asking you what race you are; right?'

I haven't thought of it that way before; but yes- yes- yes! Lucas just gets it.

‘Exactly. It’s like; why do you need to know?’

‘Exactly.’

We smile at each other and I feel that wonderful sensation of being known by someone. We walk together in the same direction; he has a Mandarin class and I have French...

At one point he asks me about Marcel, and I’m tempted to tell him the truth because I’m feeling so close to him. But Marcel and I made that pact- we explicitly said we would never tell anyone. I don’t want to be the one to break it. So-o when Lucas says; ‘Hey; so, what’s the deal with you and-?’ I just shrug and give him an enigmatic smile.

The Slit Kiss

‘It’s crazy; right? Because he’s so -’ I search for the exact right word, but I can’t think of it. ‘I mean; he could play the part of a handsome guy in a movie.’ Hastily I add; ‘So could you; though. You’d play the guy the girl should pick.’

Lucas laughs, but I can tell he likes it.

Dear Lucas; I never met a boy with manners as good as yours. You ought to have a British accent. At homecoming; you wore a cravat and it suited you so well I think you could wear one all the time and get away with it.

Oh; Lucas! I wish I knew what kind of girls you liked. As far as I can tell; you haven’t dated anyone - unless you have a girlfriend at another school. You’re just so mysterious. I hardly know a thing about you. The things I know are so unsubstantial; so unsatisfying; like that, you eat a chicken sandwich every day at lunch, and you’re on the golf team.

I guess the one remotely real thing I know about you is you’re a good writer; which must mean you have deep reserves of emotion. Like that short story you wrote in creative writing about the poisoned well, and it was from a six-year-old boy’s perspective. It was so sensitive; so keen! That story made me feel like I knew you at least a little bit. But I don't know you, and I wish I did.

I think you're very special. I think you are probably one of the most special people at our school, and I wish more people knew that about you. Or maybe I don't because sometimes it's nice to be the only one who knows something.

Love; Lara Jean-

AFTER SCHOOL; CHRIS, and Aire hanging out in my room. She's in trouble with her mom for staying out all night; so, she's hiding out over here until her mom leaves for book club.

We're sharing a big bag of Kellie's Pirate Booty; which I'm going to have to replace because she'll complain if it's missing from her lunch on Monday.

Chris stuffs a handful of Pirate Booty puffs in her mouth. 'Just tell me; Lara Jean. How far have you guys gone?'

I almost choke. 'We've gone nowhere! And we have no plans to go anywhere in the near future.' Or ever...

'Seriously? Not even over-the-bra action? A quick swipe across your chest?'

'No! I told you; I and my sister aren't like that.'

Chris snorts... 'Are you joking me...? Of course; Margot and Josh have had sex. Quit being so naive; Lara Jean.'

'This isn't me being naive;' I tell her. 'I know for a fact that he and Margot haven't done it.' 'How? How do you know 'for a fact'? I'd love to hear this.'

'I'm not telling you.' If I tell Chris; she'll only laugh more. She doesn't understand; she only has a little brother. She doesn't know how it is with sisters.

Margot and I; we made a pact; back in middle school.

We swore we wouldn't have sex until we were married or we were really; really in love and at least twenty-one. Margot might be really; really in love, but she's not married and she's not twenty-one... She'd never go back on her word. With sisters a pact is everything.

'No; I'd really love to know.' Chris has that hungry glint in her eyes, and I know she's just getting warmed up.

'You just want to make fun of it, and I'm not going to let you,' I say.

Chris rolls her eyes. 'Fine. But there's no way they haven't boned.'

I think Chris talks like that on purpose to get a reaction from me. She loves a reaction; so, I'm careful to not give her one. I calmly say; 'Can you please stop talking about my sister and Josh having sex. You know I don't like it.'

Chris takes a permanent marker out of her bag and starts to color in her thumbnail.

'You need to stop being such a scaredy-cat. Seriously; you've built it up in your head to be this huge; life-changing moment; but it's actually done in under five, and it's not even the best part.'

I know she's waiting for me to ask what the best part is, and I am curious; but I ignore her and say; 'I think permanent marker is toxic for your nails;' to which she shakes her head at me like I'm a lost cause.

I wonder; though - what would it be like? To be that close to a boy and have him see all of you; no holding back. Would it be scary only for a second or two?

Or would it be scary the whole time? What if I didn't like it at all? Or what if I liked it too much? It's a lot to think about.

'DO YOU THINK- IF A- a guy and a girl have been dating for a long time; they've automatically had sex?' I ask Marcel. We're sitting on the floor of the library; our backs against the wall of the reference section nobody ever goes to. It's after school; the library's empty, and we're doing homework. Marcel gets Cs and Ds in chemistry; so, I've been helping him study.

Marcel looks up from his chem- book; suddenly interested. He tosses the book aside and says; 'I need more information. How long have they been dating?'

‘A long time. Like two years; something like that.’

‘How old are they...? Our age...?’

‘About...’

...?...’

‘Then most likely but not necessarily. It depends on the girl and the guy. But if I had to put money on it; yeah.’

‘But the girl’s not like that. The guy isn’t either.’

‘Who are we talking about here?’

‘That’s a secret.’ I hesitate, and then say; ‘Chris thinks there’s no way they haven’t.

She says it’s impossible.’

Marcel snorts. ‘Why are you going to her for advice? That girl is a train wreck.’

‘She is not a train wreck...!’

He gives me a look. ‘Shaddyman year she got wasted on Four Loko and she climbed up on Tyler Boylan’s roof and did a striptease.’

‘Where you there?’ I demand. ‘Did you see it with your own two eyes?’

‘Damn straight. Fished her clothes out of the pool like the gentleman I am.’

I blow out my cheeks. ‘Well; Chris never mentioned that story to me; so, like- I can’t really speak to that. Besides; didn’t they ban Four Loko or whatever it’s called?’

‘They still make it, but a shitty watered-down version. You can dump Five-Hour Energy in it to get the same effect...’ I shudder; which makes Marcel smile. ‘What do you and Chris even talk about?’ he asks. ‘You have nothing in common.’

‘What do we talk about?’ I counter...

Marcel laughs. ‘Point taken.’ He pushes away from the wall and puts his head in my lap, and I go completely still.

I try to make my voice sound normal as I say; ‘You’re in a really strange mood today.’

He raises an eyebrow at me. ‘What kind of mood am I in?’ Marcel sure loves to hear about himself. Normally; I don’t mind, but today I’m not in the mood to oblige him. He already has too many people in his life telling him how great he is.

‘The obnoxious kind;’ I say, and he laughs.

‘I’m sleepy.’ He closes his eyes and snuggles against me. ‘Tell me a bedtime story; Covey.’

‘Don’t flirt;’ I tell him...

His eyes fly open. ‘I wasn’t!’

‘Yes; you were. You flirt with everyone. It’s like you can’t help yourself.’

‘Well; I don’t ever flirt with you.’ Marcel sits back up and checks his phone, and suddenly I’m wishing I didn’t say anything at all...

I’m IN FRENCH CLASS; LOOKING Gout the window as I am wont to do, and that’s when I see Josh walking toward the bleachers by the track. He’s carrying his lunch, and he’s alone. Why is he eating alone? He has his comic-book group; he has Jersey Mike.

But I guess he and Jersey Mike didn’t hang out so much last year. Josh was always with Margot and me. The trio. And now we’re not even a duo, and he’s all alone. Part of it’s Margot’s fault for leaving; but I can see my part in it too; if I’d never started liking him; I wouldn’t have had to make up this whole Marcel. story. I could just be his good friend Lara Jean like always.

Maybe this is why Mommy told Margot not to go to college with a boyfriend. When you have a boyfriend or a girlfriend; you only want to be with that person, and you forget about everybody else, and then when the two of you break up; you’ve lost all your friends. They were off doing fun stuff without you.

All I can say is; Josh sure is a lonely figure eating his sandwich on the very top bleacher.

I take the bus home from school because Marcel had to leave early for a lacrosse game with his club team. I'm in front of the house; taking the mail out of our mailbox when Josh pulls into his driveway. 'Hey!' he calls out. He climbs out of his car and jogs over to me; his backpack slung over his shoulder.

'I saw you on the bus;' he says. 'I waved, but you were doing your daydreaming thing. So how long's your car going to be in the shop?'

'I don't know. It keeps changing. They had to order apart from; like; Indiana.'

Josh gives me a knowing look. 'So, you're secretly relieved; right?'

'No! Why would I be relieved?'

'Come on. I know you. You hate driving. You're probably glad to have the excuse not to drive.'

I start to protest; but then I stop. There's no use. Josh knows me too well.

'Well; maybe I'm a teeny-tiny bit relieved.'

'If you ever need a ride; you know you can call me.'

I nod. I do know that. I wouldn't call him for myself; but I would for Kellie; in an emergency.

'I mean; I know you have - now, but I'm right next door. It's way more convenient for me to give you a ride to a school than him. I mean; it's more environmentally responsible.' I don't say anything, and Josh scratches the back of his neck.

'I want to say something to you, but I feel weird bringing it up. Which is also weird; because we've always been able to talk to each other.'

'We can still talk to each other;' I say. 'Nothing's changed.' That's the biggest lie I've ever told him; even bigger than the lie about my so-called dead twin Marcella. Until a couple of years ago; Josh thought I had a twin sister named Marcella who died of leukemia.

'Okay. I feel like - I feel like you've been avoiding me ever since-'

He's going to say it. He's actually going to say it. I look down at the ground.

'Ever since Margot broke up with me.'

My head snaps up. That's what he thinks? That I'm avoiding him because of Margot...?

Did my letter really make that little of an impact? I try to keep my face still and expressionless when I say; 'I haven't been avoiding you. I've just been busy.'

'With- I know. You and I have known each other for a long time.

You're one of my best friends; Lara Jean. I don't want to lose you; too.'

It's the 'too' that's the sticking point... The 'too' is what stops me in my tracks. It sticks in my craw. Because if he hadn't said 'too;' it would be about me and him. Not about me and him and Margot.

'That letter you wrote-'

Too late... I don't want to talk about the letter anymore. Before he can say another word; I say; 'I'll always be your friend; Joshy.' And then I smile at him, and it takes a lot of effort. It takes so much effort. But if I don't smile; I'll cry.

Josh nods. 'Okay. Good. So - so can we hang out again?'

'Sure...'

Josh reaches out and chucks my chin. 'So; can I give you a ride to school tomorrow...?'

'Okay;' I say. Because wasn't that kind of the whole point of this? To be able to hang out with Josh again without that letter hanging over our heads? To just be his good friend Lara Jean again?

After dinner; I teach Kellie how to do laundry. She resists me at first, but I tell her that this is a job we are all sharing from now on; so-o she'd better just accept it.

'When the buzzer goes off; that means it's done and you have to fold it right away or it'll get wrinkled.'

To both of our surprise; Kellie likes doing laundry. Mostly because she can sit in front of the TV and fold and watch her shows in peace.

‘Next time I’ll teach you how to iron.’

‘Ironing; too? Who am I; Cinderella?’

I ignore her. ‘You’ll be good at ironing. You like precision and clean lines.

You’ll probably be better at it than me.’

This piques her interest. ‘Yeah; maybe. Your stuff always looks wrinkled no matter what.’

After we finish the laundry; Kellie and I are washing up in the bathroom we share.

There are two sinks; Margot had the one on the left and Kellie and I used to fight over who the sink on the right belonged to. It’s hers now...

Kellie’s brushing her teeth and I’m putting on a cucumber-aloe face mask; when Kellie says to me; ‘Do you think if I asked; Marcel would take us to McDonald’s tomorrow on the way to school?’

I rub another dollop of green face mask onto my cheeks. ‘I don’t want you getting used to Marcel giving us rides. You’re taking the bus from now on; okay?’

Kellie pouts. ‘Why!’

‘Because. Besides; Marcel’s not giving me a ride tomorrow; Josh is.’

‘But won’t Marcel be mad?’

My face is getting tight from the mask drying. Through clenched teeth, I say; ‘Nah. He’s not the jealous type.’

‘Then who’s the jealous type?’

I don’t have a good answer for that. Who is the jealous type? I’m mulling this over when Kellie giggles at me in the mirror and says; ‘You look like a zombie.’

I hold my hands out to her face and she ducks away. In my best zombie voice; I say; ‘I want to eat your brains.’

Kellie runs away; screaming.

When I’m back in my room; I text Marcel that I don’t need a ride to school tomorrow. I don’t tell him Josh is giving me a ride. Just in case.

TODAY’S NOTE FROM Marcel SAYS; Tart and Tangy after school?

He’s drawn two boxes; a yes or a no. I check yes and drop the note in his locker.

After school ends; I meet Marcel in his car, and we caravan with his lacrosse friends to Tart and Tangy. I order an original frozen yogurt with Cap’n Crunch and strawberries and kiwi and pineapple, and Marcel gets key lime with crushed-up Oreos. I pull out my wallet to pay for my yogurt, but Marcel stops me. He winks at me and says; ‘I got this.’ I whisper; ‘I thought you weren’t ever paying for anything.’

‘My boys are here. I can’t look like a cheap-ass in front of my boys.’ Then he puts his arm around me and says loudly; ‘For as long as you’re my girl; you don’t pay for frozen yogurt.’

I roll my eyes, but I’m not going to say no to a free frozen yogurt. No boy has ever paid for me before. I could get used to this kind of nice treatment...

I was bracing myself to see Genevieve here, but she doesn’t show. I think Marcel’s wondering too because he keeps his eyes on the door. With Genevieve; I keep waiting for the other shoe to drop. So far- she’s been eerily; disturbingly quiet. She’s hardly ever in the cafeteria during lunch because she and Emily Nussbaum have been eating off-campus, and when I see her in the hallways; she fake smiles at me without showing her teeth; which is somehow more menacing.

When is she going to strike back against me? When will I have my Jamila Singh moment? Chris says Genevieve’s too obsessed with her college boyfriend to care about me and Marcel, but I don’t believe it. I’ve seen the way she looks at him.

Like he’s hers.

The boys put a few tables together and we basically take over the place. It's just like at the lunch table; with them being loud; talking about the football game coming up on Friday. I don't think I say two words. I don't really have anything to add. I just eat my free frozen yogurt and enjoy the fact that I'm not at home organizing my shoe closet or watching the Golf Channel with my dad.

Continued- 1

We're walking to our cars when Gabe says; 'Hey; Lara Jean; did you know that if you say your name really fast; it sounds like Large? Try it! Lara Jean.'

Dutifully I repeat; 'Lara Jean. Largy. Actually; I think it sounds more like Largy; not Large.'

Gabe nods to himself and announces; 'I'm going to start calling you Large.

You're so little it's funny. Right? Like those big guys who go by the name Tiny?'

I shrug. 'Sure.'

Gabe turns to Darrell. 'She's so little she could be our mascot.'

'Hey; I'm not that small;' I protest.

'How tall are you?' Darrell asks me.

'Five two;' I fib. It's more like five and a quarter.

Tossing his spoon in the trash; Gabe says; 'You're so little you could fit in my pocket!'

All the guys laugh. Marcel's smiling in a bemused way. Then Gabe suddenly grabs me and throws me over his shoulder like I'm a kid and he's my dad.

'Gabe! Put me down!' I shriek; kicking my legs and pounding on his chest.

He starts spinning around in a circle, and all the guys are cracking up. 'I'm going to adopt you; Large! You're going to be my pet. I'll put you in my old hamster cage!'

I'm giggling so hard I can't catch my breath and I'm starting to feel dizzy.

‘Put me down!’

‘Put her down; man;’ Marcel says, but he’s laughing too.

Gabe runs toward somebody’s pickup truck and sets me down in the back.

‘Get me out of here!’ I yell. Gabe’s already running away. All the guys start getting into their cars.

‘Bye; Large!’ they call out. Marcel jogs over to me and extends his hand so I can hop down.

‘Your friends are crazy;’ I say; jumping onto the pavement...

‘They like you;’ he says.

‘Really?’

‘Sure... They used to hate when I would bring Gen places. They don’t mind if you hang out with us.’ Marcel slings his arm around me. ‘Come on; Large. I’ll take you home.’

As we walk to his car; I let my hair fall in my face; so, he doesn’t see me smiling. It sure is nice being part of a group; feeling like I belong.

I VOLUNTEERED TO BAKE Six Dozen cupcakes for Kellie’s PTA bake sale. I did it because Margot’s done it for the past two years. Margot only ever did it because she didn’t want people to think Kellie’s family wasn’t involved enough in PTA. She did brownies both times, but I signed up for cupcakes because I thought they’d be a bigger hit. I bought a few different kinds of blue sprinkles and I made little toothpick flags that say BLUE MOUNTAIN ACADEMY. I thought Kellie would have fun helping me decorate.

But now I’m realizing Margot’s way was better; because with brownies; you just pour them into the pan; bake, and slice, and there you go. Cupcakes are a lot more work. You have to scoop the perfect amount six dozen times, and then you have to wait for them to cool, and then you’re frosting and sprinkling.

I’m measuring out my eighth cup of flour when the doorbell rings. ‘Kellie!’ I scream.

‘Get the door!’

It rings again. 'Kellie!'

From upstairs she screams back; 'I'm running an important experiment!'

I run to the door and fling it open without bothering to check who it is.

Marcel; He busts up laughing.

'You have flour all over your face;' he says; dusting off my cheeks with the backs of his hands.

I twist away from him and wipe my face with my apron. 'What are you doing here?'

'We're going to the game. Didn't you read my note from yesterday?'

'Oh; shoot. I had a test and I forgot.' Marcel frowns and I add; 'I can't go anyway because I have to bake seventy-two cupcakes by tomorrow.'

'On a Friday night?'

'Well - yeah.'

'Is this for the PTA bake sale?' Marcel brushes past me and starts taking off his sneakers. 'You guys are a no-shoes house; right?'

'Yeah;' I say; surprised. 'Is your mom making something too?'

'Rice Krispie treats.' Another way smarter choice than seventy-two cupcakes.

'Sorry; you came over here for nothing. Maybe we can go to the game next Friday;' I say; expecting him to put his shoes back on.

But he doesn't; he wanders into the kitchen and sits on a stool. Huh? 'Your house looks the same as I remembered;' he says; looking around. He points at the framed picture of me and Margot taking a bath when we were babies. 'Cute.'

I can feel my cheeks burn. I go and turn the photo over. 'When have you ever been to my house?'

‘Back in seventh grade. Remember how we’d hang out in your neighbor’s treehouse? I had to pee once, and you let me use your bathroom.’

‘Oh; yeah;’ I say.

Nevaeh

Book: 27

French Kiss

Part: 7

Kiss me Here

It’s funny to see a boy other than Josh in our kitchen. I feel nervous for some reason.

‘How long’s it going to take?’ he asks me, his hands in his pockets.

‘Hours, probably.’ I pick up the measuring cup again. I can’t remember what cup I was on.

Marcel groans. ‘Why can’t we just go to the store and buy some?’

I start measuring the flour that’s in the bowl, separating it into piles.

‘Because, do you think any of the other moms are buying cupcakes from Food Lion? How would that make Kitty look?’

‘Well, if it’s for Kitty, then Kitty should be helping.’ Marcel hops off the stool and comes up to me and slides his hands around my waist and tries to untie my apron strings.

‘Where is the kid?’

I stare at him. ‘What - are you doing?’

Marcel looks at me like I’m a dummy. ‘I need an apron too if I’m going to help. I’m not trying to get my clothes all messed up.’

‘We’re not going to be done in time for the game,’ I tell him.

‘Then we’ll just go to the party after.’ Marcel shoots me an incredulous look. ‘That was in the note I wrote to you today! God, why do I even bother?’

‘I was really busy today,’ I say meekly. I feel bad. He’s following through on his end of the deal and faithfully writing me a note a day and I can’t even be bothered to read them. ‘I don’t know if I can go to a party. I don’t know if I’m allowed to go out that late.’

‘Is your dad home? I’ll ask him.’

‘No, he’s at the hospital. Besides I can’t just leave Kitty here by herself.’ I pick up the measuring cup again.

‘Well, what time does he get home?’

‘I don’t know. Maybe late.’ Or maybe like in the next hour. But Marcel will be long gone by then. ‘You should just go. I don’t want to hold you up.’

Marcel groans. ‘Covey. I need you. Gen hasn’t said a word about us yet, which is kind of the whole point of this. And - she might bring that dick-hole she’s dating.’

Marcel pushes out his lower lip. ‘Come on. I came through for you with Josh, didn’t I?’

‘Yes,’ I admit. ‘But, Marcel, I have to make these cupcakes for the bake sale-’

Marcel stretches his arms out. ‘Then I’ll help you. Just give me an apron.’

I back away from him and start rummaging around for another apron. I find one with a cupcake print and hand it to him.

He makes a face and points at mine. 'I want the one you're wearing.'

'But it's mine!' It's red-and-white gingham with little brown bears; my grandma got it for me in Korea. 'I always bake in this. Just wear that one.'

Slowly Marcel shakes his head and holds out his hand. 'Give me yours. You owe me for not reading any of my notes.'

I untie the apron and hand it over. I turn around and go back to my measuring. 'You're a bigger baby than Kitty.'

'Just hurry up and give me a task.'

'Are you qualified, though? Because I only have exactly enough ingredients for six dozen cupcakes. I don't want to have to start over-'

'I know how to bake!'

'Okay, then. Dump those sticks of butter into the mixing bowl.'

'And then?'

'And then when you're done, I'll give you your next task.'

Marcel rolls his eyes, but he does as he's told. 'So-o this is what you do on Friday nights?

Stay home and bake in your PJ's?'

'I do other stuff too,' I say, tying my hair into a tighter ponytail.

'Like?'

I'm still so flustered by Marcel's sudden appearance that I can't think.

'Um, I go out.'

'Where?'

'God, I don't know! Quit interrogating me, Marcel.' I blow my bangs out of my eyes. It's getting really warm here. I might as well just turn off the oven, because Marcel's arrival has slowed down this whole process. At this rate, I'll be up all night. 'You made me lose my count on the flour. I'm going to have to start over from scratch!'

'Here, let me do it,' Marcel says, coming up close behind me.

I jerk away from him. 'No- no, I'll do it,' I say, and he shakes his head and tries to take the measuring cup from me, but I won't let go, and flour puffs out of the cup and into the air. It dusts us both. Marcel starts cracking up and I let out an outraged shriek. 'Marcel!'

He's laughing too hard to speak.

I cross my arms... 'I'd better still have enough flour.' 'You look like a grandma,' he says, still laughing.

'Well, you look like a grandpa,' I counter. I dump the flour in my mixing bowl back into the flour canister.

'Actually, you're really a lot like my granny,' Marcel says. 'You hate cussing. You like to bake. You stay at home on Friday nights. Wow, I'm dating my granny... gross.'

I start measuring again. One, two. 'I don't stay home every Friday night.' Three...

'I've never seen you out. You don't go to parties. We used to hang out back in the day.

Why'd you stop hanging out?'

Four. 'I - I don't know. Middle school was different.' What does he want me to say?

That Genevieve decided I wasn't cool enough- so I got left behind? Why is he so clueless?

'I always wondered why you stopped hanging out with us.'

Was I on five or six? 'Marcel! You made me lose my count again!'

'I have that effect on women.'

I roll my eyes at him and he grins back at me, but before he can say anything else, I yell, 'Kitty! Get down here!'

‘I’m working-’

‘Marcel’s here!’ I know that will get her.

In five seconds flat, Kitty’s running into the kitchen. She skids to a stop, all of a sudden shy. ‘Why are you here?’ she asks him.

‘To pick up Lara Jean. Why aren’t you helping?’

‘I was running an experiment. Want to help me?’

I answer for him. ‘Sure, he’ll help you.’ To Marcel, I say, ‘You’re distracting me. Go help Kitty.’

‘I don’t know if you want my help, Katherine. See, I’m really distracting to women. I make them lose their count.’ Marcel winks at her and I make a gagging sound. ‘Why don’t you stay down here and help us bake?’

‘Boring!’ Kitty turns tail and runs back up the stairs.

‘Don’t you dare try to sprinkle or frost when it’s all over!’ I yell. ‘You haven’t earned the right!’

I’m creaming the butter and Marcel’s cracking eggs into a chipped salad bowl when my dad gets home. ‘Whose car is that out front?’ Daddy asks as he walks into the kitchen.

He stops short. ‘Hello,’ he says, surprised. He has a Chan’s Chinese Bistro bag in his hands.

‘Hey, Daddy,’ I say like it’s perfectly normal that Marcel - is cooking in our kitchen. ‘You look tired.’

Marcel stands up straighter. ‘Hi, Dr. Covey.’

My dad sets the bag down on the kitchen table. ‘Oh, hello,’ he says, clearing his throat. ‘Nice to see you. You’re Marcel K., right?’

‘Right.’

‘One of the old gang,’ my dad says jovially, and I cringe. ‘What are you kids up to tonight?’

‘I’m baking cupcakes for Kitty’s PTA bake sale and Marcel’s helping,’ I say.

My dad nods. ‘Are you hungry, Marcel? I have plenty.’ He lifts the bag.

‘Shrimp lo mein, kung pao chicken.’

‘Actually, Lara Jean and I were going to stop by our friend’s party,’ Marcel says. ‘If that would be okay? I’ll bring her back early.’

Before my dad can answer, I say to Marcel, ‘I told you I have to finish these cupcakes.’

‘Kitty and I will finish them,’ my dad interjects. ‘You two go to that birthday party.’

My stomach flips. ‘It’s really okay, Daddy. I have to be the one to do them; I’m decorating them specially.’

‘Kitty and I will figure it out. You can go get changed. We’ll keep working on these cupcakes.’

I open and close my mouth like a trout. ‘All right, then.’ And I don’t make a move, I just stand there, because I’m afraid to leave the two of them alone together.

Marcel smiles at me broadly. ‘You heard the man. We’ve got this covered.’

I think, don’t act too confident, because then my dad will think you’re arrogant.

There are certain outfits you have that make you feel good every time you wear them, and then there are outfits where you wore them too many times in a row because you- liked them so much, and now they just feel like garbage. I’m looking at my closet now and everything looks like garbage. My anxiety is only compounded by the fact that I know- Gen will be wearing the exact right thing because she always wears the exact right thing.

And I have to be wearing the right thing too. Marcel wouldn’t have come by and made such a point of going to this party if it weren’t important to him.

I pull on my jeans and try on different tops- a frilly peach one that suddenly looks prissy in my eyes, a long fuzzy sweater with a penguin on it that looks too kid-sh. I'm stepping into a pair of gray shorts with black suspenders when someone knocks at my door. I freeze and grab a sweater to cover myself up.

'Lara Jean?' It's Marcel.

'Yes?'

'Are you almost ready?'

'Almost! Just- just go downstairs. I'll be down soon.'

He lets out an audible sigh. 'Okay. I'm going to see what the kid's doing.'

When I hear his footsteps walking away, I scramble and try a cream polka dot blouse with the shorts-suspenders ensemble. It's cute, but is it too cute? Too much?

And should I do black tights or black knee socks? Margot said I look Parisian in this outfit. Parisian is a good thing. It's sophisticated, romantic. I try on a beret, just to see the effect, and I immediately throw it off. Definitely too much.

I wish Marcel hadn't snuck up on me with this. I need time to plan, to prepare. Though truthfully, if he'd asked me ahead of time, I would have come up with an excuse not to go. It's one thing to go to Tart and Tangy after school, but a party with all of Marcel's friends, not to mention Genevieve?

I hop around my room, searching for my over-the-knee socks, then searching for my strawberry lip pot that looks like a strawberry. Gosh, I really need to clean my room. It's hard to find anything in this mess.

I run to Margot's room for her big grandpa cardigan, and I pass Kitty's open door, where I see Marcel and Kitty lying on the floor, working with her lab set. I root through Margot's sweater drawer, which is now T-shirts and shorts because she's taken most of her sweaters. No grandpa cardigan. But at the bottom of the drawer, there is an envelope.

A letter, from Josh.

I want to open it so badly. I know I shouldn't.

Carefully, ever so carefully, I take out the letter and unfold it.

Dear Margot, you say we had to break up because you don't want to go to college with a boyfriend, and you want your freedom, and you don't want to be held back. But you know, and I know that's not the real reason. You broke up with me because we had sex and you were scared of getting close to me.

I stop reading.

I can't believe it. Chris was right- and I was wrong. Margot and Josh did have sex. It's like everything I thought I knew is the opposite. I thought I knew exactly who my sister was, but it turns out I don't know anything.

I hear Marcel calling my name. 'Lara Jean! Are you ready yet?'

Hastily I fold the letter up and put it back in the envelope. I put it back in the drawer and slam the drawer shut. 'Coming!'

WE'RE STANDING AT THE FRONT door of Steve Bledell's mansion.

Steve's on the football team; he's mostly known for having a rich stepdad with his own plane.

'Ready?' Marcel asks me.

I wipe my palms on my shorts. I wish I'd had time to do something better for my hair.

'Not really.'

'Then let's talk strategy for a second. All you have to do is act like you're in love with me. That shouldn't be too hard.'

I roll my eyes. 'You're the vainest boy I've ever met.'

Marcel grins and shrugs. He's got his hand on the doorknob, but then he stops. 'Hold on,' he says, and he pulls the hair tie out of my hair and tosses it into the yard.

'Hey!'

‘It looks better down. Just trust me.’ Marcel runs his fingers through my hair and fluffs it up, and I swat his hand away. Then he takes his phone out of his back pocket and he snaps a picture of me.

I give him a puzzled look, and he explains, ‘In case Gen checks my phone.’

I watch as he sets the picture as his wallpaper.

‘Can we do another one?’ I don’t like the way my hair looks.

‘Nah, I like it. You look pretty.’ He probably only said it so we could hurry up and go inside, but it makes me feel good.

Walking into this party with Marcel -, I can’t help but feel a sudden rush of pride.

He’s here with me. Or is it that I’m here with him?

I see her as soon as we walk in- she’s on the couch with her girls; they’re all drinking from red Solo cups. No boyfriend in sight. She raises her eyebrows at me and whispers something to Emily Nussbaum. ‘Heyyy, Lara Jean,’ Emily calls out, crooking her finger at me. ‘Come sit by us.’

I start to walk toward them, thinking Marcel is next to me, but he’s not. He’s stopped to say hi to someone. I look at him with panicky eyes and he just gestures at me to keep going. He mouths, You’re up.

Crossing the room alone feels like crossing a continent, with Gen and her friends watching me. ‘Hi, guys,’ I say, and my voice comes out high-pitched and little-girlish.

There’s no room for me on the couch, so I perch on an armrest like a bird on a telephone wire. I keep my eyes trained on Marcel’s back; he is across the room with some guys from the lacrosse team. It must be nice to be him. So-o at ease, so comfortable with himself, knowing that people are waiting for him, like Marcel’s here, now the party can really get started. I look around the room, just to have something to do, and see Gabe and Darrell, and they wave at me very nicely, but they don’t come over. It feels like everyone is waiting and watching, waiting and watching to see what Genevieve will do.

I wish I hadn’t come.

Emily leans forward. 'We're all dying to know - what's the story with you and-?'

I know she's been commissioned by Gen to ask. Gen's sipping her drink, casual as can be, but she's waiting for my answer. Is she drunk yet? I wonder. From everything I've heard and know about Gen, she is a mean drunk. Not that I've ever personally experienced it, but I've heard things. There are stories.

I wet my lips. 'Whatever Marcel said - I guess that's the story.'

Emily waves this off like whatever Marcel says doesn't really count. 'We want to hear it from you. I mean, it's just so surprising. How did this even happen?' She leans closer like we are girlfriends.

When I hesitate, when my eyes dart toward Genevieve, she smiles and rolls her eyes.

'It's okay, you can say, Lara Jean. Marcel and I are over. I don't know if he told you this, but I'm actually the one who broke up with him, so.'

I nod... 'That's what he said.' That is not what he said, but it's what I already knew.

'So- when did you guys get together?' She tries to sound offhand, but I know my answer is important to her. She's trying to catch me in something.

'Pretty recently,' I say.

'How recently?' she presses.

I swallow... 'Right before school started,' I tell her. Isn't that what Marcel and I decided the story was going to be?

Genevieve's eyes go bright and my heart sinks. I've said the wrong thing, but it's too late. It's hard not to get caught up in her spell. She's the kind of person you want to like you. You know she can be cruel; you've seen her be cruel. But when her eyes are on you, and she's paying attention to you, you want it to last. Her beauty is part of it, but there's something more- something that draws you in. I think it's her transparency- everything she thinks or feels is written all over her face, and even if it wasn't, she'd say it anyway, because she says what she thinks, without thinking first.

I can see why Marcel has loved her for so long.

‘I think it’s adorable,’ Genevieve says, and then the girls start talking about some concert they’re trying to get tickets for and I just sit there, glad I don’t have to talk- anymore, wondering how it’s going with the cupcakes back at home. I hope Daddy isn’t overbaking them. There’s nothing worse than a dry cupcake.

The girls move on to talking about Halloween costumes, so I get up and go to the bathroom.

I come back to find Marcel sitting in a wingback leather armchair, drinking a beer and talking to Gabe. There’s nowhere for me to sit; my spot on the couch has been taken.

Now what?

I stand there for a second and then I go for it: I do what a girl in love with Marcel would do. I do what Genevieve would do. I march right in and plop down in his lap like it’s my rightful place.

Marcel yelps in surprise. ‘Hey,’ he says, coughing on his beer.

‘Hey,’ I say. Then I tweak him once on the nose like I saw a girl do in a black-and-white movie.

Marcel shifts in his seat and gives me a look like he’s trying not to laugh, and I get nervous- tweaking a boy on the nose is romantic, right? Then, out of the- corner of my- eye, I see Genevieve glaring at us. She whispers something to Emily and stalks out of the room.

Success!

Later I am pouring myself Cherry Coke and I see Genevieve and Marcel, talking in the kitchen. She’s speaking to him in a low, urgent voice, and she reaches out and touches his arm. He tries to brush her hand away, but she doesn’t let go.

I’m so mesmerized I don’t even notice when Lucas Krapf comes up to me, popping the cap off a bottle of Bud Light. ‘Hey, Lara Jean.’

‘Hi!’ I’m relieved to see a familiar face.

He stands next to me, our backs against the dining room wall. 'What are they fighting about?'

'Who even knows?' I say. I smile a secret smile. Hopefully, it's about me, and Marcel will be happy our plan is finally working.

Lucas crooks his finger at me, so I'll come closer. He whispers, 'Fighting isn't a good sign, Lara Jean. It means you still care.' His breath smells like beer.

Hmm. Genevieve obviously still cares. Marcel must too.

Lucas pats me on the head fondly. 'Just be careful.'

'Thank you,' I say.

Marcel stalks out of the kitchen and says, 'Are you ready to go?' He doesn't wait for me to answer him; he just starts walking, his shoulders stiff.

I give Lucas a shrug. 'See you on Monday, Lucas!' Then I scurry after Marcel.

He's still mad; I can tell by the way he jerks the keys into the ignition. 'God, she makes me crazy!' He's so keyed up energy is vibrating off him in waves.

'What did you say to her?'

I shift uncomfortably in my seat. 'She asked me when we got together. I told her just before school started.'

Marcel does a full-body groan. 'We hooked up that first weekend.'

'But - you guys have broken up already.'

'Yeah, well.' Marcel shrugs. 'Whatever. What's done is done.'

Relieved, I click on my seat belt and kick my shoes off. 'What were you two fighting about tonight, anyway?'

'Don't worry about it. You did a good job, by the way. She's so jealous it's killing her.'

‘Yay,’ I say. Just as long as she doesn’t kill me.

We drive through the night in silence. Then I ask, ‘Marcel - how did you know you loved Genevieve?’

‘God, Lara Jean. Why do you have to ask those kinds of questions?’

‘Because I’m a naturally curious person.’ I flip down his mirror and start braiding the top of my hair. ‘And maybe the question you should be asking yourself is, why are you so afraid to answer those kinds of questions?’

‘I’m not afraid!’

‘Then why won’t you answer the question?’

Marcel goes silent, and I’m pretty sure he’s not going to answer, but then, after a long pause where my question just hangs in the air, he says, ‘I don’t know if I ever loved

Genevieve. How would I even know what that felt like? I’m seventeen, for God’s sake.’

‘Seventeen’s not so young. A hundred years ago people got married when they were practically our age.’

‘Yeah, that was before electricity and the Internet. A hundred years ago eighteen year-old guys were out there fighting wars with bayonets and holding a man’s life in their hands! They lived a lot of life by the time they were our age. What do kids our age know about love and life?’ I’ve never heard him talk like this before- like he actually cares about something. I think he’s still all worked up from his fight with Genevieve.

I wind my hair into a honey bun and secure it with a ponytail holder. ‘You know who you sound like? You sound like my grandpa,’ I say. ‘Also- I think you’re stalling because you don’t want to answer the question.’

‘I answered it; you just didn’t like my answer.’

We pull up in front of my house. Marcel turns off the engine, which is what he does when he wants to talk a little while longer. So, I don't jump out right away, I put my bag in my lap and search for my keys even though the lights are on upstairs.

Gosh... To be sitting in the passenger seat of Marcel -'s black Audi. Isn't that what every girl has ever wanted, in the history of boys and girls? Not Marcel - specifically, or yes, maybe Marcel - specifically.

Marcel leans his head back against the headrest and closes his eyes.

I say, 'Did you know that when people fight with each other, that means they still really care about each other?' When Marcel doesn't answer, I say, 'Genevieve must really have a hold on you.'

I expect him to deny it, but he doesn't. Instead, he says, 'She does, but I wish she didn't. I don't want to be owned by anyone. Or belong to anyone.'

Margot would say she belongs to herself. Kitty would say she belongs to no one.

-And-

I guess I would say I belong to my sisters and my dad, but that won't always be true.

To belong to someone- I didn't know it, but now that I think about it, it seems like that's all- I've ever wanted. To really be somebody's, and to have them be mine.

'So that's why you're doing this,' I tell him- I'm partly asking but I'm mostly telling.

'To prove you don't belong to her. Or with her.' I stop. 'Do you think there's a difference?

Between belonging with and belonging to, I mean?'

'Sure. One implies choice; the other doesn't.'

'You must really love her to go to all this trouble.'

Marcel makes a dismissive sound. 'You're too dreamy-eyed.'

'Thank you,' I say, even though I know he doesn't mean it as a compliment.

I say it just to bug him.

I know I've succeeded when he says, his face sour, 'What would you know about love, Lara Jean? You've never even had a boyfriend before.'

I'm tempted to make up someone, a boy from camp, from another town, from anywhere. His name is Clint is on the tip of my tongue. But it would be too humiliating because he'd know I was lying; I already told him I never dated anybody before.

-And-

Even if I hadn't, it is far more pathetic to make up a boyfriend than to just admit the truth. 'No, I've never had a boyfriend. But plenty of people I know have had boyfriends, but they've never once been in love. I've been in love.' That's why I'm doing this.

Marcel snorts. 'With who? Josh Sanderson? That tool?'

'He's not a tool,' I say, frowning at him. 'You don't even know him to say that.'

'Anybody with one eye and half a brain could tell what a tool that guy is.'

'Are you saying my sister's blind and brainless?' I demand. If he says one bad word about my sister, that's it. This whole thing is off. I don't need him that badly.

Marcel laughs. 'No. I'm saying you are!'

'You know what? I changed my mind. You've obviously never loved anyone but yourself.' I try to jerk the passenger door open, but it's locked.

'Lara Jean, I was just kidding. Come on.'

'See you on Monday.'

'Wait, wait. First, tell me something.' Marcel leans back in his seat. 'How come you never dated anybody?'

I shrug. 'I don't know - because nobody ever asked?'

'Bullshit. I know for a fact that Martinez asked you to homecoming and you said no.'

I'm surprised he knows about that. 'What is it with you guys all calling each other by your last name?' I ask him. 'It's so- 'I struggle to find the right word.

'Affected?

Affected?'

'Don't change the subject.'

'I guess I said no because I was scared.' I stare out the window and run my finger along with the glass, making an M for Martinez.

'Of Tommy?'

'No! I like Tommy. It's not that. It's scary when it's real. When it's not just thinking about a person, but, like, having a real live person in front of you, with, like, expectations. And wants.' I finally look at Marcel, and I'm surprised by how hard he's paying attention; his eyes are intent and focused on me like he's actually interested in what I'm saying. 'Even when I liked a boy so much, loved him even, I- would always rather be with my sisters, because that's where I belong.'

'Wait. What about right now?'

'Right now? Well, I don't like you that way so -'

'Good,' Marcel says. 'Don't go falling for me again, okay? I can't have any more girls in love with me. It's exhausting.'

I laugh out loud. 'You're so full of yourself.'

'I'm kidding,' he protests, but he's not. 'What did you ever see in me anyway?' He grins at me then, cocky again and so sure of his charm.

'Honestly? I really couldn't tell you.'

The grin falters and then rights itself, but now it's not so certain. 'You said it was because I make people feel special. You - you said it was because I was a good dancer and I was science partners with Jeffrey Suttleman!'

‘Wow, you really memorized every single word of that letter, huh?’ I tease.

It gives- me a small, mean surge of satisfaction to see Marcel’s grin fade completely.

That surge is immediately followed by remorse because now I’ve hurt his feelings for no good reason.

What is it in me that wants to hurt Marcel’s feelings? To make it better, I quickly add, ‘No, it’s true- you really did have something about you then.’

I guess- I made it worse because he flinches.

I don’t know what else to say, so I open the car door and climb out. ‘Thanks for the ride, Marcel.’

When I get inside the house, I go look in the kitchen first to check on the cupcakes.

They’re packed away in Tupperware and my cupcake carrier. The frosting’s a little messy and the sprinkles are haphazard, but overall, they look pretty good. That’s a relief. Kitty won’t be shamed at the PTA bake sale on my account, at least!

From: Margot Covey mcovey@st-andrews.ac.uk

To: Lara Jean Covey larajeansong@gmail.com

How’s school going so far? Have you joined any new clubs? I think you should consider Lit Mag or Model UN. Also, don’t forget it’s Korean Thanksgiving this week and you have to call Grandma or she’ll be mad! Miss, you guys.

PS, please send Oreos! I miss our dunk contests.

Love, M

From: Lara Jean Covey larajeansong@gmail.com

To: Margot Covey mcovey@st-andrews.ac.uk

The school is good. No new clubs yet, but we’ll see. I already have it down in my planner to call Grandma. Don’t worry about a thing, I’ve got everything under control here!

Marcel's MOM OWNS AN ANTIQUE store called Linden & White in the cobblestone part of downtown. She sells furniture mostly, but she has jewelry cases too, arranged by decades. My favorite decade is the aughts, which means the 1900's. There's this one gold heart locket with a tiny diamond chip in the center; it looks like a starburst.

It costs four hundred dollars. The store is right next to McCall's bookstore, so I go in sometimes and visit with it. I always expect it to be gone, but then it never is.

We once bought our mom a gold clover pin from the 1940s for Mother's Day. Margot and I ran a lemonade stand every Saturday for a month, and we were able to chip in sixteen dollars for it. I remember how proud we were when we presented Daddy with the money, we had it nice and neat in a ziplock bag. At the time I thought we were paying the lion's share and my dad was only helping out a little. I realize now that the pin cost a lot more than sixteen dollars. I should ask Daddy how much it really cost.

But then- maybe I don't want to know. Maybe it's nicer not knowing. We buried her with it because it was her favorite.

I'm standing over the case, touching my finger to the glass, when Marcel comes out from around back. 'Hey,' he says, surprised.

'Hey,' I say. 'What are you doing here?'

Marcel gives me a look like I'm a dummy. 'My mom owns the place, remember?'

'Well, duh. I've just never seen you here before,' I say. 'Do you work here?'

'Nah, I had to drop something off for my mom. Now she's saying I have to go pick up a set of chairs in Huntsburgh tomorrow,' Marcel says in a grumbly voice. 'It's two hours there and back. Annoying.'

I nod companionably and lean away from the case. I pretend to look at a pink-and-black globe. Actually, Margot would like this. It could be a nice Christmas present for her.

I give it a little spin. 'How much is this globe?'

'Whatever it says on the sticker.' Marcel rests his elbows on the case and leans forward. 'You should come.'

I look up at him. 'Come where?'

'To pick up the chairs with me.'

'You just complained about how annoying it's going to be.'

'Yeah, alone. If you go, it might be slightly less annoying.'

'Gee, thanks.'

'You're welcome.'

I roll my eyes. Marcel says 'you're welcome' to everything! It's like, No, Marcel, that was not a genuine thank-you, so you do not need to say you're welcome.

'So, are you coming or what?'

'Or what.'

'Come on! I'm picking the chairs up from an estate sale. The owner was some kind of a shut-in. Stuff has just been sitting there for like fifty years. I bet there'll be stuff you can look at. You like old stuff, right?'

'Yes,' I say, surprised that he knows this about me. 'Actually, I've kind of always wanted to go to an estate sale. How did the owner die? Like, how long was it before someone found him?'

'God, you're morbid.' He shudders. 'Didn't know you had that side to you.'

'I have lots of sides to me,' I tell him. I lean forward. 'So? How did he die?'

'He isn't dead, you weirdo. He's just old. His family's sending him to a nursing home.'

Marcel raises an eyebrow at me. 'So, I'll pick you up tomorrow at seven.'

'Seven? You never said anything about leaving at seven in the morning on a Saturday!'

'Sorry,' he says contritely. 'We have to go early before all the good stuff gets snatched up.'

That night I pack lunches for Marcel and me. I make roast beef sandwiches with cheese and tomato, mayonnaise for me, mustard for Marcel. Marcel doesn't like mayonnaise. It's funny the things you pick up in a fake relationship.

Kitty zooms into the kitchen and tries to grab a sandwich half. I smack her hand away.

'That's not for you.'

'Then who's it for?'

'It's for my lunch tomorrow. Mine and Marcel's.'

She climbs onto a stool and watches me wrap the sandwiches in wax paper.

Sandwiches look so much prettier wrapped in the wax paper than encased in ziplock. Any chance I get, I use wax paper. 'I like Marcel,' Kitty says. 'He's a lot different than Josh, but I like him.'

I look up. 'What do you mean?'

'I don't know. He's really funny. He jokes around a lot. You must really be in love if you're making sandwiches for him. When Margot and Josh first became a couple, she made three-cheese macaroni and cheese all the time because that's his favorite.'

Continued: 1

What's Marcel's favorite?'

'I- I don't know. I mean, he likes everything.'

Kitty gives me the side-eye. 'If you're his girlfriend, you should know what his favorite food is.'

'I know he doesn't like mayonnaise,' I offer.

'That's because mayonnaise is gross. Josh hates mayonnaise too.'

I feel a pang. Josh does hate mayonnaise. 'Kitty, do you miss Josh?'

She nods. 'I wish he still came over.' A wistful look crosses her face, and I'm about to give her a hug when she puts her hands on her hips. 'Just don't use all the roast beef, because I need it for my lunch next week.'

'If we run out, I'll make tuna salad. Sheesh.' 'See that you do,' Kitty says and zooms off again.

'See that you do'? Where does she get this stuff?

At seven-thirty I'm sitting by the window, waiting for Marcel to pull up. I've got a brown paper bag with our sandwiches and my camera, in case there's anything spooky or cool I can take a picture of. I'm picturing a crumbling, gray old mansion as you see in horror movies, with a gate and a murky pond or a maze in the backyard.

Marcel's mom's minivan pulls up at seven forty-five, which is annoying. I could've slept a whole hour longer. I run out to the car and hop inside, and before I can say a word, he says, 'I'm sorry, I'm sorry. But look what I brought you.' He passes me a donut in a napkin, still warm. 'I stopped and got it special, right when they opened at seven-thirty. It's mocha sugar.'

I break off a piece and pop it into my mouth. 'Yum!'

He gives me a sidelong glance as he pulls out of my driveway. 'So- I did the right thing being late, right?'

I nod, taking a big bite. 'You did the exact right thing,' I say, my mouth full.

'Hey, do you have any water?'

Marcel hands me a half-full water bottle and I gulp it down. 'This is the best donut I ever had,' I tell him.

'Good,' he says. Then he takes one look at me and laughs. 'You have sugar all over your face.'

I wipe my mouth off with the other side of the napkin.

'Cheeks, too,' he says.

‘All right, all right.’ Then it’s quiet, which makes me nervous. ‘Can I put some music on?’ I start pulling out my phone.

‘Actually, do you mind if we just drive in quiet for a while? I can’t have music blaring in my face before my caffeine kicks in.’

‘Oh - sure.’ I’m not sure if that means he wants me to be quiet too. I wouldn’t have agreed to come on this little outing if I’d known I would have to be silent.

Marcel has a serene look on his face like he is a fishing-boat captain and we are floating placidly along in the middle of the sea. Except he isn’t driving slowly; he is driving really fast.

I stay quiet for all of ten seconds and then say, ‘Wait, where you are wanting me to be quiet too?’

‘No, I just didn’t want music. You can talk as much as you want.’

‘Okay.’ And then I’m quiet because it’s awkward when someone tells you-you- can talk as much as you want. ‘Hey, so what’s your favorite food?’

‘I like everything.’

‘But what’s your favorite? Like, you’re favorite- favorite. Is it macaroni and cheese, or um, fried chicken, or steak, or pizza?’

‘I like all that stuff. Equally.’

I let out an aggrieved sigh. Why does Marcel not get the concept of picking a favorite thing?

Marcel mimics my sigh and laughs. ‘Fine. I like cinnamon toast. That’s my favorite thing.’

‘Cinnamon toast?’ I repeat. ‘You like cinnamon toast better than crab legs? Better than a cheeseburger?’

‘Yes.’

‘Better than barbecue?’

Marcel hesitates. Then he says, ‘Yes! Now quit picking my choice apart. I stand by my choice.’

I shrug. ‘Okay.’ I wait, give him a chance to ask me what my favorite food is, but he doesn’t. So- I say, ‘My favorite food is cake.’

‘What kind of cake?’

‘It doesn’t matter. All cake.’

‘You just gave me so much shit for not picking,’ he begins.

‘But it’s so hard to pick one kind!’ I burst out. ‘I mean, there’s coconut cake, the kind with white frosting that looks like a snowball- I like that a lot. But then I also like cheesecake, and lemon cake, and carrot cake. Also- red velvet cake with cream cheese frosting, and chocolate cake with chocolate ganache frosting.’ I pause.

‘Have you ever had an olive-oil cake?’

‘No. That sounds weird.’

‘It’s really, really good. Really moist and delicious. I’ll make it for you.’

Marcel groans. ‘You’re making me hungry. I should have gotten a whole bag of those donuts.’

I open up my brown paper bag and pull out his sandwich. I wrote a P on his in Sharpie so- I’d know whose was whose. ‘Do you want a sandwich?’

‘You made that for me?’

‘I mean, I was making one for myself, too. It would have been rude to just bring one sandwich and eat it in front of you.’

Marcel accepts the sandwich and eats it with the bottom half still wrapped.

‘This is good,’ he says, nodding. ‘What kind of mustard is this?’

Please, I say, 'It's beer mustard. My dad orders it from some fancy food catalog. My dad's really into cooking.' 'Aren't you going to eat yours, too?'

'I'm saving it for later,' I say.

Halfway into the ride, Marcel starts weaving in and out of traffic, and he keeps looking at the clock on the dashboard.

'Why are we in such a hurry?' I ask him.

'The Epsteins,' he says, rapping his fingers on the steering wheel.

'Who are the Epsteins?'

'They're an old married couple with an antique store in Charlottesville.

Last time, Phil got there five minutes before me and cleared the whole place out. That's not going to happen today.'

Impressed, I say, 'Wow, I had no idea this business was so cutthroat.'

Like a know-it-all, Marcel smirks and goes, 'Isn't all business?'

I roll my eyes at the window. Marcel's so Marcel.

We're at a stoplight when Marcel suddenly sits up straight and says, 'Oh, shit! The Epsteins!'

I was half asleep. My eyes fly open and I yell, 'Where? Where?'

'Red SUV! Two cars ahead on the right.' I crane my neck to look. They are a gray-haired couple, maybe in their sixties or seventies. It's hard to tell from this far away.

As soon as the light turns green, Marcel guns it and drives up on the shoulder. I scream out, 'Go go go!' and then we're flying past the Epsteins. My heart is racing out of control,

I can't help but lean my head out the window and scream because it's such a thrill. My hair whips in the wind and I know it's going to be a tangled mess, but I couldn't care less.

'Yahhh!' I scream.

‘You’re crazy,’ Marcel says, pulling me back in by the hem of my shirt.

He’s looking at me like he did that day I kissed him in the hallway. Like I’m different than he thought.

We pull up to the house and there are already a few cars parked in front. I’m craning my head trying to get a good look. I was expecting a mansion with a wrought iron gate and maybe a gargoyle or two, but this just looks like a normal house. I must look disappointed, because as he puts the car in park, Marcel says to me, ‘Don’t judge an estate sale by the house. I’ve seen all kinds of treasures at regular houses and junk at fancy houses.’

I hop out and bend down to tie my shoelace. ‘Hurry, Lara Jean! The Epsteins will be here any second!’ Marcel grabs my hand and we run up the driveway; I am breathing hard trying to keep up with him. His legs are so much longer than mine.

As soon as we are inside, Marcel goes right up to a man in a suit and I bend over and try to catch my breath. A few people are milling around looking at the furniture. There’s a long dining room table in the center of the room with China and milk glass and porcelain knickknacks. I go up to it and take a closer look. I like a little white creamer with pink rosebuds but I’m not sure if I’m allowed to touch it and see how much it costs. It could be really expensive.

There’s a big basket with olden-day Christmas memorabilia in it, plastic Santas and Rudolfs and glass ornaments. I’m sifting through it when Marcel comes up to me, a huge grin on his face. ‘Mission accomplished,’ he says. He nods at an older couple who are looking at a wooden sideboard. ‘The Epsteins,’ he whispers to me.

‘Did you get the chairs?’ Mr. Epstein calls out. He’s trying to sound casual and not annoyed, but his hands are on his hips and he’s standing very rigidly.

‘You know it,’ Marcel calls back. ‘Better luck next time.’ To me he says,

‘Do you see anything cool?’

‘Lots of stuff.’ I hold up a hot pink reindeer. It’s glass, with an electric blue nose. ‘This would look great on my vanity. Will you ask the man how much it costs?’

‘No, but you can. It’ll be good for you to learn how to negotiate.’ Marcel grabs my hand and leads me over to the man in the suit. He’s filling out some paperwork on a clipboard.

He looks very busy and important. I’m not even sure if I’m supposed to be here. I’m thinking I don’t really need this reindeer.

But Marcel’s looking at me expectantly, so I clear my throat and say, ‘Excuse me, sir, but how much is this reindeer?’

‘Oh, that’s part of a lot,’ he says.

‘Oh. Um, I’m sorry but what’s a lot?’

‘It means it’s part of a set,’ he explains. ‘You have to buy the whole set of ornaments.

Seventy-five dollars. They’re vintage, you see.’

I start to back away. ‘Thank you anyway,’ I say.

Marcel pulls me back and gives him a winning smile and says, ‘Can’t you just throw it in with the chairs? A gift with purchase?’

The man sighs. ‘I don’t want to separate them.’ He turns away to flip through his clipboard.

Marcel throws me a look like You’re the one who wants the reindeer; you should step up. I give him back a look that says I don’t want it that bad, and Marcel shakes his head firmly and pushes me toward the man. I say, ‘Please, sir? I’ll give you ten dollars for it.

No one will know they’re missing a reindeer. And look, his paw is a little chipped on the bottom, see?’ I hold it up.

‘All right, all right. Just take it,’ the man says begrudgingly, and I beam at him and start to pull my wallet out of my purse, but he waves me off.

‘Thank you! Thank you so much.’ I clutch the reindeer to my chest. Maybe haggling isn’t as hard as I thought.

Marcel winks at me, and then he says to the man, 'I'll bring my van closer so, we can load up the chairs.'

They go out the back, and I hang around, looking at the framed pictures on the wall. I wonder if they're for sale too. Some of them look really old: black-and-white pictures of men in suits and hats. There's one picture of a girl in a confirmation dress, it's white and lacy like a wedding gown. The girl isn't smiling, but she has a mischievous glint in her eye that reminds me of Kitty.

'That's my daughter, Patricia.'

I turn around. It's an old man in a navy-blue sweater and stiff jeans. He's leaning against the staircase watching me. He looks very frail; his skin is paperwhite and thin.

'She lives in Ohio. She's an accountant.' He's still gazing at me as I remind him of someone.

'Your house is lovely,' I say, even though it isn't. It's old; it could use a good cleaning.

But the things inside it are lovely.

'It's empty now. All my things sold up. Can't take it with you, you know.'

'You mean when you die?' I whisper.

He glares at me. 'No. I mean to the nursing home.'

Whoops. 'Right,' I say, and I giggle the way I do when I feel awkward.

'What do you have there in your hand?'

I lift it up. 'This. He- the man in the suit gave it to me. Do you want it back? I didn't pay for it. It's part of a lot.'

He smiles, and the wrinkles in his paper skin deepen. 'That was Patty's favorite.'

I hold it out to him. 'Maybe she'd like to keep it?'

‘No, you have it. It’s yours. She couldn’t even be bothered to help me move, so.’ He gives a spiteful nod. ‘Is there anything else you want to take? I’ve got a trunk full of her old clothes.’

Yikes. Family drama. Best not to get involved in that. But vintage clothes!

That’s tempting.

When Marcel finds me, I’m sitting cross-legged on the floor in the music room, looking through an old trunk. Mr. Clarke is snoozing on the couch next to me. I found a mod minidress the color of cotton candy pink that I’m crazy about, and a sleeveless button-down with little daisies on it that I can tie at the waist. ‘Look, Marcel!’ I lift up the dress.

‘Mr. Clarke said I could have it.’

‘Who’s Mr. Clarke?’ Marcel asks, and his voice fills the room.

I point at him and put my finger to my lips.

‘Well, we’d better get out of here fast before the guy in charge of the sale sees him giving stuff away for free.’

I get up in a hurry. ‘Bye, Mr. Clarke,’ I say, not too loud. Probably better to let him sleep. He was very down earlier when he was telling me about his divorce.

Mr. Clarke’s eyes flutter open. ‘Is this your feller?’

‘No, not really,’ I say, and Marcel throws his arm around my shoulder and says, ‘Yes, sir. I’m her feller.’

I don’t like the way he says it like he’s making fun. Of both me and Mr.

Clarke. ‘Thank you for the clothes, Mr. Clarke,’ I say, and he sits up straight and reaches for my hand. I give it to him and he kisses it, and his lips feel like dry moth’s wings.

‘You’re welcome, Patty.’

I give him a goodbye wave and grab my new things. As we walk out the front door, Marcel says, ‘Who’s Patty?’ and I pretend I don’t hear.

I must fall asleep in about two seconds from the excitement of the day, because the next thing I know, we're parked in my driveway, and Marcel's shaking my shoulder, saying, 'We're here, Lara Jean.'

I open my eyes. I'm clutching my dress and shirt to my chest like a security blanket, and my reindeer is on my lap. My new treasures. I feel like I just robbed a bank and got away with it. 'Thanks for today, Marcel.'

'Thanks for coming with me.' Then, abruptly, he says, 'Oh yeah. I forgot to ask you something. My mom wants you to come over to dinner tomorrow night.'

My mouth drops. 'You told your mom about us?'

Marcel gives me a dirty look. 'Kitty knows about us! Besides, my mom and I are close.

It's just her and me and my brother, Owen. If you don't want to come, then don't come.

But just know that my mom will think you're rude if you don't.'

'I'm just saying - the more people that know, the harder it is to manage.

You have to keep lies restricted to as few people as possible.'

'How do you know so much about lying?'

'Oh, I used to lie all the time as a kid.' I didn't think of it as lying, though. I thought of it as playing make-believe. I told Kitty she was adopted, and her real family was in a traveling circus. It's why she took up gymnastics.

IM NOT SURE HOW DRESSED up I should get for dinner at Marcel's house. At the store, his mom seems so fancy. I just don't want to meet her and have her be thinking of all the ways that I'm lacking compared to Genevieve. I don't see why I have to meet her at all.

But I do want her to like me.

I go through my closet, and then Margot's closet. I finally pick a cream-colored sweater and a blouse with a Marcel Pan collar, with a corduroy mustard circle skirt.

Plus, tights and flats. Then I put on some makeup, which I hardly ever wear. I put on peach blush and I try to do some eye makeup, but I end up washing everything off and starting over again, this time with just mascara and lip gloss. I go show Kitty and she says, 'Looks like a uniform.'

'Like in a good way?'

Kitty nods. 'Like you work at a nice store.'

Before Marcel arrives at my house, I go on the computer and look up what fork to use with what, just in case.

It's strange... Sitting at Marcel's kitchen table, I feel like I'm living someone else's life. It turns out Marcel's mom has made pizzas, so I didn't even need to worry about forks. And their house isn't fancy on the inside; it's just normal and nice. There's a real butter churner on display in the kitchen, pictures of Marcel and his brother hanging on the walls of wooden frames, and red-and-white gingham everything.

There are a bunch of pizza toppings on the breakfast bar- not just pepperoni and sausage and mushroom and pepper, but also artichoke hearts and greasy kalamata olives and fresh mozzarella and whole cloves of garlic.

Marcel's mom is nice. She keeps putting more salad on my plate all throughout dinner, and I keep eating it even though I'm full. Once, I catch her looking at me, and she has a soft smile on her face. When she smiles, she looks like Marcel.

Marcel's younger brother is named Owen. He's twelve. He's like a miniature Marcel, but he doesn't talk as much. He doesn't have Marcel's easy way. Owen grabs a slice of pizza and shoves it into his mouth even though it's too hot. He puffs out hot air and he almost spits a piece back out into his napkin, and their mom says, 'Don't you dare, Owen. We have company.'

'Leave me alone,' Owen mumbles.

'Marcel says you have two sisters,' Mrs. - says with a bright smile.

She cuts a piece of lettuce into bite-sized bits. 'Your mother must love having three girls.'

I open my mouth to answer her, but before I can, Marcel does. He says, 'Lara Jean's mom passed away when she was little.' He says it as she should already know, and embarrassment crosses her face.

'I'm so sorry. I remember that now.'

Quickly I say, 'She did love having three girls. They thought for sure my little sister Kitty was going to be a boy, and my mom said she was so used to girls she was nervous about what she was going to do with a boy. So, she was really relieved when Kitty turned out to be a girl. My sister Margot and I were too; we would pray every night we'd get a sister and not a brother.'

'Hey, what's wrong with boys?' Marcel objects.

Mrs. -'s smiling now. She puts another piece of pizza on Owen's plate and says,

'You're heathens. Wild animals. I bet Lara Jean and her sisters are angels.' Marcel snorts.

'Well - Kitty might be part heathen,' I admit. 'But my older sister Margot and I are pretty good.'

Mrs. - takes her napkin and tries to wipe tomato sauce off Owen's face, and he swats her hand away. 'Mom!'

When she gets up to take another pizza out of the oven, Marcel says to me, 'See how my mom babies him?'

'She babies you way more,' Owen counters. To me, he mumbles, 'Marcel doesn't even know how to cook ramen.'

I laugh. 'Can you?'

'Hell yeah, I've been cooking for myself for years,' he says.

'I like to cook too,' I say, taking a sip of iced tea. 'We should give Marcel a cooking lesson.'

He eyes me and then says, 'You wear more makeup than Genevieve did.'

I shrink back as he slapped me. All I'm wearing is mascara! And a little lip gloss! I know for a fact that Genevieve wears bronzer and eyeshadow and concealer every day.

Plus, mascara and eyeliner and lipstick! Swiftly Marcel says, 'Shut up, Owen.'

Owen's snickering. I narrow my eyes. This kid is only a few years older than Kitty!

I lean forward and wave my hand in front of my face. 'This is all-natural. But thank you for the compliment, Owen.'

'You're welcome,' he says, just like his big brother.

On the drive home, I say, 'Hey, Marcel?'

'What?'

'Never mind.'

'What? Just ask.'

'Well - your parents are divorced, right?'

'Yup.'

'So how often do you see your dad?'

'Not often.'

'Oh, okay. I was just wondering.' Marcel looks over at me with expectant eyes.

'What?' I say.

'I'm just waiting for the next question. You never just have one question.'

'Well, do you miss him?'

'Who?'

'Your dad!'

'Oh. I don't know. I think it's more than I miss how it used to be with us.'

He and my mom and me and Owen. We were like a team. He used to come to every lacrosse game.'

Marcel gets quiet. 'He just - took care of things.'

'I guess that's what dads do.'

'That's what he's doing for his new family.' Marcel says it matter-of-factly, without bitterness. 'What about you? You miss your mom?'

'Sometimes, when I think about it.' Suddenly I say, 'You know what I miss? I miss bath time. I miss when she would wash my hair. Don't you think getting your hair washed is just the best feeling? Like, warm water and bubbles and fingers in your hair. It's so nice.'

'Yeah, it is.'

'Sometimes I don't think about her at all, and then - and then sometimes I'll have a thought like, I wonder what she would think of me now? She only knew me as a little girl, and now I'm a teenager, and I wonder, if she saw me on the street, would she recognize me?'

'Of course, she would. She's your mom.'

'I know, but I've changed a lot.' An uncomfortable look has crossed his face, and I can tell he's regretting complaining about his dad because at least his dad is still alive.

-And-

Then, because Marcel's looking at me like he feels sorry for me, I straighten up and say in a haughty voice, 'I'm very mature, you know.'

He's grinning now. 'Oh yeah?'

'Oh, yes, I'm very refined, Marcel.'

When Marcel drops me off, right before I get out of the car, he says, 'I can tell my mom liked you.' This makes me feel good inside. It's always been really important to me that other people's moms like me.

It was my favorite part of going over to Genevieve's house- hanging out with her mom. Wendy was so stylish. She used to wear a silky blouse and nice pants and a statement necklace, just for sitting around the house. Perfect hair, always smooth and flat. Genevieve has that same good hair, but she doesn't have her mom's perfectly straight nose. Hers has a little bump on the bridge that I think only adds to her appeal.

'By the way, you definitely don't wear more makeup than Gen. She was always getting bronzer on my white shirts.'

For someone who's over Genevieve, he sure does talk about her a lot.

Though it's not just him. I was thinking about her too. Even when she's not here, she's here. That girl has some kind of reach.

Continued: 2

DURING CHEMISTRY, Marcel WRITES ME a note that says, Can I come over tonight to study for the test?

I write back, I don't remember study sessions being in the contract. After he reads it, he turns around and gives me a wounded look. I mouth, I'm kidding!

At dinner, I announce that Marcel's coming over to study and we're going to need the kitchen, and my dad raises his eyebrows. 'Leave the door open,' he jokes.

We don't even have a door to the kitchen.

'Daddy,' I groan, and Kitty groans with me. Casually he asks, 'Is Marcel your boyfriend?'

'Um - something like that,' I say.

After we eat and Kitty and I do the dishes, I set up the kitchen like a study room. My textbook and notes are stacked up in the center of the table, with a row of highlighters in blue, yellow, and pink, a bowl of microwave kettle corn, and a plate of peanut-butter brownies I baked this afternoon. I let Kitty have two but that's it.

He said he'd be over around eight. At first, I think he's just late as usual, but the minutes tick by and I realize he's not coming. I text him once, but he doesn't text back.

Kitty comes down between commercial breaks, sniffing around for another brownie, which I give her. 'Is Marcel not coming?' she asks. I pretend I'm so absorbed in my studying I don't hear.

Um around ten he sends a text that says, Sorry, something came up. I can't come over tonight.

He doesn't say where he is or what he's doing, but I already know. He's with Genevieve.

At lunch he was distracted; he kept texting on his phone. And then, later in the day, I saw them outside the girls' locker room. They didn't see me, but I saw them.

They were just- talking, but with Genevieve, it's never just anything. She put her hand on his arm; he brushed her hair out of her eyes. I may only be a fake girlfriend, but that's not anything.

I keep studying, but it's hard to concentrate when your feelings are hurt. I tell myself it's just because I went to the trouble of baking brownies and cleaning up the downstairs.

I mean, it's rude to just not show up somewhere. Does he not have manners?

How would- he like it if I did that? And really, what's the whole point of this charade if he's just going- to keep going back to her anyway? What's even in it for me anymore?

Things are better with Josh and me, practically normal. If I wanted to I could just call the whole thing off.

The next morning, I wake up still mad. I call Josh to ask him for a ride to school. For a- second, I worry he might not pick up; it's been so long since we hung out.

But he does, and he says no problem.

Let's see how Marcel likes it when he comes to my house to pick me up and I'm not there.

Halfway to school, I start to feel uneasy. Maybe Marcel had a legitimate reason for not- coming over. Maybe he wasn't with Genevieve and now I've just done a very petty thing out of spite.

Josh is looking at me with suspicious eyes. 'What's wrong?'

'Nothing.'

He doesn't believe me, I can tell. 'Did you and - have a fight?'

'No.'

Josh sighs and says, 'Just be careful.' He says it in a patronizing older brother kind of way that makes me want to scream. 'I don't want to see you hurt by that guy.'

'Josh! He won't hurt me. Geez.'

'He's a douche. I'm sorry, but he is. All the guys on the lacrosse team are.

Guys like-, they only care about one thing. As soon as they get what they want, they're bored.'

'Not Marcel. He dated Genevieve for almost four years!'

'Just trust me. You haven't had much experience with guys, Lara Jean.'

Quietly I ask, 'How would you know?'

Josh gives me an Oh, come on the look. 'Because I know you.'

'Not as well as you think.'

We're quite the rest of the way.

It won't be that big of a deal. Marcel will stop by my house, see that I'm not there, and- then he'll leave. Big deal, so he had to go five minutes out of his way. I waited for him last night for two friggin' hours.

When we get to school, Josh heads for the senior hall and I go straight to the junior hall. I keep sneaking peeks down the hallway at Marcel's locker, but he doesn't arrive. I wait at my locker until the bell rings, and he still doesn't come. I run off to the first period, my backpack banging against my back as I go.

Mr. Schuller is taking attendance when I look up and see Marcel standing in the doorway glaring at me.

He gestures at me to come out. I gulp and quickly look down at- my notebook and pretend like I didn't see him. But then he hisses my name, and I know I have to talk to him.

Shakily I raise my hand. 'Mr. Schuller, can I go to the bathroom?' 'You should have gone before class,' he grumbles, but he waves me on.

I hurry out to the hallway and pull Marcel away from the door so Mr. Schuller can't see.

'Where were you this morning?' Marcel demands.

I cross my arms and try to stand tall. It's hard because I'm so short and he really is-tall.

'You're one to talk.'

Marcel huffs, 'At least I texted you! I've called you like seventeen times.

Why is your phone off?'

'You know we're not allowed to have our phones on at school!'

He huffs, 'Lara Jean, I waited in front of your house for twenty minutes.'

Yikes. 'Well, I'm sorry.'

'How'd you get to school? Sanderson?'

'Yes.'

Marcel exhales. 'Listen, if you were pissed, I couldn't come over last night, you should've just called and said so instead of the shit you pulled this morning.'

In a small voice, I say, 'Well, what about that shit you pulled last night?'

A smile tugs at the corners of his mouth. 'Did you just say 'shit'? It sounds really funny coming out of your mouth.'

I ignore that. 'So - were you? Where you with Genevieve?' I don't ask what I really want to know, which is, did you guys get back together?

He hesitates and then he says, 'She needed me.'

I can't even look at him. Why is he such a dummy? Why does she have such a hold on him?

Is it just the amount of time they've been together? Is it sex? I don't understand. It's disappointing, how little self-control boys have. 'Marcel, if you're just going to go running every time she beckons, I don't see a point to any of this.'

'Covey, come on! I said I was sorry. Don't be pissed.'

'You never said you were sorry,' I say. 'When did you say you were sorry?'

Chastened, he says, 'Sorry.'

'I don't want you to go to Genevieve's anymore. How do you think that makes me look to her?'

Marcel looks at me steadily. 'I can't be there for Gen, so don't ask me to.'

'But Marcel, what does she even need you for when she has a new boyfriend?'

He flinches, and right away I'm sorry I said it. 'I'm sorry,' I whisper.

'It's fine. I don't expect you to understand it. Gen and I - we just get each other.'

He doesn't know it, but when Marcel talks about Genevieve, he gets a certain softness- in his face.

Its tenderness mixed with impatience. And something else.

Love. Marcel can protest all he wants, but I know he still loves her.

Sighing, I ask, 'Did you at least study for the test?'

Marcel shakes his head, and I sigh again.

'You can look at my notes during lunch,' I say, and I head back to my class.

It's starting to make sense to me. Why he'd go along with a scheme like this, why he'd spend his time with someone like me. It's not so he can move on from Gen.

It's so he- can't. I'm just his excuse. I'm holding Genevieve's place for her. When that piece makes sense, everything else starts to.

JOSH'S PARENTS FIGHT A LOT- I don't know if it's a normal amount of fighting because I- only have one parent, but I don't remember my parents fighting that much when I had two. Our houses are close enough that I can hear them sometimes if my window is open.

The fights usually start out with something small, like Mrs. Sanderson accidentally leaving the car door open and the battery going dead, and end with something big, like how Mr. Sanderson works too much and is inherently selfish and not cut out for a family.

When they fight bad, Josh comes over. When we were younger, he'd sneak out sometimes in his pajamas with his pillow, and he'd stay until his mom came looking for him. It's not something we talk about. Maybe he and Margot, but not me and him. The most he ever said about it was that sometimes he wished they'd just get divorced- so it could finally be over. They never did, though.

I can hear them tonight. I've heard them other nights since Margot left, but tonight sounds particularly bad. So, bad I close my window. I gather up my- homework and go- downstairs and turn on the living room light so Josh knows he can come over if he wants.

Half an hour later there's a knock at the door. I wrap myself in my pale blue baby blanket and open it.

It's Josh. He smiles at me sheepishly. 'Hey. Can I hang out here for a bit?'

'Course you can.' I leave the door open and trudge back to the living room. I call back, 'Lock it behind you.'

Josh watches TV and I do my homework. I'm highlighting my way through US history when Josh asks me, 'Are you going to try out for Arcadia?' That's the spring play. They just announced it yesterday.

'No,' I say, switching highlighter colors. 'Why would I?' I hate public speaking and getting up in front of people, and Josh knows it.

'Duh, because it's your favorite play.' Josh changes the channel. 'I think you'd be a really good Thomasina.'

I smile. 'Thanks, but no thanks.'

'Why not? It could be something good to put on your college apps.'

'It's not like I'm going to be a theater major or anything.'

'It wouldn't kill you to get out of your comfort zone a little bit,' he says, stretching his arms out behind his head. 'Take a risk. Look at Margot. She's all the way over in Scotland.'

'I'm not Margot.'

'I'm not saying you should move to the other side of the world. I know you'd never do that. Hey, what about Honor Council? You love judging people!'

I make a face at him.

'Or Model UN. I bet you'd like that. I'm just saying - your world could be bigger than just playing checkers with Kitty and riding around in -'s car.'

I stop highlighting midsentence. Is he right? Is my world really that small?

It's not like- his world is so big! 'Josh,' I begin. Then I pause because I don't know how I'm going to finish the sentence. So instead I throw my highlighter at him.

It ricochets off his forehead. 'Hey! You could have hit me in the eye!'

'And you would have deserved it.'

‘Okay, okay. You know I didn’t mean it like that. I just mean that you should give people a chance to know you.’ Josh points the remote control at me and says, ‘If people knew you, they would love you.’ He sounds so matter-of-fact.

Josh, you break my heart. And you’re a liar. Because you know me, you know me better than almost anybody, and you don’t love me.

After Josh goes back home, I tidy up the living room, lock all the doors, and turn off the lights. Then I pour myself a glass of water and head upstairs.

The light is on in my bedroom, and Chris is asleep in my bed. I roll her to the side- so I can fit in too. Stirring, she mumbles, ‘Want to go get hot wings?’

‘It’s too late to eat hot wings,’ I say, pulling my quilt up so it covers both of us. ‘You just missed Josh.’

Her eyes fly open. ‘Joshy was here? Why?’

‘No reason.’ I won’t tell Josh’s secrets, not even to Chris.

‘Well, don’t mention it too -.’ ‘He wouldn’t care,’ I say.

Chris shakes her head. ‘All boys care.’

‘Marcel’s not like that. He’s really confident.’

‘They’re the ones that care the most,’ she says. I’m about to ask her what- she means, but before I can, she says, ‘Let’s go do something wild.’

‘Like what?’ It’s a school night; I can’t go anywhere, and she knows it. But I still like to hear her schemes. They’re like bedtime stories.

‘Like - I don’t know. We could sneak into the nursing home and break out that grandma you’re always talking about. What’s her name again? Thunder?’

I giggle. ‘Stormy.’

‘Yeah, Stormy.’ She yawns. ‘She seems like she knows how to have a good time. I bet she’d buy us cocktails.’

‘Stormy goes to sleep at nine every night to get her beauty rest. Let’s do it tomorrow.’

By tomorrow, Chris will have forgotten all about it, but it’s still a nice thought. Her eyes are closed again.

I poke her in the side. ‘Chris, wake up. Go brush your teeth.’ I keep a toothbrush in my bathroom drawer just for her. I painted a cursive C on it with red nail polish so it doesn’t get mixed up with anybody else’s toothbrush.

‘Can’t. I’m too tired to move.’

‘A second ago you wanted to break Stormy out of Belleview, and now you’re too tired to wash your face and brush your teeth?’ Chris smiles but doesn’t open her eyes. I turn off my bedside lamp. ‘Night, Chris.’

She wriggles closer to me. ‘G’night.’

THERE ARE VERY LIMITED Options for Asian girls on Halloween.

Like one year- I went as Velma from Scooby-Doo, but people just asked me if I was a manga character. I even wore a wig! So now I’m committed to dressing up as Asian characters solely.

Margot never goes as a person; she is always an inanimate object or a concept of some kind. Like last year she went as a ‘formal apology’: she wore a floor-length evening- gown we found at Goodwill for ten dollars, and she had a sign around her neck, written in- calligraphy, which said, I’m sorry. It won second prize in the school contest.

The first prize went to a Rastafarian alien.

Kitty’s going as a ninja, which I suppose is in line with my whole Asian costume idea.

This year I’m going to Cho Chang from Harry Potter. I’ve got my Raven claw scarf and an old black choir robe I found on eBay, plus one of my dad’s ties and a wand. I’m not going to win any contests, but at least people will know what I am. I wish I never have to answer a What are you? The question ever again.

I'm waiting for Marcel to pick me up for school, messing with my knee highs. They won't stay up.

'Lara Jean!'

Automatically I call back, 'Josh!' It's our version of Marco Polo.

Then I look up. There's Josh, standing in front of his car. In a full-on Harry Potter costume. Black robe, glasses, lightning mark on his forehead, wand.

We both burst out laughing. Of all the random costumes! Ruefully Josh says, 'The guys from the graphic-novel club are going as different fantasy-book characters.'

I- was going to- go as Drogo from Game of Thrones because, you know, I've got the upper body for it, but-'

I giggle, trying to picture Josh with eyeliner and a long braid and no shirt.

It's a funny picture. I wouldn't exactly call Josh scrawny, but -

'Hey, quit laughing so hard,' the objects. 'It wasn't that funny.' He jingles his keys. 'So- do you need a ride, Cho?'

I look at my phone. Marcel's five minutes late as usual. Not that I can really complain, because it's a free ride to school, and I could be taking the bus. But if I go with Josh, I won't have to rush to class, I can go to my locker, I can go pee, I can get a juice at the vending machine. But he's probably already nearly here. 'Thanks, but I'm waiting for Marcel.'

Josh nods. 'Oh, yeah - right.' He starts to climb into his car.

I shout out, 'Expelliarmus!' and Josh spins around and calls back, 'Finite!'

Then we grin at each other like goofs.

He drives off and I hug my knees to my chest. Josh and I read Harry Potter around the-same time when I was in sixth and he was in seventh. Margot had already read them.

Neither of us can read as fast as she does. It drove her crazy waiting for us to get to the third book- so we could discuss it.

The longer I sit waiting for Marcel, the more- prickly I feel. I take off my robe and put it back on a few times. It's polyester, and polyester doesn't breathe or feel nice against- your skin.

When he drives up, I run to his car and get in without saying hello. I spread my robe over my lap like a blanket, because my kilt is short.

His eyes are big. 'You look hot,' he says, sounding surprised. 'What are you? An anime character...?'

'No,' I say, or more like a snap. 'I'm Cho Chang.' Marcel still has a blank look on his face, so I add, 'From Harry Potter.'

'Oh yeah. Cool.'

I look over at him. He's wearing a regular button-down and jeans. 'Where's your costume?'

'I and my boys are going to change right before the assembly. It's a better effect if we unveil at the same time.'

I know he wants me to ask what his costume is, but I don't feel like talking to him, so I- sit there, not saying anything and looking out the window. I keep waiting for him to ask- me what's wrong, but he doesn't. He's so oblivious; I don't even think he notices I'm mad.

Abruptly I say, 'I wish you weren't always late.'

Marcel frowns. 'Geez, sorry. I was trying to get my costume together.'

'Today you were trying to get your costume together. But you're late all the time.'

'I'm not late all the time!'

'You were late today, and yesterday, and last Thursday.' I stare out the window. The autumn leaves are already falling.

'If you're not going to be on time, I don't- want you giving me rides anymore.'

I don't have to look; I can feel him glaring at me. 'Fine. That means I get five extra minutes of sleep, so, works for me.'

‘Good.’

During the judging, Chris and I are sitting in the balcony of the theater.

Chris is dressed- up like Courtney Love. She’s wearing a pink slip and holey knee socks and lots of smudgy eye makeup.

‘You should go down there too,’ I say. ‘I bet you’d win something.’

‘People at this school wouldn’t even know who she is,’ Chris sneers. But I can tell she kind of wants to.

The guys in Marcel’s group are all superheroes. There’s Batman, Superman, Iron Man, the Incredible Hulk, all to varying degrees of effort. Marcel went all out. He is, of course, Marcel Parker. Who else would - go as? His Spider-Man costume is super authentic, with yellow Mylar eyes and gloved hands and booted feet. He is a total ham up onstage.

All the guys run around, capes flapping, pretend to fight each other. Marcel tries to climb-up a column, but Mr. Yelznik stops him before he can get far. I cheer when his group wins for the best group costume.

Genevieve is Catwoman. She’s wearing leather leggings and a bustier and black cat-ears. I wonder if she was in on the superhero theme, if Marcel told her, or if she came up- with that on her own. Every guy in the auditorium goes wild when she goes on stage for the best junior costume. ‘What a ho,’ Chris says. She sounds almost wistful.

Genevieve wins, of course. I sneak a look at Marcel, and he’s whistling and stomping his feet with all his friends.

After the assembly, I’m getting my Chem book out of my locker when Marcel- comes over and leans his back against the locker next to mine. Through his mask, he says, ‘Hey.’

‘Hey,’ I say. And then he doesn’t say anything else; he just stands there. I close my locker door and spin the combination lock. ‘Congratulations on winning the best group costume.’

‘That’s it? That’s all you’re going to say?’

Huh? 'What else am I supposed to say?'

Just then Josh walks by with Jersey Mike, who's dressed up as a hobbit, hairy feet and all. Walking backward, Josh points his wand at me and says, 'Expelliarmus!'

Automatically I point my wand back at him and say, 'Avada Kedavra!'

Josh clutches his chest as I've shot him. 'Way harsh!' he calls out, and he disappears down the hallway.

'Uh - don't you think it's weird for my supposed girlfriend to wear a couple- costume with another guy?' Marcel asks me.

I roll my eyes. I'm still mad at him from this morning. 'I'm sorry, I can't talk to you when you look like this. How am I supposed to have a conversation with a person in head-to-toe latex?'

Marcel pushes his mask up. 'I'm serious! How do you think it makes me look?'

'First of all, it wasn't planned. Second of all, nobody cares what my costume is! Who would even notice something like that?'

'People notice,' Marcel huffs. 'I noticed.'

'Well, I'm sorry. I'm very sorry that a coincidence like this would ever occur.'

'I really doubt it was a coincidence,' Marcel mutters.

'What do you want me to do? Do you want me to pop over to the Halloween store during lunch and buy a red wig and be Mary Jane?'

Smoothly Marcel says, 'Could you? That'd be great.'

'No, I could not. You know why? Because, I'm Asian, and people will just think I'm in a manga costume.' I hand him my wand. 'Hold this.' I lean down and lift the hem of my robe- so I can adjust my knee socks.

Frowning, he says, 'I could have been someone from the book if you'd told me in advance.'

‘Yes, well, today you’d make a really great Moaning Myrtle.’

Marcel gives me a blank look, and disbelieving, I say, ‘Wait a minute - have you never read ‘Harry Potter’?’

‘I’ve read the first two.’

‘Then you should know who Moaning Myrtle is!’

‘It was a really long time ago,’ Marcel says. ‘Was she one of those people in the paintings?’

‘No! And how could you stop after Chamber of Secrets? The third one’s the best out of the whole series.

I mean, that’s literally crazy to me.’ I peer at his face. ‘Do you do not have a soul?’

‘Sorry if I haven’t read every single Harry Potter book! Sorry, I have a life and I’m not in the Final Fantasy club or whatever that geek club is called-’

I snatch my wand back from him and wave it in his face. ‘Silencio!’

Marcel crosses his arms. Smirking, he says, ‘Whatever spell you just tried to cast on me, it didn’t work, so I think you need to go back to Hogwarts.’ He’s so proud of himself for the Hogwarts reference, it’s kind of endearing.

Quick like a cat, I pull down his mask, and then I put one hand over his mouth. With my- another hand I wave my wand again. ‘Silencio!’ Marcel tries to say something, but I press my hand harder. ‘What? What was that? I can’t hear you, Marcel Parker.’

Marcel reaches out and tickles me, and I laugh so hard I almost drop my wand. I dart away from him, but he pounces after me, pretends shooting webs at my feet.

Giggling, I- run away from him, further down the hall, dodging groups of people. He gives chase all- the way to chem class. A teacher screams at us to slow down, and we do, but as soon as we’re around the corner, I’m running again and so is he.

I’m breathless by the time I’m in my seat. He turns around and shoots a web in my direction, and I explode into giggles again and Mr. Meyers glares at me.

‘Settle down,’ he says, and I nod obediently. As soon as his back is turned, I giggle into my robe.

I want to still be mad at Marcel, but it’s just no use.

Halfway through class, he sends me a note. He’s drawn spiderwebs around the edges.

It says I’ll be on time tomorrow. I smile as I read it. Then I put it in my backpack, in my French textbook so the page won’t crease or crumble. I want to keep it so when this is over, I can have something to look at and remember what it was like to be Marcel’s girlfriend. Even if it was all just pretend.

WHEN WE PULL UP IN my driveway, Kitty runs out of the house and over to the car.

‘Spider-Man!’ she shrieks. She’s still in her ninja costume, though she’s taken the mask off. ‘Are you coming inside?’

I glance at Marcel. ‘He can’t. He has to go condition.’ Marcel spends an hour a day conditioning for lacrosse. He’s very dedicated to it.

‘Condition?’ Kitty repeats, and I know she’s imagining Marcel washing his hair.

‘I can hang out for a little bit,’ Marcel says, turning the engine off.

‘Let’s show him the dance!’

‘Kitty, no.’ The dance is something Margot and I made up when we were bored one-night a few summers ago at the beach.

Let’s just say neither of us is particularly talented at choreography.

Marcel’s eyes light up. He’ll take any opportunity for a laugh, especially at my expense.

‘I want to see the dance!’

‘Forget about it,’ I tell him. We’re in the living room; each of us has our own couch or armchair. I poured us iced teas and put out a bowl of potato chips, which we’ve already finished.

‘Come on,’ he pouts. ‘Show me the dance. Please, please show me the dance.’

‘That’s not going to work on me, Marcel.’

‘What’s not going to work?’

I wave my hand at his Handsome Boy face. ‘That. I’m immune to your charms, remember?’

Marcel lifts his eyebrows as I’ve dared him. ‘Is that a challenge? ‘Cause, I’m warning you; you do not want to step into the ring with me.

I’ll crush you, Covey.’

He doesn’t take his eyes off mine for several long seconds, and I can feel my smile fade and my cheeks heat up.

‘Come on, Lara Jean!’

I blink. Kitty. I’d forgotten she was still in the room. I scramble to my feet.

‘Cue up the music. Marcel just challenged us to a dance-off.’

Kitty squeals and runs to turn on the speakers. I push back the coffee table.

We take our places in front of the fireplace, backs turned, heads down, hands clasped behind our backs.

When the bass kicks in, we jump and turn around. Hip thrust, swivel, then move into our knee slides. Then the running man, then this move Margot made up called the treadmill. The music stops, and Kitty and I freeze in our crunking positions- and then it- starts up again, and we’re doing the butterfly, then back into the knee slides.

I forget- what the next move is so I sneak a peek at Kitty, who’s shimmying and clapping her hands. Oh yeah.

Our big finish is split, with our arms crossed for emphasis.

Marcel’s bowled over, laughing his head off. He claps and claps and stomps his feet.

When it’s over, I try to catch my breath and manage to say, ‘Okay, you’re up.’

‘I can’t,’ Marcel gasps. ‘How do I follow a performance like that? Kitty, will you teach me that pop-and-lock move?’

Kitty gets shy all of a sudden. She sits on her hands and looks at him through her lashes and shakes her head.

‘Please, please?’ He asks.

Kitty finally caves in- I think she just wanted to make him work for it. I watch them dance all afternoon, my little sister the ninja and my pretend boyfriend Spider-Man.

First- I- laugh, but then a worrying thought comes out of nowhere- I can’t let Kitty get too attached to Marcel. This is temporary. The way Kitty looks at him, so adoringly, like he’s her hero-.

When Marcel has to leave, I walk him out to his car. Before he gets in, I say, ‘I don’t think you should come over anymore. It’s confusing to Kitty.’

Frowning, he says, ‘How is it confusing to Kitty?’

‘Because - because when our - our thing is over, she’s going to miss you.’

‘I’ll still see the kid around.’ Marcel pokes me in the stomach. ‘I want joint custody.’

All I can think of is how patient he was with her, how sweet. Impulsively I get up on my tiptoes and kiss him on the cheek, and he jerks back in surprise.

‘What was that for?’

My cheeks feel scalded. I say, ‘For being so nice to Kitty.’ Then I wave goodbye and I run into the house.

IF I DON’T BUY GROCERIES today, it’s scrambled eggs for dinner tonight.

Again...

Margot’s car is fixed and sitting in the driveway, where it’s been sitting for the past few weeks. I could go to the store if I wanted to. I do want to. But I don’t want to drive.

If I- was a nervous driver before, the accident has only made me worse. What business do I- have behind the wheel of a car? What if I hurt someone? What if I hurt Kitty?

They shouldn't just give out driver's licenses so easily. I mean, a car is a really dangerous thing. It's practically a weapon.

But the store is less than ten minutes away. It's not like I'd be getting on the highway.

And I really- really don't want to eat scrambled eggs for dinner tonight. Besides - if Marcel and Genevieve are getting back together, he won't be giving me rides anymore.

I've got to learn how to do it for myself. I can't depend on other people to help me.

'We're going to the store, Kitty,' I say.

She's lying down in front of the TV, propped up on her elbows. Her body looks so long; it's getting longer every day. Pretty soon she'll be taller than me. Kitty doesn't look away from the TV. 'I don't want to come. I want to watch my shows.'

'If you come, I'll let you pick out ice cream.'

Kitty gets to her feet.

On the drive there, I'm going so slow that Kitty keeps telling me the speed limit. 'They give tickets for going under the limit too, you know.'

'Who told you that?'

'No one. I just know it. I bet I'm going to be a better driver than you, Lara Jean.'

I grip the steering wheel tighter. 'I bet you are.' Brat. I bet when Kitty starts driving, she's going to be a speed demon without the slightest concern for those around her. But she'll still probably be better at it than me. A reckless driver is better than a scared one; ask anybody.

'I'm not scared of things like you are.'

I adjust my rearview mirror. 'You sure are proud of yourself.'

'I'm just saying.'

‘Is there a car coming? Can I switch lanes?’

Kitty turns her head. ‘You can go, but hurry.’

‘Like how much time do I have?’

‘It’s already too late. Wait - now you can go. Go!’

I jerk into the left lane and look in my rearview. ‘Good job, Kitty. You just keep being my second pair of eyes.’

As we push the cart around the store, I’m thinking about the drive home and having to get behind the wheel again. My heart still races even as I’m trying to decide if we should have zucchini or green beans with dinner. By the time we’re in the dairy aisle, Kitty’s whining. ‘Can you hurry? I don’t want to miss my next show!’

To appease her, I say, ‘Go pick out ice cream,’ and Kitty heads off toward the frozen-food aisle.

The way home, I stay in the right lane for blocks and blocks- so I don’t have to switch lanes.

The car in front of me is an old lady, and she’s moving at a snail’s pace, which suits me just fine. Kitty begs me to switch lanes, but I just ignore her and keep doing what I’m doing, nice and easy. My hands are gripping the steering wheel so tightly my knuckles are white.

‘The ice cream’s going to be all melted by the time we get home,’ Kitty gripes.

-And-

‘I’ve missed every single one of my shows. Can you please go to the fast lane?’

‘Kitty!’ I screech. ‘Will you just let me drive?’

‘Then drive already!’

I lean across the console to cuff her upside the head, and she scoots closer to the window so I can’t reach her. ‘Can’t touch me,’ she says gleefully.

‘Quit playing around and be my eyes,’ I say.

A car is coming up on my right, zooming off a highway exit. He’s going to have to merge into my lane soon. Lightning-fast I look over my shoulder for my blind spot, to see if I can switch lanes. Every time I have to take my eyes away from the road, even for a second, I feel so much panic in my chest. But I don’t have a choice, I just hold my breath and I switch over to the left lane. Nothing bad happens. I exhale.

My heart races the whole way home. But we make it, no accidents and nobody honking their horn at me, and that’s the important thing. And the ice cream is fine, only a little melted on top. It will get easier each time, I think. I hope. I just have to keep trying.

I can’t stand the thought of Kitty being scornful of me. I’m her big sister. I have to be someone she looks up to, the way I look up to Margot. How can Kitty look up to me if I’m weak?

That night I pack Kitty’s and my lunches. I make what Mommy used to make us sometimes when we went on picnics at the winery in Keswick. I dice up a carrot and an onion and fry it with sesame oil and a little vinegar; then I mix in sushi rice.

When it’s- cooked, I scoop pats of rice into tofu skins. They’re like rice balls in little purses.

I don’t have an exact recipe to follow, but it tastes right enough. When I’m finished, I get on a ladder and search for the bento boxes Mommy used to put them in. I finally find them in the back of the Tupperware cabinet.

I don’t know if Kitty will remember eating these rice balls, but I hope that her heart will.

AT THE LUNCH TABLE PETE Rand his friends can’t get enough of the rice balls. I only get to eat three. ‘These are so good,’ Marcel keeps saying. When he reaches for the last one, he stops short and quickly looks up at me to see if I noticed.

‘You can have it,’ I say. I know what he’s thinking of. The last piece of pizza.

‘No, it’s all right, I’m good.’

‘Have it.’

‘I don’t want it!’

I pick up the rice ball with my fingers and put it in his face. ‘Say ‘ah.’ ‘Stubbornly he says, ‘No. I’m not going to give you the satisfaction of being right.’

Darrell hoots with laughter. ‘I’m jealous of you, I wish I had a girl to feed me my lunch. Lara Jean, if he doesn’t take it, I will.’ He leans forward and- opens his mouth for me.

Marcel shoves him to the side and says, ‘Step off, it’s mine!’ He opens his mouth and I pop it in like he’s a seal at Sea World. With his mouth full of rice and his eyes closed, he says, ‘Yum- yum- yum.’

I smile because it’s so cute. And for a second, just for a second, I forget. I forget that this isn’t real.

Marcel swallows the food in his mouth and says, ‘What’s wrong? Why do you look sad?’

‘I’m not sad. I’m hungry because you guys ate my lunch.’ I cross my eyes at him to show him I’m joking.

Immediately Marcel pushes out his chair and stands up. ‘I’m going to get you a sandwich.’

I grab his sleeve. ‘Don’t. I’m just kidding.’

‘Are you sure?’ I nod, and he sits back down. ‘If you’re hungry later, we can stop somewhere on the way home.’

‘About that,’ I say. ‘My car’s fixed now, so I won’t be needing you to give me rides anymore.’

‘Oh, really?’ Marcel leans back in his chair. ‘I don’t mind picking you up, though. I know you hate to drive.’

‘The only way I’ll get better is if I practice,’ I say, feeling like Margot.

Margot the- Good.

‘Besides, now you’ll get back your extra five minutes of sleep.’

Marcel grins. ‘True.’

VIRTUAL SUNDAY NIGHT DINNER WAS an idea I thought up.

I’ve got my laptop propped up on a stack of books in the center of the table.

Daddy- and Kitty and I are all sitting in front of it with our slices of pizza. It’s our lunchtime and Margot’s dinnertime. Margot’s sitting at her desk with a salad. She’s already in her flannel pj’s.

‘You guys are eating pizza again?’ Margot gives me and Daddy a disapproving look.

‘Kitty’s going to stay tiny if you don’t feed her any green food.’

‘Relax, Gogo, there are peppers on this pizza,’ I say, holding up my slice, and everybody laughs.

‘There’ll be a spinach salad with dinner tonight,’ Daddy offers.

‘Can you make my spinach portion into a green juice instead?’ Kitty asks.

‘That’s the healthiest way to eat spinach.’

‘How do you know that?’ Margot asks.

‘From Marcel.’

The pizza slice that was halfway to my mouth freezes in midair.

‘Marcel who?’

‘Lara Jean’s boyfriend.’

‘Wait a minute - Lara Jean’s dating who?’ On the computer screen, Margot’s eyes are huge and incredulous.

‘Marcel-,’ Kitty chirps.

I whip my head around and give her a dirty look. With my eyes, I say, thanks for spilling the beans, Kitty. With her eyes she says, What? You should have told her yourself ages ago.

Margot looks from Kitty to me. 'What in the world? How did that happen?'

Lamely I say, 'It just sort of - happened.'

'Are you serious? Why would you ever be interested in someone like Marcel-?'

He's such a -' Margot shakes her head in disbelief. 'I mean, did you know Josh caught him cheating on a test once?'

'Marcel cheats at school?' Daddy repeats, alarmed.

I quickly look at him and say, 'Once, in seventh grade! The seventh grade doesn't even count anymore it's so long ago. And it wasn't a test, it was a quiz.'

'I definitely don't think he's a good guy for you. All of those lacrosse guys are so douchey.'

'Well, Marcel's not like those other guys.' I don't understand why Margot can't just be happy for me. I was at least pretend happy for her when she started dating Josh.

She could pretend happy for me too. And it makes me mad, the way she's saying all of this stuff in front of Daddy and Kitty.

'If you talk to him, if you just give him a chance, you'll see, Margot.' I don't know why I'm bothering trying to convince her of- Marcel when it will be over soon anyway. But I want her to know that he is a good guy because he is.

Margot makes a face like Yeah, okay, sure and I know she doesn't believe me. 'What about Genevieve?'

'They broke up months ago.'

Daddy looks confused and says, 'Marcel and Genevieve were an item?' 'Never mind, Daddy,' I say.

Margot is quiet, chewing on her salad, so I think she's done, but then she says, 'He's not very smart, though, is he? I mean, at school?'

'Not everybody can be a National Merit Scholar! And there are different kinds of intelligence, you know. He has a high emotional IQ.' Margot's disapproval makes me feel prickly all over. More than prickly. Mad.

What right does she have to weigh in when she doesn't even live here anymore?

Kitty has more of a right than she does.

'Kitty, do you like Marcel?' I ask her. I know she'll say yes.

Kitty perks up, and I can tell she is pleased to be included in the big-girl talk.

'Yes.'

Surprised, Margot says, 'Kitty, you've hung out with him too?'

'Sure. He comes over all the time. He gives us rides.'

'In his two-seater?' Margot shoots a look at me.

Kitty pipes up. 'No, in his mom's van!' With innocent eyes, she says, 'I want to go for a ride in his convertible. I've never been in a convertible.' 'So, he doesn't drive around his Audi anymore?' Margot asks me.

'Not when Kitty's riding with us,' I say.

'Hmm' is all Margot says, and the skeptical look on her face makes me want to x her right off the screen.

AFTER SCHOOL I GET A text from Josh.

You, me, and the diner-like old times.

Except old times would have included Margot. Now it's new times, I suppose. Maybe that's not altogether a bad thing. New can be good.

OK but I'm getting my own grilled cheese because you always hog more than your fair share.

Deal.

We're sitting in our booth by the jukebox.

I wonder what Margot's doing right now. It's nighttime in Scotland. Maybe she's getting ready to go out to the pub with her hallmates. Margot says pubs are really big over there; they have what they call pub crawls, where they go from pub to pub and drink and drink.

Margot's not some big drinker, I've never even seen her drunk. I hope she's learned how to by now.

I hold my hand out for quarters. Another Lara Jean-and-Josh tradition. Josh always gives me quarters for the jukebox.

It's because he keeps mounds of them in his car for the tollbooth and - I never- have quarters because I hate change.

I can't decide if I want doo-wop or folksy guitar, but then at the last second, I put in- 'Video Killed the Radio Star,' for Margot. So, in a way, it's like she is here.

Josh smiles when it comes on. 'I knew you'd pick that.'

'No, you didn't, because I didn't know I was going to until I did.' I pick up my menu and study it like I haven't seen it a million times.

Josh is still smiling. 'Why bother looking at the menu when we already know what you're going to get?'

'I could change my mind at the last second,' I say. 'There's a chance I could order a tuna melt or a turkey burger or a chef salad. I can be adventurous too, you know.'

'Sure,' Josh agrees, and I know he's just humoring me.

The server comes over to take our order and Josh says, 'I'll have a slice of grilled cheese and a tomato soup and a chocolate milkshake.'

He looks at me expectantly.

There's a smile coming up on the corners of his lips.

'Ah-um -' I scan the menu as fast as I can, but I don't actually want a tuna melt or a turkey burger or a chef salad. I give up. I like what I like. 'A grilled cheese, please.

And a black-cherry soda.' As soon as the server is gone, I say, 'Don't say a word.'

'Oh, I wasn't going to.'

And then, because there's a silence, we both speak at the same time. I say, 'Have you talked to Margot lately?' and he says, 'How are things going with-?'

Josh's easy smile fades and he looks away. 'Yeah, we chat online sometimes. I think. ...I think she's kind of homesick.'

I give him a funny look. 'I just talked to her last night and she didn't seem homesick at all. She seemed like the same old Margot. She was telling us about Raisin Weekend. It makes me want to go to Saint Andrew's too.'

'What's Raisin Weekend?'

'I'm not a hundred percent sure - it sounds like it was a mix of drinking a lot and Latin. I guess it's a Scottish thing.'

'Would you do that?' Josh asks. 'Would you go somewhere far away?'

I sigh. 'No, probably not. That's Margot, not me. It'd be nice to visit, though. Maybe my dad will let me go during spring break.'

'I think she'd like that a lot. I guess our Paris trip isn't happening anymore, huh?'

He laughs awkwardly, and then he clears his throat. 'So, wait, how are things going with-?'

Before I can answer, the server comes back with our food. Josh pushes the bowl of soup so it's in the middle of the table. 'the First sip?' he asks, holding up the milkshake.

Eagerly I nod and lean across the table. Josh holds the glass and I take a long sip.

'Ahhh,' I say, sitting back down.

'That was a pretty big sip,' he says. 'How come you never get your own?'

'Why should I when I know you'll share?' I break off a piece of grilled cheese and dip it into the soup.

'So, you were saying?' Josh prods. When I stare at him blankly, he says, 'You were about to talk about-'

I was hoping this wouldn't come up. I'm not in the mood to tell more lies to Josh.

'Things are good.' Because Josh is looking at me like he's expecting something more, I add, 'He's really sweet.'

Josh snorts.

'He's not what you'd think. People are so quick to judge him, but he's different.'

I'm surprised to find I'm telling the truth. Marcel isn't what you'd think. He is cocky, and he can be obnoxious and he's always late, true, but there are other good and surprising things about him too.

'He's - not what you think.'

Josh gives me a dubious look. Then he dunks half his sandwich into the soup and says, 'You already said that.'

'That's because it's true.' He shrugs at this like he doesn't believe me. So, I say, 'You should see the way Kitty acts around Marcel. She's crazy about him.' I don't realize it until the words are actually out of my mouth, but I say it to hurt him.

Josh tears off a hunk of grilled cheese. 'Well, I hope she doesn't get too attached.'

Even though I've had that exact same thought for different reasons, it still hurts to hear.

Suddenly the easy Josh-and-Lara Jean feeling is lost. Josh is withdrawn and closed off, and I'm stinging from what he said about Marcel, and it feels like playacting to sit across from each other and pretend it's the same as the old days. How could it be, when Margot isn't here? She is the point of our little triangle.

'Hey,' Josh says suddenly. I look up. 'I didn't mean that. That was a shitty thing to say.' He ducks his head. 'I guess - I don't know, maybe I'm just jealous.'

I'm not used to sharing the Song girls.'

I go soft inside. Now that he's said this nice thing, I am feeling warm and generous toward him again. I don't say what I'm thinking, which is, you may not be used to sharing- us, but we're very used to sharing you. 'You know Kitty still loves you best,' I say, which makes him smile.

'I mean, I did teach her how to hock a loogie,' Josh says. 'You don't forget the person who teaches you something like that.' He takes a long sip of his milkshake.

'Hey, they're doing a Lord of the Rings marathon at the Bess this weekend. Want to go?'

Continued: 3

'That's like - nine hours!'

'Yeah, nine hours of awesome.'

'True,' I agree. 'I wanna go; I just have to check with Marcel first. He said something about going to a movie this weekend, and-' Josh cuts me off before I can finish. 'It's fine. I can just go with Mike. Or maybe I'll take Kitty. It's about time I introduced her to the genius that is Tolkien.'

I'm quiet. Are Kitty and I interchangeable in his mind? Are Margot and I?

We're sharing a waffle when Genevieve walks into the diner with a little kid who I guess must be her little brother. Not her actual little brother; Gen is an only child. She's the president of the Little Sib program. It's where a high school student is paired up with an elementary school kid and you tutor them and take them out for fun days.

I slump down in my seat, but of course, Gen still sees me. She looks from me to Josh, and then she gives me a little wave. I don't know what to do so I just wave back.

Something about the way she's smiling at me is unsettling. It's how genuinely happy she looks.

If Genevieve is happy, that's not good for me.

At dinner, I get a text from Marcel. It says, If- you're going to hang out with Sanderson, can you at least not do it in public?

Under the table, I read it over and over. Could it be that Marcel's the teensiest bit jealous? Or is he really just worried about how it looks to Genevieve?

'What do you keep looking at?' Kitty wants to know.

I put my phone down, face down. 'Nothing.'

Kitty turns to Daddy and says, 'I bet it was a text from Marcel.'

Buttering a roll, my dad says, 'I like Marcel.'

'You do?' I say.

Daddy nods. 'He's a good kid. He's really taken with you, Lara Jean.'

'Taken with me?' I repeat.

To me, Kitty says, 'You sound like a parrot.' To Daddy she says, 'What does that mean? Taken by her?'

'It means he's charmed by her,' Daddy explains. 'He's smitten.'

'Well, what's smitten?'

He chuckles and stuffs the roll in Kitty's open, perplexed mouth. 'It means he likes her.'

‘He definitely likes her,’ Kitty agrees, her mouth full. ‘He- he looks at you a lot, Lara Jean. When you’re not paying attention. He looks at you, to see if you’re having a good time.’

‘He does?’ My chest feels warm and glow, and I can feel myself start to smile.

‘I’m just happy to see you so happy. I used to worry about Margot taking on so many responsibilities at home and helping out the way she did. I didn’t want her to miss out on her high school experience. But you know Margot. She’s so driven.’ Daddy reaches over and squeezes my shoulder. ‘To see you now, going out and doing things and making new friends - it makes your old man very happy. Very, very happy.’

I feel a lump grow in my throat. If only it wasn’t all a lie.

‘Don’t cry, Daddy,’ Kitty orders, and Daddy nods and pulls her into his arms for a hug.

‘Can you do me a favor, Kitty?’ He says.

‘What?’

‘Can you stay this age forever?’

Automatically Kitty replies, ‘I can if you give me a puppy.’

My dad roars with laughter, and Kitty laughs too.

I really admire my little sister sometimes. She knows exactly what she wants, and she’ll do whatever it takes to get it. She’s shameless that way.

I’m going to talk to Daddy and help her cause. The two of us will wear him down.

There’ll be a puppy under our tree Christmas morning. I’d bet money on it.

THE NEXT NIGHT Marcel AND I study at Starbucks for a few hours- well, I study, and he keeps getting up and talking to people from school. On the way home, he asks, ‘Did you sign up for the ski trip?’

‘No. I’m a terrible skier.’ Only cool people like Marcel and his friends go on the ski trip.

I could try to twist Chris's arm into going, but she'd probably laugh in my face. She's not going on any school trip.

'You don't have to ski. You can snowboard. That's what I'm doing.'

I give him a look. 'Can you picture me snowboarding?'

'I'll teach you. Come on, it'll be fun.' Marcel grabs my hand and says, 'Please- please- please, Lara Jean? Come on, be a sport. It'll be fun, I promise.'

He catches me by surprise with this. The ski trip isn't until winter break. So, he wants to keep this, us, up until then. For some reason, I feel relieved.

'If you don't want to snowboard,' he continues, 'the lodge has a big stone fireplace and big comfy chairs. You can sit and read for hours. And they sell the best hot chocolate.

I'll buy you one.' He squeezes my hand.

My heart does a little zing, and I say, 'All right, I'll go. But the hot chocolate had better be as good as you say.'

'I'll buy you as many as you want.'

'Then you better bring a lot of singles,' I say, and Marcel snorts. 'What?'

'Nothing.'

When we get to my house, I climb out and he drives away before it occurs to me, I left my bag on the floor of his car, and Daddy and Kitty aren't home.

They're at- Kitty's the school for parent-teacher conferences.

I fumble around blindly under the deck, feeling around in the dark for the spare keys- we keep hidden under the wheelbarrow. Then I remember that the spare keys are in the junk drawer, in the house, because I forgot to put them back the last time I got locked out.

I have no keys, no phone, no way of getting into the house.

Josh! Josh has a spare key. He's watered my dad's plants for him a few times when we went away on vacation.

I find a rock in the driveway and I cross the lawn and stand underneath Josh's window.

I throw the rock at it and I miss it. I find another one, and it pings off the glass, barely making a sound. I try again, with a bigger rock. This one hits.

Josh opens the window and leans his head out. 'Hey. Did - leave already?'

Surprised, I say, 'Yeah. I left my bag in his car. Can you throw down the spare keys?'

Josh sighs like I'm asking for something huge. 'Hold on.' Then he disappears.

I stand there and wait for him to come back to the window, but he doesn't.

He comes out of the front door instead. He's wearing a- hoodie and sweatpants.

It's- Margot's favorite hoodie. When they first got together, she used to wear it all the time, like it was a letterman's jacket or something.

I hold my hand out for the keys and Josh drops them in my hand. 'Thanks, Joshy.'

I turn to leave, but he says, 'Wait. I'm worried about you.'

'What? Why?'

He sighs heavily and adjusts his glasses. He only wears his glasses at night.

'This thing with-'

'Not that again, Josh-'

'He's a player. He's not good enough for you. You're - innocent. You're not like other girls. He's a typical guy. You can't trust him.'

'I think I know him a lot better than you do.'

'I'm just looking out for you.' Josh clears his throat. 'You're like my little sister.'

I want to hit him for saying that. 'No I'm not,' I say.

An uneasy look crosses over Josh's face. I know what he's thinking because we're both thinking it.

Then, headlights are beaming down our street. It's Marcel's car. He's come back. I hand Josh his set of keys and run over to my driveway. Over my shoulder, I call out, 'Thanks, Joshy!'

I come around the front to the driver's side. Marcel's window is down. 'You forgot your bag,' he says, glancing over toward Josh's house.

'I know,' I say breathlessly. 'Thanks for coming back.'

'Is he out there?'

'I don't know. He was a minute ago.'

'Then just in case,' Marcel says, and he leans his head out and kisses me on the lips, open-mouthed and sure.

I'm stunned.

When he pulls away, Marcel's smiling. 'Night, Lara Jean.'

He drives off into the night and I'm still standing there with my fingers to my lips.

Marcel - just kissed me. He kissed me, and I liked it. I'm pretty sure I liked it. I'm pretty sure I like him.

The next morning I'm at my locker, putting my books away when I see- Marcel walking down the hallway. My heart thumps in my chest so loud I can hear it echo in my ears. He hasn't seen me yet. I duck my head into my locker and start arranging my books into a pile. From behind the locked door, he says, 'Hey.' 'Hey,' I say back.

'I just want to set your mind at ease, Covey. I'm not going to kiss you again, so don't worry about it.'

Oh. ...?...

So that's that. It doesn't matter if I like him or not because he doesn't like me back.

It's kind of silly to feel so disappointed about something you only just realized you wanted, isn't it?

Don't let him see that you're disappointed.

I face him. 'I wasn't worried about it.'

'Yes- you were. Look at you: your face is all pinched together like a clam.'

Marcel-

laughs, and I try to un-pinch my face, to look serene. 'It's not going to happen again. It was all for Sanderson's benefit.'

'Good.'

'Good,' he says, and he takes my hand, and he closes my locker door, and he walks me to class like a real boyfriend like we're really in love.

How was I supposed to know what's real and what's not? It feels like I'm the only one who doesn't know the difference.

MY DAD'S THRILLED WHEN ask him to sign the permission slip. 'Oh, Lara Jean, this is- great.

Did Marcel convince you? You've been scared of skiing ever since you were ten and you did the splits and you couldn't get back up!'

'Yeah, I remember.' My boots froze onto the skis, and I lay there in the splits for what felt like days.

Signing the paper, my dad says, 'Hey, maybe we can all of us go to Wintergreen over-Christmas. Marcel too.'

So that's where I get it from. My dad. He lives in a fantasy world. Handing me the slip, he says cheerfully, 'You can wear Margot's ski pants. Her gloves, too.'

I don't tell him that I won't need them because I'll be cozy in the lodge reading and sipping hot cocoa by the fire. I should bring my knitting stuff with me too.

When I talk to Margot on the phone that night, I tell her I'm going on the ski trip, and she's surprised. 'But you hate skiing.'

‘I’m going to try out snowboarding.’

‘Just - be careful,’ she says.

I’m thinking she means on the slopes, but when Chris comes over the next night to borrow a dress, I learn otherwise. ‘You know everybody hooks up on the ski trip, right?’

It’s like a school-sanctioned booty call.’

‘What?’

‘That’s where I lost my V freshman year.’ ‘I thought you lost it in the woods near your house.’

‘Oh yeah. Whatever, the point is, I had sex on the ski trip.’

‘There are chaperones,’ I say worriedly. ‘How can people just have sex with chaperones around?’

‘Chaperones go to sleep early because they’re old,’ Chris says. ‘People just sneak out.

Plus- there’s a hot tub. Did you know that there’s a hot tub?’

‘No - Marcel never mentioned that.’ Well, that’s that, I just won’t pack a bathing suit.

It’s not like they can make you go in a hot tub if you don’t want to.

‘The year I went, people were skinny-dipping.’

My eyes bug out. Skinny-dipping! ‘People were nude?’

‘Well, the girls took their tops off. Just be prepared.’ Chris chews on her fingernail.

‘Last year I heard Mr. Dunham got in the hot tub with students and it was weird.’

‘This sounds like the Wild West,’ I mutter.

‘More like Girls Gone Wild.’

It’s not that I’m worried Marcel will try something with me. I know he won’t because he doesn’t see me that way. But are people going to expect it? Am I going to have to sneak into his room in the middle of the night so people think we're doing something? I don't want to get in trouble on a school trip, but Marcel has a way of convincing me to do stuff I don't want to do.

I grab Chris's hands. 'Will you please come? Please, please!'

She shakes her head. 'You know better than that. I don't do school trips.'

'You have before!'

'Yeah, freshman year. Not anymore.'

'But I need you!' Desperately I squeeze her hands and say, 'Remember how I covered for you last year when you went to Coachella? I spent the whole weekend sneaking in and out of your house so your mom would think you were at home! Don't forget the things I've done for you, Chris! I need you now!'

Unmoved, Chris plucks her hands away from mine and goes to the mirror and starts examining her skin. 'Um-'s not going to pressure you to have sex if you don't want to.

If you minus the fact that he dated the devil, he's not a total dummy. He's kind of decent, actually.'

'What do you mean by decent? Decent like he doesn't care that much about sex?'

'Oh, God, no. He and Gen were in constant heat for each other. She's been on the pill longer than I have. Too bad everyone in my family thinks she's this angel.'

Chris pokes at- a zit on her chin. 'What a fake. I should send an anonymous letter to our grandma - Not that I really would. I'm no rat, unlike her. Remember that time she told our grandma I was going to school drunk?' She doesn't wait for me to answer. When Chris gets going on a Genevieve rant, she is single-minded. 'My grandma wanted to use the money she saved for my college for rehab! They had a family meeting with me! I'm so glad you stole - from her.'

'I didn't steal him. They were already broken up!'

Chris snorts. 'Sure, keep telling that to yourself. Gen's going on the ski trip, you know.'

She's class president, so she's basically organizing it. So just beware. Don't ever ski alone.'

I let out a gasp. 'Chris, I'm begging you. Please come.' In a burst of inspiration, I say, 'If you come, it'll make Genevieve really mad! She's organizing this whole thing; it's her trip. She won't want you there!'

Chris purses her lips into a smile. 'You know how to play me.' She juts her chin at me.

'Do you think this zit is ready to pop?'

THANKSGIVING DAY, DADDY CLEANS OUT the turkey for me and then leaves to go pick up our Korean grandma, who lives an hour away in a retirement community with a lot of other Korean grandmas. Daddy's mom, Nana, is spending Thanksgiving with her boyfriend's family, which is fine by me because I know she wouldn't have anything nice to say about the food.

I make up a green-bean dish with orange peel and dill, in an earnest effort to be jazzy and inventive. I nominate Kitty to be my taste tester and she takes a bite of green bean and says it tastes like an orange pickle. 'Why can't we just have a green-bean casserole with the fried onion rings that come in the can?' Kitty ponders. She's cutting out different colored feathers for her turkey placemats.

'Because I'm trying to be jazzy and inventive,' I say, dumping a can of gravy into the saucepan.

Doubtfully Kitty says, 'Well, are we still having broccoli casserole? People will eat that.'

'Do you see any broccoli anywhere in this kitchen?' I ask. 'No, the green in this meal is the green bean.'

'What about mashed potatoes? We're still having mashed potatoes, right?'

Mashed potatoes. I jump up and check the pantry. I forgot to buy potatoes. I got the whole milk and the butter and even the chives to put on top like Margot always does.

But I forgot the actual potatoes. ‘Call Daddy and ask him to pick up Yukon gold potatoes on the way home,’ I say, closing the pantry door.

‘I can’t believe you forgot the potatoes,’ Kitty says with a shake of her head.

I glare at her. ‘Just focus on your placemats.’

‘No, because if I didn’t just ask about the mashed potatoes, the meal would have been ruined, so you should be thanking me.’

Kitty gets up to call Daddy, and I yell out, ‘By the way, those turkeys look more like the NBC peacock logo than actual turkeys, so!’

Kitty is unfazed, and I take another bite of the green beans. They do taste like an orange pickle.

It turns out I have cooked the turkey upside down. Also, Kitty kept hounding me about salmonella because- she watched a video on it in science, so I wind up leaving the bird in too long. The mashed potatoes are fine, but there are some crunchy bits here and there because I rushed to boil them.

We are seated around the dining room table, and Kitty’s placemats really do add a certain something.

Grandma is eating a whole pile of green beans, and I shoot Kitty a triumphant look.

See? Someone likes them.

There was a minute or two after Mommy died when Grandma moved in to help take care of us. There was even talk of her staying. She didn’t think Daddy could manage on his own.

‘So, Danny,’ Grandma begins. Kitty and I exchange a look across the table because we know what’s coming. ‘Are you seeing anyone these days? Going on dates?’

My dad reddens. ‘Er - not so much. My work keeps me so busy-’ Grandma clucks. ‘It’s not good for a man to be alone, Danny.’

‘I’ve got my girls to keep me company,’ my dad says, trying to sound jovial and not tense.

Grandma fixes him with a cold stare. 'That's not what I mean.'

When we're doing the dishes, Grandma asks me, 'Lara Jean, would you mind if your daddy had a girlfriend?'

It's something Margot and I have discussed at length over the years, most often in the dark, late at night. If Daddy absolutely had to date, what kind of woman would we like to see him with? Someone with a good sense of humor, kindhearted, all of the usual things. Someone who'd be firm with Kitty but not rein her in so much that it would squash all the special things about her.

But also- someone who wouldn't try to be our mother; that's what Margot is fiercest about. Kitty needs a mom, but we're old enough to not need mothering, she says. Of the three of us, Margot would be the most critical. She's incredibly loyal to Mommy's memory. Not that I'm not, but there have been times, over the years, where I've thought about how it would be nice to have someone. Someone older, a lady, who knows about certain things, like the right way to put on blush, or how to flirt to get out of a speeding ticket.

Things to know for the future. But then it never happened. Daddy's been on some dates, but he hasn't had a steady girlfriend he's brought around. Which has always been sort of a relief, but now that I'm getting older, I keep thinking about what it will be like when I'm gone and it's just Kitty and Daddy, and then before long it will just be Daddy. I don't want him to be alone.

'No,' I say. 'I wouldn't mind at all.'

Grandma gives me an approving look. 'Good girl,' she says, and I feel warm and cozy inside, like how I used to feel after a cup of the Night-Night Tea Mommy used to make me- when I couldn't fall asleep at night. Daddy's made it for me a few times since, but it never tasted the same, and I never had the heart to tell him.

THE CHRISTMAS COOKIE JACKPOT START December first. We drag out all of Mommy's old cookbooks and cooking magazines and we spread them out on the living room floor and turn on the Jack Brown Christmas album. No Christmas music is- allowed in our house until December first. I don't remember whose rule this is, but we abide by it. Kitty keeps a list of which cookies we're definitely doing and which ones we're maybe doing.

There are a few perennials. My dad loves pecan crescents, so those are a must.

Sugar cookies, because those are a given. Snickerdoodles for Kitty, molasses cookies for Margot, cowgirl cookies for me. White-chocolate cranberry is Josh's favorite. I think this year, though, we should mix things up and do different cookies. Not entirely, but at least a few new ones. Marcel's here; he stopped by after school to work on chem, and now it's hours later and he's still here. He and Kitty and I are in the living room going through the cookbooks. My dad's in the kitchen listening to NPR and making tomorrow's lunches.

'Please no more turkey sandwiches,' I call out. Marcel nudges my sock and mouths spoiled, and he points at me and Kitty, shaking his finger at us. 'Whatever. Your mom makes your lunches every day, so shut it,' I whisper.

My dad calls back, 'Hey, I'm sick of leftovers too, but what are we going to do? Throw it away?'

Kitty and I look at each other. 'Pretty much exactly,' I say. My dad has a thing about wasting food. I wonder if I snuck down to the kitchen tonight and threw it out if he'd notice. He probably would. 'If we had a dog,' Kitty pipes up loudly, 'there wouldn't be any more leftovers.' She winks at me. 'What kind of dog do you want?' Marcel asks her. 'Don't get her hopes up,' I tell him, but he waves me off. Immediately Kitty says, 'An Akita. Red fur with a cinnamon-bun tail. Or a German shepherd I can train to be a seeing-eye dog.'

'But you're not blind,' Marcel says.

'But I could be one day.' Grinning, Marcel shakes his head. He nudges me again and in an admiring voice, he says, 'Can't argue with the kid.' 'It's pretty much futile,' I agree. I hold up a magazine to show Kitty. 'What do you think? Creamsicle cookies?' Kitty writes them down as a maybe.

'Hey, what about these?' Marcel pushes a cookbook in my lap. It's opened up to a fruitcake cookie recipe. I gag. 'Are you kidding? You're kidding, right? Fruitcake cookies? That's disgusting.'

‘When done right, fruitcake can be really good,’ Marcel defends. ‘My great-aunt Trish used to make fruitcake, and she’d put ice cream on top and it was awesome.’ ‘If you put ice cream on anything, it’s good,’ Kitty says.

‘Can’t argue with the kid,’ I say, and Marcel and I exchange smiles over Kitty’s head. ‘Point taken, but this isn’t your average fruitcake. It’s not, like, a wet loaf of neon jujubes. It’s got pecans and dried cherries and blueberries and good stuff. I think she called it Christmas Memory fruitcake.’

‘I love that story!’ I exclaim. ‘That’s my favorite. It’s so good but so sad.’

Marcel looks puzzled and so does Kitty so I explain. ‘“A Christmas Memory” is a short story by Truman Capote. It’s about a boy named Buddy and his older lady cousin who took care of him when he was little. They’d save up all year to buy ingredients for fruitcake and then they’d send them as presents to friends, but also to, like, the president.’

‘Why is it so sad?’ Kitty wants to know.

‘Because they’re best friends and they love each other more than anybody, but they get separated in the end, because the family thinks she doesn’t take good enough care of him. And maybe she doesn’t, but maybe it doesn’t matter because she was still his soul mate. In the end, she dies, and Buddy doesn’t even get to say goodbye to her. And, it’s a true story.’

‘That’s depressing,’ Marcel says. ‘Forget the fruitcake cookies.’ Kitty crosses out fruitcake cookies on her pad.

I’m thumbing through an old Good Housekeeping magazine when the doorbell rings.

Kitty scrambles up and runs for the door. ‘Check who it is before you open it,’ I call after her. She’s always forgetting to check first.

‘Josh!’ I hear her squeal.

Marcel’s head jerks up.

‘He’s here to see Kitty,’ I tell him.

‘Yeah, right.’

Josh walks into the living room with Kitty hanging around his neck like a monkey.

‘Hey,’ he says, eyes flickering in Marcel’s direction.

‘What’s up, man,’ Marcel says, friendly as can be. ‘Have a seat.’

I give him a strange look. Just a second ago he was grouching, and now he’s happy as a clam. I don’t get boys.

Josh holds up a plastic bag. ‘I brought back your casserole dish.’

‘Is that Josh?’ my dad calls from the kitchen. ‘Josh, do you want a snack? Turkey sandwich?’

I’m positive he’s going to say no because I’m sure he’s had as many leftover turkey sandwiches over at his house as we’ve been eating over here, but then he goes, ‘Sure!’

Josh disentangles himself from Kitty and plops down on the couch. To me he says,

‘Christmas Cookie Bonanza?’

‘Christmas Cookie Bonanza,’ I confirm.

‘You’re making my favorite, right?’ Josh gives me puppy-dog eyes, which always makes me laugh because it’s so un-Josh.

‘You’re such a dork,’ I say, shaking my head.

‘What’s your favorite?’ Marcel asks him. ‘Because I think the list is pretty set.’

‘I’m pretty sure it’s already on the list,’ Josh says.

I look from Josh to Marcel. I can’t tell if they’re kidding or not.

Marcel reaches out and tickles Kitty’s feet. ‘Read us the list, Katherine.’

Kitty giggles and rolls over to her notepad. Then she stands up and grandly says, ‘M&M cookies are a yes, cappuccino cookies are a maybe, creamily cookies are a maybe, fruitcake cookies are a no way-’

‘Wait a minute, I’m a part of this council too,’ Marcel objects, ‘and you guys just turned down my fruitcake cookies without a second thought.’

‘You said to forget the fruitcake cookies, like, five seconds ago!’ I say.

‘Well, now I want them back under consideration,’ he says.

‘I’m sorry, but you don’t have the votes,’ I tell him. ‘Kellie and I both vote no, so that’s two against one.’ My dad pops his head into the living room. ‘Put me down as a yes vote for the fruitcake cookies.’ His head disappears back into the kitchen. ‘Thank you, Dr. Berson’ Marcel crows. He drags me closer to him. ‘See, I knew your dad was on my side.’ I laugh. ‘You’re such a suck-up!’ And then I look over at Josh, and he is staring at us with a funny, left-out look on his face. It makes me feel bad, that look. I scoot away from Marcel and start flipping through my books again. I tell him, ‘The list is still a work in progress. The cookie council will strongly consider your white-chocolate cranberry cookies.’

‘Greatly appreciated,’ Ray says. ‘Christmas isn’t Christmas without your chocolate Kiss cookies.’ Kitty pipes up, ‘Hey, Honey, you’re a suck-up too.’ He grabs her and tickles her until she’s laughing so hard, she has tears in her eyes.

After Ray leaves and Kellie goes upstairs to watch TV, I’m tidying up the living room and Ray sprawled out on the couch watching me. I keep thinking he’s about to leave, but then he keeps lingering. Out of nowhere, he says, ‘Remember back at Halloween how you where Marcel and Karly went. I bet you that wasn’t a coincidence. I am a freeze.’ ‘No, he isn’t. He loves my sister. He always has and he always will.’ Ray waves this off. ‘Just you wait. As soon as you and I are done, he’s going to pull some cheesy-ass move and, like, profess his love for you with a boom box. I’m telling you; I know how guys think.’

Continued: 4

(Past)

Kellie- I yank away the pillow he’s got cushioning his back and put it on the recliner. ‘My sister will be home for winter break soon. I bet you a million dollars they get back together.’ Ray holds his hand out for me to shake on it, and when I take it, he pulls me onto the couch next to him. They suck face legs touching and spared out and shit. He has a mischievous glint in his eye, and I think maybe he's going to kiss me here and there, and I'm scared, but I'm excited, too. Footsteps coming down the stairs, and the moment's over. 'CAN WE PUT UP THE TREE this weekend?' Kellie asks at breakfast.

My and her dad looks up from his bowl of oatmeal. Oatmeal, ugh. 'I don't see why not.' Unenthusiastically I say, 'Margot might be mad if we do it without her.' Truth be told, I want to put up the tree too. It's so cozy to do Christmas Cookie Windfall and have the lights twinkling on the tree and Christmas music and the whole house smelling like sugar and butter. 'Our family put their tree up the day after Thanksgiving,' Killie says. 'Let's just do it, then,' I say. 'Can we, Daddy?' 'Well, if Barn's family is doing it,' Daddy says. We drive out to the Christmas tree farm an hour away, because that's where the really nice ones are. Kellie insists on seeing each and every tree to make sure ours is the nicest one- dad-a.

I vote for a plump balsam fir because it smells the best, but Kellie doesn't think it's tall enough. We go for a Douglas fir instead, and the whole drive home the air smells like Christmas morning. Karly and Marcel who stayed overruns out of his house when he sees us struggling to get the tree inside. He and my dad heft it up and take it inside the house. He holds the tree up straight as my dad screws the Christmas tree stands around it tightly. I have a feeling like he's going to want to stay and help decorate the tree. I can't stop thinking you said Ray said on the phone to me.

How I could maybe like to get over they and we can do things. 'A miniature to the left,' Kellie directs. 'It's not straight enough.' I bring down the box with the twinkle lights and the ornaments and start sorting through them.

My favorite is the painted blue star I made in kindergarten out of dough. It's my favorite because there's a bite taken out of it, I told Kitty it was a cookie and she chomped right into it like the Cookie Monster. And then she cried, and I got in trouble, but it was worth it. 'Should we do colored lights or white lights this year?' I ask.

Where is,' sis says. 'But colored lights are fanciful,' Marcel argues. 'I mean, they're sentimental.' I Kellie roll my eyes, to the goo- goo bull shit. 'Fanciful, Marcel?' And then Josh proceeds to make a case for colored lights, and he and I argue back and forth until Daddy intercedes and says we should just do half and half. This is when things finally feel really and truly normal between us, now that we are bickering again like old times.

Marcel was wrong about Ray. I feel that in my heart of hearts. The tree is so tall it nearly touches the ceiling. We run out of lights, so Daddy goes to buy more at the store. Marcel puts Karly on his shoulders so she can put the angel on the tippy top seven or more feet or so- up.

‘I’m glad we got a big tree this year,’ I say with a happy sigh, falling back onto the sofa, spring jabbing me in the ass as I look up at the top. There’s nothing cozier than a Christmas tree all lit up. A little later, Daddy has to go into the market in town the only place open, and Kellie goes over to our neighbor’s, so we can have our time. Get out of the House because they’re making s’ love next to the fireplace, so it’s just them and me leaving then?

I go to Ray- I’m putting ornament hooks back into their different zip lock bags and Ray is loading up a cardboard box with the ornaments we didn’t have room for. He hoists the box in harams and knocks into a branch on the tree, and a glass ornament slips off and breaks.

Ray whimpers. ‘Ray-ie,’ I say. ‘I made that in home-ie.’ ‘Sorry.’ ‘It’s okay, it wasn’t my best work anyway. I put in too many feathers.’ It’s a clear glass ball with white feathers and white sequins inside. I go get a broom, and when I come back, he says, ‘You act differently around the baby. Did you know that?’ I look up from sweeping the broken ornament. ‘No- I don’t.’ ‘You don’t act like you. You act like - like how all girls act around him.

That’s not you, Kill.’ I am somewhat annoyed, I say it nicely, ‘I act the same as I always do. What would you know about it, Ray? His mom is a dick and dad a pussy, they just fit in will and I get fucked over; you’ve barely ever even been around us.’ I crouch down and pick up a shard of glass. ‘Be careful,’ Ray says. ‘Here, I’ll do it.’ He stoops down next to me and reaches for another shard. ‘Owl is looking at me I said looking at the tree it like the sister loves so!’

‘You be careful!’ I lean close to him and try to get a closer look at his finger. ‘Are you bleeding?’ He shakes his head. ‘I’m fine.’ And then he says, ‘You know what I don’t get?’

‘What the...?’

Ray stares at me, his cheeks a dull red. 'Why you never said anything. If all that time you felt like that about me, why didn't you say anything?' My whole body goes stiff. I wasn't expecting that. I'm not prepared. I swallow hard and say, 'You were with Margot.'

'I wasn't always with Margot. The stuff you wrote- you liked me before I ever liked her. Why didn't you just tell me?' I let out a breath. 'What does that even matter now?' 'It matters. You should have told me. You should have at least given me a chance.' 'It wouldn't have made a difference, Ray!' 'And I'm telling you it would have!' He steps toward me. He- I rise to my feet as he holds me up.

Why is he bringing this up now, just when things are back to normal again?

'You're so full of it I say yet I love that about you. You've never thought of me that way, not ever, so don't go trying to reinvent history now when I have somebody.' 'Don't tell me what I think,' he shouts. 'You don't know my every thought, of my sis.' 'Yes, I do. I know you better than anyone. You know why?

You're predictable. Everything you do. It's so predictable. The only reason you're even saying this now is because you're jealous. And it's not even because of me. You don't care about who I'm with.

Ray said- You're just jealous that she took your spot, before now... I think you liked her better than me now... fuck no! You're the one baby- you're the one I want to feel and hold and fuck hard. His face looks worried. He glares at me and I glare back. 'Fine!' he yells be that way. 'I'm jealous! Are you happy now?' I do her instead- how about that, and then he jerks his head toward mine, and he kisses me. On the lips. His eyes are closed, mine are wide open. And then mine close too, and for a second, just for a second, I kiss him back. Then I break away. I push him off. We have a crazy love going on.

Victoriously he says, 'Did you predict that, for Karly?' My mouth opens and closes, but no words come out. I drop the broom and run up the stairs, as fast as I can. I run all the way to my room and lock my door behind me. Ray just kissed me. In my living room. My sister is coming back in a few weeks. And I have a fake boyfriend I just cheated on.

AFTER the THIRD PERIOD, Marcel IS waiting for me. He's wearing a skinny tie today with a V-neck and he has a full-size bag of cheese-it's in his hand. He stuffs a handful of Cheetos into his mouth, and orange dust floats onto his white and yellow bottom down. The corners of his mouth look slightly orange too. With his mouth full he says, 'Look, there's something I need to tell you.' I laugh. 'I can't believe I ever thought you were so refined,' I say, blowing cheez-it- its powder off his shirt.

'What do you need to tell me?' I ask. I steal a few Cheese-it's out of the bag. When he shall, I say, 'Lucas, I hate when people say that they have something to tell you and they don't just say it. It's like when people say they have a funny story- like, just hurry up and tell the story and I'll decide for myself if I think it's funny or not.' I lick' cheese off his lips. 'Well, you know I live in the same neighborhood as the city, right?' I nod. 'Last night I saw Olivia leaving her house, she was on her own today, Maddie and she fights over nothing like always.'

'Oh.' That's all I say. Marcel 'oh.' 'Typically, I wouldn't think it was that big of a deal, but there's one other thing.' Marcel wipes his mouth off with the back of his hand. 'Genevieve and her college guy broke up over the weekend. You know what that means, right?'

I'm nodding but I'm numb inside. 'Naturally, wait, what?' Marcel gives me a look that's half pitying, half impatient. 'She's going to try to get I back, on him!'

'Right,' I say, and I feel a pang even as I'm saying it. 'Of course- she will.' 'Don't let her,' he warns. 'I won't,' I say, and the words come out soft like jam, without any conviction at all. I didn't know it until now but I think maybe I've been counting down to this moment all along.

For an oak view to want hell. For I figure out this whole thing has been a zany little detour and now it's time for him to go back where he belongs. To the person, he belongs to passed and now it belongs to no one for I know.

I wasn't planning on telling Marcel a thing about Kellie kissing me Ray. I really wasn't. But then, as Ray and I are walking together in school again, I see him and Genevieve walking down the hallway. Ray gives me a meaningful look, which I pretend not to see. In chemistry class, I write both a note. Seeing which, one would go farthest and comeback with I want you baby or love you. You were right about Ray. Maddie said. I tap him on the back and slip the note in his hand. When he reads it, he sits up straight and immediately scribbles something back. Yet it was not what I wanted, I see Marcel in the hills, I walk up and he- He kissed me.

Maybe I write about him- and not the other one.

~*~

When Ray strengthens, I am ashamed to say that I feel a little bit vindicated.

I wait for him to write back, but he doesn't. As soon as the bell rings, he turns around and says, 'What the hell? How did that even happen?' 'He came over to help us trim the tree.' 'And then what? He kissed her in front of me, my sis?'

'Nope, not at all! It was just the two of us at the house.'

~*~

Marcel looks really irritated at this like never- ever before, and I'm starting to regret mentioning it. 'What the hell is he thinking, kissing my girlfriend? It's fucking silly. I'm going to say something to him.' 'Hold your shit, what? No!' 'I have to, Olivia. He can't just get away with it... can he?' I stand up and start packing up my bag. 'You'd better not say anything to him, Ray- I mean it.' Stop fooling around. Jay watches me like a ghost eyes going through me- feeling me from the inside and out, like a dick in a vagina feels the climaxing. And then he asks,

'Did you kiss him back?' 'What does it matter? If I did- or didn't?' He looks taken back. 'Are you madding at me for something?' 'No,' I say. 'But I will be if you say anything to Ray.' 'Fine,' he says with a deadpanning berth. 'Fine,' I say back.

#- Hashtag: (Who needs boys, or go with a girl it's easier)

part: 8

Hold out your Tongue...

I HAVEN'T SEEN Ray kissed me as Marcel does, but when I get home that night from studying at the library, I see the old book for the old one, I sit there and he rubs my leg and up parts of me in-between the girlie heart-shaped of non-shaved hairy-ness, and the poop-shoot. Why...? Why... did God put the snack bar so close to the bathroom, (he grabs at her goodies,

Ray said. ‘-Nice!’ The boy over yonder said- Nice! Looking like get some of that! He is sitting next to me a navy top, waiting for me to move to his hand. The bell rings out and I want to shout it out. (What a way to beat around the bush... I thought. He- he.)

~*~

The lights are on but you’re not there, your mind is not your own, going have to face it you addicted to love. In the house; my dad is home. Killie bedroom light is on doing the nasties like always now. God, even I am not that horned up...

Cut- aw-ah- her face made a look of something I can put into words- the door bangs as she runs and calls me a creeper! Moving on to my room, I think about doing what she is... ah, maybe not- IDK- yet, I may get on the cam and chat. Don’t know yet- maybe- maybe not. HI boy- HI! It's ME!!!! LOVES! DID YOU ALL MISS ME- MAH-KISS! The kiss was blown to all of the viewers with eyes on the screen and one hand on the mouse and the other you can guess for yourself. Now- I like this one- I singing out load for my baby boys now: I'm selling records...

What is it that you do? Sitting in your mama's basement with a shiatsu, Peanut butter on your dick, your right hand going click, while the dog is giving you a rim job! You’re nothing but a WANNA BE! I’d rather go on avoiding Ray, but here he is, at my house. ‘Hey,’ he says. ‘Can I talk to you?’ I sit down next to him and look straight ahead, across the street. Ms. McChild’s put her Christmas tree up too. She always puts it by the window near the door so people can see it from the outside. ‘We have to figure out what we’re going to do before Margot gets here. It was my responsibility for what happened. I should be the one to tell her.’ I stare at him in doubt. ‘Tell her? Are you nuts-o? We’re never telling Maggie because there’s nothing to tell, to her she is just out of the click of teen life.’

He puts his chin out. ‘I don’t want to keep a secret from her.’ ‘You should have thought of that before you kissed me!’ I hiss. ‘And for the record, if anybody was going to tell her, it would be me. I’m her sister. You were just her boyfriend. And you’re not even that to any further extent, so...’ Snow flashes across his face and it stays there. ‘I was never just Maggie’s true girlfriend... Do I ponder the thought, of why and how and who...?’

This is weird for me, too, you know. It’s like, ever since I got that letter...’ He shilly-shallies. ‘Forget it about it all I don’t get why boys forget it all, and everything, and whatnot.’

‘Just say it now that you can, say now!’ I say. ‘Ever from the time when I got that letter, things have been messed up amid us. It’s not fair. You got to say everything you wanted to say, and I’m the one who has to rearrange the way I think about you; I have to make sense of it in my head. You totally blindsided me, and then you just shut me out. close me up and out like always- that what boys do- get in and back out fast, and see you cry as they runoff.

You start dating Ray again, you stop being my friend.’ Said Olivia. (Oh you wanna get into his boxers too?)

In the Café- Marcel is hearing this- He exhales. I gonna- well- go- eat over her.

‘Endlessly since I got your letter, I haven’t been able to stop thinking about you.’ He said.

What a bunch of lines- crappie-ness!

Whatever I was expecting him to say, it wasn’t that. It definitely wasn’t that.

‘Ray.’

‘I know you don’t want to hear it, but just let me say what I need to say, okay?’ I nodded.

Part: 9

Say Ah!

And went the crying... coming on... or something like that. ‘I hate that you’re with him. I hate it like you now. Said Olivia. He’s not good enough for you. I’m a sorry baby girl it is right- what I said it’s not right to keep whoring around. When you have a good guy that- well I think is madly in love with you. Then but Maggie on top- like get it right- and fugue shit out. One is all you need to feel the love!

part: 10

Rhapsodize...

Say it, but he’s just not. In my opinion, no guy will ever be good enough for you. Least of all me.’ Ray drops his head, and then suddenly he looks up at me and says, ‘There was this one time, I guess it was a couple of summers ago. We were walking home from somebody's house, as well as I personally think it was Marcel.' It was hot, around dusk. I was mad because Marcel's older brother Markus had said he had given us a ride home that was not all it was said to be, the room needs a good cleaning and fresh sheets, yet we did it on them anyways- gross.

I was dissatisfied- I hope I am not pregnant. Let's get a sandwich, and then he went somewhere and didn't come back, to get my undies hanging on the door handle, so we had to walk back to Maddie's place. I was wearing hills and my feet were heartbroken like me feel oh so terrible. Ray kept telling me to keep up with him, and not be a pain in the ass baby, that he should dump, for sucking- and not fucking right. He said I won't even tight... Awh! I want Marcel right now! I need a hug, and a loving kiss, to make it feel alright- what did I do?

~*~

Vociferously he says, I call Marcel to get me as I fall way behind to get away from his mouth and many hard slaps in the face. There he was in his dad's-

2016 Stingray Corvette, why would I give that up too? He said- 'It was just me and you. he had on that light blue shirt I got him, and an under top I used to wear when sleeping over with him at night and need a night top to roll in or be seen in by his mom and dad, I would have all and everything off in his bed of cores, look at you your shown your belly button, and have your butting hanging out, can the top get and tighter?' Stop doing what he asked, he used you like Jenny.

Oh, how I loved that shirt. 'I almost kissed you that day since we been apart from your photo on my PC. I thought about it. You and I all the time now, it was this weird impulse I had. I just want to see what it would be like that again, yet put this on. And- well run!'

My heart stops. 'And then?' The heart-shaped ring looked like hers, 'And then I don't know. I guess- I forgot about it- us.' Did you forget? I let out a sigh.

'I'm sorry you got that letter. You were never supposed to see that. It wasn't meant for you to ever read. It was just for me, to say it was you to do and show.' I loved you long before he even thought about it- okay stop fucking up- I love you!

‘Maybe it was fate. Perhaps this was all supposed to materialize just like this, for the reason that it was always going to be you and me.’ I say the first thing that comes to mind. ‘Nope, it wasn’t.’ And I comprehend it’s correct. This is the moment I realize I don’t love him, which I haven’t for a while. That maybe I never did. For the reason that he’s right there for the pleasing: I could kiss him again; I could make him mine. But I don’t want him. I want someone else. It feels strange to have spent so much time wishing for something, for someone, and then one day, suddenly, to just stop.

It all stops fast- and I look back and see all the mistakes. I run my fingers inside my jacket sleeves. ‘You can’t tell Maggie about this all. You have to promise me, Marcel.’ I said I lift her for you only. Reluctantly he nods.

And the day ends with us making up, and talking it up.

‘Has Maggie been in touch with you recently?’ I ask him.

‘Yeah. She called the other night. She said she wants to hang out while she’s home. She wants to go to DC for the day. Go to the Smithsonian, get dinner in Chinatown.’ ‘Great. Then that’s what you’ll do.’ I pat him on the knee and then quickly take my hand back. ‘Josh, we just have to act like before. Like always. If we do that, everything will be fine.’ I repeat it to myself in my head. Everything will be fine. We’ll all go back to our proper places now. Maddie and the one we did want in our groups yet had to babysit Maggie.

part: 11

After School, Special...

AFTER SCHOOL LETS OUT THE next day, I go look for Marcel in the weight room. He’s sitting on the bench press. I think it’s better to talk here and not in his car. I’m going to miss riding around in his car. It was starting to feel like home. I’m going to miss being somebody’s pretends girlfriend. Not just somebody’s- James. I’ve gotten to really like Danny and Gabbie and the other Lexie all the kids at the other table next to us. They aren’t as douchey as people say.

They’re good people...

The weight room is empty except for like Danny. He's at the bench press, lifting weights. When he sees me, he smiles? 'Are you here to spot me?' He sits up and wipes the sweat off his face with the collar of his T-shirt.

My heart squeezes painfully. 'I'm here to break up. To fake break up, I mean.' Dan does a double-take at me want it and all. 'Wait. What?' 'There's no need to keep it going. You got what you wanted, right?

(A week before Jenny passes)

Jenny- You saved face, and so did I. I talked to Marcel, and everything's back to normal with us again. And her sister will be home soon.

So, I don't know if I get it and over beforehand, So, my mission is accomplished I will see you tonight then-, won't I? Or else.' He slowly he nods. 'Yeah, I guess if that how it has to be.'

Karly- My heart is breaking even as I smile. 'So okay, then.' With a flourish, I whip our contract out of my bag, like my compact. 'Worthless and void. Both parties have hereby fulfilled their responsibilities to each other in endlessness.' I'm just rattling off lawyer words.

I am not going to cheat on her... you know that.

'You carry that around with you?'

'Of course! Killie's such a snob and creeper. She'd find it in two seconds.'

I hold up the piece of paper, poised to rip it in half, but Marcel grabs it from me.

'Wait!

What about the ski trip?'

'What about it?'

'You're still coming, right?'

Marcel- Jenny only made him envious of me.

Karly- I hadn't thought of that. The only reason I was going to go was for Marcel. I can't go now. I can't be a witness to Dan and Jenna's reunion, I just can't. I want them to come back from the trip mysteriously together again, and it will be like this whole thing was just something I dreamed up.

'I'm not going to go.' Can he call her Jenna...? That's cool, I would and my tongue would be up to my ass. Yet that boy she will do anything for and look over all the shit she hates about everything- and anything.

His eyes widen...

'Come on, her chest and lower! It's what guy just do, we know your eyes are up there yet it's a guy thing we just do, blame the monkey theory I don't buy into if you want to be a hairy ape that's on you! Ape- transited is harry woman- nice right? Yet- you can pound this shit to me into me in class, yet I cannot say a prayer- well fuck you!

Don't bail on me now like last night. We already signed up and gave the deposits and everything. Let's just go, and have that be our final hurrah.' When I start to protest, Dan shakes his head. 'You're going, so take this contract back.' Dan and carefully puts it back in my bag. Why? Why is it so hard to say NO to him? Is this what it's like to be in love with somebody?

Marcel, Karly, Maddie, Killie, Olivia, Maggie, and Shy- we all say that... Jenny would fuck anybody!

True? Yep! -Slut!

Morning rays-

'Today is beautiful us ♡☺'

The sun comes up and it's off to the rink, for practice.

(About week later)

I finally got to do something for me and did my ice-skating tournament. Yes, I am a twirling girl! I have a short start in white, and everything. Marcel is going to be on the stand all he can do is fall on his ass on the ice. I GET THE IDEA DURING the morning announcements when they announce that our school's hosting this event, and not that Jenny is gone I can do what I want and no one is going to stop me from this one is for me. I'll do me now!!! It's at Penn State University the event this weekend.

Be there!

Cheer me on!

The show, I get everything right on, churching it! I did a dibble lux and also a triple seal cow, and the fast spin with my head back and leg up at the end. To Titanium piano argument I sing the cover! I wonder I am the only one that can really do this at my schools, I am really good. It just like lying there taking it to me at this point it's all in my head. Before any of the guys sit down, I get a perfect score, and first.

I was the happiest girl in the world- even mom said a good job! Dad will you can get it! I beat out all the girls in my class!

Part: 12

Ice and Heat

Jenny asking- 'Do you know if Marcel still does love me?' He gives me a funny look when I walk by, I wonder why. 'How should I know, said the girls?' 'I don't know- why I can ask, can't I? I was just wondering, JEEZ.' 'Why?'

'I think maybe I'm going to go to the mail tonight, do you want to come?

This weekend is going to be the shit! I have a feeling that he'll be there if I go to the food court'

Karly- 'For real's?' - 'Back off!' - 'If he is, what are you going to do with him?' - 'Or the better question is what are you going to do to him?'

Jenny- I haven't figured that part out yet. Maybe I'll go up to him and hug, kiss and feel his junk, maybe I won't. I just want to see how he turned out. We can look him up online right now and I'll show you he got my name there not yours. Karly- Hacker! - Sucker - Slut!

Maddie and Olivia- we both shake our heads, and look politely away from the boy drama, ha- that's why we were gay!

Karly- No! He would be cheating on me bitch! You bitch!

Maddie- Stengel the little weasel!

Olivia- Chock out the fucker! And no not that way either you both do that enough! I want to see him with my own eyes and open.

Maddie- I want to be surprised. By- well everything.

‘Well, don’t bother asking me to go and keep you then, or to take you places anymore, if I can have it my way, you won’t have me. I’m not going to waste awhile Saturday and Sunday crying over you I got plans too. You’ll see when I get back what’s going down.

Jenny- Okay, don’t do something you regret me.

Karly- Suck it!

Coming to you-

Chapter: 131

Preparation...

(Up to the day)

Karly asking Marcel- ‘I wasn’t planning on asking you to go.’

I throw him a hinting look. Why not?’ - ‘What- now?

‘It’s just something... I want to do for us.’ - ‘So-o we can stay us, and no one can break us.’

Marcel- Let’s go after this... (Bell)

He let out a low whistle, as we were running for the door. ‘Huh?’ I need my handbag, and I have a change for when we get there.

Marcel- Let’s move there are eyes on us!

Chapter: 132

Phase...

Karly's thought- 'My daily objective is less about goal achievement and more about regret management.' #- Hashtag: (Aim Low)

Lunch- where are Marcel and Karly? The girls asked.

Jenny- I don't care about her...

Jenny- We aren't even broken up yet!

Maddie- Besides you're already trying to talk to other guys. Like why do you care?

Jenny- Why? Why do you care?

Olive- doesn't that sound stupid to you now.

Maddie- Yes, yes it does! - 'Dumb fucking- fools look what you could have had!'

Olivia thought- I would be hurt if I wasn't impressed. That was deep! And I get it, don't be so dumb and not see what you could have had. And what your end by being you, and that is selfish, condescending, and thoughtless. I would say- 'I get that' - a-load.

Maddie- This makes me smile.

The drama is never- ever over here a big- clit!

Chapter: 133

Clear and Blue...

(Confession)

Lily Anderson- In seventh grade, I kissed at a party. It wasn't a romantic kiss. It was barely anything kisses... We were playing spin the bottle, and when it was his turn, I held my breath and prayed the bottle would land on me. And it did! Long and slow- It almost landed on Nevaeh. I think luck was on my side that day, and she was mine and I got everything I hoped for.

I tried to keep my face very still and whole-hearted so I wouldn't smile, and bump teeth yet I felt her boobs and vagina my hand went down her pants, I found out she was not wearing an underwire. And a sports bra, she and I crawled into the center and we did this very quick yet everyone looked at the magic moment we have with more than just a peck on the cheeks and lips even if that what happened also, and everybody groaned, and her face was red.

And I was wet, and so was she, I was not disappointed, that night we did things that you would love to hear about; like- Eating her out, and using my Twisted Love Glass one blue and clear, on her and she did it back, as I had the small end in my other whole, that must girl call an exit only, I say no if it feels go to you. Yet is all in what you like, I did it on her and she was in love with me and that too. She came to me too, on my open lips! I was rubbing in- between her hips, with my hands fast and then slow, until it would ago. We have nude-ie photos too... see our polaroids! I would drink it down, I got her to also... and it was so cute to me.

She is so cute to me!

Chapter: 134

Stargaze...

Hey U.

Maggie- me back in the old- old days... my quote: 'You get bored you eat, you get lonely you ate, that was my old life- eating out everything I could get my hands on, to stop the pain of not having.'

Lily Anderson- I think maybe I would expect something more than just a kiss with more weight to it. But that was it. Maybe I will get a second chance. To do it all over I would not change a thing, yet I think you know that already.

I have had my love... what more can I say now it's time for me to fly away.

Karly- Maybe it'll make me forget about you, all of them together, and never- ever come back!

~*~

Angelina Penelope- I have dated Marcel and also Karly. AS I WALK INTO SCHOOL on Monday morning, I don't see either, I go over what I'm going to say.

Maybe if I ask around some... I will find out. Hey, Quela- Anna, how are you?

Have you seen so and so? Like them, I see a lot of faces in the halls as I walk past.

Hi- Emma, hey she said.

Hi- Harper, what's up she said?

Hello- Ava, high five Yo- Madison a wink and a thumbs up.

Hey-a- Noah, he smacks my ass, as I pass.

Isabella- gives me that drop-dead look! Rolling her eyes like fuck you in the ass hole!
Or the other one you pick!

Bonjour- Benienie, hey!

Aiden- he looks and walks by shyly; I think he likes me- weird!

Jackson- cute but not my type, or Karly's either. Hey maybe gay, by the way, he where his hair and the clothes that he has on is so not now.

Liam- is Liam- see for yourself, don't let me inferences you.

Scarlett- Ha- she a slut! Funny right.

Charlotte- dropped her book, thanks to Tom.

Stella- the fat girl- drinking at the water- fountain, slurping it up, ow-ha! (Those things are gross, the gay PE teacher said to wash are pitt's using those, I say no think you!)

Violet- is doing just that now!

Elsa- is running to take a piss!

Hudson- slamming a locker door.

Ezra- is getting shoved into one.

Declan- looks at me like he wants to fuck on the floor.

Acedia and James- well there just about doing that now!

It's Tom, Lara, and they said no to seeing my two weirdo friends and Exes. I haven't seen him since the eighth grade.

Chapter: 135

Daybreak...

Angelina- What if he doesn't recognize me, I look at Ray? What if he doesn't even remember me? Yet he is sucking on her face now and its really pissing me off. I scan the sandwich boards in the lobby and I find his name under All-purpose Assembly. For the upcoming prom, I bet Karly and Marcel well go together! I am not sure... but I think he has already asked her. It was all over her face, when they kissed at her locker, the day before.

The General Assembly is meeting in the auditorium. Look and you can see there are desks set up for each, they and you can do to be part of... it's so cheesy and sits girl back many years, but hell that's the point right. Next, they say get naked and have a pillow fight!!! Te- he! We delegate, and onstage there is a podium where a girl in a black suit is making a speech, on why we should not get some after, yet that the point there too. That way the girl doesn't wear underwire underneath and that if you have to piss you can drop and go! Got it? - Good.

See you at prom!

~*~

(Freshmen year)

Karly- I'm thinking I'll just slip in the back, and sit and watch but there's nowhere to sit, so I just stand at the back of the room with my arms crossed and look for Marcel. There are so many people here, and everybody's facing the front, so it's hard to tell what's what.

I was at the middle school said for some event over there and a kid in a flotilla suit turns around and looks at me and whispers, 'Are you, Karly?' He's holding up a folded piece of paper. 'Um- oh- okay.' I'm not sure what a page is, and then I see a girl hustling around the room delivering notes to people.

The boy thrusts the piece of paper at me and turns back around and scribbles in his notebook. The note is addressed to me saying, I need to take him to his bus. I see all the snotty-nosed rug- rats at their tables sitting in alphabetical order, so I just start wandering around trying to find this other girl that I have to button her pants and shit. I have to do all the volunteer work or get kicked out, for no good reason. Other people are raising their hands, calling out names I just want to bell- runaway to the bathroom and smoke or doing something other than this shit! Before long I'm hustling too. And hunted by the voices inside me like before. From behind I see a boy's hand raised for me to pick up his note, so I hurry forward, and then he turns his head just slightly.

In addition to that- oh my freaking God- he shit- his undies, and now it's my job to clean that shit, I think not! I run my ass out of the home economics room so fast your head would spin. A few feet away from me, was the band room and I get to run and sat in there playing a random ass trumpet and nobody even noticed. I could shave a sick up to my pussy and I don't think anyone one blink or think about anything really. I don't cut as much as I did- yet this one- I just had too. Maybe I should do that...? I can blow hard!

Do I really want kids?

I love them only if they were mine...

What do you say to that?

~*~

Tom- has sandy hair, clean-cut. His cheeks are rosy, just the way I remember. They still have that fresh-scrubbed wholesomeness that makes him look young. He's wearing denim and light green and pink button-down with a white T-shirt underneath. He looks thoughtful, engrossed like he's a real delegate and this isn't pretending. Honestly, he looks just the way I imagined he would know that he what I would call all grow up to look.

I am holding the piece of paper, one being a love note passed around, out for me as he takes notes with his head down, he is shy and it said I hart you on it. I reached for it; my fingers close around the paper, and then he looks up and does a double-take.

'Hi,' I whisper, flirtingly.

Maggie is the one that passed it- We're both still holding on to the note. And she gives me a shy eye also! I think she likes me more than he does.

‘Hi,’ she says back. She blinks, and then he lets go of the paper, and I hurry away with my eyes the teacher doesn’t bitch, my heart pounding in my ears. From both she and he, I hear him call out my name in a loud whisper, and then her, I don’t get how I got so popper after the party last week, I just got laid that all. But I don’t slow down. No time to think... I look down at the paper and see more than one boy’s number and where to hook up. His handwriting is neat, precise. I go deliver his note back saying- yes.

All my afternoon and night were going to change from that day on.

~*~

Olivia’s little sister moves back from her dad’s place, and is now going to are a school, instead of where she was: Olivia- age- eleven- taller and smart, blond, and careless for now. All lags and long arms. Big hands too! I just saw Ray. After all these years of fucking on an off, I finally saw him my Ex and I don’t really want to I know I end up doing bad things. And he knew me, I am easy, for him. Right away he knew who I was, and was all over me. you know all over me. I get a text from him around lunchtime. I have been moving back and forth between homes and the school ever since I was little, they can’t get their shit together.

Walkout into the hall, I see a boy pass- I kind of remember everything somewhat.

Did you see Ray?

‘No-how that fuck- are you and- why do you even ask, dumb little shit!’

Okay...? Thanks...

I type back yes, but then I delete it before I hit send. Why do I do this to myself, I need back in... I write back instead, all over and say- to me. I’m not sure why I did yet I get why I wouldn’t. I think maybe, I just want to keep it for myself and be happy just knowing that he remembered me, for me and not the fast- fucking sex, where I get bent and pounded, and have that be enough. Or my doing all the work on- top!!!

~*~

WE ALL GO TO Marcel and he picks up Maggie from the airport. The day she moved here, and Kellie made a sign that says Welcome Home sing, we did know at this time that she would be classed as uncool or swagger-less. I keep my eyes peeled for her, and when she comes out, and I am ready to hug, I almost don't recognize her for a second - her hair is short! It's cut in a bob! When Margot sees us, she waves and she runs to my arms and I kiss her cheek, and Kellie drops her sign and runs toward her also. Then we're all hugging and Daddy has tears in his eyes, for she is all grown up for when he saw her last, she was in Pampers. 'What do you think?' Maggie says to me, good to see you love your hair now. I have not talked to you more than on the video chat.

It was an awesome day!

The day that I fall to her!

~*~

'It makes you look older,' I lie, and Maggie beams a glow at me. If anything, it makes her look younger, but I knew she wouldn't want to hear that. On the way home, she makes Daddy pull over at Clouds for a cheeseburger, even though she says she isn't hungry. 'I've missed this so many senses then,' she says, but she only has a few bites and Karly has the rest.

I'm excited to show Maggie all the cookies we made, but when I take her into the dining room and show her all the tins, she frowns. 'You guys did this for me you're the best.' I feel a little bit guilty, but I honestly didn't think Maggie would mind. I mean, she was in Ohio, doing way more fun stuff than baking cookies, and being in the city.

We saved half the dough in the freezer, though, so you can still help us bake the rest for the neighbors.' I open the big blue tin so she can see the cookies layered, and we kind of had to. The school ends tomorrow. If we'd waited for you, we wouldn't have had time. All- lined up in rows. I'm proud of how they are the same size and height. 'We did some new cookies this year. Try an orange creamily; it's really good.' Maggie picks through the box and scowls. 'You didn't do molasses cookies?' 'Not this year... We decided to do orange creamily cookies in their place.' She picks one up and I watch her bite into it. 'Good, right?'

She nods...

So- do I- 'Mm-hum.'

'Those were Kellie's pick.'

And also- mine...

Maggie- glances toward the living room, TV?

Sure...? We say... Maggie- Movie?

‘Okay!’ We say...

‘When did you guys do all this for me?’

‘Killie couldn’t wait,’ I say, and it sounds like an excuse, but it’s true. I try not to sound self-justifying as I add, ‘I think it’ll be nice to enjoy the tree for as long as we can.’ ‘So, when did you put it up?’ Unhurriedly I say, ‘A couple of weeks ago...’ Why? Why- is she in such a bad mood now? ‘That’s so long ago.

It’ll probably be dried out a little in the memories of the past.’

~*~

Maggie walks over to me and she, the moves are playing under the blanket we are that is the first time I feel that way about her. I see that my sis wants to be- in-between and somehow this feels like a fight, and we never fight. But then Maggie yawns and says, ‘I’m really sleepy. I think I’m going to take a nap.’ Aah- and I said come to my bed and I will join you! ‘Okay!’

When someone’s been gone a long time, at first you save up all the things you want to tell them. Yet here in the bed I had nothing to say it wall a coming out in the touching and feeling. You try to keep track of everything in your head, yet I forget everything, even what I have for breakfast.

Nonetheless, it’s like trying to hold on to a fistful of sand: all the little bits slip out of your hands, and then you’re just clutching air and grit. That’s why you can’t save it all up like that. Because by the time you finally see each other, you’re catching up only on the big things, for the reason that it’s too much bother to tell about the little things. I want to get all said- yet I don’t really know how to as of now. But then again, the little things are what make-up’s life. Like a month ago when Daddy slipped on a banana peel, a literal banana peel that Kitty had dropped on the kitchen floor. Killie and I laughed forever and never- ever wanted to stop.

~*~

I should have e-mailed Jenny about it right away; I should have taken a picture of the banana peel. Now everything feels like you had to be there and oh never mind, I guess it's not that funny.

'If you with her you can be seen with me- she said back.' 'Why?' I simply asked.

Jenny- 'Don't ask I don't shit'n have to give you away!'

Maggie- read it- and said maybe I should go back?

I said hell no- well be friends regardless of what she says.

You'll be my dirty secret.

Okay... she was crying.

Chapter: 136

Spell...

Karly- Marcel, your such an ass!

Marcel- That's right I am your ass- hole!!!

Is this how people lose touch? And feel when they get back in touch? I didn't think that could happen with sisters- like friends of the past. Maybe with other people, but never us. Before Maggie left, I knew what she was thinking without having to ask; I knew everything about her, it has not changed, on the way Jenny feel, friends- Not anymore forbidden. I don't know what the view looks like outside her window, but I went up to it anyways and saw the city, she still wakes up early every morning to have a real breakfast, or if maybe now that she's at the high school she likes to go out late and sleep in late.

~*~

(I am a girl... just a girl... so- out of the group.)

Saniya- All I know is she likes her classes, from what I can see, I am in this with her, she not liking all the teachers' ways and how dumbled down all the crap is to do, and she's been made to do this, like us all, so basically, I know nothing.

Pammie- I think sometimes though, there is usually a helper in the class, because all the people in the class who can do the work but don't want to, they take all the teacher's time, so they can't help other people who actually need it.

(Half a year)

Maggie- Here is what I say: I feel worthless... I had to write a mission statement the other day in the study hall, special education room and this gal have to come in and help me, and I have to think about what to write. As well as I feel like she is staring at me all the time, this girl that is really far gone I not like this... I get my shit done in the end; I don't need your help!

In addition to I have to give me some ideas as if I could not think for myself and said because this assignment was on values do you want to be a selfish person or unselfish person and I took a moment because some people have called me selfish before, and before... a few seconds she is selfish is thinking only about yourself and unselfish means thinking about others first, and it's like duh-hhh, you think I'm that retarded. They don't teach me anything I just sit and do nothing all day and think what I am missing out on. It's hell...!

I personally, just feel really depressed like special- Ed has ruined my life. and then during my IEP meeting the IEP director was like well what do you want to go to college for, and I was like pre-medicine or being an Rn if I have to and she was saying like you know we all have dreams but some are just not going to be possible and look at other possible majors and what are you good at. It needs to end, put me with the others so I can have a life, now and someday. Hey, I know exactly how you feel, I've been through the exact same situation.

Special Ed teachers sitting beside me all the time and taking me to another room to do the work, even though I was perfectly fine doing it on my own. It's very embarrassing and humiliating. I always felt that I would learn better doing it myself, and learn to cope on my own, but none of them understood. I also felt different from other kids, like I was from another planet or something. But anyway, in one of my Special Ed English classes.

My English teacher noticed that I was capable of achieving better work and being the normal classes- yet they won't let me go into them, so she rang up my parents to ask them if it was okay never- ever getting out, and then I eventually, I will never get moved into the normal classes. I see the light of day for one hour!

And it backs it to the small little dumb ass room.

Maggie's- mother- So really, I just work as hard and tell them that you feel a little embarrassed being taken out of classrooms and stuff, I'm sure they would understand. Tell them that you want to learn on your own and whenever you do need a bit of help, just ask someone.

Karly- don't give up! Is there any way you or your parents could suggest a move into a general education classroom for more parts of the day? Or could it be determined that you don't actually need that aide coming in to help you?

It must be hard if she's rushing and giving you suggestions when you're just trying to think. And about college - keep pushing for what you want! Plenty of colleges have supported for all types of learners, and if you need a little extra help, you'll always be able to find it.

Even so, chances are if you're motivated by pre-med, you'll do fine in the classes; because you actually want to learn about it. So, let your other teachers, parents; and anyone else know that you really want to do pre-med... they can't push you into something you don't want to do!

Maggie- You don't get it unless you go through it- and live it!

'Once you're out of school you can be anything- I hear it all the time I nothing no, how the fuck- will I be anything, when I get out? And have nothing to fall back on.'

Karly's Mom- That's rubbish don't listen to them you can be whatever you want to be in life. Don't let these people make you feel inferior, perhaps you will have to do a year extra but you can follow your dream. I had to attend a special education math's lesson, it was awful I felt like a fool as the weekly tests where 'there are 5 balls in this circle color 3 of the balls green and 2 balls red' I understand how you feel and no you are not stupid at all.

'I get that you like playing with balls- I can do this shit!'

Don't let the education you are getting destroy your dreams you can be everything you want to be, I am proof of that, it did take me a lot longer to get here but I'm glad I did not listen to the people who told me 'there is no chance on god's green earth that you can ever do that!'

What a girl named Anna said to me, she thinks she is smart- Welcome to the world thinking just because you are different you must be mentally retarded. I get this all the time. Not that there is anything shameful about being mentally retarded...not at all. But then again it is frustrating to be 'dumbed down,' no matter what your IQ is, to begin with. Know this... your life is not ruined. We all get challenges, every one of us. As for this person telling you to forget about medicine or nursing... blow her off and go for it. If someone tells you something like this again, say, I believe it is my right to try, yes? And so, does she... there are big things, I haven't told her- how my letters got sent out.

Jessie- I hate being in Special- Ed classes!

I'm enjoying High School so far but, my English and Global History class are both Special Ed. I find some of the kids to be really stupid in the classes, and feel like I shouldn't be in there. My average in English has been 91, 92, 88, and 95 so far. My average in global has been an 89 this entire year.

I want to get switched out of these classes and be with normal kids, but my parents and teachers don't seem to believe that I am capable enough. Also, it's not considered cool to be seen in Special Ed classes. It is also very embarrassing to be seen in Special Ed classes when my friends are in regular classes. Does anyone know any way I could convince my parents, or teachers to get me out of these classes? Btw- (by the way) I'm not insecure, I'm just really losing my patience with my school. I just don't feel like I there, I all locked up in a room with no one to be a friend on the outside, or in here.

Normal boy- Bob- Getting an A in a special education class isn't at all the same as getting an in a regular non-special education class. (Is that say then why to be here, I ask?) Why? Why- can I be like you I can out-do you mother-fucker? You need to learn to write also and keep your mouth shut.)

If you don't understand classwork in those classes, the teacher can provide some help, (B- FUCKING -S, all they do is make you feel dumb and inferior for being you, no help is there, don't you get that, show me what they do? For I can see it!) Nevertheless, has to move on to teach the rest of the class- who DOES get the material. They can't stay with you until you exactly understand something in your own way. (This is what you get with these kids, yet they can't even put a coma in there texting. And their grammars are- less than that of first graders.)

Karly- You need to figure out why the authorities think you are crazy. Once you know that you can act like you're not. Maybe earn a better grade and such. Maggie- I am just a puppet on a string.

BS! THIS IS WHAT I GET! BS! 'People who are actually your friends won't ever care what classes you are taking. It would be much more uncool to get held back in high school (which regular Ed can do) while all your friends did graduate and leave you still in high school having to keep attempting classes.'

You're NOT GOING TO HAVE SHIT OR A LIFE, like who is going to hire you in your town, know you're the fucked up sped kid, retarded, dumb or not worth living life, how do you get a job when you're hated? And how do you get schooling when you had none to build upon when you drop up for getting harassed.

You don't make money with a job... you can do anything; how do you get that...?

Answer that fucker! When you took it away from me... and yes it was you not me- I not the bad girl!!!

Spell this- F! U! C! K! Y! O! U! (Both fingers up) what does that say! I can read it, can you?

~*~

Ryan- 'I am male and 16 and I find them very patronizing and treat me as if I was Retarded. I think that it is humiliating. (SORRY - It depends on the teacher. There are some really good ones out there and unfortunately, like life, there are some that are sour.) One of the things that I hate is being pulled out of class to do something that I am quite capable of doing on my own. I was wondering if there is a way that I can prove them wrong so that I can be like everyone else (are you demonstrating that you can do it? If they are not seeing it then they may be pulling you out to work on the skills... when my students demonstrate the skills, I am not pulling them from other classes. You may also want to express your concern... If I have to be pulled can you do it _____ time?')

'Maybe if you would just keep us in the mainstream class, we learn something... think about that on, before you say we can get anything right or learn.'

I was wondering how to get off my IEP. I think that it is embarrassing to be ridiculed for being in special Ed and everyone standing up for you like a retard and trying to defend you. I did not know I was in Special Ed because I thought Special Ed was the all-day class. No! NO- it is not all day. It can be for almost any type of issue. To get off the IEP you need to test out or your parent- guardian has to come in and sign out. However, before I recommend it to anyone, I would look at academic success- yes, the dreaded grades- behaviors, and participation in class. If you are getting 'Ridiculed' let your teacher or admin know.

You have the right to a safe and secure environment. Some people may argue that is a form of bullying. You can always take the approach you are working in smaller groups... so-on, I wish that I can cure my disability and be normal but no Technology is not that advanced enough. I hate having an aid it is embarrassing to me I don't want to be retarded. I also have this relay mean like head special Ed teacher which I kind of hate.

I would like to know how can I be normal, and get out of special- Ed for the reason that I am missing out on some fun other classes for normal people too. I have also ridden on the short bus which was humiliating- as well- I have an Autism spectrum disorder and mental retardation may be to better understand... you should find out the disability classification and research it. They are wanting to help you find coping skills and development skills. Technology may be the thing to help compensate for the deficits that may be visual to society.

Teacher: Just drop out, or deal with it!

I say: 'FUCK YOU! DIE!'

Teacher- I'm surprised your district doesn't allow you to have a say at your IEP annual meeting. I would speak to your parents and teachers so they could get some insight on your opinions for your goals for the year. Stand up for yourself if you feel that strongly about it. It won't get done if you don't say anything.

I say: 'KISS MY ASS!'

Plus- saying, you should die doesn't mean I need help with my emotions, you sick twisted fuck!

~*~

They say- If you are in the US, your parents need to agree with you. They would need to call a new IEP meeting and request changes. You may be able to get moved into some regular classes like history, art, gym and be in some special Ed classes like English and Math.

(Not if you are railroaded into it- sing or you're going to a dumb ass school or dropping out, and tapping yourself on the head the rest of your days. Nut they class you!)

What the kids think all of them- 'If you're in special Ed you probably need to be there!'

I say fuck you, you don't get it, and you would never- ever- ever- ever, last a day as me!

You would kill yourself, that's not a bad idea for you and your mouth, you do that for saying shit like that! That is what you think about me... right?

UM-hum!

Chapter: 137

Whereas...

Karly- Yes Marcel makes me orgasm over and over, you would love to feel and see what he can do to me. I was feeling how that was all belling up in my G-spot and coming out hard thick and watery. I get the milky type coming out of me with my clit being jacked about by his hands or mine, white- sh when it's going in and out, and clear when I squirt hitting the right spot. Don't stop- don't stop we did it for three hours not stopping just coming. Until I can take another.

Maggie- That's what I thought...

The truth about me is starting to show if I like it or not. The truth about me... or so you think. Do you like me now?

Or would you hate me now?

Would you turn your back on me if you saw me?

I know you would all do!

Do you get that?

Do you...?

Don't be heartless, yet some of you will giggle and say yeah, she gets what she deserves, I don't deserve this... I- we don't.

~*~

Are you just as FUCKED as me? I don't think so, normal kids... I don't think so, and getting fucked in the ass, here is not what I am saying, just so you can comprehend that one.

Karly- I wonder if Maggie feels it too. The distance between us. If she even notices. Daddy makes spaghetti Bolognese for dinner. Kitty has hers with a big pickle and a glass of milk, which sounds terrible, but then I take a bite, and actually, pickle and spaghetti taste good together, milk, too. Maggie is about to crack I see it all over her face, as she sits next to me. Kellie's dumping more noodles on her plate when she says, 'Liv, Jean, what are you going to get Ray for Christmas?'

I glance at Maggie, who is looking at me. 'I don't know. I hadn't thought about it.'
'Can I go with you to pick stuff it out?'

Um- not if the girls go...

Um-

Karly- 'Sure, if I get him something, more, I can do it to times.'

Maggie- 'You have to get him something; he's your boyfriend.'

Karly- 'He not my boyfriend... he just a friend that is a boy that I do things with.'

Maggie- 'I still can't believe you're dating Marcel.'

I- NO!

Karly- They do not say it in a nice way, they think- like it's a good thing.

'Can you just... not?' I say anything at all.

Karly- Ummm- when a girl says stop when she just had fourteen orgasm's stop means give me on more until my legs shake my hip thrusts upwards, and my body covers- with your hands, jerking back and forth fastly, it's just that right movement, girls get it. OH- away! And a girl can teach a guy how to do this, and like it builds and heightens then it's one after another orgasming drizzling all over me, and its warm and feels good, as it drips down my vagina into my butt cracks- it- it runs in its sticky-ness. Aww-ahh-aaa! (Do you see this?)

My ass just vibrated, someone just followed me on Instagram. Don't really know them yet that all right, they love me and I get that. I don't always back yet that what a popular girl does.

~*~

Maggie- 'I'm sorry, I just don't like the guys and girls that take shit about me.'

Madilyn- I pass the field, and I see the band at practices, and they are playing 'We Are Young!'

(One week before the crash)

'Well, you don't have to like him. I do,' I say, and Marcel shrugs. I think you should be with me and not him.

I asked- Why?

Why? If you don't get then never- mind- go!

~*~

Chapter: 138

Break...

(The first week of me dating a girl)

Karly- Daddy stands up and claps his hands together. 'We have three different kinds of ice- cream for dessert! Pralines and cream, Chunky Monkey, and strawberry. All your favorites, I said to her, you remembered- she said. We were at this little train station that is converted into an ice- cream stand. Sitting out under the lights, late on a school night.

Maggie looks out the window of the taxi, toward the house. 'Josh wants to see me later. I hope he finally gets that we're broken up and he doesn't try to come over every day while I'm home. He needs to move on.' What a mean thing to say.

She's the one who's been calling Josh, not the other way around. 'He hasn't been yearning for you if that's what you're imagining,'

I say. 'He gets that it's over it and me too.'

Maggie stares at me in surprise, like this was some shocker. 'Well, I hope that's true.' 'I THINK WE SHOULD do recital party this year,' Maggie says from her spot on the couch.

(Christmas 0-12)

Maggie- People would drift in and out of the piano room and sing along, and Maggie and I would take turns playing. When my mom was alive, every Christmas we'd have what she called a recital party. She'd make tons of food and invite people over one night in December, and Margot and I would wear like dresses and play Christmas Carols on the piano all night long. I hated real piano recitals for the reason that I was the worst in my age group and Maggie was the best.

Kellie- It was humiliating to have to play some easy 'Für Elise, and reindeer' while the other kids had already moved on, I was banging the piano. I always hated recital party where you can drink or drug it up, old fart shit. I used to beg and beg not to have to play. (Now I miss those days.)

The last Christmas, Mommy bought us matching red velvet dresses to wear, and I threw a fit and said I didn't want to wear it, even though I did, even though I loved it. I just didn't want to have to play the piano in it next to Margot. I screamed at her and I ran to my room and smashed the door and I wouldn't come out. Mommy came up and tried to get me to open the door, but I wouldn't, and she didn't come back.

People started homeward bound, and Maggie started playing the piano, and I stayed upstairs. I sat in my apartment room, lousy and philosophy about all the dips and little canapés Mommy and Daddy had made, and how there would be none left for me, and how Mommy probably didn't even want me down there anyway after the way I would behave.

Maggie- After Mommy died, we never had another recital party.

Kellie- 'Are you serious?' I asked her.

Karly- 'Why not?'

Maggie shrugs her shoulders to the side- then up and down, rolling from one side to the other side. 'It'll be fun. I'll plan it all, you won't have to do anything.'

Karly- 'You know I hate the piano.' Stay with me is something I have been working on hears this and be nice.

'Then I play the whole thing.'

Kellie looking at me like- what the shit- was that?

Maggie's worried eyes looked at me for she knew how it was for. Biting her lip, she offers, 'I'll do, before I left her for him again. 'Moves time? - Lost in New York?'

Alone at home, funny!

I like it when he gets fired, like in 101 when his balls do.

Maggie reaches out and cuddles me with her hug and hands, and says, 'that's a great idea. I'll play the piano and you'll do tea or coffee- no can do, Olivia, and I will just- be a' 'Watching,' I finish, Jen won't be here if Maggie is.

Going out with the girls... nice fancy place and crap!

'I was going to say entertainer, but suit yourself.'

I don't answer her, she was not worth it to me nob, ass bitch!

We eat.

We dace-

Maddie farts... and yah-

You get it.

I pass it out my mouth nonetheless, loudly.

That's the point to make a sense.

Karly- I remember the start of my freshmen year with Maggie after the day of her coming back to me, she and I both got our clits piercing matching on our first date. (Do you wanna see? She unbuttons her jeans and pulls down the undies gummies- band at the top with her thumb exposing her jewelry going through her clitoris.) we were around fourteen at the time... fake ID's and having an older girl to get you into the tattoo shop. The guy doing was more than happy to pier our fourteen-year-old clits. Look at that face! (I wonder what went through Marcel mind the first time he saw that?)

It was not long 'till I feel and saw what he thought!

Yah you know it thinks about that going back and forth un and down with these oral movants. The sensitive is instant cummie's, in his face and mouth!!! And yes, I am a squatter that shoots it far!!! You like that! don't lie!

UM-HUM That's what they all say!

Ant I cute?

There too right...? why do you think I got this? It holds the hood skin back a good bit, which I heated with a passion for myself. You get that... don't you?

Maggie was reluctant at first with the idea, yet afterward, what more than pleased with what it could do for her and I. even she said, I'm not that type of girl. What type of girl are you to do something that is pleasurable, thrilling, and stimulating for you and your lover? Think about how hard you're coming and going to just freak'n going to gush-h!

'Um-? Okay-? If you say so- for you!'

It's something that we shared that no one ever knew about...

-Until the day I died and it was all showing and Maggie's Dr. said hey I see that one before. And she told her boyfriend, and it got around. Everyone was shocked shitless, nonetheless, yet happy for her... for have balls, which they never saw, that I gave to her.

~*~

Later, we're watching TV and Kitty's asleep, curled up on the couch like she's a real cat.

Margot wants to wake her up and make her go to her bed, but I say just let her sleep, and I put a quilt over her. 'Will you help me work on Daddy about a puppy for Christmas?' I ask. Maggie groans. 'Puppies are so much work. You have to let them out to pee like a million times a day. As well as they shed like cracked. You'll never be able to wear black pants again.

Also- who's going to walk it, and feed it, and take care of it?' 'Kellie will. And I'll help.' 'Kellie is so not ready for the responsibility.' Her eyes say, and neither are you. 'Kellie's matured a lot since you've been gone.' And so, have I... 'Did you know that she packs her own lunch now? And she helps with the laundry? I don't have to nag her to do her homework, either. She just does it on her own- on her own like always.' 'Really?

Then I'm impressed.' Why can't she just say, Good job, oh and Liv and Jean?

Thanks for not showing... when I did my shows, that's it.

Maggie- If she could just acknowledge that I have been doing my part to keep the family going since she's been gone, her my real mom. But no. Hell no I am moving in with Karly I said to her- 'fine go!' she yelled...

Chapter: 139

Replica...

Maggie- The high school ranking never- ever die unless, even if your out- that is if you are on Facebook, for the group are never die-off on there, do you see it like stupid high school games, for who does this and that, and I don't care to see. Even if you want to change their mind, you're not your status to them never well change its all in their made-up minds not too.

-Did you see Madilyn she changed her hair to more of a reddish color! She looks so good! Said Oliva. I like this color to change this time. Yet, that here change her colors all the time. Black tanks with low armholes all the way down to her butt hanging out short shorts frayed hanggie's things on them, and today look form now on you can see her tummy and back, bra showing on the side, brighter red ends on her locks, waved out, and dark burgundy on the top, new gray-blue contacts, and big long lashes, black eyebrows, cat eyeliner, pale makeup, soft pink lips that she said matched the other set of hers, emo yet sweet. You can look cute and be in the dress code, so fuck it she said by doing her hair and the skimpy top and bra showing along with her butt cheeks in the back.

I get a kick out of Killie stiffing her bras to look full and wearing my dress and top and so on, she looks like a little lady. With her honey-brown hair, and short yet all their flirty look, she has a nicer ass than me. and like us she knows that if you have blue eyes you get laid, so I see her doing that when she wants to be more like us, my dad doesn't like it, he wants to keep her a little girl.

I get that he lost me too to this look and slutty act that boys want. I see her some time going braless and having one strap down on her dress just to turn them on, the boy just thinks she is small, and small chested, I swear to you she passes as one of the high schoolers. I see Kellie wrights on her hands saying, about love or what she thinks it is, and some days to big nerdy glasses, that I can't stand, yet I glad she where or she looks to erasable to all them, that want it and all of her- young, and these boys like um- young like her and tight.

This is coming from the girl that is not so any longer, yet I am not Jenny that is gapped like the grand. I worked in if you want to call it that, like a good pair of shows, and you want to wear them all the time for they feel tremendous. Just right so Marcel says... Okay... if you say so...? He the one that opened me up and so many ways that is one of them. I come so much I lose a jean size as I ware to yah, I need to eat something, God I am crapping up- shit.

~*~

'All a boy should do when a girl is horny on top, pushing it down- when she legs side to side... all in... and sliding- kneeling- why, yet somewhat sitting- like into it, lay there and take it, forget this... they're not really moving much, that just to shut you up, but yet again- girl, that's all you have to do when he is on top of you, with your head in his chest going deep.'

Its SIX THIRTY IN THE morning the day of the ski trip, Daddy drops me off at school. It's not even light out yet. It seems like every day the sun takes longer and longer to come up. Before I hop out of the car, my dad pulls a hat out of his coat pocket. It's light pink yarn with a pom-pom on top. He fits it on my head so it covers my ears. 'I found this in the hall closet. I think it was one of your mom's. She was such a great skier.' 'I know. I remember.' 'Promise me you'll go out on the slopes at least once.'

'I promise...'

'I'm so glad you're doing this. It's good for you to try new things.' I smile weakly. If he only knew what went down on the ski trip, he wouldn't be so gladdened. Then I spot Marcel and his friends messing around outside by the charter bus.

'Thanks for the ride, Daddy. See you tomorrow night.' I give him a peck on the cheek and grab my duffel bag. 'Zip up your coat,' he calls out as I shut the car door. I zip up my coat and watch his car drive off. Across the parking lot, Marcel's talking to Killie... (wah- wah-awah-wawa-aha)

Ray says something that makes her laugh. Then he sees me and gestures at me to come over. She walks away, looking down at her clipboard. When I get there, he takes my duffel bag off my shoulder and puts it next to his. 'I'll put this on the bus.'

'It's freezing look at this go there small yet pointy,' I say, my teeth chattering. Marcel pulls me in front of him and puts his arms around me. 'I'll keep you warm.' I look up at him like so cheesy, but his attention is somewhere else.

He's watching Karly. He snuggles against my neck, and I squirm away from him.

'What's with you?' he asks.

'Nothing,' I say what...

Ms. Tibbitt and Coach White are looking through kids' bags- she is doing the girls and Coach White is doing the boys. 'What are they looking for?' I ask Marcel.

'Alcohol.'

I whip out my phone and text Ray. Don't bring alcohol wink- and if you do find a place to hide it! They are checking! Nope- no response. Are you awake?

Wake up! I say!!! But then her mom's SUV pulls into one bays of the lot and her blunders and stumbles out of the passenger seat. She looks like she just woke up.

What a release! Marcel can talk to me all he wants; I'll be sharing a seat with Ray and eating the snacks I packed. I have strawberry gummies and the wasabi peas that Ray loves, and Pickie sticks.

Marcel groans. 'Ray is coming- so he coming for you, why do you need me to come then?' I ignore him and wave at her- the girl crush. Karly standing by the bus with her clipboard when she spots me too. She has a big frown on her face. She marches right up to me and says, 'You didn't sign up... why?'

It's not my thing...? I said unenthusiastically.

'Come on- I- do- things for you!' She said timidly...

Maggie- Karly give me a full makeover and now she is a cute rock looking girl kind of looking like a younger Avril Lavigne, also the day I got her ring, she mine. Even snapping her top teeth into fang- points, colors in her hair.

Karly- that's right- I broke her glasses and did her hair and make-up and said keep it this way and you'll look so hot to me. Eyes smoky, nails painted, and hair color changed. Eyebrows plucked, and new undies that were mine. Brown hair to blonde, what a change it just works. Flack lashes, blue contacts and extremely extensions do so much- LIKE OMG! Do you see her- now!

'I am a conundrum wrapped in a rattle' That is how I would say it.

I want my Lizzy doll again, stupid- '>this girl here<!' Fingers pointing at all me they don't need to I do it to myself, yep all me this one. Um, hum- knee rubbing and award movants needed. Please... don't look at me... um God- shit!

Chapter: 140

Bygone Preceding...

(1943)

The train pulls into the Clearfield station, and the steam was rushing around my face. The moment has arrived, the moment I was so long for... hoping she would make it over, and that I would get away with this one, I knew if some find up, I will end up over there or shot in the face with no mercy. This how she got her name- the hope for this little girl's life.

He's handsome, man that walks up to me, most likely a lawyer or judge for the county, the last name black, the mothers were- only seventeen over in France, yet was Jewish, the mother ran... the boxcar holding her to her beast, she sees the engineer and said please take her as yours on this trip back. Overall the rails, passed the Gestapo and or Nazi past Germany dripping in blood dr-ip- dr-ip covering the lands.

~*~

So my predicament, is an abuse of my Right to Have Rights, could have turned out far worse than in WW2, however, looking at history, and me being Polish as well, this was exactly the same predicament that all Polish people faced, in appeasement, and so I think Polish Jewish people in WW2 had a far harder time mentally than people from other countries, both experiencing the same rights abuses, but Polish people where mentally abused as well, and not only by the Nazis but also by the English and Americans, which whenever some people disagree with me that I say that I actually remember perfectly that I was not born there, psychiatrists say.

'You're not Polish- then what am I said to myself one dad -Digging for answers, you're just psychologically abused, We're doing that,' which is not true, and the 'right to have a right' is not the same thing as 'having rights questioned' which the latter is just rights abuse period, but when someone promises rights to me and then abandons me when it really matters, then that's not them questioning my rights at all, it's a Nazi form of teasing! I was undoubtedly born in here in us... so-o why do you care now what the fuck happens to those that had it coming, it never did- they say.

NO.

The Holocaust was the worst human rights atrocity, but what was happening to me in Canada in the 90's wasn't as bad, but had potential to be far worse because: what was happening was that people were talking to me about my rights issues in private like on a podium, pretending that others were involved in a private discussion, and then the people who were talking to me that way abandoned me when other people were really around.

~*~

I remember the trains and talk of the communist party - I never saw anything but trains. Do you see? The term, 'holocaust' can mean anything. According to dictionary.com, a holocaust is 'great or complete devastation especially destruction by fire.' You may have heard the term 'nuclear holocaust' thrown around; this definition would apply to that term.

So- I am half Jewish do you hate me for it now that you know me?

This is all I really paid attention to in school for it applied to me.

Do you see it...?

~*~

'There are several books and films dedicated to this horrendous event in history I have them all I think; it would take me hours to explain it all. I was privileged to go there in my freshman year of high school; our docent was a Holocaust survivor and he told us about what went on in the concentration camps.'

'The Jewish Holocaust during WW2, Is sometimes known as 'Shoah' began in the late 1930s. The Wannsee Conference was held to bring together the 'Final Solution,' which was to get rid of Jewry once and for all. Adolf Hitler, the German dictator of Germany, was an anti-semitic.

(Meaning ALL were hated.)

As well as required to get rid of Jews for the motive, that he felt that they were Communists, betrayed Germany during WWI, and a lot of other injudicious causes.

He and his Nazi party prearranged a revolutionary group known as the SS (the Schutzstaffel) to round up the Jews, and put them into ghettos and then camps.' The first Nazi ghettos were never intended to be more than temporary, an interim concentration of Jews pending a decision concerning what the 'Final

A solution of the Jewish Question' was going to be. That decision went through many convoluted changes before its ultimate determination.

Ghettos- The ghetto was not a Nazi invention. Its origins can be traced back to medieval times when restrictions on the places where Jews were allowed to reside were commonplace throughout Europe. Although this restriction is usually perceived as relating to towns or cities, it even applied in certain cases to entire countries. The policy towards the incarcerated Jews also changed, as the realization dawned on the Germans that a locked-up labor force could be placed to better use than sweeping snow, or breaking rocks.

Later, the ghettos served as convenient points at which to concentrate that Jewish labor force prior to its liquidation. Not every town had a ghetto. Hundreds of ghettos were established in Nazi-occupied Europe, ranging in size from the 445,100 inhabitants of the Warsaw ghetto to those containing just a few families in rural quasi- ghettos. And I think being sex slaves for them also... think about it was easy butt and puss- puss!

I can see this girl, being held down against her will, don't you, and just getting fuck hard well there was a gun at her hand, well he said f*ck me or die, and if you die, I f*ck you anyways.

So, she does what he said and he pops her in the head he walks away, as they come is dripping down her dead body. I should know she was one of my past grandmothers. Do you see her being shot doing without him blinking I can, do you? And then moves over to the seven-yard and does the same, she is nude and calls for her now-dead mother, yet his dick in her vagina and she gets pop and popped, do you get it. I can see her... now... do you... like an angel to me- with dark hair and soft skin, and blue eyes, small looking just like me at her age, that she is and she is seven.

The official name is, Kaiser-Richter Schülz!

This makes my skin crawl!!!

(I wonder why- I was heated- like her... maybe that is why?)

Why?

Is there a why? Or a reason to it...?

He wands and had the never to ask my grandparents forgiveness that was not slatted off by him, and he got it- yet I not giving it.

(Back to the story)

Men with guns, and death in the air. Plans in the air, and steering to their death. Pass and clear pass all the inspectors, we did- I said in relief, as I was sweating hard over having a smuggled baby on my lap, that was odd to have in the front parts of a locomotive, it over getting out to change the tracks, I was not happy about leaving her with others, yet I have no choice but to do so. Overall the trains, mountains, and tunnel are the horn blowing hauntingly in my mind as we got closer to home.

I knew my wife would be thrilled, for she could not have children of her own, you see... she wanted a baby girl and one was just handed over to me I love her as my own. It's my secret, not even she well really knows the truth, or the baby that is my wish to have it that way, understand me! Passing time-worn tree, and faces, uniforms and girls not realizing what is going on over there, SS officer- (was it him- did he let her go out of remorse? I sure he knew... her- he looked right into her little chubby face.)

'Where this train going Mr. Ansley' - he said to me. 'I don't think that is any over your business!' And he had he his pistol drew ready to pull, as I released the handbrake, and the wheels spun as they do fastly and the chugging- building up speed, as I kicked him out the opening doorway, on to the now moving tracks.

The fireman was on my side think god, saying babies don't need to be killed, he had the coal shovel rad hot ready to fight for her life also. There- I see it approaching me the green station, my wife wearing for me not know if I am coming back to her, and yet look what I have to bring- to her along with me. I take up to three weeks for a later to get to her, which is a lot of worry time, is it not?

Ansley- I ran the troop train poor buggers, some of you might not make it back, I don't want to look as I pull forward all young like seventeen, and they wave to me, getting in the cars. This is what he did- driving his train that I see every day almost in the sky tracks. -I Push the reverser Johnson bar forward - grip the very large lever that rises from near the floor in front or beside you, squeeze the release handle and shove it all the way forward, and let go of the release handle to lock it into place. Open the cylinder cocks - find a medium size valve in front of you on the boiler, or a thin lever on the floor in front of you.

Turn the valve all the way clockwise, or pull the lever back. Turn the front headlight on - above you on the ceiling, there will be a large, flat, half-round box or on the side of the cab wall. Slide the knob on the round side of the box all the way to the front. Blow the about-to-move-forward whistle along with two shorts and a long - there will be either a cable, cables or whistle handles, above your head or in front of you on the boiler. Pull down on the cable (or turn the lever) twice to make the steam whistle sound out two short blasts.

Release the engine brakes - two brass horizontal levers will be near your left hand. The top one must be moved from right to left to release the brakes on the engine. Open the throttle to start the engine moving - the very long lever in front of your face is the throttle. Grip it firmly and give it a yank toward you.

As you feel the engine moves slightly, shove it back in most of the way so that it does not gather speed too fast. Gradually open throttle as the locomotive approaches track speed. Observe cylinder cock exhaust and close them when only steam is emitted. Move the Johnson bar slowly back toward vertical, but never too close to vertical.

This is like the gear shift of your car and admits less steam per cylinder stroke. In turn, this increases the efficiency of steam usage so you don't overwork the poor guy throwing coal into the fire (and to conserve fuel and water!) If the locomotive's wheels slip, close throttle most of the way immediately. Allowing the wheels to slip will not render any tractive effort and will damage the locomotive if done continuously (also 'tears' holes in a coal-fired locomotive, or in an oil-burning locomotive, can cause hollow booms much like an explosion.)

Blow the whistle and ring bell at all crossings of all types and DO NOT EXCEED TRACK SPEED. That is very dangerous.

~*~

The flagman hands her to me, as I step on the train, and the next engineer takes over for my 18 hours off the rails, no- does come in handy along with coffee, don't want to sleep. Her- the new baby was stolen from sure death at the camps. Jewish- surely, destiny for the death pits or gas shower rooms or fireboxes at Auschwitz the death camps, I can see the nude body run around for them now, shaving head, injection in the eyes and more for the perfect race.

All blue eyes in what they wanted, she babies Hope- and the photos of the past in black and white. She was saved from, her real family that was killed off, we no; hitherto she never did, she never had any US paperwork. She was adopted, illegally and her new dad worked for the Pennsylvania railroad, she went over that burgh too like I, did, on the same engine that is sitting there rusting away. In the same car that I did things in... it's so weird to me. The story keeps going on...

My wife happy yet not content, yet I loved her like my own... I hope she knows that when I left her for my job.

(Freshmen year)

Mailbox- 'Working on my fantasy of what I SHOULD have said to that, FedEx girl who gave me attitude.' Yah- so suck my pussy! I thought and then stop in my walking- God I am not that gay!

Tv- 'So that Stouffer Mac & Cheese and is basically saying 'Buy our product to make your annoying daughter shut the hell up for 2 seconds!' God! AH! #- hashtag- (Family)

'Our- rooms are never clean- anyways- so- why to bother cleaning it, my mom is always bitching about it anyway. So- why- bother, even- if it's clear to me.'

'Don't worry about me. I'm covered.'

We showered together and did all things like that, together also, never apart.

When I give her a dubious look, she whispers back, 'Shampoo bottle filled with tequila at the bottom of my bag.' 'I hope you washed it out really well! You could get sick! If you go outside, and make snow angels or take to people that are not there again.'

'When is that terrified- of- everyone- I- don't- know feeling going to go away?'

I bob my head up and down and try to look enthusiastic, even though a little, pinching feeling of guilt starts nipping at yours truly. I haven't even thought about the evaluations since this pre-launch, not since I found out the results would be discounted. 'Yeah, you're right.'

‘Come on, now. Dinnertime.’ My aunt reaches out and passes a finger over my forehead. Her finger is cool and reassuring and gone as quickly as the lightest stirring of wind. It makes the guilt flare up full force, and at that moment I can’t believe, I was even considering going to Back and Gold Cove.

Me after I cook anything at all- ‘I’m the best person in the world!’

I am fat- ‘Bitches gotta eat okay?’ *I* ‘Serious question: How much are wedding cakes...? And how weird would it be... like- if I wanted to buy one just to eat? By myself...?’

~*~

‘They say you shouldn’t meet your heroes. And they’re right because I met a baby raccoon once and it pooped on my shoulder.’

I look at me- and the showdown in the black show is all, the girl looks happy you see the showdown deep, of secrets, isolated and inappropriate with herself and her world. I always look so said just like me, not acting it all out.

Boy’s- ‘Yes, of course, I got your text - I’m just ignoring it. Don’t make it weird.’

~*~

Facebook- Twitter- ‘Does anyone else think ‘don’t be a weirdo, don’t be a weirdo - over and over when entering social gatherings? Cause I don’t. You’re probably right.’ * -- * ‘You’re wrong, I just don’t want to seem like a dick about it.’

Nevaeh

Book: 28

Heart-to-Heart's

‘Dedicated to the girl, that plays in my mind.’

...And also, to my dad rest in peace,

Raymond ‘Buddy’ Duriez, 1957 to 1993.

Quote- ‘I feel LOVE for people, that I have loved, and I think that is so beautiful, I think that’s such an important lesson for children, that people can have disagreements’, but it doesn’t mean one is bad, and one is good. The worst would pain over not smelling and tearing over it.’

-Anna Kendrick

Interval

Kellie-

The climax of you-

My most prized possession Kelly passed on- hell's- yeah, I wanted it! I recall saying- she said- I cannot have this thing in my room or Jenny is going to mucky swing it and break it for me. You can have your N-word BOY-sh baby shit rip- you can have your pc beats I think too. The world has gone crazy passing up this or it smashed?

Yes, plain real shit is gay, or so her friends said- like- to her to give it up. They said that she could never- ever wrap her hand around the neck of a guitar and play like she does, okay she did this- It was said to me and I now have this to show you and play- that my grandmother, had this made.

A Gibson guitar pink body into lavender- and this was the neatest thing a 17 inch with body, 17-inch body height, and a neck 18 inches long, with four skewers holding it on the form the back; and the dumb-looking to me and you, but right for a girl I feel that it is... a custom neck for her with other parts made to fit her tinny body parts and hands so you can rap the nick, wood-tick and heavy yet no over- and hard-nock-nock-nock, yet semi-hollow, and the sin custom pickups that you can know about- 2 humbuckers. She wanted to make it sound like mom's fender yet better.

Don't ask she said just make it. N sound holes. Fender nobs the tall ones, that light up, light on the inside, pink on a toggle switch at the nobs- in silver, painted out headstock 3 inches wide by seven high, look if so, right to me also. It's got hips and covers and looks sexy a girl like me loves that also- other then it being kick ass. It was made in my pap's shop. Do you see the wood in this thing oak from their tree or so the story goes? Rosewood fretboard, and several and bird and Lily inlays.

Look at the big photo like the picture of her on the back, the thing a has a fifties look-right? white pickguard- who does that? Cord jack on the said white piping, pink amp- with white stand- she even had an outfit to matches this thing. Look at her picks here four. And the white into pink and lavender fad case, with her face shot on it, like the guitar well you can see the show more- yet classy, as a pin-up on it.

'You crazy kids know how to spoil a girl.' I would now I am one of those kid girl teens.

~*~

Un- ah-

Oh-

Ummmm- it's good...

Kellie- The next morning while he- I was bathing, I and he admitted he overdid it last night. He said he wasn't sorry, but he hasn't been away from her that long before. Annie smiled and told him it felt good to have him all over her again, she really missed it.

Remembering back to her coming home- 'Why do I buy cooking magazines in airports? I might as well be buying porn. I get all excited but there's nothing I can do about it.'

After having two orgasms back to back last night, I was surprised at how hard I was and she hasn't gotten to the penis wash yet. As she bent down to wash his legs, her face got a helluva slap from that rock-hard penis. While washing his lower body and eye to eye with that rock-hard dick, she asked him if he wanted her right there and right now. Ray lifted her up and asked if he could look at her beautiful heels. I knew he wanted her with her big legs behind her head and dried him off to give him as always, what he wants.

I wasted no time... in going after what he requested. He started slow, to enjoy every stroke. He hit it high, he hit it low. Every now and then he floated with the only thing touching was his elbows. This gave him maximum penetration and also gave Annie an early orgasm of the squirting kind. Her squirt- hit I squarely in his chest with her large ass up, and bent back had her pussy facing forward.

I was now hitting a somewhat wet pussy that caused him to let loose his orgasm. Annie tried to pull him off to finish his orgasm off orally, but then again, he was slapping meat that could be heard all over the house. In the direction of the end of his orgasm... I just rotated her big hips deliberately, and hard against his penis, this caused him to moan. Since Annie was in a position that she couldn't pat her on back, she patted Ray. He was out of breath, as well as couldn't talk, nonetheless a little kiss, he gave I told her- job well done.

I laid there, plus watched me going in and out of sleep. When he reached up and touched her face, besides uttered the words she loves to hear.

(Moring at the café)

I pulled Ray is now out of bed, as well as into the bathroom to bathe him again, all being well this time they can make it through without some make out time. She was wrong, he just grabbed a hand full of her ass in a loving way.

'Hello, my- honey- my baby.' I smiled and asked if he wanted breakfast or brunch. I replied, 'Banquet!' Is it that late? I said it's only eight-thirty, but I didn't know if you wanted to sleep some more or not.

He told her he will get up now but keep her alluring beautiful ass, away from him. I jumped on top of him and slapped his face with her ass. I cried out, 'Okay- I give up, sorry but I want you.'

Ray was sitting at the regular breakfast counter, her- I if he really missed her. He told her every evening he had room, she comes to his room, so-o he could go to bed early in order to speed up time just so they could be together. He missed just looking at her, feeling her close to him, stroking her butt, her breast, as well as, just hugging her tight in him, and her.

He missed her sleeping on top of him, although she doesn't do at often as she used to. I saw this, in addition, started to get up. I told him to sit there, she's just so touched by his words it made her cry. In order to break the ice- I said- 'it's a good thing I wasn't sitting at your breakfast counter- or I would be in trouble.' Annie said after what you just said, in trouble no, in my throat, yes. They both laughed as I placed their breakfast on the counter.

After breakfast, they both retired to the reading room. I with the morning paper, I with a book. He looked at her lying on the sofa with her ass sticking up like two basketballs and just thought about how much fun he is having with it. He saw him and knew what he was thinking. She grabbed a pillow and put it on top of her ass and asked if he wanted one that big. He said- if it's yours, yes, I do.

Cut-

Measure-

It's the complete, 100 percent wrong thing to do, and I stand up- for dinner feeling clean now, buoyant and pleased about everything- me, and the world too. Like the first time, I have felt- oh so healthy, after a long fever, plus doing what I need for me.

On the other hand, then again at dinner, my idiosyncrasy, as well as with it, the sick feeling, my uncertainties- return to me like before. Not sure if I can barely follow the conversation at this point and time.

All I can think is go...? Why? I don't feel right- I say... bizarrely.

Him- Don't go from me now?

Me- I have to go...? Sorry...

Him- Don't go...?

At one point my uncle is telling a story- about one of his customers, and I notice everyone is laughing, so I laugh too with them, nevertheless a little too loud and long with there's, do you see I want to fit in. Do what as they do...

~*~

Part: 1

Marcel turns around, and to my surprise, his face isn't cool, calm and collected at all. It is the weird look, that I have learned- that he has when something is not right. His jaw is at work chomping, as well as his eyes are full of pain, and I can tell he hates himself... over this moment- like for being there, for being the one to say this, for being the one to show me... what on his mind. 'I'm sorry, Liv,' He says, I am below him the sign glowers in the darkness at this time.

~*~

Humans, unregulated, can be cruel, and ticky; passionate and self-interested; unhappy and cantankerous. It is only after their make-ups and basic emotions have been controlled, that they can be happy, lavish, and moral.

The Book of stuff-

I have the sudden dread, of going any farther; at this phase in my life. That butterfly feeling in the deaths, or the pit of my stomach squeezing up, like a fist in the ovaries, making it hard to breathe, see, and deliberate. I can't go on like this- I swear to you, I cannot. I don't want to know- anymore- what up or going down.

Marcel reaches out for me like he's thinking of touching me. Then remembering where we are, and commands his arms to his sides. 'Don't worry,' he says. He said- 'You have friends here.' She said back- 'It's probably not even something to worry about.'

My dialog is rising a little, and I'm worried, concerned that I might have a breakdown like always. I lick my lips, trying to keep it all together. 'It was probably just a big mistake, I thought unsurely like always with me. We shouldn't have come in the first place, another bad thought within me. I want to go home, ah- another thought to add to the shit heap!' I know I must sound like a toddler throwing a tantrum, but I can't help it, you get it to don't you.

Run-

Running out- in the world that is death to me.

Walking through those double doors seems absolutely incredible.

‘Liv, come on.... you have to trust me.’

Then she does reach out, for just a second, skating one finger across my forearm. ‘Okay? Trust me.’ Did she say, along with doing you? ‘I do trust you, it’s just... um.’ The air, the disgusting odor, the darkness and the sensation of rot all around me- so-much. It makes me want to run fast and not stop for anything or anyone.

‘If she isn’t here... well, that’s not good. On the other hand, if she is... kind of there with me. I ponder- I think it might be even worse, then I assumed.’

Marcel watches me closely for a second or more. ‘You have to know, Liv,’ he says finally, firmly, looks and gives, and he’s right. I nod to the feelings of this... he gives me the barest glimmer white smile something in a movie, then reaches forward and heaves open the doors toward me or so it seems to be at that moment in my mind only.

We step into a vestibule openness, that looks exactly like what I imagine a cell in the Vaults might be like: The walls and floor are concrete, and whatever color they might once have been painted, now faded to a discolored, overgrown gray-green. A single rhizome is set high in the ceiling and barely delivers enough light to illuminate the tiny space. There is a stool in the corner, occupied by a guard.

A place I don’t get- my mind misplaced- lost in time- this guard is actually ordinary-sized- skinny and yet has some weight, even with a skin condition pockmarks and hair that reminds me of- of my pap, that I never met yet new in my mind.

He runs after me- I didn’t want him to- to see me like this... and all. As soon as Marcel, and I step through the door, the guard makes a small impulsive adjustment to his gun, drawing it closer toward his body, I thought I was going down I was high- and swiveling the barrel ever so slightly in our direction. High not by choice she got me on the shit.

Marcel is beside me, not worried about my mental state. All of a sudden, I feel very alert, in his hold.

‘Can’t be in here... they can be in my had.’

The guard says.

‘Restricted area’s- he knows I didn’t get it.’ For the first time since entering the Vaults, Marcel appears uncomfortable. The man- walks up, and fiddles nervously with his badge.

The guard gets to his feet and now mine also. The light is where I see it- amazingly, God may be showing me something... The man- he’s not much taller than I am- he’s certainly shorter than Marcel. Then of all the guards I have seen today, he frightens me the most it pointed at my had. Or am I in a dream.

There’s something strange about his eyes yellow not brown to me, a flatness and hardness, which reminds me of a movie guys. I have never had a gun pointed at me before, and staring into the long black tunnel of its barrel makes me feel the black blocking out the light like an eclipse like I am going to pass out.

‘Oh, he’s here, all right. He’s always here, nowadays.’ The guard smiles humorlessly, and his fingers tap on the trigger. I want it- when he speaks his lips curl upward, revealing a mouth full of crooked yellow teeth.

Part: 2

Kellie- ‘What do you know about Raymon?’

‘I thought Raymon would be here.’ The room takes on the stillness, and charge of the air outside, and reminds... of this boy.

~*~

Karly-

‘My heart is POUNDING.’ Me of waiting for the thunder to crack. Marcel allows himself one small indication of nervousness: He curls and flexes his fingers against his thighs. I can almost see him thinking, trying to figure out what to say next. He must know that mentioning

Raymon was a bad decision- even, I heard the contempt and suspicion in the guard's voice as he pronounced the name.

After what seems like a terribly long time-but is probably only a few seconds-the blanks, official look sweeps down over his face again.

'We heard there was some kind of problem, that's all.'

The statement is sufficiently vague, and a decent assumption. Marcel twirls his security badge idly between two fingers. The guard flicks his eyes to it, and I can tell he relaxes.

~*~

Providentially, he doesn't try to look at it more closely. Marcel has only Level One security clearance in the labs, which means he barely has the right to visit the janitor's closet, much less parade around delimited areas, there or anywhere else in Pitt, as though he owns them.

~*~

Hanna- 'Took you long enough,' the guard says flatly. 'Raymon has been out for months. All the better for CID, I guess. It's not the kind of thing we wanted to publicize.' The CID is the Controlled Information Department or if you're cynical like Hanna, the Corrupt Idiots-

Department or the Censorship Implementation Department, and goosebumps prick up on my arms. Something went very wrong in Ward Six if the CID got involved.

'You know how it is,' Marcel says. He has recovered from his temporary slip up; the confidence and ease return to his voice.

'Impossible to get a straight answer from anyone over there.'

Another vague statement, but the guard just nods.

'You're telling me.' Then he shakes his head in my direction. 'Who's she?'

I can feel him staring at the unmarred skin on my neck, noticing that I have no procedural mark. Resembling many people, he unconsciously recoils-just a few inches, but enough so that the old feeling of humiliation, the feeling of being somehow wrong, creeps over me. I turn my eyes to the ground.

‘She’s a nonentity,’ Marcel says, and even though I know he has to say it, it makes my chest ache dully. ‘I’m supposed to be showing her the Vaults, that’s all. An educational process, if you know what I mean.’

I hold my breath, certain that at any second he’ll boot us out, almost wishing he would. Plus, yet... Just beyond the guard’s stool is a single door made out of heavy, thick metal, and protected by an electronic keypad. It reminds me of the bank vault at Central Savings downtown. Through it I can just make out distant sounds-human sounds, I think, though it’s hard to tell. My mother could be beyond that door.

She could be in there, Marcel was right. I do have to know. For the first time, I begin to know, fully, what Marcel told me last night: All this time, my mother might have been alive. While I was breathing; she was breathing too. While I was sleeping, she was sleeping elsewhere.

It’s just like when I hold and release, and have the small one for the big O!

When I was awake thinking of her, she might have been thinking of me, too. It’s overwhelming, both miraculous and fiercely tender. Marcel and the protector eye each other for a minute. Marcel continues spinning his badge around one finger, winding and unwinding the chain. It seems to put the guard at ease.

Fuck! Fuck! Fuck! Shit- piss- my god, I as it comes out in that O!

‘I can’t let you back there,’ he says, but this time he sounds apologetic. He lowers his gun and sits down on the stool again. I exhale quickly; I’ve been holding my breath without meaning to. ‘You’re just doing your job,’ Marcel says, keeping his voice neutral. ‘So- you’re Raymon’s replacement?’

‘That’s right.’ The guard flicks his eyes to me and again I can feel his gaze lingering on my unmarked neck. I have to stop myself from covering my skin with a hand. But then again, he must decide that we aren’t going to be trouble because he looks back to Marcel and says, ‘Marcel. Got reassigned from Three in February -after the incident.’ Something about the way he says incident sends chills up my spine. 'Tough breaks, huh?' Marcel leans up against a wall, the picture of casualness.

Only I can detect the edge in his voice. He's stalling. He doesn't know what to do from here, or how to get us inside. Marcel shrugs. 'Quieter up here, that's for sure. Nobody in or out. At least, almost nobody.'

Part: 3

He smiles again, showing off those awful teeth, but his eyes maintain their strange flatness, as though there's a curtain drawn over them. I wonder if this, for him, was a side effect of the cure, or whether he was always like that. He tilts his head back, peering at Marcel through narrowed eyes, and his resemblance to a snake grows even stronger. 'So- how'd you hear about Raymon?'

'If I die unexpectedly can everyone just do the right thing, and pretend, I was a way better person than- I am?'

Marcel keeps up the unconcerned act, smiling, twirling the badge. 'Rumors floating here and there,' he says, shrugging. 'You know how it is.' 'I know how it is,' Marcel says. 'But the CID wasn't too happy about it. Had us on lock for a few months. What exactly did you hear, anyway?'

'When I'm home alone I eat tri-color pasta one color at a time.... and it feels great.'

Da ta da- like- a boy once said to me- 'If your fake orgasms as well as you do who you are, I am in trouble.'

I can tell the question is an important one, some kind of test. Be careful, I think in Marcel's direction, as though he might somehow hear me. Marcel hesitates for only a second before saying- 'Heard he might have sympathies on the other side.' Suddenly, it all makes sense: the fact that Marcel said- 'I have friends here,' the fact that he has seemingly had access to six in the past. One of the guards must have been a well-wisher, maybe an active part of the resistance. Marcel's constant refrain plays in my head: There are more of us than you think.

Marcel decreases visibly. Apparently, that was the right answer. He seems to decide that Marcel is, after all, trustworthy. We're in a tiny square, surrounded on all sides by the stained gray sides of the Vaults.

The grass here is amazingly lush, reaching practically to my knees. A single tree twists upward to our left, and a bird is twittering in its branches. It's surprisingly nice out here, peaceful and pretty- strange to be standing in the middle of a little garden while enclosed by the massive stone walls of the prison, like being at the exact center of a hurricane, and finding peace and silence in the middle of so much shrieking damage.

Part: 4

Marcel has moved several paces away. He is standing, head bowed, with his eyes on the ground. He must have a sense too of the peacefulness here, the stillness that seems to hang in the air like a veil, covering the whole thing in softness, and rest. The sky above us is darker than it was when we first entered the Vaults: Against all the grayness and shadow, the grass stands intense and electric, as though it is lit up from inside. It will rain at any another, it just has too. I have the sensation of the world holding its breath before a giant exhales, balancing, teetering, about to let go.

'Here...' Marcel's voice rings out, surprisingly loud, and it startles me.

'Right here.' He points to a shard of rock sticking up crookedly from the ground.

'That's where my father is.'

The grass is broken up by dozens of these rocks, which at first glance appeared to be naturally, haphazardly arranged. Then I realize that they've been deliberately tamped down into the earth. Some of them are covered in fading black markings, mostly illegible, although on one stone I recognize the word BLAIR and on another DIED.

He- he- I love to get tickle right above my little shaft... and feel some fuzz.

Part: 5

By the time, I returned to the guest room where their lovemaking session had taken place, I found he sound asleep. They haven't seen each other in five days. It only took thirty minutes to go from hello to total exhaustion for Teddy who was sleeping like a baby. I didn't want to, but she had to take a bath alone after Teddy left his calling card all over her legs, a little on her chin and breasts. She felt Teddy would not miss his feeling her up this one time. Looking in the bathroom mirror and only seeing herself without him with his hands all over her big ass, Annie saw a woman that had accomplished so much in a very short period of time. Yet with all she had accomplished, the greatest would be capturing Ray. For without him, Annie knew she wouldn't be the woman she is today.

My total concentration was on him. She wondered if this is what true love is. She knows he is her everything. She knows he loves her totally. He gave up his playboy lifestyle and a year-long trip around the world with all expenses paid just to be with her. He has gotten the best at that time a virgin could give, although Annie gave way more than she had, he stayed. It had to be love and not lust.

Annie's only goal is to continually be the best at whatever he needed. Be it a cook or a warm mouth, she vowed to be the best at all times. On this day, she knew she was better, so much better.

Kellie- previous times - returned to the guest room and crawled up next to him. She always thought about how amazing it was that I could sleep in one spot without moving. She kissed his shoulder and stared at him as if she was seeing him for the first time. Going into the hostile territory was nothing compared to hunting down him. This gift that expanded her mind and body was released by him and she loves it more and more each day. What this gift did was take a naive young virgin whose breasts had never been touch before and who would break a Popsicle in three pieces to downing he's seven-plus inches with the greatest on ease.

She never tried gymnastics before because she was too stiff, yet she can keep her legs behind her head for as long as it takes, I complete his mission. Annie opens the curtains and looked toward the Heavens to give thanks for selecting Teddy for her. Then she rolled teddy on his back and put his arm around her, kissed the head of his penis and went to sleep a happy little girlie.

I realize as the purpose of the courtyard dawns on me. We're standing in the middle of a graveyard. Marcel is staring down at a large chunk of concrete, as flat like a tablet, pressed down into the earth in front of his feet.

All the writing is visible here, the words neatly printed in what looks like a black marker, their edges slightly blurred as though someone has been continuously retracing them over a long period of time. It says rest in peace.

I say... I want to reach out and slip my hand into Marcel's, but I don't think we're safe. There are a few windows surrounding the courtyard on the ground floor, and even though they are thickly coated in grime, someone could walk by at any moment, lookout, and see us. 'Your father?'

Marcel nods, then shakes his shoulders, a sudden movement as though trying to jerk himself away from sleep. 'Yeah.'

'He was here?'

One side of Marcel's mouth quirks up into a smile, but the rest of his face remains stony. 'For fourteen years.' He draws a slow circle in the dirt with his toe, the first physical sign of discomfort or distraction he has given since we arrived. At that moment I am in awe of him: Since I have known him, he has done nothing but support me and give me comfort and listen to me, and all this time he has been carrying the weight of his own secrets too.

~*~

I say to you now dad- 'What happened...?' I ask quietly. 'I mean, what did he...?' I trail off. I don't want to push the issue. It's funny that way, you can get used, To the tears and the pain, What a child will believe you never loved me, It's funny that way, you can get used, To the tears and the pain, What a child will believe, You never loved me, You can't hurt me now, I got away from you, I never thought I would, you can't make me cry, you once had the power, I never felt so-o good about myself, seems like yesterday, I lay down next to your boots and I prayed for your anger to end, Oh Father I have sinned; Oh Father you never wanted to live that way you never wanted to hurt me, why am I running away, maybe someday, when I look back I'll be able to say, you didn't mean to be cruel Somebody hurt you too.

~*~

Marcel glances at me quickly and looks away. 'What did he do?' He says.

The hardness has returned to his voice. 'I- don't know. What all the people who end up in Ward Six do. He thought for himself. Stood up for what he believed in.

Refused to give in...'

'Ward Six?'

Marcel avoids my eyes carefully. 'The dead ward,' he says quietly. 'For political prisoners, mostly. They're kept in solitary confinement. In addition, no one ever gets released.'

He gestures around him, to the other shards of stone poking up through the grass, dozens of makeshift graves. 'Ever,' he repeats, and I think of the sign on the door: LIFERS, HA-HA.

'I'm so sorry, Marcel.' I would give anything to touch him, but the best I can do is an inch closer to him so that our skin is separated by only a few inches.

He looks at me then, shooting me a sad smile. 'He and my mom where only sixteen when they met. Can you believe that? She was only eighteen when she had me.'

Part: 6

He drops into a squat and traces his father's name with his thumb. I suddenly understand that the reason he comes here so often is to continue darkening the letters as they fade, to keep some record of his father. I think for my mom it was easier to believe he had really died. She didn't want to think of him rotting in this place.'

'They wanted to run away together, but he was caught before they could finalize a plan. I never knew he'd been taken into custody.

I just thought he was dead. My mom thought it would be better for me, and nobody in the Wilds knew enough to correct her.

I feel sick. The walls appear to be pressing closer to us, growing taller and narrower, too- so the sky feels more and more remote, an ever-diminishing point. We'll never get out, I think, and then take a deep breath, trying to stay calm.

He continues looping a finger over the letters, back and forth. 'My aunt and uncle told me the truth when I turned fifteen. They wanted me to know. I came here to meet him, but-'

I think I see- Marcel shudder, a sudden stiffening movement of his shoulders and back.

'Anyway, it was too late. He was dead, had been dead for a few months, and buried here, where his remains wouldn't contaminate anything.'

Marcel straightens up. 'Ready?' he asks me, for the second time this morning. I nod, even though I'm not sure that I am. He allows himself the brief flicker of a smile, and I see, for a second, a bit of warmth spark up in his eyes. Then he's all business again.

I take one last look at the tombstone before we go in. I try to think of prayer or something appropriate to say, but nothing comes to me. The lessons of the scientists aren't really clear about what happens when you die: Supposedly you dissipate into the heavenly matter that is God, and get absorbed by him, although they also tell us that the cured go to heaven and live forever in perfect harmony and order.

'Your name.' I spin around to face Marcel. He has already moved past me, headed back for the door. 'Marcel.'

~*~

He gives an almost imperceptible shake of his head. 'Assigned to me,' he says. For a moment Marcel's hand pauses on the gun, his fingers once again performing a dance on the trigger. 'Sure,' he says, keeping his eyes on

Marcel, as though I'm not even there. 'You must have heard about it.'

Marcel shrugs. 'A little of this, a little of that. Nothing confirmed.' Marcel laughs. It's a terrible sound. It reminds me of the time I saw two seagulls fighting in midair over a scrap of food, screeching as they tumbled toward the ocean. 'Oh, it's confirmed,' he says.

'Happened back in February.

We got the alarm from Raymon, as a matter of fact. 'Course if he was in on it, she might have had a lead time of six, seven hours.'

Part: 7

17th November- 2014-

‘The ‘50 Shades of Grey’ dude looks just like ‘Love Actually’ kid...? I feel less ~turned on~ and more like... I should call child services...’

Kalliez14@twitter.com

Kelliez14@twitter.com < look at that shit there... I can have anything can I?

Cupcakes- ‘If the frosting has cream cheese it counts as breakfast, right?’

Through the walls, we can hear low moaning, a constant vibration. It’s worse, somehow, than the screeches, and screams of earlier: This is the sound people make when they’ve long ago given up hope that anyone is listening, a reflexive sound, meant just to fill the time and space and the darkness.

‘Cooking for one sucks, because no matter how I portion it; I seem to end up wasting food. Also, loneliness...’

I’m going to be sick. If Marcel is correct, my mother is here, behind one of these terrible doors-so close that if I could rearrange the particles and make the stone melt away, I might put my hand out, and touch her. Closer than I ever thought I would be to her again.

As we walk, I can hear the barrel of his gun, slapping against his thigh. I’m worried I might faint, and I want to reach out, and steady myself against the walls, but they are coated with fungus and moisture. On either side of us, bolted metal cell doors appear at intervals, each outfitted with a single grimy window the size of a dinner plate.

‘Being told ‘I know you can do this’ weirdly makes me not want to try...’

‘You CAN’T do this’ has the same effect. Okay, yeah, I might just be lazy.’

I am filled with competing thoughts and desires: My mother cannot be here; I would rather she was dead; I want to see her alive. And filled, too, with that other word, pressing itself underneath all my other thoughts: leakage, seepage, escape. A possibility too fantastic to contemplate. If my mother had been the one to break out, I would have known. She would have come for me. Ward Six consists of just one long hallway.

‘Here’s your boy Raymon, if you want to say hello.’ Then he laughs again, that awful crackling sound. I think about what he said when we first entered the vestibule: He’s always here, nowadays.

Ahead of us, Marcel does not respond, but I think I see him shudder. Marcel nudges me sharply in the back with the barrel of his gun. ‘So, what do you think?’

As far as I can tell, there are about forty doors, forty separate cells.

‘This is it...’

Marcel says. ‘The grand tour.’ He pounds on one of the very first doors.

~*~

Random- like- ‘I get the same feeling at the dentist that I get when a cop car is behind me; I haven’t done anything wrong, but I feel incredibly guilty.’

When he says the word, the walls seem to collapse around me. I take a quick step backward, bumping up against a wall. It could be her, I think, and for one horrible, guilty second, I’m disappointed. Then I remind myself that she might not be here at all and in any case, it could have been anyone who escaped, any female sympathizer or agitator.

Still, the dizziness does not subside. I’m filled with anxiety and fear and a desperate craving, all at once.

‘What’s wrong with her?’ Marcel asks. His voice sounds distant.

‘Air,’ I manage to force out. ‘It’s the air in here.’

Hate isn’t the most dangerous thing, he’d said. Indifference is.

Marcel starts talking. His voice is low and still casual, but there’s an undertone of force to it: the kind of vocal sound street peddlers lapse into when they are trying to get you to buy a carton of bruised berries or a broken toy. It’s okay, I will give you a deal, no problem, trust me.

‘Listen, just let us in for a minute. That’s all it will take: a minute. Marcel laughs again, that unpleasant crackling sound. ‘You think it’s bad out here,’ he says. ‘It’s paradise compared to the cells.’ He seems to take pleasure in this, and it reminds me of a debate I had a few weeks ago with Marcel when he was arguing against the usefulness of the cure. I said - that without love, there could also be no hate: without hate, no violence. You can tell she’s already scared out of her thoughts. I had to come all the way out here for this, a day off and everything, I was going to go to the pier, maybe try out some fishing.

Point is if I bring her home and she’s not straightened out - well, you know, chances are I’ll just have to haul out here again. And I only have a couple of days off, and summer’s almost over-’

‘Why all the trouble?’ Marcel says, jerking his head in my direction.

‘If she’s causing problems, there’s an easy to fix her up.’ It’s a bold lie. Marcel could easily ask to see my ID card, and then Marcel and I are screwed. I’m not sure what the punishment would be for infiltrating the Vaults under false pretenses, but it can’t be good. Marcel smiles tightly. ‘Her father’s Steven, a commissioner at the labs.

He doesn’t want to do an early procedure, no trouble, no violence or mess. Looks bad, you know.’

~*~

Marcel appears interested in me for the first time. He looks me up and down like I’m a grapefruit he’s evaluating in the supermarket for mellowness, and for a moment he doesn’t say anything.

Then, finally, he stands, slipping the gun onto his shoulder. ‘Come on,’ he says. ‘Seven minutes.’

‘Let’s go,’ he says, manufacture his vocal sound crotchety, like my little fit has left him impatient. Nevertheless, his touch is gentle, and his hand warm and reassuring. As he’s fiddling with the keypad, which requires both that he type code, and scan his hand on some kind of fingerprint- matching screen, Marcel reaches out and takes my elbow.

Part: 8

Ray's idea of bathing her is to wash her ass and feel her up over and over again. But one thing is for sure, he cleans her ass really well. After bathing herself Annie sat on the bed and reflected on today's events. It's two forty-five and she flew out of Pitt. At nine this morning. She became Less than this nice naive barely boob-ed adult, unassuming, sexless woman. Now she's a killing sex machine on me. How could the taste of he come do this to her?

And she did...

I wish he... could keep it there, but after only a second he lets me go again. I can read a plea, loud and clear, in his eyes: Be strong. We're almost there. Be strong for just a little while longer. The locks on the door release with a click.

Marcel goes first, then me, then Marcel.

Marcel leans his shoulder against it, straining, and it slides open just enough for us to squeeze by into the hallway beyond.

But the smell is what really hits me: a horrible, rotting, festering stink, like the Dumpsters by the harbor, the place where all the fish intestines get discarded, on the hottest day. The passage is so narrow we have to go single file, and it's even darker than the rest of the Vaults.

~*~

I stood looking out at the cattle as it grazed in the far-field. It was good to be home, but he couldn't quite get his head on straight. That's when he saw the lone horse out in the field. Anger surged in him as he urged his horse into a run across the large expanse of pasture. If one of those longhorn cattle came near enough to gore that Stallion, they'd be out a lot of money. His mind kept going over who was in charge of the horses this morning when he headed out. Then he remembered, it was Maggie. Shaking his head as he easily jumped the fence and gained on the skittish Stallion. Evidently, the horse realized he was in the wrong place. Once- he neared the horse he saw the dangling rope. Grinding his teeth and jumping off his horse he grabbed the rope and reached up to tie it to the horn on his saddle. He stepped up into the saddle and started for the barn. He would have her hide for this. She knew how to tie a proper knot. Where was that girl's mind?

When he neared the barn, he saw his little sister brushing her mare. She looked up and their eyes locked. Hers was the first to dart away. She knew instantly that he was angry. The horse he was leaning toward her was one of the prize Stallions that her father had paid a lot of money for. Stepping around the back of her horse, she gazed over the horse's back timidly, dreading his wrath. Maybe if she put the horse between them it would be better, but the anger in his eyes was growing. Finally, she walked out of the stall and reached up for the rope that he handed her.

‘Maggie...’

‘What were you thinking? Do you have any idea where this horse was when I found him?’ Not giving her time to respond, he continued with a loud, booming voice full of anger. ‘He was out in the pasture with the longhorn cattle. What if one of those bulls decided to tear open this Stallion? How’d he get- loose? You know how to tie a knot.’ He slowly dismounted his horse and stood in front of his sister. Grabbing the rope, he tied it in a proper knot and slipped it over the hook on the side of the stall.

‘I’m sorry Ridge. I don’t know how he got loose. I swear I tied the knot tightly.’ She edged away from him as he continued to stare at her.

He reached up and pulled his cowboy hat off to wipe the sweat from his forehead. How could he stay mad at her? With a quick motion, he grabbed her and pulled her into his embrace. ‘Just be glad it was me that found him and not dad. He’d have you cleaning out stalls with your hands.’ He reached up and pulled her ponytail.

She made a face just thinking about that punishment. ‘Thanks, Ridge, for not ratting on me this time but I’ll do better. I guess I was distracted by the new horse and all.’ Looking over her shoulder at her new mare she smiled. ‘But you’ve got to admit she’s worth the distraction.’

He laughed and pushed her gently back toward her mare. ‘Well, distraction or not, don’t let it happen again or I’ll have you using your toothbrush on the bits.’

As she giggled, he rolled his eyes and headed over to brush his horse down, his heart-melting slightly at the sound of her giggle. That was one of the many things he'd missed while in Iraq.

His mind went back to that bad place that haunted his dreams and woke him in a cold sweat every night. The sand ate into his feet as he stood with his back against the jeep. He held his gun against his body in complete silence, waiting on the enemy to move closer. The cries from his injured fellow soldiers filled the air, causing his heart to pound loud in his ears.

Suddenly-

A loud explosion rattled the air and then the next thing he knew was seeing a hospital room ceiling. Then he was brought back to the stable when he felt a slight shiver run up his spine. Turning he realized a female was in the stables that he didn't know.

Maggie was talking with her as he walked up. The woman was stunning in her jeans and t-shirt, as she stood talking about the new mare. Both women looked up when he stopped beside Maggie.

'Ridge have you met the new vet yet?' She asked in a sweet telling voice. He looked down at her with a warning in his eyes, letting her know he was aware of the slight hint in her voice.

The woman stepped forward and extended her hand. 'I'm glad to finally meet the town's hero, Ridge Cauthen. Thank you for all you've done for this country.' She said in almost an exhale as she took in his gorgeous face and lean, muscular body.

He took her hand sheepishly as he grinned down at her. 'I'm just a normal man doing what he had to do.'

Suddenly- embarrassed, she said, 'I'm sorry, I didn't say my name, it's Mallory Talon.'

'Good to meet you, Mallory.' He tipped his hat and spun on his booted heel, heading back out of the stable. One thing he'd learned while at war was when that tingle went down your spine, you needed to take cover and it was time to take cover.

It was raining we ran to the barn and had hot sex and kissing. I was up early kidding him and she didn't want to drain him before his golf game with Timmy.

She brought him to the brink, but didn't drain his tank is the way he put it. It was eight o'clock and as he was preparing to meet Timmy for their nine o'clock tee time, I was still kidding him about what he misses when he plays golf. She told him to shoot that little white ball in that hole because you didn't shoot anything in this hole.

He laughed and said I can still cancel. I said don't do that, that golf course may close, but I stay open. She kissed him passionately, grab his manhood and told him to go beat Timmy and if he won, she'll give him a trophy. He waved bye and shouted I've had a trophy since I met you. Annie kissed him and said that's good because I'm going to drain you right now.

~*~

Even Marcel curses and coughs, covering his nose with his hand.

Behind me, I can imagine Marcel grinning. 'Ward Six has its own special perfume,' he says.

It's all good! Remember that!

'Your real name is Marcel,' I say, and he nods. This is what people are always talking about when they talk about God: this feeling, of being held and unspoken and protected. Feeling this way seems about as close to saying a prayer as you could get, so I follow Marcel back inside, holding my breath as we again encounter that awful stink. He has a secret name, just like me. We stand there for one more moment, looking at each other, and in that instant, I feel our connection so strongly it's as though it achieves physical existence, becomes a hand all around us, cupping us together, protecting us.

I follow Marcel down a series of serpentine hallways. The sensation of stillness and peace I had in the courtyard is replaced almost immediately by fear so sharp it is like a blade going straight into the core of me, driving down and deep until I can hardly breathe or keep going. At points, the wailing grows louder, almost to a fever pitch, and I have to cover my ears; then it ebbs away again. Once we pass a man wearing a long white lab coat, stained with what looks like blood; he is leading a patient on a leash.

Neither one looks at us as we pass. We make so many twists and turns I'm beginning to wonder if Marcel is lost, especially as the hallways grow dirtier, and the lights above us become fewer in number so that eventually we are walking through murk and obscurity, with a single functioning bulb to light up twenty feet of the blackened stone corridor. At intervals various glowing neon signs appear in the darkness, as though they are rising out of the air itself: WARD ONE, WARD TWO, WARD THREE, WARD FOUR. Marcel keeps going, though, and when we pass the hallway that leads to Ward Five, I call out to him, convinced he has gotten confused or lost his way.

Part: 9

'Marcel,' I say, but even as I say the word it strangles me because just then we come up to a heavy set of double doors marked with a small sign, barely illuminated, so faint I can hardly read it. And yet it seems to burn as brightly as a thousand suns.

He strokes the barrel of his gun-which has been resting casually between his knees- as though it is a pet.

'That's right.

This is the first time I've heard anyone in an official capacity acknowledge the existence of the people in the Wilds, and I sucked in a sharp breath. I know it must be painful for Marcel to stand there, talking dismissively about a friend who has been caught for being a sympathizer. The punishment must have been swift and severe, especially since he was on the government payroll. Most likely he was hanged or shot or electrocuted, or thrown into one of the cells to rot- if the courts were merciful and decided against a verdict of death by torture. If he even had a trial. Came as a total shock to me. 'Course I hardly knew him- saw him sometimes in the break room, once or twice in the shitter, that's about it.

Kept to himself, mostly. I guess it makes sense. Must have been getting chatty with the Invalids.'

Amazingly, Marcel's voice doesn't falter. 'What was the tip-off?' Marcel keeps massaging his gun, and something about the motion-gentle, almost, like he's willing it to live-makes me feel sick. 'No tip-off, exactly.' He sweeps his hair off his face, revealing a splotchy red forehead, shiny with sweat. It's much hotter here than it was in the other wards. The air must get trapped in these walls, rotting, and festering like everything else in this place. 'It figures he must have known something about the escape. He was in charge of cell inspections. And the tunnel didn't just sprout up overnight.'

'The escape?' The words fly out of my mouth before I can help it. My heart starts jolting painfully in my chest.

Nobody has ever escaped the Crypts, not ever.

'You must have heard about it.'

Marcel shrugs. 'A little of this, a little of that. Nothing confirmed.'

Marcel laughs. It's a terrible sound. It reminds me of the time I saw two seagulls fighting in midair over a scrap of food, screeching as they tumbled toward the ocean. 'Oh, it's confirmed,' For a moment Marcel's hand pauses on the gun, his fingers once again performing a dance on the trigger.

'Sure,' he says, keeping his eyes on Marcel, as though I'm not even there. He says. 'Happened back in February. We got the alarm from Raymon, as a matter of fact. 'Course if he was in on it, she might have had a lead time of six, seven hours.'

When he says the word, the walls seem to collapse around me. Then I remind myself that she might not be here at all and in any case, it could have been anyone who escaped, any female sympathizer or agitator. Still, the dizziness does not subside. I take a quick step backward, bumping up against a wall. It could be her, I think, and for one horrible, guilty second, I'm disappointed.

~*~

Then- I only have a couple of days off, and summer's almost over-.'

It's okay, I'll give you a deal, no problem, trust me.

'Listen, just let us in for a minute. That's all it will take: a minute. You can tell she's already scared out of her mind. I had to come all the way out here for this, a day off and everything, I was going to go to the pier, maybe try out some fishing.

Point is if I bring her home and she's not straightened out - well, you know, chances are I'll just have to haul out here again.

I'm filled with anxiety and fear and a desperate craving, all at once.

'What's wrong with her?' Marcel asks.

His voice sounds distant.

'Air,' I manage to force out. 'It's the air in here.'

Marcel laughs again, that unpleasant crackling sound. 'You think it's bad out here,' he says. 'It's paradise compared to the cells.' He seems to take pleasure in this, and it prompts me of a debate I had a few weeks ago with Marcel when he was arguing against the usefulness of the cure. I said that without love, there could also be no hate: without hate, no violence. Hate isn't the most dangerous thing, he'd said. Indifference is.

Marcel starts talking. His voice is low, and still casual, but there's an undertone of force to it: the kind of voice street peddlers lapse into when they are trying to get you to buy a carton of bruised berries or a broken toy.

'Why all the trouble?' Marcel says, jerking his head in my direction. 'If she's causing problems, there's an easy way to fix her up.' Marcel smiles tightly.

'Her father's Steven, a commissioner at the labs.

He doesn't want to do an early procedure, no trouble, no violence or mess.

Looks bad, you know.'

It's a bold lie. Marcel could easily ask to see my ID card, and then Marcel and I are screwed. I'm not sure what the punishment would be for infiltrating the Vaults under false pretenses, but it can't be good.

Behind me, I can imagine Marcel grinning. 'Ward Six has its own special perfume,' he says- As we walk, I can hear the barrel of his gun, slapping against his thigh. I'm worried I might faint, and I want to reach out and steady myself against the walls, but they are coated with fungus and moisture. On either side of us, bolted metal cell doors appear at intervals, each outfitted with a single grimy window the size of a dinner plate.

Through the walls, we can hear low moaning, a constant vibration. It's worse, somehow, than the screeches, and screams of earlier: This is the sound people make when they've long ago given up hope that anyone is listening, a reflexive sound, meant just to fill the time and space and the dimness.

I'm going to be sick.

Then filled, too, with that other word, pressing itself beneath all my other thoughts: escape, leakage, escape. An occasion too fantastic to contemplate. If my mother had been the one to break out, I would have known.

She would have come for me.

If Marcel is correct, my mother is here, behind one of these terrible doors-so close that if I could rearrange the particles and make the stone melt away, I might put my hand out and touch her. Closer than I ever thought I would be to her again.

I am filled with competing thoughts and desires: My mother cannot be here; I would rather she was dead; I want to see her alive. Ward Six consists of just the one long hallway. As far as I can tell, there are about forty doors, forty separate cells.

'This is it,' Marcel says. 'The grand tour.' He pounds on one of the very first doors. 'Here's your boy Raymon, if you want to say hello.' Then he laughs again, that awful crackling sound.

I think about what he said when we first entered the vestibule: He's always here, nowadays. Ahead of us, Marcel does not respond, but I think I see him shudder.

Marcel nudges me sharply in the back with the barrel of his gun. 'So, what do you think?'

'Awful,' I croak out. My throat feels like it has been encircled with barbed wire. Marcel seems pleased. 'Better to listen and do as you're told,' he says.

'No use ending up like this guy.'

We've paused in front of one of the cells. Marcel nods toward the tiny window, and I take a hesitant step forward, pressing my face up against the glass. It's so grimy it's practically opaque, but if I squint, I can just make out a few shapes in the obscurity of the cell: a single bed with a flimsy, dirty mattress; a toilet; a bucket that looks like it might be the human equivalent of a dog's water bowl. At first, I think there's a pile of old rags in the corner too, until- I realize that this thing is the 'guy' Marcel was pointing out: a filthy, crouching heap of skin and bones and crazy, tangled hair. He's motionless, and his skin is so dirty it blends in with the gray of the stone walls behind him. If it weren't for his eyes, rolling continuously back and forth as though he is checking the air for insects, you would never know he was alive. You would never even know he was human. The thought flashes again: I would rather she be dead. Not in this place.

Anywhere but here.

'What?' I say.

For a moment he doesn't answer. He is staring at something, I cannot see some door, presumably, farther down the hall.

Marcel has continued down the hall, and I hear him draw in his breath sharply. I look up. He is standing perfectly still, and the appearance on his face makes me afraid.

Then he turns to me abruptly, a quick, convulsive shake.

'Don't,' he says, his voice a croak, and the fear surges, overwhelms me.

'What is it?' I ask again. I start down the hall toward him. It seems, all of a sudden, that he is very far away, and when Marcel speaks up behind me, his voice too sounds distant.

'That's where she was,' he is saying. 'Number one-eighteen. Admin hasn't coughed up the dough to get the walls patched, yet, so, for now, we're just leaving it as is. Not a lot of money around here for improvements-'

Marcel is watching me. All his control and confidence has vanished.

Marcel holds up his hand like he's thinking of blocking my progress. Our eyes meet for just a second and something flashes between us- a warning, or an apology, maybe-and then I am pushing beyond him into cell 117.

His eyes are blazing with anger, or maybe pain; his mouth is twisted into a grimace.
My head feels full of noise.

In almost every way it is identical to the cells I've glimpsed through the tiny hallway windows: a rough cement floor; a rust-stained toilet, and a bucket full of water, in which several cockroaches are revolving slowly; a tiny iron bed with a paper-thin mattress, which someone has dragged into the very center of the room.

But the walls.

'Stray bobby pins; you are my Everest.'

#- Hashtag- (Organizing Day)

Looped huge and scratched, just barely, in the corners; inscribed in the graceful script and solid block lettering; chipped, scratched, picked away, as though the walls are slowly melting into poetry.

And on the ground, lying curled up against one wall is a dull silver chain with a charm still attached to it: a ruby-encrusted dagger whose blade has been worn down to a small nub.

The walls are covered- crammed- with writing. Nope- Not writing. They are covered with a single four-letter word that has been inscribed over and over, on every available surface.

Love.

Part: 10

Sleepy- sleepy- sleepy- 'How long can you stay still before you develop bedsores?'
Lazy boy...!

#- Hashtag: (MotivationMonday)

DADDY- My father's charm. My mother's necklace. My mother. All this time, during every long second of my life when I believed her dead, she was here: scratching, burrowing, chipping away, encased in the stone walls like a long-buried secret.

You know- 'For someone with such an intense need to be liked you-you would think I would have figured out how to be less of an asshole.'

I feel, suddenly, as though I am back in my dream, standing on a cliff as the solid ground disintegrates underneath me, transforms into the sand in an hourglass, running away under my feet. I feel the way I do at that moment when I realize that all the ground has vanished, and I am standing on a bare blade of air, ready to drop.

‘It’s terrible, you see? Look at what the disease did to her. Who knows how many hours she spent scrabbling along these walls like a rat?’

Tv time- ‘Does the food network use music recycled from 80's porn, or do I want to fuck that soufflé?’ This is why I do eat- god- shit and piss! ‘I suspect that low-carb diets work not because they are healthier, but because without carbs I simply lose the will to eat.’

~*~

Marcel and Marcel are standing behind me. Marcel’s words seem to be muffled by a layer of cloth. I take a step forward into the cell, suddenly fixated on a shaft of light, extending like a long golden finger from a space in the wall that has been chipped clear away.

The clouds must have begun to break apart outside: Through the hole, on the other side of the stone fortress, I see the flashing blue of the 3 Rivers, and leaves shifting and tumbling over one another, a snow slip of green and sun and the perfume of wild, growing things. The Boondocks...

As he’s fiddling with the keypad, which requires both that he type code and scan his hand on some kind of fingerprint-matching screen, Marcel reaches out and takes my elbow. ‘Let’s go,’ he says, making his voice gruff like my little fit has left him impatient.

Nevertheless, then his touch is moderate, and his hand warm and reassuring. I wish he could keep it there, but after only a second he lets me go again. I can read a plea, loud and clear, in his eyes: Be strong.

We’re almost there. Be strong for just a little while longer. Marcel appears interested in me for the first time.

He looks me up and down like I’m a grapefruit he’s evaluating in the supermarket for ripeness, and for a moment he doesn’t say anything. Then, finally, he stands, slipping the gun onto his shoulder. ‘Come on,’ he says. ‘Five minutes.’ The locks on the door release with a click.

Marcel leans his shoulder against it, straining, and it slides open just enough for us to squeeze by into the hallway beyond.

Marcel goes first, then me, then Marcel. The passage is so narrow we have to go single file, and it's even darker than the rest of the Vaults.

But the smell is what really hits me: a horrible, rotting, festering stink, like the Dumpsters by the harbor, the place where all the fish intestines get discarded, on the hottest day. Even Marcel curses and coughs, covering his nose with his hand.

So many hours, so many days, looping those same four letters over and over: that strange and terrifying word, the word that confined her here for over ten years.

~*~

In addition to, ultimately, the word that helped her escape. In the lower half of one wall, she has traced the word so many times in such enormous script- LOVE, each letter the size of a child- and gouged so deeply into the stone that the oh has formed a tunnel, and she has gotten out. Food for the body, milk for your bones, ice for the bleeding, a belly of stones.

-A folklore consecration...

Even after the iron gates clang shut behind us and the Vaults recedes in the distance, the feeling of being penned in on all sides doesn't go away. There's still a terrible, squeezing pressure in my chest, and I have to struggle to suck in full breaths.

An ancient prison bus with a wheezing motor carries us away from the border, to Deering. From there Marcel and I walk back toward the center of Pittsburgh, staying on opposite sides of the sidewalk. Every couple of feet he swivels his head to look at me, opening, and closing his mouth, like he's pronouncing a series of inaudible words. I know he's worried about me, and probably waiting for me to break down, but I can't bring myself to meet his eyes or speak to him. I keep my eyes locked straight ahead of me, keep my feet cycling forward. Other than the terrible pain in my chest and stomach, my body feels numb.

I can't feel the ground underneath me or the wind zipping through the trees, skating past my face; can't feel the warmth of the sun, which has, against all odds, broken through the terrible black clouds, lighting the world up a strange greenish color, as though everything is submerged in water.

When I was little and my mother died -when I thought she'd died- I remember going out for my first-ever run and getting hopelessly lost at the end of Congress, a street I'd been playing on my whole life. I turned a corner, and found myself in front of the Bubble and Soap Cleaners and had been suddenly unable to remember where I was, and whether the home was to the left or to the right.

Nothing looked the same.

Everything looked like a painted replica of itself, fragile and distorted, like I was caught in a funhouse hall of mirrors, with face does not mine looking back at me, luminous my regular world back to me, I feel now, once again; yes- lost and found and lost again, all at once this was happening or so it seems to me, I wonder if it was to them. In addition- now I know somewhere in this world, in the wildness on the other side of the fence, my mother is alive and breathing I see her angel body in- front of me all the time, do you see her? Me- sweating and moving and thinking frantically. I spectacle if she is thinking about me... plus the pain shoots deeper, in my mind, and hurting young small body it makes me- lose my breath completely, that I did not know I was holding in, so I have to rest... you see me sitting done in the grass, then I got up started walking and double up, one hand on my stomach.

Still- there are people on the streets, that I and you can see. This including a man that I take for a watchdog right away. Even now just before noon, he has a bullhorn swinging from his neck, besides a wooden baton strapped to one thigh.

I have to fight my way through the pain, that I have that they gave to me. It is radiating through my whole body, like hart barn in the night after eating far too much. Now, throbbing up into my head and shank with tremors down to my legs and toes. 'I think so,' I make a harsh gasp out...!

~*~

'Backstreet- on your left- go...' I uncurl up as much as I can- an adequate amount of, at least, to hobble into the backstreet in the middle of two larger buildings that a black glass and like way far up there, one has a point on it.

Halfway down the backstreet there are a few metal dumpsters, arranged parallel to one another, bustling with flies. The smell is disgusting, like being back in the Vaults, on the other hand, I sink down between them anyway, appreciative for the concealment and the chance to be seated. As soon as I'm resting, the throbbing hits and ticks in my head subside some, yet not all. I slope my head back against the brick wall there, and feel the world swaying some to my eyes, and looking forward and to the sides, a ship cut loosens for now mooring.

Marcel- he must have seen him too... there... do you? He stays a couple of feet away from me, skims through the street, trying to appear undisturbed, or unworried. Then again, he murmurs in my direction, 'Can you move- Jezz?' The voices said.

Part: 11

Marcel joins me a few moments later, squatting in front of me, brushing the hair away from my face. It's the first time he's been able to touch me all day. 'I'm sorry, Liv,' he says, and I know he really means it when he said something like this. 'I thought you'd want to know.' Maybe not...?

Ray aka Raymond...

~*~

She- I see her face too-

'Twelve years,' I say basically and so simply. 'I thought she was dead for twelve years.' For a while, we stay there in stillness. I am lost now in the past... confused me too.

~*~

Marcel rubs circles on my shoulders, arms then lay me down and feel my knees- anywhere he can reach, really, like he's despairing to maintain bodily contact with me. I wish I could close my eyes, and be blown into dust, and have nothing but nothingness, not feeling all my thoughts run like a train running down an upcoming dead-end track. I see the light run in flickers like being in the car looking out the window all the same as the girl in the first story.

Diffuse like fuzz or bully lint of mine- like just drifting off on the wind. All the same, his hands keep pulling me back, yes back- into the backstreet, dark cold and damp, it is fucking

Pittsburgh, what do you expect, and a world that has suddenly stopped making sense won't be right. She's out there somewhere, breathing, thirsty, eating, walking, swimming. Impossible like how and now, to contemplate going on with my life... It's just fucking impossible to imagine sleeping, and lacing up my shoes for a run and helping.

~*~

(Home)

I see- my new mom so bitch 2, and she is loading up all the dishes, and even lying in the house with some new boyfriend, when I know that she exists on in his mind as fucking perfect: that she is out there, orbiting as far from me as a distant constellation, like stars in the milky ways is not far enough.

Why?

Tell me why I didn't just walk- yet she comes for me?

'Your mother loved you.

She loved her dicks more.

Do you recognize that? She loved you.

Sure... I thought to myself. She still loves you. She desired you to be not hurtful.'

Yet you want to be that way to her.

On the other hand- then again- I don't know whom to pray to.

All at once, I can't remember any words said to me, and I can't think of anything but being in church not want to be there; like- when I was little and watching, I recall the sun brightness up my day, and then fade away beyond the stained- glass windows, loved it- like just watching all that light die, like my hope for faith- see if it would come back- ha. What do you think I have?

I have truly nothing, but dull panes of colored glass, raying out for me. All metallic thin and not- dunce insubstantial- looking. The thought flashes as speedily and clearly as an electrical surge passing like my clit in the light night, bringing the pain searing back. I squeezed my eyes shut, drop my head forward, pray for it to pass, and give the finger to the father, and walk out, I know he fucked Jenny and not in the ass.

Watching it tumble to the ground, and it reminds me of my mother 1, and those strange and terrifying walls and the tears come faster back then. I swore to the man up there I would never cry for anyone like that ever- never ever.

It's too late, I feel fucked in the ass once more, and it gets old and sore. Tears are blurring my vision, I kick a small boy in the face, dumping holy water in a teen girl's eyes, that was pointing at me saying shit that I did with a girl. I turn away from him and start fragmenting lines at the wall and running a fingernail down the bench. Over her name... she was my friend, not a lover. A minuscule portion of brick crumbles away.

The girl- Hanna- 'If you cared about me, you would take me away,' I say. 'If you cared about me at all you would go right now.'

His place I go-

'I do care about you,' Ray says. 'You don't.' Now I know I am being juvenile, but I can't help it. 'She didn't either... she didn't care at all. Like bitch 1, all the same.'

'That's not true.' He yelled out- running after. I said- 'Why didn't she come for me, then?' I'm still turning away from him, pressing the palm against his room wall, hard; feeling like it, too, might collapse at any second.

(My thoughts)

'Where is she now? Fucking shit- I should like my sister, yet that is what, and everyone wants, isn't it? she said moody and pissed off at the world.

Why didn't she come looking for me then is she the one?'

Ray said- You know why, he says, more firmly.

'You know what would have happened if she was caught again- if she was caught with you. It would have meant death for both of you.'

I know he's right, but that doesn't make it any better. I keep going stubbornly, unable to stop myself from the shit I feel. 'It's not that... it's not that- she doesn't care, and you don't care. Nobody ever cares... About me- about- shit and about- anything or anyone.' I draw my forearm across my face moving into the handhold of my cheeks, swiping at my nose getting the snot.

~*~

Ray puts a hand on each of my elbows and guides me around to face him. When I refuse to meet his eyes yet feel dejected, he tilts my chin upward, forcing me to look, stop looking down, let me see those eyes...they shin up at him- wet glass nice- yet shy.

~*~

'Maggie- Liv,' he repeats, the first time... since we met that he has ever used my full name. You don't need to know that it sucks ass. Heat rushes through me like never- ever before it was like a barning fart from my ass hole. For the first time in my life, I am not afraid of the words they all say.

Something seems to yawn open inside of me, to stretch out like a girl on her bed, like a pussy trying to soak up the sun, into the bargain I'm desperate for him to say it again.

Like- her voice is endlessly soft. Her eyes are warm and flecked with light, like a dream of her in a perfect way- the color of the sun melting like butter through the trees on a warm autumn evening.

~*~

Ray- That's when it happens, the crying and crap, standing there is- sandwiched between two disgusting dumpsters in some crappy lane with the whole world crumbling, down around me, and hearing Kellie say those words, all the fear I have carried with me since myself scholarly to sit, stand, breathe-since I was told that at the very heart of me was something wrong, something rotten and diseased, something to be suppressed- since I was told that I was always just a heartbeat away from being damaged- all of it vanishes at once.

(More judgment's)

That thing-the heart of hearts of me, the core of my core -stretches and unfurls even further, soaring like a flag: making me feel stronger than I ever have before. His fingers skate the edge of my chin, dance briefly over my lips. 'You should know that like- you have to know that.'

'As well as I love you too.'

Nevaeh- I thought back on it I think the band teacher, though I would have picked up a really little girl, to my lips and played her like a flute; she horizontal like... he would look at me and- 'I say that what I thought you would do you're that stupid to- mix this thing up.' Me- as I thought, that was the soundhole down there on her blowing into her vagina.' Otherwise so he would have thought, that what I would to someone we eye's- like on me doing nothing wrong. I said- 'She made the same sound as the band didn't, she- not as fuck at that one drum you tuned?'

Ray- I open my mouth and say, 'I love you too.' Ray looks hazy dazed and confused, even though he's crouching no more than a foot away from me.

'Hey, Look at me.' I say with longing for his look. My eyes opened he take me there full of delightful energy, I have now, don't you see?

He looks at me saying these very words-

'You must be hungry,' he says gently.'

'Let's get you home, okay?' 'Are you okay?' He said.

'Now are you okay to walk?'

He shuffles back a little, giving me space to stand.

'No.' It comes out more emphatically than I'd intended, and Ray looks startled.

'You're not okay to walk?'

A little crease appears between his eyebrows.

'No.' It's a struggle to keep my voice at a normal volume. 'I mean I can't go home. At all.' He sighs and rubs his forehead. I think he will be happy, but instead, he just seems tired.

He looks away, squinting. 'Listen, Liv, it's been a really long day. You're exhausted. You're hungry lust, desire, and your wanting, with complete pain.

You're not thinking clearly... don't you see.' The same path you're going down- I see her dad said to her.

'I am thinking clearly.' I feel that- I feel fucked up! Did I die some when she did? Dyeing on the inside... are you for her now? I haul myself to my feet, hopeless, so I don't look so helpless. I'm angry at this boy, too- even though I know this isn't his fault, what- so- ever.

'Hello: I am your mind, giving you someone to talk too.' But then again, the fury is whipping around inside of me, undirected, gaining force. 'I can't stay here Ray.

Not anymore...

Not after- not after... after that.'

My throat spasms as I swallow back the scream again. 'They knew, my boy. They knew and they never told me, how they feel about him.' How do you feel about him now?

He climbs to his feet too- slowly for my liking, like- it hurts him or some shit like that. 'You don't know that for sure,' he says. I cut him off by the pass. Asking- 'You don't get it.' A scream is welling inside of me, a black creepy- crawly scrabbling in my throat. All I can think is- they knew it was known.

They all knew- mom and dad and maybe even my girl- Rachel- and still they let me believe all along that she was dead. They let me believe she had left me.

They let me believe I wasn't worth it. I'm filled, suddenly, with white-hot anger, ablaze: If I see them, if I going home, I won't be able to stop myself. I will not... don't you see this? I'll burn the fucking apartment building down now, or tear it apart, plank by plank. 'I want to run away with you. To the countries like the girl in the story. Like we talked about.'

'I do know... do you?'

I insist, and it's true. I do know, deep down. I think of my mother 2 bent over me, the floating pale whiteness of her face breaking through my sleep, her voice- I love you. Remember...? They cannot take it all the shit inside like I.

I see Hanna- sung quietly in my ear, the sad little smile dancing on her lips.

She knew too. She must have known they were coming for her and would take her to that terrible place. Besides only a week later, I sat in a scratchy black dress in front of an empty coffin with a pile of orange peels to suck on, trying to keep back tears, not once more them one girl I love while everyone- I believed inbuilt around me a solid, smooth surface of lies and red eyes. ('She was sick' 'This is what the disease does call.' 'Suicide.') I was the one who was really buried that day. 'I can't go home and I won't. I'll go with you. I ran... I ran... with him and his many...

~*~

'Liv... if you leave- really leave-it won't be like it is for me now. You get that, right? You won't be able to go back and forth. You won't be able to come back ever. we dated, yet not known to anyone. Your number will be invalidated.

Everyone will know you're a cheater. Everyone will be looking for you. If anyone found you-if you were ever caught-

Ray doesn't finish his sentence. She's gone so yah date the friend- right all the same no. 'Listen, liv. I'm really sorry. I know you have had- I mean, with the whole thing that comes about today- I can't imagine how you must be sensitive.'

We can make our home in the Wildernesses. Other individuals do it, don't they? Other people have done it. My mother, I want to say, my mother is going to do it, but my voice breaks on the word. Ray is watching me carefully and wondering why. 'I don't care,' I snap back saying, I'm no longer able to control my temper. 'You where the one who suggested it, weren't you? So, what...? Now...? I'm ready to go, you take it back?' I said shouting.

'I'm just trying to- forget it.'

I cut Ray off again, rapid-firing my mouth, coasting on the anger, the desire to shred, and hurt and tear apart. 'You're just like everybody else. You're as bad as all the rest of them. Conversation, exchange, dialog- it comes so easily to you. Nevertheless, when it's time to do whatever thing when it's time to help me...'

'I'm trying to help you...' Ray says sharply... 'It's a big deal...

Do you- understand that...? It's a huge choice- I have to make or pick it here... in addition to that, he is so pissed at me for what...? As well as you don't know what you're saying to me.'

He's getting angry too, the tone of his voice makes something painful run through me like a butt end of a spoon- blunt, but I can't stop speaking.

Sometimes you even have to give them up. Ray and I talk about all the things I'll be leaving behind to go with him to the wildernesses. He wants to be absolutely sure that I know what we're getting into. Stopping by Bakery after closing and buying the day-old bagels, and cheddar buns for a dollar each; sitting out on the piers and watching the gulls shriek and circle overhead; long runs up by the farms when the dew glistens off every blade of grass as though they're encased in glass; the constant rhythm of the oceans, beating under Pittsburgh.

~*~

Karly- 'I'm fine...' I push around some ravioli on my plate and slips down my chin, then I total my fork, and one falls on my boob. Normally, I can put away half a box myself, especially after a long run or beating off my guitar or boy. Same thing with me... (and still, have room for dessert creamy no!), but I've barely managed to choke down a few bites. 'Just stressed.'

'Leave her alone,' my mom 2 says.

'She's upset about the evaluations. They didn't exactly turn out as planned.'

She lifts her eyes to my uncle, and they exchange a quick glance. I feel a rush of excitement. It's rare for my mom, and dad to look at each other like that, a wordless glance, full of meaning. like a heartbeat; the narrow-paved streets of the old harbor, shops crowded with bright, pretty clothes- I could never afford, yet this thing I have is $10,000 that she gave up for this shit- for popularly, she not my big sis to me- she is not... any longer.

~*~

Put an end to, destroy, abolish: I want to break everything- him, me, us, the whole city, the whole world.

I sing this shit- ‘‘Don’t treat me like a child,’ I say. I’m loving, not a fighter respectable to women, I ain’t Chris Brown I don’t feel the need to hit ‘em, it’s sad to see a 12-year-old acting like a little ho, Takin’ naked pictures while she’s livin’ in her parents’ home Post ‘em up on Twitter, it’d make u reconsider. Every time you go online to find a babysitter. Sometimes it makes me wanna blow my f*ckin head off!

But, don’t listen to a word I say, because it doesn’t really mean a thing... The world is full of hypocrites and I’m the fucking king, it’s not like I mean it, we’re all in agreement. As soon as u hear this freaking song, I’m sure you’ll just delete it...’

Yep!

I get this, do you?

‘Then stop acting like one,’ he rips off back at me. The second the words are out of his mouth- I can tell he regrets them. He turns partially away, inhales, and then says, in a normal tone of voice... It’s strange, but after that moment in the passageway I suddenly understand the meaning of my full name, the reason my mom named me Maddie- Liv in the first place and the meaning of the old biblical story, of Joseph and his abandonment of Mary Madeleine. I understand that he gave her up for a reason. He gave her up so she could be saved, even though it killed him to let her go.

He gave her up for love.

I think, maybe, my mother had a sense even when I was born that she would someday have to do the same thing. I guess that’s just part of loving people:

You have to give things up. Trace and Sana and the other girls are my only regrets. The rest of Pittsburgh. Can dissolve into nothing, for all I care: its shiny, spindly false towers and blind storefronts, and staring, obedient people, bowing their heads to receive more lies, like animals offering themselves up to be slaughtered.

‘If we go together, it’s just you and me,’ Ray keeps repeating, as though needing to make sure I understand-as though needing to be sure that I’m sure.

‘No going back. Ever.’ And I say: ‘That’s all I want. Just you and me... always.’

I mean it too... I'm not even afraid. Now that I know I will have him- that we have each other- I feel as though I will never be afraid of anything ever again.

We decide to leave Pittsburgh. in a week, exactly nine days before my scheduled procedure. I'm nervous about delaying our departure so long- I'm halfway tempted to make a straight run for the border fence and try to barge my way through in broad daylight- but as Explain sentences usual, Marcel tranquilities me down and explains the importance of waiting. In the past few years, he has made the crossing only a handful of times. It's too dangerous to go back and forth more often than that. But in the next week, Marcel will cross twice before we make our final escape-an almost suicidal risk, but he convinces me it's necessary. Once he leaves with me and starts missing work and class, he'll be invalidated too-even though, technically, his identity was never really valid in the first place, since it was created by the battle.

And once we're both canceled, we'll be erased from the system. Gone.

Blip!

~*~

Everyone turns to look at me, even Tracie, who puckers her nose and tilts her head like a dog sniffing at something new.

'Are you okay, Liv?' my uncle asks, adjusting his glasses as though hoping to bring me into a clearer focus. 'You seem a little strange.'

Most of the time their interactions are limited to the usual thing-my uncle tells stories about work, my aunt tells stories about the neighbors. What's for dinner? There's a leak in the roof. Blah blah blah. I think that for once they're going to mention the Wilds and the Invalids. But then my uncle gives a minute shake of his head.

'These kinds of mix-ups happen all the time,' he says, staking a ravioli with his fork. 'Just the other day, I asked Andrew to reorder three cases of Vik's orange juice. But he goes and gets the codes wrong and guess what shows up? Three cases of baby formula. I said to him, I said, 'Andrew -' I tune the conversation out again, grateful that my uncle is a talker, and happy that my aunt has taken my side. The one good thing about being kind of shy is that nobody bugs you when you want to be left alone. I lean forward and sneak a glance at the clock in the kitchen.

Seven-thirty, and we haven't even finished eating. And afterward, I'll have to help clear and wash the dishes, which always takes forever; the dishwasher uses up too much electricity, so we have to do them by hand. Outside, the sun is streaked with filaments of gold and pink. It looks like the candy that gets spun at the Sugar Shack downtown, all gloss and stretch, and color. It will be a beautiful sunset tonight. At that moment the urge to go is so strong, I have to squeeze the sides of my chair to keep from suddenly springing up and running out the door. Finally, I decided to stop stressing and leave it to luck, or fate, or whatever you want to call it. If we finish eating, and I'm done cleaning up the dishes in time to make it to Back and Gold Cove, I'll go. If not, I'll stay. I feel a million times better once I've made the decision, and even manage to shovel down a few more bites of ravioli before Jenny (miracle of miracles) has a sudden late burst of speed and cleans her plate, and my aunt announces I can clear the dishes whenever I'm ready. The truth is, I don't know what would happen. I've never broken curfew.

Just as I've finally accepted that there's no way to get to Back Cove and back in time, my aunt does the unthinkable. As I'm reaching forward to take her plate, she stops me. 'You don't have to clean the dishes tonight, Lena. I'll do them.'

As she's speaking, she reaches out and puts a hand on my arm. Just like earlier, the touch is as fleeting and cool like the wind. And before I can think about what this means, I'm blurting out, 'Actually, I have to run to Hanna's house really quick.' I stand up and start stacking everyone's plates. It's almost eight o'clock. Even if I can wash all the dishes in fifteen minutes and that's a stretch-it will still be difficult to get to the beach by eight-thirty. And forget about making it back by nine o'clock, when the city has a mandated curfew for all under-agers. And if I got caught on the streets after curfew.

'Now?' A look of alarm or suspicion? flickers across my aunt's face. 'It's nearly eight o'clock.' 'I know. We-she-she has a study guide she was supposed to give me. I just remembered.' Now the look of suspicion-it is suspicion, definitely makes itself comfortable, drawing her eyebrows together, cinching her lips. 'You don't have any of the same classes. And your boards are over. How important can it be?'

'It's not for class.' I roll my eyes, trying to conjure up Hanna's nonchalance, even though my palms are sweating and my heart is jerking around in my chest.

‘It’s like a guide full of pointers. For the evaluations. She knows I need to prep more since I almost choked yesterday.’ Again, my aunt directs a small glance at my uncle. ‘Curfew’s in an hour,’ she says to me. ‘If you get caught out after curfew.’

I’ve never spoken back to her, have always tried to be as patient and obedient and good as possible-have always tried to be as invisible as possible, a nice girl who helps with the dishes and the little kids and does her homework and listens and keeps her head down. I know that I owe mom for taking Kellie Nervousness makes my temper flare. ‘I know about curfew,’ I snap... ‘I’ve only been hearing about it for my whole life.’ I feel guilty the second that the words are out of my mouth, and I drop my eyes to avoid looking at Carol. and me in after my mother died. If it wasn’t for her, I would probably be wasting away in one of the orphanages, uneducated, unnoticed, destined for a job at a slaughterhouse, probably, cleaning up sheep guts or cow crap or something like that. Maybe- maybe! - if I was lucky, I’d get to work for a cleaning service. No foster parent will adopt a child whose past has been tainted by the disease.

I wish I could read her mind. I have no idea what she’s thinking, but she seems to be analyzing me, attempting to read my face. I think I’m not doing anything wrong, it’s harmless, I’m fine, over and over, and wipe my palms on the back of my jeans, positive I’m leaving a sweat mark.

‘Be quick,’ she says finally, and as soon as the words are out of her mouth I’m off, jetting upstairs and converting my sandals for sneakers. Then I bang back down the stairs and fly out the door. She barely had time to take the dishes into the kitchen. She calls something to me as I blur past her, but I’m already pushing out the front door and don’t catch what she says. The ancient grandfather clock in the living room starts booming out just as the screen door swings shut behind me.

Eight o’ three clocks. I unlock my bike and pedal it down the front path and out into the street. The pedals creak and moan and shudder. This bike was owned by my cousin Marcia before me and must be at least fifteen years old, and leaving it outside all year isn’t doing anything to preserve it.

I start cruising in the direction of Back Cove, which is downhill, fortunately. The streets are always pretty empty at this time of night. For the most part, the cured are inside, sitting at dinner, or cleaning up, or preparing for bed and another night of dreamless sleep, and all the uncured are home or on their way there, nervously watching the minutes swirl away toward nine o'clock four curfews. My legs are still aching from my run earlier today. If I make it to Back and Gold Cove on time and Ray is there, I'm going to be a complete mess, sweaty and disgusting.

However, I keep going anyway. Now that I'm out of the house I push all my doubts and questions out of my mind and focus on hauling ass as fast as my cramping legs will allow me, spinning down through the vacant streets toward the cove, taking every shortcut I can think of, watching the sun descend steadily toward the blazing gold line of the horizon, as though the sky—a brilliant, electric blue at this point—is water, and the light is just sinking through it.

I've only been out at this hour a few times on my own, and the feeling is strange—frightening and exhilarating at the same time, like talking to Ray out in the open earlier this afternoon: as though the revolving eye that I know is always watching has been blinded just for a fraction of a second, as though the hand you've been holding your whole life suddenly disappears and leaves you free to move in any direction you want. Lights sputter in windows around me, candles and lanterns, mostly; this is a poor area, and everything is rationed, especially gas and electricity.

After a minute's rest, I keep pedaling, slower now. I'm still about a mile away but the cove is visible, flashing off to my right. The sun is just teetering over the dark mass of trees on the horizon. I have ten, fifteen minutes' tops until total darkness. At a certain point I lose sight of the sun's position beyond the four- and five-story buildings, which grow more densely packed after I turn onto Preble: tall, skinny, dark buildings, pressed up against one another as though already preparing for winter and huddling for warmth. I haven't actually supposed about what I'll say to Marcel, and the idea of standing alone with him suddenly makes my belly bottom out. I have to pull my bike up abruptly, stop and catch my breath. My heart is pounding frantically.

Then another thought nearly stops me, hitting me traditional like a fist: He won't be there. I'll be too late and he'll leave. Or this will turn out to be a big joke or a trick.

I wrap one arm around my stomach, willing the ravioli to stay put and pick up speed again.

I was having a fantastic dream until he awakens to reality, he wasn't dreaming, I was taking advantage of his morning 'Hard On.' It was very cold outside but he was sweating from the heat Annie was putting out. When Annie tasted his pre-cum, she rode him slowly and deeply. I got off and repeated her slow, deep and wet oral of what she calls 'MY - Penis.' This went on for an hour before Ray exploded like a burst pipe under full pressure.

Daddy will never know...

I was too exhausted to talk once again, but I spoke up and said 'Thank you, Honey.' He just barely able to speak said not this time baby, thank you for loving me. I crawled up on me and told him what she does for him, she does for herself.

Listen to me... was said, if you're happy, I'm happy. Besides, you gave me a great Christmas. If I can't please my man, why am I here? Like I said yesterday Teddy, marriage is so easy, loving you is easier. He didn't say a word he just pulled me on top of him and just held her like he didn't ever want to let her go.

I tried to get up and prepare breakfast for him but he would not let her go. So, Annie decided to use her trump card. This was... said in her sexy playful voice, you haven't measured my pregnant butt in three days. He immediately reaches out and felt her ass.

If and when you're pregnant, how fast does it grow? I said if this was my second child, he maybe I could tell you, but I don't have a clue. Get the tape measure and measure my stomach and butt. He released me and ran to the bathroom to get the tape. Wow, he shouted, your stomach is out another inch. Then the drum roll and the tally on the size of her ass. It has also grown an inch.

I thought she had played him and was out of bed and on her way to getting dressed. Raymon had another plan, he grabbed her and said I'll let you go on one condition. She gave a hum and said what's that illness. He said- wear that Santa's helper outfit and I'll let you go. I laughed and said ok, that's a deal, I love that outfit.

It took him about five minutes to realize I left without bathing him. He ran downstairs and said I made mistake honey on our deal. I said a deal is a deal teddy boy. But then again you know how I look forward to you bathing me. Annie stopped preparing breakfast, walked up to Teddy and asked if he was serious about her bathing him.

He kissed her on her forehead and told her he loves it when she bathes him.

He when on to tell her it not just his penis wash, but they're together in an intimate setting, alone, it almost as good as having sex with her, almost. He when on to say they laugh, talk about nothing serious, and he looks forward to that at least twice daily. I said I guess the coffee can wait for the reason that you can't. I'm about to speed through the long-defunct traffic light at Baxter when I am suddenly dazzled by a wall of zipping, bouncing light: the beams of a dozen flashlights directed into my eyes, so I have to skid abruptly to a halt, lifting a hand to my face and nearly flipping over the handlebars-which would be a real disaster, since in my rush to get out of the house I forgot to bring my helmet.

'Stop,' the voice of one of the regulator's barks out-the leader in charge of the patrol, I guess. 'Identity check.' I'm so busy circling one foot after the other left, right, left, right-and doing a mental tug-of-war with my digestive tract, that I don't hear the regulators coming.

Clusters of regulators-both volunteer citizens and the actual regulators laboring by the government-patrol the streets every night, looking for uncured breaking curfew, checking the streets and (if the curtains are open) houses for unapproved activity, like two uncured touching each other, or walking together after dark-or even two cured engaging in 'activity that might signal the reemergence of the deliria after the procedure,' like too much hugging and kissing. This rarely happens, but it does happen.

Regulators report directly to the government and work closely with the scientists at the labs.

Watchdogs were responsible for sending my mother off for her third procedure; a passing patrol saw her crying over a photograph one night right after her second failed treatment. She was looking at a picture of my father, and she'd forgotten to close the curtains all the way. Within days, she was back at the labs. Customarily it's easy to avoid the regulators. You can practically hear them from a mile away. They carry walkie-talkies to coordinate with other patrolling groups, and the static interference of the radios going on and off makes it sound like a giant buzzing den of hornets is heading your way. I just wasn't paying attention. Mentally cursing myself for being so stupid, I fish my wallet out of my back pocket. At least I remembered to grab that. It's illegal to go without ID in Pitt. The last thing anybody wants is to spend the night in jail while the powers that be try to verify your validity. 'Magdalena Ellahaj,' I say, trying to keep my voice steady, as I pass my ID to the regulator in charge. I can hardly make him out behind his flashlight, which he keeps trained on my face, forcing me to squint. He's big; that's all I know. Tall, thin, angular.

'Ella,' he repeats. He flips my ID over between his long fingers and looks at my identity code, a number assigned to every citizen of the USA. The first three digits identify your state, the next three your city, the next three your family group, the next four your identity. 'And what are you doing, highway shit? Curfew's in less than forty minutes.' Less than forty minutes. That must mean it's almost eight-thirty. I shift on my feet, trying hard not to betray impatience. A lot of the regulators- especially the volunteer ones-are poorly paid city techs: window washes or gas-meter readers or security guards. I take a deep breath and say as innocently as possible, 'I wanted to take a quick ride down to Back and Gold Cove.' I do my best to smile and look kind of stupid.

'I was feeling bloaty after dinner.' No point in lying any more than that. I'll just get myself in trouble. The lead regulator continues to examine me, the flashlight directed glaringly at my face, my ID card in his hand. For a second he seems to waver, and I'm sure he's going to let me go, but then he passes my ID to another regulator. 'Run it through with SVS, will you? Make sure it's valid.' My heart plummets.

SVS is the Secure Validation System, a computer network where all the valid citizenships, for every single person in the entire country, are stored. It can take twenty to thirty minutes for the computer system to match codes, contingent on how many other people are calling into the system. He can't really think I've forged an identity card, but he's going to waste my time while someone checks. And then, unbelievably, a voice pipes up from the back of the group. 'She's valid, Gerry. I recognize her. She comes into the store. Lives at 119 Phillie.' Gerry swings around, lowering his flashlight in the process. I blink away the floating dots in my vision. I recognize a few faces vaguely-a women who work in the local dry cleaners and spends her afternoons leaning in the doorway, chewing gum and occasionally- spitting out into the street; the traffic officer who works downtown near Franklin Pretrial, one of the few areas of Pittsburgh that has enough car traffic to justify one; one of the guys who collects our garbage-and there, in the back, Deved Howard, who owns the Walmart down the street from my apartment.

He's super skinny and has hooded black eyes that remind me of a rat. But tonight, I feel like I could hug him. I didn't even think he knew my name. He's never said a word to me except, 'Will that is all today?' after he has rung up my purchases, glowering at me from underneath the heavy shade of his eyelids. I make a mental note to thank him for the next time I see him. Normally my uncle brings home most of our groceries-canned goods and pasta and sliced meats, for the most part -from his combo deli and convenience store, Save a lot, all the way over on Monroy Hill, but occasionally or Bilo, if we're desperate for toilet paper or milk, I'll run out to the Walmart. Mr. Howard has always creeped me out. Gerry hesitates for a fraction of a second longer, but I can see that the other regulators are starting to get restless, shifting from foot to foot, eager to continue the patrol and find someone to bust.

Gerry must sense it too because he jerks his head abruptly in my direction.

'Let her have the ID.' Relief makes me feel like laughing, and I have to struggle to look serious as I take my ID and tuck it into place. My hands are shaking ever so slightly. It's strange how being around the regulators will do that to you. Even when they're being relatively nice, you can't help but think of all the bad stories you've heard -the raids and the beatings and the ambushes. 'Just be careful,' Marcel says, as I straighten up. 'Make sure your home before curfew.' He tilts his flashlight into my eyes again. I lift my arm to my eyes, squinting against the dazzle. 'You wouldn't want to get into any trouble.'

~*~

And I'm only a few minutes from Back Cove. My heart picks up its rhythm as I think about skidding down the sloping hill of grass, seeing Marcel framed against the last, dazzling rays of sun-as I think about that single word breathed into my ear.

~*~

Marcel says it lightly, but for a moment I think I hear something hard running under his words, a current of anger or aggression. But then I tell myself I'm just being paranoid. Nope no matter what the regulators do, they exist for our protection, for our own moral rights.

The regulators sweep away in a group around me, so for a few seconds, I'm caught up in a tide of rough shoulders and cotton jackets, unfamiliar cologne, and sweat-smells. Walkie-talkies sputter to life and fade away again around me. I catch snippets of words and broadcasts: Market Street, a girl, and a boy, possibly infected, unapproved music on St. Paul's, someone appears to be dancing - I get bumped side to side against arms and chests and elbows until finally, the group passes and I spit out again, left alone on the street as the regulators' footsteps grow more distant behind me. I wait until I can no longer hear the fuzz of their radio chatter or their boots hitting the pavement. Then I take off, feeling again a lifting sensation in my chest, that same sense of happiness and freedom. I can't believe how easy it was to get out of the house. I never knew I could lie to my aunt- I never knew I could lie, period-and when I think, about how narrowly I escaped getting grilled by the regulators for hours, it makes me want to jump up and down and pump my fist in the air.

Tonight, the whole world is on my side. I tear down the street, which loops around the last mile down to Back and Gold Cove. And then I stop short. The buildings have fallen away behind me, giving way to ramshackle sheds, sparsely situated on either side of the cracked and run-down road. Beyond that, a short strip of tall, weedy grass slants down toward the cove. The water is an enormous mirror, tipped with pink and gold from the sky.

In that single, blazing moment as I come around the bend, the sun-curved over the dip of the horizon like a solid gold archway-lets out its final winking rays of light, shattering the darkness of the water, turning everything white for a fraction of a second, and then falls away, sinking, dragging the pink and the red and the purple out of the sky with it, all the color bleeding away instantly and leaving only dark.

Marcel was right I was he not...?

The regulators must have been wrong about the time. It must be after eight-thirty now. It was a gorgeous-one of the best I've ever comprehended.

For a moment I can't move or do anything but stand there, breathing hard, staring. Then an emotionlessness creeps over me. I'm too late. Uniform if Marcel decides to wait for me somewhere along the long loop of the cove, I don't have a prayer of finding him and making it home before curfew.

My eyes sting and the world in front of me goes watery, colors and shapes sloshing together. For a second I think I must be crying, and I'm so startled I forget everything-forget about my disappointment and frustration, forget about Marcel standing on the beach, the thought of his hair catching the dying rays of the sun, flashing copper.

I can't remember the last time I cried. It's been years. I wipe my eyes with the back of my hand, and my vision sharpens again.

It's just sweat, I realize, relieved; I'm sweating, it's getting in my eyes. Still, the sick, leaden feeling won't work its way out of my stomach. I stay there for a few minutes, straddling my bike, squeezing the handlebars hard until I'm a little bit calmer. Part of me wants to say, screw it, to shove off, both legs extended, and go flying down the hill toward the water with the wind whipping up my hair- screw curfew, screw the regulators, screw everyone. But I can't; I couldn't; I could never. I have no choice. I have to get home.

On the way home I tell myself that it's probably for the best. I must be crazy, zooming around in the half-dark just to meet up with some guy on the beach.

Besides, everything has been explained: He works at the labs, probably just snuck in on evaluation day for some completely innocent reason-to use the bathroom, or refill his water bottle. And I remind myself that I probably imagined the whole thing-the message, the meeting up. He's probably sitting in his apartment somewhere, doing coursework for his classes. I maneuver my bike around in a clumsy circle and start back up the street. Now that the adrenaline and excitement have faded, my legs feel like they're made out of iron, and I'm panting before I've gone a quarter of a mile. This time I'm careful to stay alert for regulators and constabularies and patrols.

He's probably already forgotten about the two girls he met at the lab multifaceted today. He was probably just being nice earlier, making casual discussion.

It's for the best. But no matter how many times I repeat it, the strange, hollow feeling in my stomach doesn't go away. And ridiculous as it is, I can't shake the persistent, needling feeling that I've forgotten something, or missed something, or lost something forever. Of all the systems of the body-neurological, cognitive, special, sensory-the cardiological system is the most sensitive and easily disturbed. The role of society must be to shelter these systems from infection and decay, or else the future of the human race is at stake.

Food and me not friends- like- 'I cut my finger and used a can opener one-handed.' I was done...

Part: 13

Movie time- 'Hey Pixar, maybe put some louder music in those sad moments so a bitch can snuffle undetected.'

#- Hashtag- (Inside Out)

'So- infected with deliria and in violation of the pacts of society, she fell in love with men who would not have her or could not keep her.' Similarly, a summer fruit that is protected from the insect invasion, streak, and rot by the whole mechanism of modern farming; so, must we protect the heart. Her last love, they say, was the greatest: a man named Jo, a bachelor all his life, who found her on the street, bruised and broken and half-crazy from hallucinations.

We learned all about it in Biblical Science. First, there was John, then Matthew, then Jeremiah and some other one I can recall as of now, and Judas, and many other nameless men in-between.

There's some debate about what kind of man Jo was- whether he was righteous or not, whether he ever succumbed to the disease-but in any case, he took good care of her. He nursed her to health and tried to bring her peace.

By this time, however, it was too late. She was tormented by her past, haunted by the love's lost and damaged and ruined, by the evils she had inflicted on others and that others had inflicted on her. She could hardly eat; she wept all day; she clung to Joseph and begged him never to leave her, but couldn't find comfort in his goodness.

And then one morning, she woke and Joseph was gone without a word or an explanation. This final abandonment broke her at last and she fell to the ground, begging God to put her out of her misery.

He heard her prayers, and in his infinite compassion, he instead removed from her the curse of deliria, with which all humans had been burdened as punishment for the original sin of Eve and Adam. In a sense, Mary Magdalene was the very first cured.

‘And so- after years of tribulation and pain, she walked in righteousness and peace until the end of her days.’ I always thought it was strange that my mother named me Magdalena. She didn’t even believe in the cure. That was her whole problem. And the Book of Lamentations is all about the dangers of deliria. I’ve done a lot of thinking about- it, and in the end- I guess I’ve figured out that despite everything, my mother knew that she was wrong: that the cure, and the procedure, were for the best. I think even then she knew what she was going to do- she knew what would happen. I guess my name was her final gift to me, away. It was a message. I think she was trying to say, Forgive me. I think she was trying to say, Someday, even this pain will be taken away.

Do you see? No matter what everyone says, and despite everything, I know she wasn’t all bad.

The next two weeks are the busiest of my life.

Like back on like- December 20th You know that lit girls have to do that get ever longer- ‘That thing where you haven’t shaved your legs in a bit, so you decide to wait, and get a wax; but then you don’t do that either.’

‘Every year the same question: what the hell are you supposed to buy men for Christmas? Besides socks or a sex doll? Merry Christmas! I hope everyone has put on at least 7 pounds today! Remember guys, the better she looks in that dress, the scarier her underwear is. Merry Christmas!

#- Hashtag: (Santa Brought Me Diabetes and Commando!)

Part: 14

Magazine time- ‘No. 1...??? Half-naked supermodels in Mad Max and Y’all went to see awkward chicks sing and do vagina jokes?? This is a world I can get behind.’ Sick...! >Look at this girl here< could be that, yet I fat and ugly. I so what to be them, or cute, at least that. I can eat a pie, god I feel overweight! At 100 pounds, and like four feet.

It's seven-thirty days before Christmas, his parents, at least his dad wants to come and see his pregnant daughter in law. Ray's mother said her husband has been on cloud nine since hearing the news. I myself so-o excited to see his parents, his dad dick hanging out. I wanted them to stay at their house since they have the mother in lawsuits ready, but he said not before the baby is born. He wants to hear a newborn crying. Annie now knows where he gets his weird sense of humor.

I finish making hot cocoa and they're going to watch Christmas movies on TV. He for the tenth time in the last ten minutes asked how she's feeling. Annie said I'm feeling great. Do you need or want anything? He said no, I'm good. Annie told him- she's feeling a little neglected, he's not all over her like he used to be, and she misses that. I said- I just didn't want to push you, or you know, I mean, I don't know when you're feeling your best. I said- calm down my daddy, when I'm not feeling well, I will tell you okay. Pending then I want your hands all over me as you did before, I really miss that. I found a good movie on TV and laid down between my legs hugging her thigh. Every now and then he would kiss and suck her inner thigh. Annie patted him on his head and said that's my good boy.

Christmas was on a Saturday this year, us- had taken two weeks off knowing- Teddy's parents were coming in and knowing they wanted time to themselves when it was all over. Timmy had called and said they would be over at six that evening and were bringing dinner. Annie was upstairs and called I call him my teddy to come to take a bath before Chuck and Liv showed up, I think we are friends even if she is older then I. He wanted to know why so early?

Annie said don't come, it's your loss. Needless to say, he ran like the flash.

When Ray entered the shower, he asked me what he was going to miss. I said in a minute, now hold still. When I got to the penis was, she dried her hands and told him to get that book from under a towel near the shower. He opens the book and saw dates with fractions and some whole numbers by each date which seems to be a week apart. I said I don't get it. What do they mean? By this time, I was having a good laugh. My- Teddy shouted what I am missing.

I said I don't know if I should tell you before I hand wash your dick. She said what these small numbers would have to do with my dick! I said- those numbers; those small numbers represent how much bigger my ass is getting every week. He shouted what! Your ass has gained three inches since Thanksgiving. Annie said yes, I'm surprised you didn't notice. That's why I told you last night I want doggie-style; I was hoping you would notice. Congratulations honey, you're getting a bigger ass to play with, just what you wanted. He shouted yes, that what I'm talking about. I said yes, I'm talking about how hard your dick got since I told you, but it easier to wash.

By the time- he and I got there. We had measured my ass six times. After the couples had eaten, both wanted to talk with them Kelly was in the kitchen, with Liv a new friend from middle school when Ray called her.

Liv went and sat by Chuck. Liv started by saying how much they love me and him. Timmy then said why they would like to get married on the same day as they got married, it's on a Friday next year and Annie will have given birth. Annie and Teddy said that's great. We feel honored that you would cherish our special day as your own.

I jumped up and hugged Liv, Ray- high.

The couple asked to keep it quiet until they tell their parents. they wanted to wait until little MY- Teddy was able to walk as the ring bearer, but he just wanted to marry Liv as soon as possible. I and Lisa at the same time said, 'How do you know it's going to be a boy!'

Timmy as cool as he could be, replied, 'My mom said her black hair, just like I was so full and shiny, just like I when she was pregnant with me, therefore, Kellie is carrying a boy.' Of course, I and Lisa laughed at him. Teddy just said, there's a lot of judgment in that statement. I and Lisa laughed at Teddy also.

Annie said I bet it was that doggie style that hurt you, you shot a pint in me, I thought your cum would never stop coming out of me. My- Teddy just barely able to speak for laughing said, that was good, no, that was great. He kissed Annie and told her she might be right, that orgasm was different.

~*~

(In the shower)

I notice her stomach was out just a little, she shouted at teddy to look at it and confirm. I told her it's definitely out a little. Hanna left the shower soaking wet to call her mother. He is standing there pleading with her to wait until after the penis wash. I was still laughing at him when her mother answered the phone. She asked her what she was laughing so hard about. I just said he was being silly. When I told her mom about her stomach, her mom told her to be at her house first thing in the morning so she could see it, or she could come to my house. She is very charged up about Karly maybe- pregnancy and she wants to experience every aspect of it.

When I finally returned to the shower, he was standing there with the tape measure.

Annie said oh, you want to measure my stomach. Teddy said I only measure your ass; you can measure your stomach. I was playing with it turned around and bent over. He went ‘WOW’ that ass is getting huge. I stood up and started to hit Ray, then said I’ll let you have your seven and half months of fun. I started to laugh and told her to show her- pussy and her breast will get bigger also, will you measure them. I said no, I have a flashlight to inspect that monster to me, and my hands for your breasts. They both started laughing.

With three days to go before Christmas, I told her he would drive her to her parents’ house. I didn’t want to take any chances with the holiday traffic. As they were driving, I asked him if they could ride around tonight and watch the Christmas lights. He told her that would be great. They could grab some sandwiches from Timmy and get some cocoa. I said I’ll make the cocoa the way you like it and we can get just the sandwiches from Bill’s.

I have created a grandma to be a monster with her mom. She was going crazy over Hannie’s little baby bump that he made for her. Then Mrs. Irene said that butt is getting big. That made me smile which Mrs. Irene notice. Then she did the big no-no, she called his mom and told her about I bump. Instead of flying out tomorrow evening, his parents, mainly his mom, are flying out first thing in the morning.

Do it more so not then...

~*~

I got out of the hot shower, and my damp body was still wrapped in a towel when Ray commanded, ‘Come to me, baby.’ That stimulating, stern voice was coming from above me. My stomach did flips just as I stopped at the entrance of the walk-in closet. That domineering voice had me hypnotized. It was sexy, guiding, welcomed, and turned me on greatly. I started panting, my body tingling and warming. That overassertive tone in which he used spoke volumes of what he had planned. I didn’t know if I was going to get palmer and such- (Ray ’s assertive yet loving palm against my ass cheeks) I turned and looked up at the second level of the walk-in closet, and he was leaning on the railing, looking pointedly at me, shirtless and barefoot. That was a glorious, breathtaking view.

With my eyes set on him, I obeyed and climbed the stairs at an even pace. The further I climbed to the second level, gaze steady with his, the more he lured me in.

My pussy was already thumping, preparing itself for Ray's huge invasion, in any position he so desired. When I finally reached him, he stood directly in front of me, our bodies barely touching, pulled the towel free from me with authority, and, with his delectable lips a mere inch from mine, he seductively said, 'This towel has no use; it's only a distraction.' He threw it to the floor.

The heat his body radiated told of the inferno within. He was burning with desire, and I knew a short sex-ing wasn't going to put out that fire- she and I were going to be up all night long. I felt the goosebumps form on my skin just as he softly nuzzled against my neck, groaning under his breath, until he gently bit my earlobe and demanded, 'Follow me inside you.' Always obedient, I followed him deeper into the closet, admiring the back view of his sexy, toned body and nice tight ass in a pair of black low-rise lounge pants he wore. He leaned against one of the necktie racks, left ankle over right, barefoot, and with his sculpted arms crossed across his chiseled chest. With his eyes fixed on me and burning with undeniable, shameless need, he motioned his head to a pair of burgundy, four and a half-inch pink cuff fuzzy pumps in the center of the room and said, 'Put them on.'

With a smile, I obeyed, slipping my right foot in first and bending over to buckle the ankle strap. I didn't need to look in Ray's direction to see if he was taking in the sight- I felt his eyes on me, swallowing me whole. After I got the left shoe on, I looked down at my feet, turning each foot in various angles, loving how beautiful they looked on my feet.

He made his way to me, his hot, hard body pressed close against mine, and while gesturing his left hand in an offering manner, he commanded, 'Pick a tie.' At the sound of that, my heart skipped a beat and then picked up the pace. He had never ordered or given me that option before. Pick a tie... What the hell was Ray about to do to me? Clearly, he knew I would be baffled, and that I was as I stood in shock, staring at him in my naked glory, nipples getting harder pussy wetter and a fire boiling in my own core. But then again, without delay, I walked over to the wall, gently brushed my left hand along a row of ties as I walked from one end of the closet to the other, adding fuel to the fire- teasing him oh so cutely- by swaying my hips and looking back at him over my shoulder. I felt sexy in my pumps and birthday suit, and the look on my husband's face said he thought so, too. I selected a red tie to match my new pumps and turned to Hannie with a smile.

'I choose this one,' I said you like this for him too?

'That one is for your left wrist,' he said with a smile equal to mine but firm enough that I knew he was in control of the events to follow. 'Now pick one for your right wrist.' I complied, and when I turned to hand the two to him, he took them from my hand and said, 'Now two more.' He set his gorgeous greenish-grey eyes on me before love the contacts- raising them back to meet eyes with me, his sexy medium-thick brows raised up some. Now his smile was a devilish grin, and all I could ask myself was, what the hell is this sexy, forceful man of mine going to do to me?

Every day after school there's an assembly or ceremony, or graduation party to go to. Hana gets invited to all of them; I get invited to most, which surprises me. Marlowe has invited most of the graduating class- there are sixty-seven of us in total and probably fifty at the party- which makes me feel less special, but it's still fun.

We sit in the backyard while the housekeeper runs in and out of the house with plates and plates of food- coleslaw and potato salad and other barbecue stuff- and her father turns out spare ribs and hamburgers on the enormous smoking grill. I eat until I feel like I'm about to burst and have to roll back onto the blanket I'm sharing with Hanna. Kellie- who lives with Hanna in the Northern End, and whose father does something for the government- invites me to come over for a 'casual good-bye thing.' I didn't even think she knew my name- whenever she's talking to Hanna her eyes have always skated past me like I'm not worth focusing on. I go anyway. I've always been curious about her house, and it turns out to be as spectacular as I imagined. Summer explodes into Pitt.

In early June the heat was there but not the color- the greens were still pale and tentative, the mornings had a biting coolness- but by the last week of school everything is Technicolor and splash, outrageous blue skies and purple thunderstorms and ink-black night skies and red flowers as bright as spots of blood.

Her family has a car, too, and electric appliances everywhere that obviously get used every day, washers and dryers and huge chandeliers filled with dozens and dozens of light bulbs.

We stay there until almost curfew, when the stars are peeking through a curtain of dark blue and the mosquitoes rise up all at once and we all go shrieking and laughing back into the house, slapping them away. Afterward, I think it's one of the nicest days I've had in a long time.

Even girls I don't really like-like Shy, who has hated me since sixth grade, when I won the science fair and she took second place-start being nice. I guess it's because we all know the end is close. Most of us won't see one another after graduation, and even if we do it will be different. We'll be different. We'll be adults-cured, tagged and labeled and paired and identified and placed neatly on our life path, perfectly round marbles set to roll down even well-defined slopes.

Theresa Grass turns eighteen before school ends and gets cured; so, does Shy-. They're absent for a few days and come back to school just before graduation.

It's like all their anxiety and self-consciousness has been removed along with the disease. Even the legs have stopped trembling. Whenever she used to have to speak in class, the trembling would get so bad it would rock the desk. But after the procedure, just like that-whoosh! The shaking stops.

Of course...

They're not the first girls in our class to get cured- Hanna and Hannie- Hahn where both cured ways back in the fall, and half a dozen other girls have had the procedure this past semester-but in them the difference is somehow more pronounced. The change is amazing. They seem peaceful now, mature and somehow remote like they're encased in a thin layer of ice.

Only two weeks ago Theresa's nickname was Theresa Gross, and everyone made fun of her for slouching and chewing on the ends of her hair and generally being a mess, but now she walks straight and tall with her eyes fixed straight in front of her, her lips barely curled in a smile, and everyone shifts a little in the halls so she can pass easily. The same thing goes for her.

I keep going with my countdown. Eighty-one days, then eighty, then seventy-nine. Willow Marks never comes back to school. Rumors filter back to us that she had her procedure and it turned out fine; that she had her procedure and now her brain is going haywire, and they're talking about committing her to the Vaults, Pitts's combo prison-and mental- ward; that she ran away to the Wilds. Only one thing is for sure: The whole Marks family is under constant surveillance now. The regulators are blaming Mr. and Mrs. Parkings- and the whole extended family-for not instilling in her a proper education, and only a few days after she was supposedly found in Oaks Park next to the old school, I overheard my aunt and uncle whispering that both of Willow's parents have been fired from their jobs. A week later we hear that they've had to move in with a distant relative. Apparently, people kept throwing rocks at their windows, and a whole side of their house was written over with a single word: WELL-WISHES.

It makes no sense because Mr. and Mrs. Parkings were on record insisting that their daughter have the procedure early, despite the risks, but as my aunt says, people, get like that when they're scared. Everyone is terrified that the deliria will somehow find its way into Pittsburgh on a large scale. Everyone wants to prevent an epidemic. And it may sound awful, but I don't think about Willow's family for long. There's just too much end-of-high school paperwork to file, and worried energy, and lockers to spotless out and final exams to take and people to say goodbye to. I feel bad for the Marks family, of course, but that's the way things are. It's like the regulators: You may not like the patrols and the uniqueness checks, but since you know it's all done for your protection, it's dreadful not to liaise.

Part: 15

Hanna and I can barely find time to run together. When we do, we stick to our old routes by silent agreement. She never mentions the afternoon at the labs again, to my surprise.

Hanna's mind- has a tendency to skip around, and her new obsession is a collapse at the northern end of the border that people are saying might have been caused by Invalids. I don't even consider going down to the labs again, not for one single solitary second. I focus on everything and anything besides my lingering questions about Marcel-which isn't too hard, considering that I now can't believe I spent an evening biking up and down the streets of Pitt, lying to Mom and the regulators, just to meet up with him.

On graduation day Hanna sits three rows ahead of me at the commencement ceremony. As she files past me to take her seat she reaches out for my hand- two long pumps, two short ones-and when she sits down, she tilts her head back the very next day it felt like a dream or a delusion. I tell myself I must have gone temporarily insane: brain scramble, from running in the heat. So, I can see that she has taken a marker and scrawled on the top of her graduation cap: THANK GOD! I stifle a laugh, and she turns around and makes a pretend-stern face at me. All of us are giddy, and I've never felt closer to the St. Anne's girls than that day-all of us sweating under the sun, which beams down on us like an exaggerated smile, fanning ourselves with the commencement brochures, trying not to yawn or roll our eyes while Principal Ass wipe drones on about 'adulthood' and 'our entrance into the community order,' nudging one another and tugging on the collars of our scratchy graduation gowns to try to let some air down our necks.

Family members sit in white plastic folding chairs, under a cream white tarp fluttering with flags: the school flag, the city flag, the state flag, the American flag. They applaud politely as each graduate goes up to receive her diploma. When it's my turn I scan the audience, looking for my aunt and my sister, but I'm so nervous about tripping and falling as I take my place on the stage and reach for the diploma in the Principal's hand, I can't see anything but color- green, blue, white, a mess of pink and brown faces-or make out any individual sounds beyond the shush of clapping hands. Only Hanna's voice, loud and clear as a bell: Liz!' That's our special pump- a chant that we used to do before track meets and tests, a combination of both of our names. Afterward, we line up to take individual portraits with our diplomas. An official photographer has been hired, and a royal blue backdrop set up in the middle of the soccer field, where we all stand and pose. We're too excited to take the pictures seriously, though. People keep doubling over laughing in their pictures, so all you can see is the crown of their heads.

When it's my turn for a picture, at the very last second Hana jumps in and throws one arm around my shoulders, and the photographer is so startled he presses down on the shutter anyway.

Click! There we are: I'm turning to Hana, mouth open, surprised, about to laugh. She's a full head taller than me, has her eyes shut and her mouth open. I really do think there was something special about that day, something golden and maybe even magic because even though my face was all red and my hair looked sticky on my forehead, it's like Hana rubbed off on me a little bit- because despite everything, and just in that one picture, I look pretty. More than pretty.

We did it! We did it!’ And none of the parents or teachers try to separate us. As we start to break away, I see them encircling us, watching with patient expressions, hands folded. I catch my aunt’s gaze and my stomach does a weird twist and I know that she, like everyone else, is giving us this moment -our last moment together, before things change for good and forever. And things will change-are changing, even at that second.

Attractive, even. The school band keeps playing, mostly in tune, and the music floats across the field and is echoed by the birds wheeling in the sky. It’s like something lifts at that moment, some huge pressure or divide, and before I know what’s happening all my classmates are crushing together in a huge hug, jumping up and down and screaming, ‘We did it! As the group dissolves into clumps of students, and the clumps dissolve into individuals, I notice Theresa Gross and Shy- already starting across the lawn toward the street. They are each walking with their families, heads down, without once looking back.

They haven’t been celebrating with us, I realize, and it occurs to me I haven’t seen Ray and Rena or Annie Pahnies or the other cured’s either. They must have already gone home. A curious ache throbs in the back of my throat, even though of course this is how things are: Everything ends, people move on, they don’t look back.

It’s how they should be. I catch sight of Rachel through the crowd and go running up to her, suddenly eager to be next to her, wishing she would reach down and ruffle my hair as she used to when I was very little, and say, ‘Good job, Loony,’ her old nickname for me.

‘Rachel!’ I’m breathless for no reason, and I have trouble squeezing the words out. I’m so happy to see her I feel like I could burst into tears. I don’t though, obviously.

‘Congratulations, Lena.’ I stick my face in the flowers and inhale, trying to fight down the urge to reach out and hug her.

‘You came.’

‘Of course, I came.’ She smiles at me.

‘You’re my only sister, remember?’ For a second we just stand there, intermittent at each other, and then she reaches out to me. She passes me a bouquet of daisies she has brought with her, loosely wrapped in brown paper. I'm sure she's going to put her arms around me for old times' sake, or at the very least give me a one-armed squeeze.

Instead, she just flicks a bang off my forehead. 'Gross,' she says, still smiling. 'You're all sweaty.' It's stupid and immature to feel disappointed, but I do. 'It's the gown,' I say and realize that yes, that must be the problem: The gown is what's choking me, stifling me, making it hard to breathe. All the voices intermingle and become indistinguishable from one another-like the constant white noise of the ocean running underneath the rhythm of the Pitt streets, so constant you hardly notice it. 'Come on,' she says. 'Mom will want to congratulate you.' Mom is standing at the field's periphery with my uncle, Grace, and, Jenny, talking to Mrs. Panderer, my history teacher. I fall into step beside Rachel. She is only a few inches taller than I am and we walk together, in sync, but separated by three feet of space. She is quiet. I can tell she's already wondering when she can go home and get on with her life.

I let myself look back once. I can't help it. I watch the girls circulating in their orange gowns like flames. Everything seems to zoom back, recede away at once. Everything looks stark and vivid and frozen, as though drawn precisely and outlined in ink-parents' smiles frozen, camera flashes blinding, mouths open and white teeth glistening, dark glossy hair and deep blue sky, and unrelenting light, everyone drowning in light-everything so clear and perfect

I'm sure it must already be a memory or a dream.

H is for hydrogen, a weight of one; when fission's split, as brightly lit's hot as any sun.

He is for helium, a weight of two;

The noble gas, the ghostly pass That lifts the world anew.

Li is for lithium, a weight of three; A funeral pyre, when touched with fire- And deadly sleep for me. During the summers I have to help my uncle at the Save a lot Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays, mostly stocking shelves and working behind the deli counter and occasionally helping with filing and accounting in the little office behind the cereal and dry goods aisle. Thankfully, in late June, Andrew Marcus gets cured and reassigned to a permanent position at another grocery store.

On the Fourth of July, I head to Hana's house in the morning. Every year we go to see the fireworks at the Eastern Promenade.

In recent years Hanna and I have made it a kind of game to stay out until the last possible second, cutting it closer and closer every year.

Hana's last name is Tate, and we were linked up by alphabetical order (by then I was already going by my aunt's last name, Tiddle.)

Part: 16

A band is always playing and vendors set up their carts, selling fried meat on skewers and corn on the cob and apple pie floating in a puddle of ice cream, served in little paper boats. The Fourth of July-the day of our independence, the day we commemorate the closing of our nation's border forever-is one of my favorite holidays. I love the music that pipes through the streets, love the way the steam rising thick from the grills makes the streets look cloudy, the people shadowy and unclear. I especially love the temporary extension of curfew: Instead of being home at nine o'clock, all uncured are allowed to stay out until eleven. Last year I stepped into the house at 9:46 precisely, heart hammering in my chest, shaking with exhaustion- I would have to sprint home. But then again, I lay in bed I couldn't stop grinning. I felt like I'd gotten away with something. I type in Hana's four-digit gate code- she gave it to me in eighth grade, saying it was 'a sign of trust' and also that she'd slit me 'from the top of the head to the heels' if I shared it with anyone else -and slip in through the front door. I never bother knocking. Her parents are hardly ever home, and Hana never answers the door. I'm pretty much the only person who comes over to see her.

It's weird...

Hanna was always really popular in school-people looked up to her and wanted to be like her-but even though she was really friendly with everybody, she never really got close- close to anyone besides me. Sometimes I wonder whether she wishes she'd been assigned a different desk partner in Mrs. Sariseraski's second-grade class, which is how we first became friends. I wonder whether she wishes she'd been placed with Becca Jralawny, or Katie La-carp, or even Merissa Poinortofa. Sometimes I feel like she deserves a best friend who is just a little more special.

~*~

It felt as if my heart was ripped out of my chest. It was official; the doctors confirmed what I dreaded the most. You were dead. The doctor sadly told your mother the devastating truth. She raised her hand to her mouth and tears started to swell up into her eyes. I comforted her as she fell apart in her grief. Her child was gone. He passed away four in the morning where his heart gave up. I shared her grief because I loved you so much that it hurt to know that you were gone. Gone forever. Your funeral was a small private matter. It was a rainy June day when we buried in the Irving Park Cemetery where your grandfather lay. Dressed in black, everyone you knew and loved you came to say goodbye. I stood beside your mother and held her hand as- she softly sobbed into her handkerchief. The priest in his clergy outfit moved his lips as he read passages from the Bible. As your casket lay down on the earth, there was silence.

The night of your funeral, I never felt so empty in my life. You were a part of me, a part of my life. I loved you so much, but now you're gone. Your sister stayed with me that night, she told me how your death would change things between your mother and father and I know this to be true.

Your sister stayed with me that night and in the morning, he was gone. She left me a letter and thanked me for letting her stay. She was leaving Chicago for good this time and told me to tell her mother that she loved her. The weeks since your death, life went on or as they say, I moved on from the heartache. I was completing my degree at university. Remember, how you would tease me about being a bookworm. I guess I thought English would be a good degree. My parents are doing well in the bakery. You used to love to go there. My parents have been understanding about your death to me and helped me through it. I spent the night there, at my folk's place. Maybe because my mother missed me and since I already home, I might as well crash there.

There was no word from your sister. Your mother was frantic when she came over to my house. My mother comforted her when she sobbed. Becca was the only thing that held her together.

Your father, as your mother told us, was with his mistress, and she never felt so alone. I knew Erica was in Europe, but I didn't if she meant when she said she wouldn't come back.

Twilight lined the horizon the next morning, and for a while, I ran down the sidewalk across the neighbors of the community. The adrenaline hit me as I kicked off my feet. My breath was ragged; I was sweating but I kept going. I remembered how you would join me in my morning run and we would run in silence but together. After the hard exhortation, we would collapse on the main empty football field of our former high school, and you would turn and smile, that wicked gleam in your eyes, and ask, 'Ever consider not giving a damn about the world, but think about yourself?'

I remember telling you I didn't care about myself. I was, as my mother told me, selfless.

You would laugh, your blue eyes sparkling, and said, 'You must think of yourself for once, Emma. There is no crime in being selfish, even only for a while.'

You were right that day, Alvin, I was selfish. I didn't want you to die. I knew that you were suffering from depression, but I didn't know how great you suffered. I knew things at home were hard, with your parents fighting all the time. Your father's drinking habits were stressing you out as well as your sister. But I should have told your life was worth more than the suffering.

And now, I lay on the empty field, arms stretched out, and gasping for breath after all that running. The sun is coming out; the sky is changing to blue. I insert my earphones into my ears and click the play button where Bon Jovi's song, always plays on:

It's been raining since you left me. Now I'm drowning in the flood. You see I've always been a fighter. But without you, I give up. As I closed my eyes, I remembered the time you and I talked about death. We were fifteen at that time, and my grandmother had died to lose her battle with cancer. I remember how I sobbed hysterically, but you watched me with understanding in your eyes and a calm façade. Then you sat beside me after the funeral and you said, 'Do grieve for her. She wouldn't want you too.'

I asked you how you could say such a thing, but you shook your head and said, 'Listen, Em. You know your grandma loved you and she loved you too. If you love her, you would not grieve for her. She isn't coming back. I know it sounds harsh, but it's true. Death leaves a mark on the heart, but love gives you an everlasting memory, and in her memory, you should smile and think of the good things about your grandma, and by remembering, you will move on from the ache and sorrow.'

I asked you that day if you died wouldn't you want anyone to grieve for you? You smiled and laughed, 'That would be ridiculous,' you said, 'Why would anyone sob over me?' Then you calmed your eyes and said, 'Death is inevitable. It completes where life begins. The wheel comes full circle.' 'If I die, don't grieve for me, she always remembers me. That's all I ask of you.' I opened my eyes when the flashback ended and got to my feet. There was no point in reliving the past for was almost melancholic. I turned, not looking back and continued on with my run. It was July now. Summer was at its height, the sun shone gold, the trees rustled in the wind and I continued on with life. I was there did I see your sister. Erica smiled at me and I was surprised to see her. She came over to me and we decided to head to Starbucks on her. We entered the shop and after ordering, I took my Frappuccino and we sat in the nearest booth and talked.

I asked her how she was doing and she told me that somehow after accepting that you were gone, she moved on and started looking on the brighter side of things. 'Becca, wouldn't want me to grieve over him,' Bacca said to me, 'He would have wanted me to live my life. He would have wanted me happy.'

I tore at that and told her that was exactly what you wanted from her. She was your younger sister. You loved her.

'Mom and Dad are getting divorced,' Erica said, 'I think Alvin's death was the breaking point, although, I knew that everything was going bad before...' she trailed.

I asked how her mother was doing, and Erica sighed, 'Not well. She is still grieving.' I asked her if there was anything to help her, and Erica's blue eyes became shadowed, 'I don't know, Emma, but...' she swallowed, 'I'm scared she might...' I knew what your mother thought of. Suicide. The only option.' 'And I don't want that,' Erica said, 'I lost Alvin, and I don't want to lose her too.'

I took her hand and squeezed it, for it was the only thing I can do.' Then Bacca decided and told me that the only way for your mother to recover was to have her go traveling and leave Chicago for a while. It was a splendid idea, and I knew that the only way to heal the heart was enjoying life, and your mother needed that.

When I waved Bacca and your mother goodbye at the airport, I drove myself home. I shrugged off- and a back and kicked off my shoes. When I sat on my bed and opened up a book to read, her letter- It was from you, about a month before your death. My hands shook as I ripped the envelope and unfolded the letter.

Your handwriting scribbled on the paper told me that as you lay in the hospital, the doctor giving you morphine, you knew that soon you were going to die. You feel it, you wrote. Emma, you wrote, don't cry at my grave as they bury me. I'm not gone. I am a part of you as you are a part of me. I love you, Em. I always have and always will. Always remember me. That's all I ask of you.

I know you said, not to cry, but that night, I did cry. I cried tears spilling down my cheeks, burying my face in my pillow. I cried not because you died, but because you loved me and I never had the chance to tell you the same.

My mother, who heard me crying- came into my room, and sat beside me. She cradled me in her arms and soothed my tears away. I stooped my tears in her arms as she pulled me to sleep, and I did fall asleep.

The next day, I stood at your- grave. I placed the flowers on your tombstone and looked at your name that was carved in I crouched on the floor and reflected on what you told me. Always remember me. That's all I ask of you.

'I love you. I love you and will always. 'I stood up and walked away. I would not look back. I would remember you. I love you. In a way, love gives us a meaning for remembrance.

I got into my car and played the Bon Jovi CD. Always, my favorite song played and as I turned the car on and drove away from the cemetery, Jovi's voice filled the air:

I'll be there till the stars don't shine- Till the heavens burst and...

The words don't rhyme-

And I know when I die-

You'll be on my mind-

And I'll love you-

Always-

Part: 17

Finger's in me...

Something you didn't know...

The girl just like Karly: that why I like it here... all the same in their ways. Marcel-middle school, I was in John Miller's classes, and do the same old shit as normal for a guy like me in my grouping, seven out of six was in that class, I swear to you this is true. That day the first day of school, I had on my new gold shorts and OCC top, now home- it was time to go out-like all ways, and blue dusk pail brown-sh to me- 2003 Toyota Camry, I was in... as we pulled into the now go best gas station, her dad was there all the time or so, I felt I knew him well. Long hair and looking like a hippie, now in a rock band, Low voice, yet yells it all out- her hero- I shit you not.

The arcing wavy she made- it's embedded in my mind after all this time.

So, is she... she looks at me- she was sitting on the red bare by the pump, what your name, hi- I am Kristen, I looked at here and it was hard to make words, love at first sight- I think so?

The place red white and blue... 'Do you want to take my daughter to the town?' 'Sure,' we did even really know anything about each other, yet we feel the love. She stopped dead in her tracks and so did I. Yet fate to place right I did not believe in- it eater and that goes for the both of us.

It just doesn't happen... that's life... is it not? His dad- black hair- brown eyes, and love the color blue... you would not get this in seventy-seven years who he is. Kind of crazy he asked my sexy-year-old grannie to marry him the first day wired- but true, the good guy right.

The best drummer in the world- not at that time after losing it all. And beating himself up over the death if he's the best buddy, in another big-time rock band. He was drinking hard, and not doing music any longer, yet his girl was all he had to keep going.

Her- brown eyes- short- covey- and the hips that only she has, heart, shaped. She looked fine in them jeans, next to kores bar, ever another window out, or boarded over and bars on those. It like she hexes me from not keeping a girl only hear in my heart. Black nail posh was on her hands- That is why it was so hard to fall.

Skipping through my memories- striped shirt she had on-

He has glasses, on as we were both locked in that gaze. Out of all the actus look how I picked not knowing this... was all for her and on her way back when.

~*~

(Aww her mouth dropped when I cracked how she was as she was playing in my mind and rushing tough my blood, I thought I was crazy hearing the voice, that I remember but could not place until a year later. She said quotes- of September 9, 2003- And it hit me she was Kristen, of the past days of days and times of times. Next, she going to say she is Sia. Or be in the Foo Fighters- Maybe- nah. She has cups...)

~*~

What I time I had here not seen but felt nothing but here, she was in my room to do this- and not she there all the time, don't ask just go with it. Why didn't I see this... sooner no I that to think she was some girl from my hometown, playing a game just as she would for, she is a lot like her... maybe the day she went away... I found one that was the same in all ways in her actions.

So, there it was- we held hand... in the back... in the car... at four p.m. His grandmother driving... the CD player blasting gospel country the Dannie O'Donalld or something- ah- in my ears- yet, I was all into him and not that.

Religion to me was a joke at that time... I have it now... don't ask... yet mom passing can do that. My faith was shaking, if there at all, dads too. Looking into her big brown eyes, she was looking back into mine feeling the same young but in love.

She led the way of my first in everything- this is true, I shit you not. There a lot of shit jokes with us and yes- I sometimes want to hold the bunny. She and I are the same in every way... every way- it just clicks with us, and go do that makes things hot. I love her giggle then, and it's the same now- heart to get when it coming through- you and you don't know whom she is for six weeks, but damn- I got her- now and then.

We have come a long way- cybernetics. Ha- don't cross the one that she has... or face the wrath of daddy, or piss them off she has that- power within. Yet no one in his dumb ass town knew who I was or my dad or try to get to know him, their ass hole, and I found out what that one meant to them too, more than I thought. I hope your pound- you're the dicks!

Besides I was there... in the Land of Many Steeples. Barnesboro- Pa. I was there- you all saw me, with him- the band- all around the land you saw him with me... what did you think? What did you think, I know what I think about you all? I do not like what I see... in the eyes of this town, yet I get him, and that's all the matter to me and not you that believed their lies, don't give me shit about him either I don't buy it for I know him, unlike you... and now look at what he did.

I love this girl like she'll stick her finger up my nose, and whatever.

I love this boy he will give me a Wet- Willy at any time.

X-O

Both nuts- we say back here.

Now that's adorable!

She makes fun of the way I talk all pa and shit.

-And he says everything I do is cute.

'Say I did do this- you don't give me credit or anything anyways so take it- hope you feel good about yourself when you do- take it away like everything- take it. This all mine and you will never take that away now!'

The first in everything- yet get that... now look she is going to play this in life and in this... on too. The kiss... The- that... the holding hands too.

The lovesick feeling... for Kristen Majah. Maybe it for she is the Jewish girl that had sex with a Father a the - Catholicism you better now that what you are if your catholic church, for the sin of being her, and being her race, yet I am blond and blue eyes, do you love me now? They did it in the confession both a swear to god they did... I was next on over- for what I think new about us she and I, and he- and he was the altar boy that he wanted too and that why.

I spent lots and lots of time looking for her online when she let to go to Pittsburgh, or so the story went, I could not find her- no- I could not- I look thought moon schools, and she was nowhere to be found, not listed in any of the towns. Yah eat your heart out! She went out of my life; he was gone for I was making movies and music. Yet it was her grandmother I got on the phone, saying she was too young. When really, she was a stare now.

(What the hell!)

